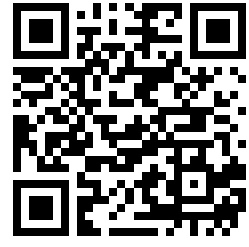
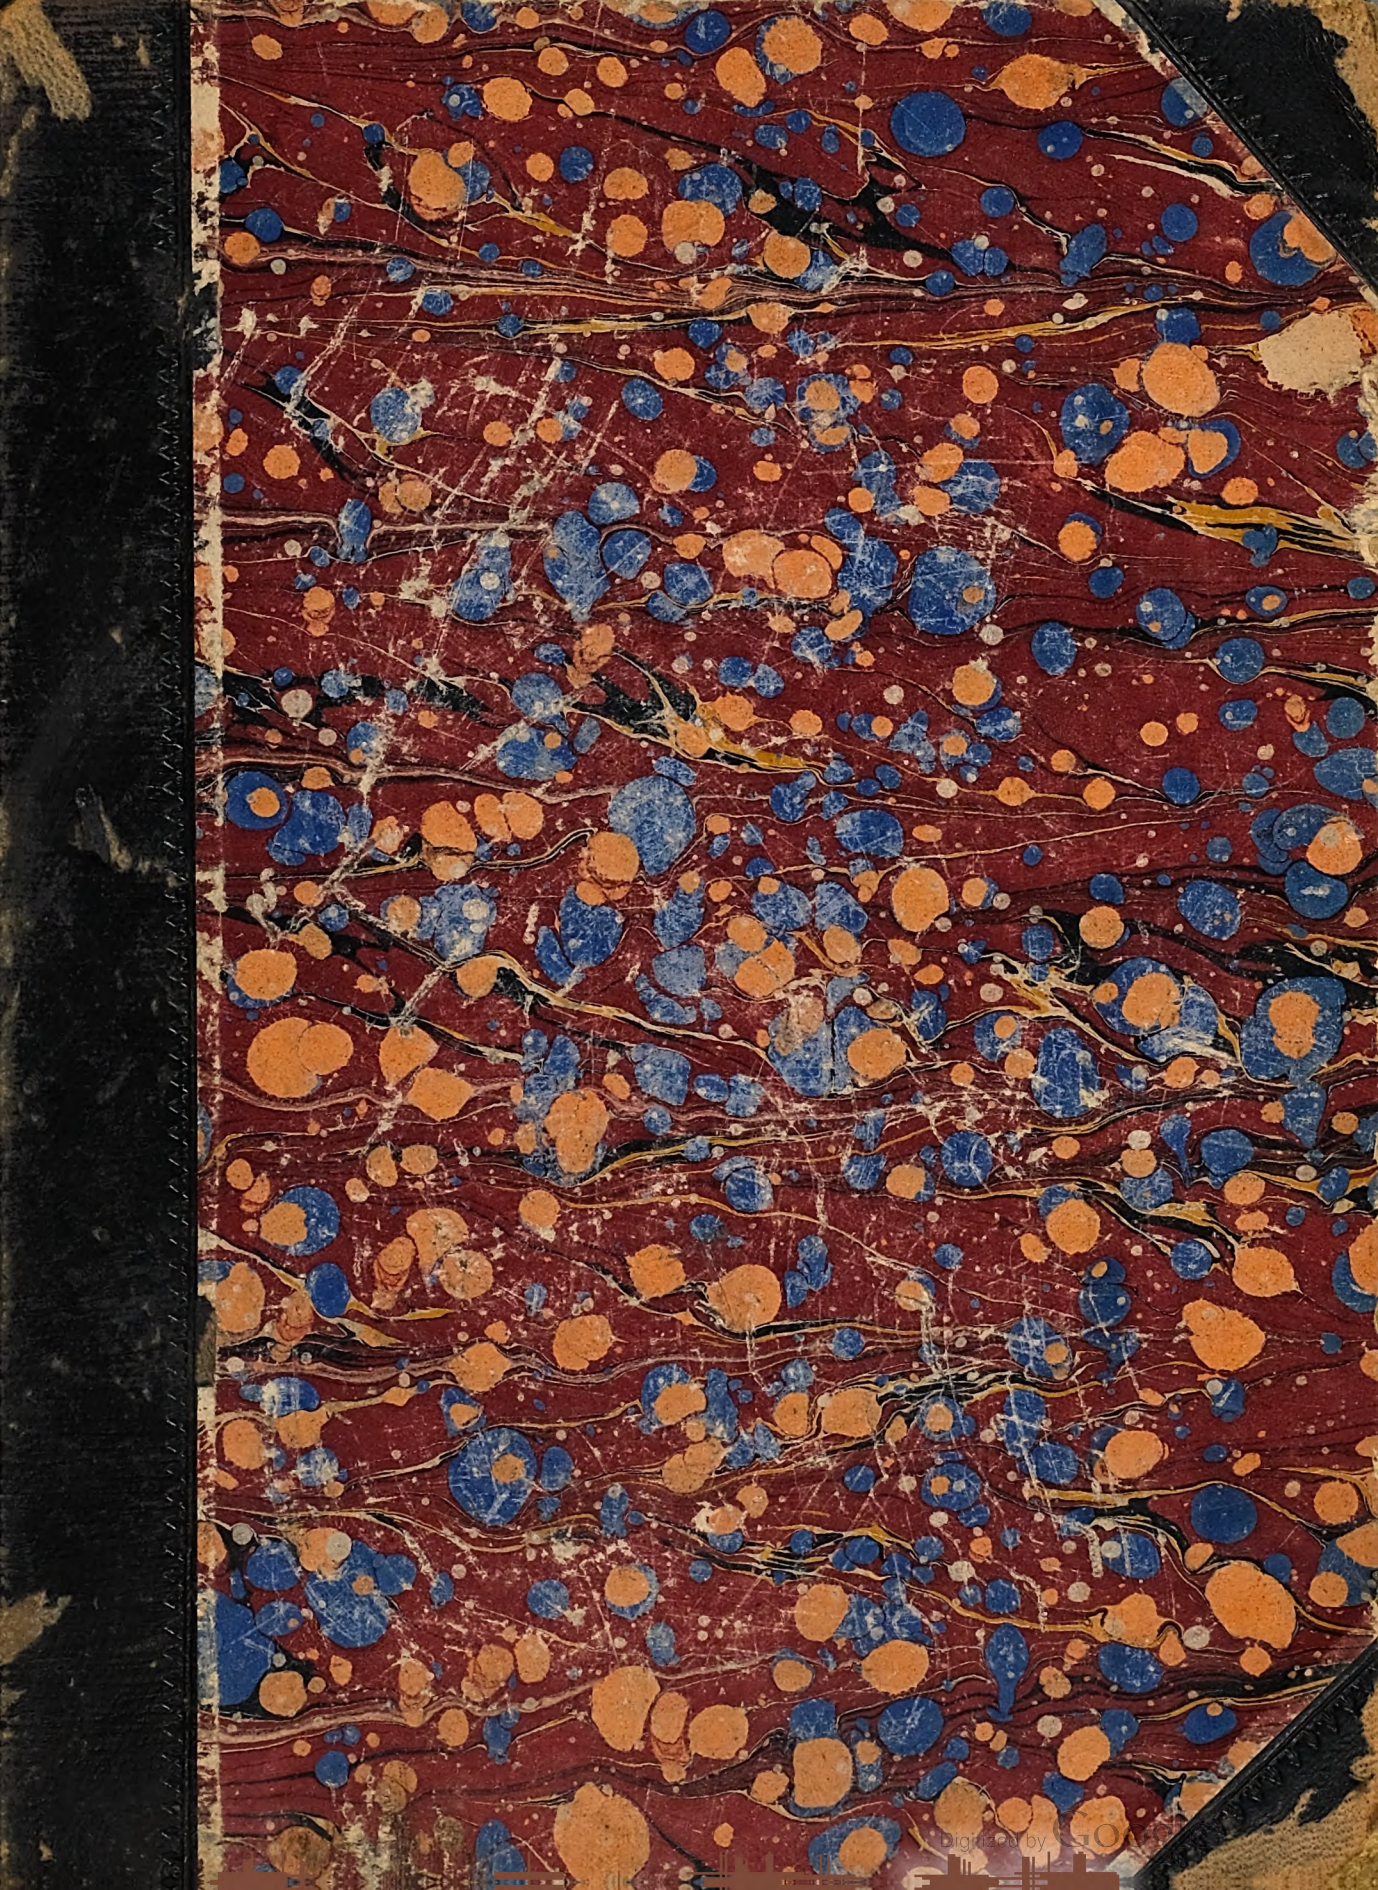
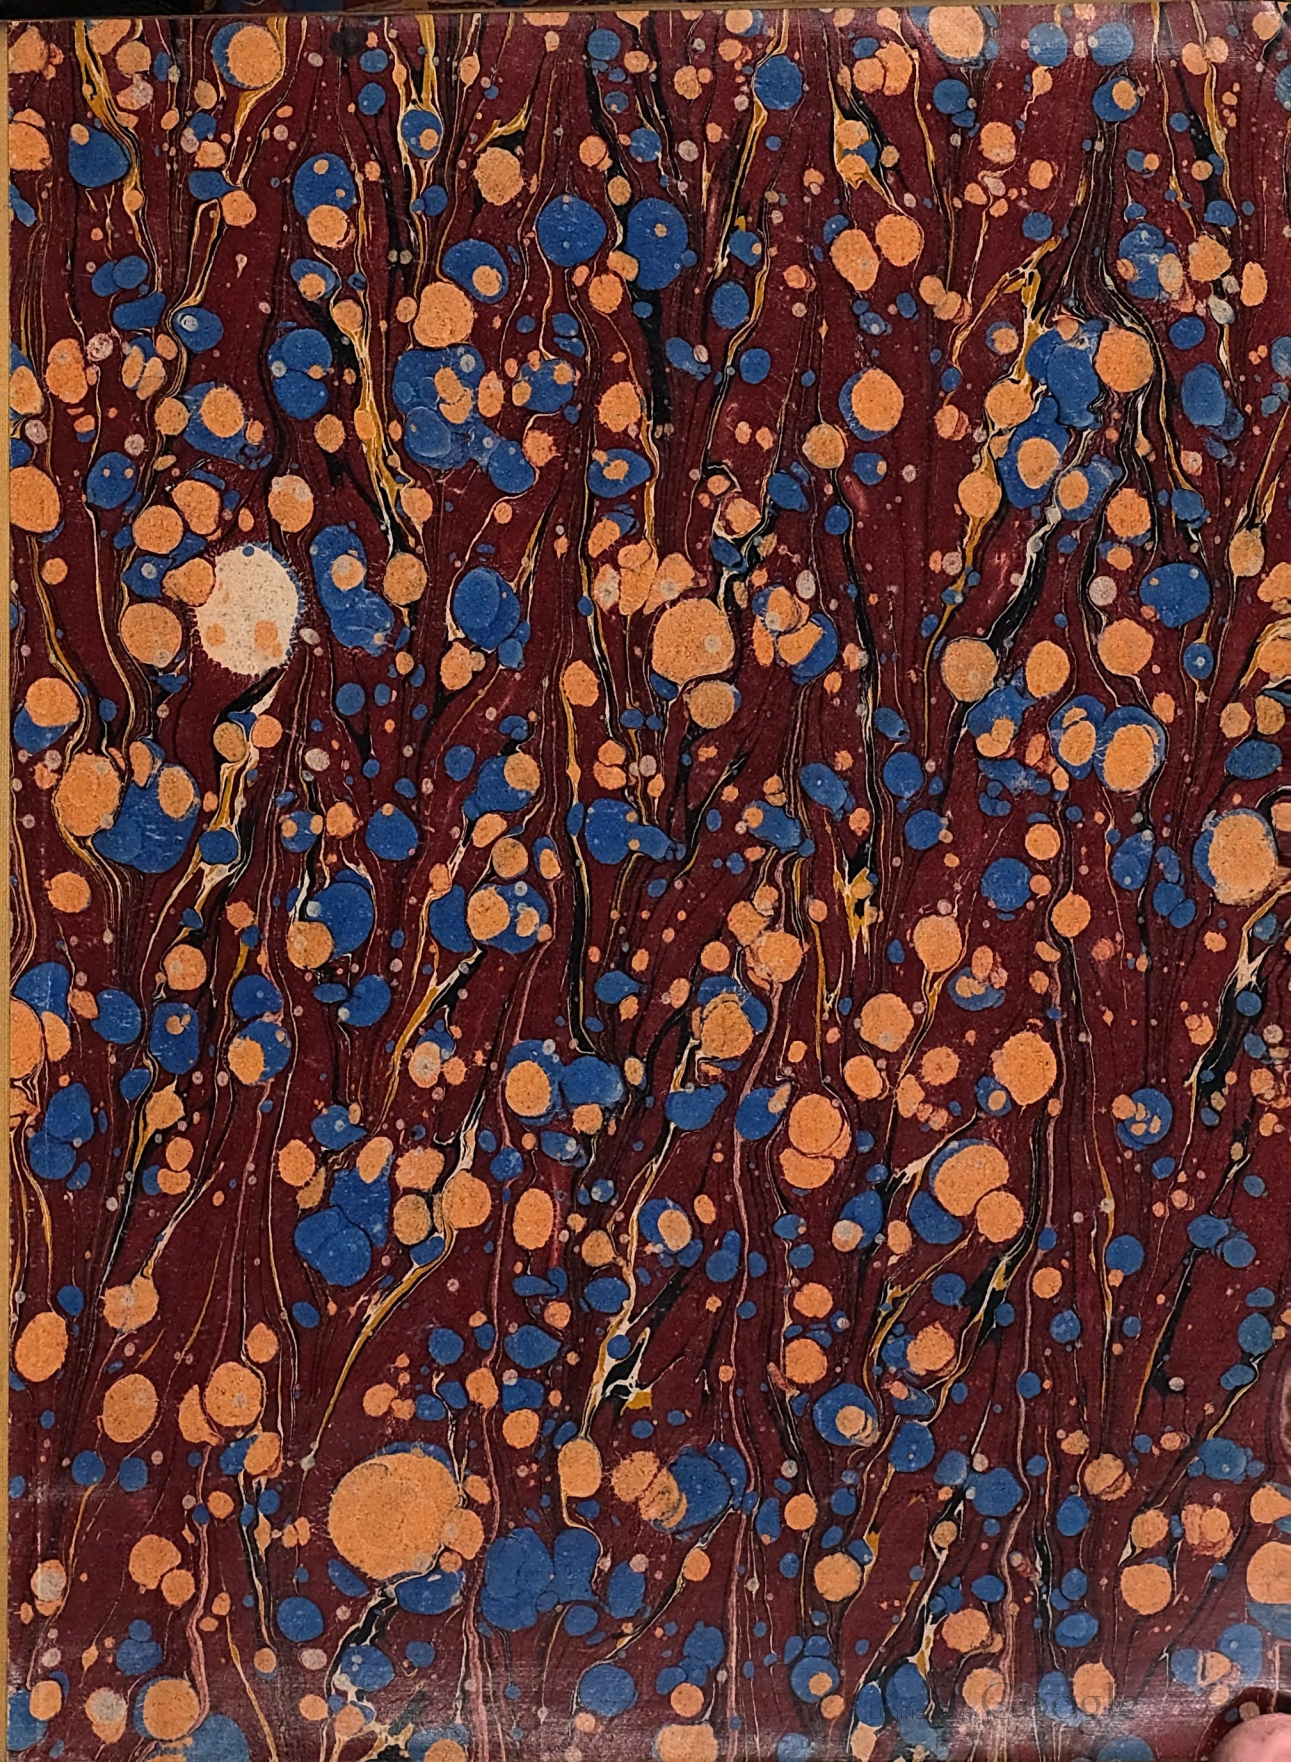
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com







Per. 256 d 763

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Short Stories.

No. 705.) Week Ending July 5th, 1902. (Price One Penny.

Suddenly a rending noise arose; there was a rumble and a splash. Richard Pascoe had fallen into his own ingenious and fatal trap.

(A Thrilling Incident from our Powerful Story, "THE OTHER WOMAN." See first page.)

Digitized by Google

A KODAK for 5/-

The No. 1 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2½ by 2½ Inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 Brownie is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK

The No. 2 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3¼ by 2¼ Inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Everset time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of

KODAK Ltd., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, W.C.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES'

Shakespeare

The "Elegant" Parcel 36/-

LADY'S COMPLETE OUTFIT.

Contains: Black Sateen Cloth Sailor Blouse, with detachable front, Black Costume Skirt with deep fashionable flounce and 9 rows of cording, Pair Model Corsets, check or stripe Underskirt, Pair Black Cashmere Hose, Cream Lace Scarf and Black Velvet Belt with Fancy Clasp.

IMPORTANT. When ordering please state Length of Dress Skirt in front from below waist band, also size of corsets worn, or waist measurement over Dress.

.. TERMS ..

Send only 6s. with order, and if the parcel meets with entire approval, complete the purchase in five more monthly payments of 6s. each. If you are not PERFECTLY SATISFIED, return the goods, and your deposit will be promptly refunded in full.

Please send a Post Card for our No. 2 CATALOGUE of Drapery, Costumes, Capes, Jackets, Mantles, Men's and Youths' Clothing, Boots and Shoes, etc., etc. Sent to your address Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED

in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa.

"Strongest and Best."—Health.

Not a stimulant merely for the moment; but a Permanent and Agreeable Form of Nourishment

BODLEIAN P 20 MAR 1981 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 705.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending July 5th, 1902.

THE OTHER WOMAN.

A Powerful Story of Love and Hate.

Complete Short Story.

CHAPTER I.

A Basket of Strawberries.

"AND I say he's making a fool of you, Diamond—well, Miss Abbot, if you like that better—as any young swell can make a fool of a girl who happens to be out of his own class. White hands and smart clothes and a little flattery count for a lot with a woman, but they won't mend a broken heart or take the place of a comfortable home and a wedding ring. Your precious Mr. Garner will end by jilting you, as sure as my name's Dick Pascoe, and then you'll be sorry you didn't snap at me."

There was an unmistakable interruption, the stamp of a small, firmly-shod foot upon the plank floor of a green-painted, low-roofed verandah in which the speaker sat by a bamboo table, over a crumbled roll and a half-empty tea-cup.

"If you should want anything else, Mr. Pascoe," he was told, "perhaps you won't mind ringing, I—we are rather busy this morning."

"That's a fib, that won't satisfy me," retorted Richard Pascoe ungallantly, breaking a piece of sugar and flinging the fragments at a group of sparrows that were pecking about the verandah; "there's not a customer on this side of the house and won't be till Garner—confound him!—comes back for his usual eleven o'clock second breakfast and flirtation. Why can't you be honest and confess that you hate the sight of me?"

Diamond Abbot fingered a cluster of drooping carnations at the bosom of her black silk blouse; a faint flush stole into her cheeks, crept to her temples, and vanished under the loose curls of her brown tresses.

"I—I don't hate the sight of you, Mr. Pascoe," she answered, "but I do wish you wouldn't worry over me so much, and wouldn't be always—always sneering at Mr. Garner. If you had ever noticed his hands you would see that they are as brown as a berry, and he isn't a bit particular about his clothes being smart; at all events, when he is working down yonder. He doesn't seem to care what he does to hurry the men on—that is, he didn't before the strike broke out and stopped the works altogether."

Richard Pascoe looked over the hotel verandah to where, at the further extremity of its sloping lawn and dusty shrubberies, the shallow waters of the Dene swept by on their way from the port of Coldharbour to the sea, past the mouth of the sandy creek near which the hotel stood. A great trench bordered the flat shore of the river, shut off from the stream by an embankment, surmounted by a temporary railway, which was carried across the creek by a wooden viaduct built upon piles.

In the trench itself long rows of contractors' wagons, filled with excavated earth, baked in the mellow June sunshine, and steam "navvies" idly extended their steel jaws towards the walls of the cutting. But the men that should have been toiling like busy ants in the huge bed of the unfinished Coldharbour Ship Canal, were lounging by the hundred about the narrow streets of Port Skillion, the works depôt of the Coldharbour Ship Canal Company, whose operations promised one day to restore to Coldharbour itself something of its old prosperity. Beyond the canal a few coasters tacked inward along the dangerous channel of the silting-up river, and vast stretches of tawny sand gleamed wetly in the sun.

"Ay," said Richard Pascoe, getting up from his seat after a moment's apparent consideration of the prospect; "our friend Garner hasn't spared himself the last month or two, I grant you. No wonder; Sir James West, the chairman of the company, is a sort of patron of his, and Kenneth Garner has tumbled to the fact that Sir James has a pretty daughter. Lilian West is a splendid creature—all red-gold hair and creamy complexion. If the canal is a success Sir James will be an immensely rich man—he has bought a lot of land in Coldharbour and the canal should double its value. 'Brilliant young engineer—financier's beautiful and only child'—it will be quite a Society romance."

He was glancing covertly at the girl beside him. Diamond Abbot had grown very pale and she drew her hand sharply from the flowers at her breast. Her tormentor went on deliberately as he paid down the amount of his bill upon the table.

"You didn't suppose there wasn't another woman, did you," he added with a harsh laugh; "in cases like these there always is and it's the other woman that wins. Consider the difference between Miss Lilian West, of Berkshire and Mayfair, and little Diamond Abbot, of the Port Skillion Hotel, a local belle and licensed victualler's daughter."

Richard Pascoe lighted himself a cigarette and puffed at it deliberately.

"By the by," he continued, "Sir James is in Coldharbour at present and is coming over to meet the strike-leaders, I believe Miss West is to be with him. So get a glimpse of her if you can, and then you can tell me what you think of your rival. Au revoir, I must get back to the Canal office and keep my subordinates in order—the strike is demoralising even us clerks."

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Diamond was galled into anger by his insolent air of patronage.

"Mr. Pascoe," she exclaimed desperately, "I don't believe a word of what you say about Mr. Garner, and what is more, I don't believe you believe it yourself. You would only like to."

And with this downright, if slightly incoherent declaration, she moved away. The chief clerk strode after her, his face crimsoned by a sudden passion. It seemed as though Diamond's chance arrow had unexpectedly hit the mark.

"Very well, Di!" he cried, hoarsely, "stick to your infatuation if you choose. But mark me, it will bring you no luck, no luck!—nor will it bring any to Kenneth Garner, either."

Not pausing to witness the effect of his grim prophecy, he swung round, and descending the steps of the verandah, hastened athwart the lawn of the hotel towards the road below.

Diamond gazed after him abstractedly—she was pondering his reference to Kenneth Garner and Lilian West.

"It wasn't true," she said to herself; "I know it wasn't true!"

"What wasn't true?" demanded a cheerful voice. Diamond turned. A young and masculine figure—tanned, athletic and set off by a big Panama and a breezy grey suit—stalked on to the verandah. Diamond smiled brightly.

"Good morning, Mr. Garner," she answered; "I was just thinking, and I expect I spoke aloud without meaning to. Will you have anything to eat with your coffee this morning?—you went out in such a hurry I hadn't time to ask."

Kenneth Garner tossed his hat on to a chair, deposited by it a tissue paper package and clasped his querist's hands.

"My second breakfast is a fraud, Diamond," he responded; "it serves merely as an excuse for a chat with you. But how formal we are to-day!—you will have me saying Miss Abbot next, and I understood distinctly that I was to be allowed 'Diamond.' What a queer little name—shall I ever get used to it? And yet you are a jewel among women."

Diamond released herself gravely. "That is a compliment I am quite accustomed to," she assured him; "my name provokes everyone to it. And you haven't told me if you want anything with your coffee or not."

"Coffee be—hanged!" ejaculated Kenneth Garner; "I'm in a tearing rush this morning, and must dispense with it. Sir James West, the chairman of the Canal company, is coming down this afternoon to see the strike-leaders. But I didn't forget your flower, and a better one than yesterday. I was really ashamed of those carnations, they were half-dead when I gave them to you."

He caught up his hat again and took out of it a half-dewy, open rose, dripping and pink as a girl's first blush. Diamond accepted it with a murmur of delight; Kenneth availed himself of the transfer to repossess himself of her hands.

"You can't guess," he whispered, "how happy it makes me to see you wear my flowers, Diamond, I—I wish you wouldn't take a single blossom from anybody else."

Diamond laughed coquettishly and would have slipped away without answering. But he detained her gently.

"There," he said, "I have no right to ask that. Yet do me a favour. Let me see you fasten my rose at your breast."

With fingers trembling irrepressibly, Diamond obeyed him. Kenneth Garner relieved her of the deposed carnations and laid them in his pocket-book.

"Since you have worn them," he observed, sentimentally, "they shall not be thrown away. And, now," he added, "I must recollect that I am here more or less on business. I want to bring Sir James here for a cup of tea about four, after the conference with the strike-leaders is over. Talking is a dry job and it will be a dusty drive back to Coldharbour in Sir James' motor-car."

He reached to the package he had laid down and unfastened it—it contained a basket of perfect strawberries, large, ripe and of a costly variety.

"A lady will be with us," he said; "Miss West, Sir James' daughter, so I took the precaution to order these from Coldharbour. She is fond of fruit." He glanced at his watch.

"By Jupiter!" he cried, "I must beat a retreat. Good-bye—see that I sustain my reputation as a host with Miss West and her father."

Diamond looked at the strawberries as he went out by the way that Richard Pascoe had gone.

"So these are for Miss West," she remarked; "and he knew that she likes them. I—I wonder if Miss—Miss Lilian is very pretty."

She crossed the verandah and entered the empty sitting-room of the hotel. As she did so she caught a glimpse of herself in a mirror, slender, dark-eyed, a little pale, with the rose-bud, a touch of colour at her bosom. She put up her hand, as if to take it away, but left it where it was.

"If I could really doubt him," he said to herself; "even for a minute—I should deserve it to be true."

CHAPTER II.
"Mr. Pascoe was Right."

"I believe, Mr. Garner, that even my pet Bond Street tea-room must yield the palm to this quaint old hotel. Henceforth I shall pity you no longer. Here have I been imagining you vegetating in a muddy wilderness, waiting for the end of this stupid strike, while you have really been living in clover. Don't you think, papa, that Mr. Garner is guilty of obtaining sympathy under false pretences?"

Lilian West put down her tea-cup and leant back in a comfortable wicker lounge-chair. She was a tall, good-tempered, smartly-dressed blonde—the late afternoon sunshine glistened in her yellow locks and made the folds of her filmy muslin gown like gossamer. Her father—a big-limbed, corpulent, grey-moustached Englishman—smiled at her tolerantly.

"I can't say," she was told, "that Mr. Garner has ever tried to excite our sympathy. On the contrary, he has always been rather enthusiastic about his quarters. By the way, what a pretty girl that is waiting on us!—do you know, Lilian, I almost begin to suspect Garner's enthusiasm."

Kenneth Garner intervened—hastily—"I fancied, Sir James," he remarked, "that I had successfully cultivated the reputation of a man too absorbed in an arduous profession to spare time for the worship of beauty. Indeed, I understand that I am reported in some quarters to be nothing less than a woman-hater."

Sir James West wiped his long moustache and showed an excellent set of white teeth.

"I suspect that Lilian has her own opinion as to that," he chuckled.

Lilian laughed—a laugh with an odd inflection in it—and rose abruptly to gaze over the verandah railing at the dusty and deserted works of the canal.

"Are you wiseacres ever going to put an end to this provoking strike?" she said, evasively; "I want to see the big ships go up to Coldharbour as they used to do when I was a little tiny girl."

Her father coughed and his broad British face set sternly. "By Monday morning," he answered, "we send in fresh.

Digitized by Google

hands to take the place of the strikers, unless they go in themselves. The leaders have forty-eight hours to consult their men."

Lilian studied the great trench and its bordering embankment. "They say," she murmured, "that the men have threatened, if you send in your fresh hands, to wreck the works. How—how would they do it?"

Sir James frowned. "Pierce the river-wall, perhaps," he rejoined, "and drown out everything in the canal-bed, or any other piece of wanton mischief that occurs to them."

His daughter gasped. "How wicked it would be!" she said, "and how un-English, wouldn't it?"

"It would, Miss West," agreed Kenneth Garner, "and so we must trust it won't be done. But we are taking every precaution. The embankment is well guarded, and I patrol it myself after dark on a light engine."

"But if they blew you up too," exclaimed Lilian West.

Kenneth Garner snapped his fingers carelessly.

"They won't do that," he replied; "I believe that they have a sort of weakness for me, on the whole."

Lilian came to his side as he sat at the dainty tea-table.

"You won't run any foolish risks, Mr. Garner," she said bravely; "I don't think my father's obstinacy is quite worth your life. If I had my way I should give the strikers their extra shilling, or whatever it is, and let the canal go on. Wouldn't you, Mr. Garner?"

Sir James pushed back his chair and rose also. "You don't comprehend the difference between profit and loss, my dear child," he told her, "and the company's engineer has to acquiesce in the view of his directors. Well, Garner, I think we'd better be off, for I dine in Coldharbour to-night with the Mayor. I'll just see if my motor is all right—the oil gave out and my mechanic has been ransacking the neighbourhood for more. You must run over to Coldharbour in it with us and tell me how you like it."

He walked off the verandah through the open windows of the hotel, turning to glance back rallyingly at the two he was leaving alone. Lilian West drew nearer to her companion.

"It works beautifully," she said, "the plan, not the motor; didn't you notice how the dear old thing tried to chaff us?"

Kenneth Garner sighed. "Yes," he admitted, "but I don't relish it, Miss West. It—it isn't quite fair to him. Of course I am yours to command, yet if—if it hadn't been you who persuaded Sir James to give me the chance of my life, I don't believe I ever should have consented—to—to——"

"To play the chivalrous knight to the lady in distress," concluded Lilian; "well, you have begun it now, and you may as well be hung for a sheep as a lamb. Come on, I hear the coughing of the motor, so they've got it going again. We can cut through the garden, can't we—what a quaint, charming place this is!"

Kenneth Garner gave her his arm as they descended the wooden steps that led to the lawn, and they made for the front of the hotel side by side. When they had disappeared round the projecting angle, a little figure crept out of the room that opened on to the verandah, glided to the railing and looked over. It was Diamond Abbot.

"Mr. Pascoe was right," she said brokenly; "he is only amusing himself with me. It is Miss West he really loves."

She sat down in a niche of the verandah and buried her face in her hands. For some while she stayed thus—silently, hopelessly wretched. Suddenly a voice reached her ear—a voice husky, suppressed, and yet familiar. It came from a ramshackle arbour, on a lower level, that communicated with a bar of the hotel affected by its poorer patrons, and entered from a back street. Diamond peered through the railings and the creeper-covered roof of the arbour beneath.

A trio of men occupied the latter, lounging over empty pipes and glasses, and smoking clay pipes. Two were rough, corduroy-clad navvies, the third a fellow in a dirty top-coat and slouch-hat. It was his voice that had reached her, and he was still speaking.

"Why have I a grudge against this Garner?" he growled, "'cause I'm an honest working-man and he got me the sack off the canal, that's why. And if you want to know, it's him that's stiffening Sir James's back not to give you follows what you're asking. Once get him out of the road and you'll have a chance of scoring. Besides, it'll show them that you mean business and won't spite yourselves as much as wrecking the canal. I'd do the job myself, only I want help, and it's precious little I'm asking you to do. Is it a deal, or is it not?"

There was a moment's hesitation, and then a muttered assent. An emptying of glasses and a shuffling of feet followed, as the three took themselves off out of the arbour.

Diamond's heart was beating wildly. In spite of its assumed hoarseness and affected vulgarity, the voice that had attracted her attention was that of Richard Pascoe, and the square, strong form of the speaker—though disguised—was his.

Something evil was going to be done, and upon his instigation—something that threatened the safety, even the life, of Kenneth Garner. And it was Kenneth Garner whom she had just pronounced guilty of the greatest wrong a man can do to a loyal and loving woman.

CHAPTER III.

"Let me Say we are Betrothed."

"S-s-t! you fools! put some more grease on that saw, can't you? It's shrieking like a stuck pig, and the wind's not all that high."

The two dark figures thus roughly addressed ceased their labour. They were perched upon the stout beams of the little swinging wooden viaduct which had been built across the mouth of the wide creek near the Port Skillion Hotel in order that the miniature bay might remain open for traffic till the canal was practically completed. Over Port Skillion, the canal bed, and the vast, sandy stretches of the river, brooded a windy summer night.

"See here, mate," grumbled one of the toilers, with an oath, stiffening himself and wiping the perspiration from his brow with the back of a knotted fist; "who are you to be ordering us about like this? Tackle the job yourself if you're not satisfied—it's a danged dirty business, and I wish I was well out of it."

Their critic crawled forward over the wooden lattice-work, over which ran the metals of the contractor's railway, and bent down to take the end of a long, two-handed saw, pull it from the beam into which place it had bitten, and rub it with a lump of tallow. The man he had displaced, as if ashamed of his momentary spasm of conscience, went to the other side of the beam and helped to operate the keen tool. When it had severed three-quarters of the log, the chief of the two stopped.

"There!" he said, "that's the last, the weight of the engine will do the rest—Kenneth Garner will not make another round of his blessed embankment, I'll bet. Now be off, and remember, it's penal or the gallows for any man who breathes a word of this. The whole place is watched, so be careful how you go—we've not been a bit too quick—there's the moon. Mind, you idiots, and don't step on those sawn timbers—a touch will finish them."

He slid down between the beams, imitated by his assistants,

Digitized by Google

just as the silver disc of the summer moon rose above the cloud masses behind Port Skillion.

"We'd better choose different ways," he told them, "so's not to render ourselves more conspicuous than we need. I'll go west, you can go east. Good night to you, and remember, a still tongue makes a wise, and especially, a safe head."

Agile as a cat, he swung himself from one part of the woodwork to another, moving in the direction of the nearest point at which the viaduct joined the embankment. A broad shaft of pallid light fell momentarily athwart his features from the drifting moon—they were those of Richard Pascoe.

His two allies growled a hoarse farewell and vanished in the gloom, while Richard Pascoe pursued his devious course. A faint sigh, like a heavily drawn breath, arrested him and he glanced up, straining his vision. Above him, crawling from sleeper to sleeper of the railway track, was the form of a woman. He dragged himself closer and peered at her. With a start he saw that she was Diamond Abbot and that she was looking down at him.

"You!" he whispered, shrinking back in astonishment, "what are you doing here, curse you?"

Diamond Abbot gazed at Richard Pascoe with a curious determination in her eyes. "I am going to save him," she said, "I heard you plotting in the arbour at the hotel, and as I could not find him to warn him I followed you—I have followed you for hours."

Richard Pascoe pulled himself up fiercely. "Yes," he exclaimed desperately; "the more unlucky you! I would have killed him because he stood between us, and now I shall have to kill you to save myself from the law."

He gained the elevated track at a bound and jumped towards her.

Diamond sprang to her feet and fled—in the direction of the spot at which the almost severed beams of the bridge still bore the weight of the metals and sleepers. In the windy gloom Richard Pascoe forgot his bearings and pursued her recklessly.

Headlong she darted down the line, springing from plank to plank as if she had been crossing a stream by stepping-stones. Under her, at the piles of the viaduct, the river lapped and sucked, and behind her came Richard Pascoe, with murder in his heart.

Unconscious of her exact peril, Diamond sped over the dangerous spot—in safety; her almost childish weight was too trifling to break through the last fibres of the severed beams. Suddenly a rending noise arose; there was a rumble, a splash, and twelve or fifteen feet of timber and metal collapsed at her back. With it had disappeared a reeling human figure—Richard Pascoe had fallen into his own ingenious and fatal trap.

Amazed, yet vaguely comprehending, with a thrill of pity, the catastrophe, Diamond stopped. While she hesitated, another sound reached her, the peculiar clanking of an engine running without a load to steady it. A star of light was nearing her along the embankment. She knew it for the headlight of the engine upon which, since the strikers had become threatening, Kenneth Garner had patrolled the all-important river-wall.

Horrified, yet galvanised into action, Diamond sped towards it, springing from sleeper to sleeper across the open water of the little bay, and calling, in broken girlish tones, a desperate warning.

A bronzed face glanced suddenly from the cab of the leisurely moving engine — a face that showed stern and anxious in the moonbeams and the yellow glare from the fire-box of the locomotive. An instant more and the engine had halted, dead — upon the brink of the fallen span. Diamond reached the metal step, gasped, tottered, caught at a strong hand, and fainted—to be drawn up into the arms of Kenneth Garner.

* * * * *

"Don't touch me!" said Diamond, indignantly, late that same night, as she lay on a sofa in the sitting-room of the Port Skillion Hotel, alone for a few moments with Kenneth Garner; "as if I didn't know all about the—the other woman."

The engineer stared at her. "The other woman, Diamond!" he exclaimed; "what in Heaven's name are you dreaming about?"

"I am not dreaming," faltered Diamond; "you love Miss West and you were only playing with me. But I couldn't help trying to save you, though I do wish that terrible Mr. Pascoe hadn't been killed."

"My dear little girl," answered Kenneth Garner, astonished, "you are talking in riddles, Pascoe killed!—myself in love with Lilian West!"

Diamond shuddered and lowered her voice. "The man that fell through the broken bridge," she said, "the one that was managing it all, was Mr. Pascoe—I recognised him at once. He—he was trying to revenge himself—on—on you—because he—fancied I cared for you. That was why he had disguised himself and tried to induce some of the men to attempt your life. It was he who told me about your being fond of Miss West. I said at first I didn't believe it, but—but afterwards when I had seen you and her together, I had to."

Kenneth Garner strove to grapple with the amazing piece of information he had just received.

"My poor Diamond," he said; "Pascoe was either lying outright, or else deceived, yet he came near the mark, for though Lilian West will never marry me, more than one person, including her father, supposes us in love. I have lent some support to that rumour—at Miss West's wish—she is devoted to a young soldier whom Sir James dislikes and while he suspects her of a passing interest in me, he relaxes his vigilance in another quarter. But this is a ghastly story about Pascoe. I am afraid it must all come out, too, which is worse. You—you must let me say we are betrothed, it will make things easier for you. Then, if you choose, we can break it off quietly."

Diamond covered her face. "You may punish me that way, if you like," she said, "I deserve it."

Her lover gathered her into her arms.

"You foolish child," he said; "as if you had not proved yourself a heroine. My life is not mine now, it is yours, to do what you like with."

"And what about Miss West and her soldier?" asked Diamond, some time after.

Kenneth Garner shrugged his shoulders.

"I know Sir James better than his daughter or he himself does," said the engineer; "he will relent—before his Lilian's heart is quite broken. Besides, he will be in great good humour for the next while. The strike is over—in a day or two we shall all be at work again upon the canal. Before the first ship goes up, my darling, you shall be Mrs. Garner."

R. Norman Silver.

Digitized by Google

A Man, Two Maids, and Some Money.

Telling of the Transference of both Love and a Fortune.

MADGE sat before the drawing-room fire, apparently lost in thought. The cheerful blaze leapt and sank in the grate, casting audacious gleams amongst her wavy brown hair and dimpled mouth. Her eyes, so far as they were visible amongst the shadows, seemed to be troubled. But shadows, doubts, troubles, and everything else vanished in an instant when the door was flung wide open and a visitor strode into the room.

"Jack!" she cried delightedly, and with just a quiver in her voice—"Save me from my loneliness. Come and sit by the fire. How are you?"

"Going strong, with land in sight," he answered, cheerfully.

"Mabel is out in town."

"Oh, that's all right. It's you I want to see to-day, Madge. Shall I sit here?"

"Yes, anywhere." But she pulled her own chair back amongst the shadows as she spoke.

"You and I have always been good friends?"

"I suppose so—I hope so," she stammered.

The earnestness in his eyes deepened. He forgot the chair he had selected so carefully a moment before, and sprang to his feet.

"Look here, Madge," he blundered affectionately. "Dear old Madge, you and I have always been like brother and sister, but—I want—I hope——"

"We've been friends—and we are now—don't spoil our friendship," she whispered, with a sudden shrinking from her expected happiness.

"I want to be your brother in reality if you will have me."

"Jack?"

"Mabel accepted me last night," he said, "and I've come round now on purpose to tell you, although probably you already know all about it from Mabel. No? She's too shy. She's most bewitchingly shy," he added. "Shall I light up? Or will you draw your chair nearer—you look so lonely somehow in that dark corner."

"No, don't light the gas. I'm all right here."

"You know it isn't like an ordinary engagement, Madge. I mean you're not going to lose a sister but to gain a brother. And we'll keep a special cosy chair by the fireside—by our fireside—for you."

He continued in this way for another few minutes, and then he became vaguely aware that something was wrong. He felt just a little annoyed at the lack of interest in his love affairs shown by Madge. As a rule she was kindness and sympathy itself. The thought of these two qualities swung his mind in an instant round to Mabel. What a difference there was between the two sisters! He bade her good evening in a somewhat hurt tone and left the room.

Then she sank upon the sofa. The little brown head fell pitcously amongst the cushions and the bright eyes filled and overflowed. Two or three minutes later the door was opened again and a tall, loosely-built girl entered the room. Her face was attractive with that sort of empty prettiness which attracts a man for six months and estranges him for a lifetime. This was Madge's step-sister.

"Whatever's the matter?" she asked carelessly, and then, without waiting for an answer—"Has—have you had any visitors?"

"Jack has been here," said Madge steadily. "He has told me of your engagement. He's only just gone. I hope you will be very happy together."

"Naturally," simpered Mabel affectedly. "He's a good old boy though he's rather too much in earnest about me. But I'll soon cure him of that after we're married."

Madge looked at her in horror. This was not the spirit in which she would have considered Jack.

"You don't seem a bit pleased," said Mabel pettishly. "Did you want him yourself? Everything seems to go wrong to-day. That library book was out again, and now as soon as I get home you look at me as though I had committed a murder. You are not a bit nice to me."

She flounced angrily out of the room. And Madge stared with tear-dimmed eyes into the heart of the fire and found that pity for herself had given place to an all-absorbing helpless pity for Jack.

* * * * *

Apparently life in lodgings did not suit Madge. She had spent six weeks in one of these "Homes from Home," and already the bright eyes were dull and spiritless and the roguish dimples had retired, disgusted with their new environment.

Soon after the announcement of Mabel's engagement her step-father died very unexpectedly, apparently without having made a will. As Madge was only the daughter of his first wife Mabel inherited everything. The latter at once assumed a patronising air towards her elder sister, mortifying her independence in every possible way, until finally—

"Finally, here I am," said Madge dolefully, embracing in one disgusted sweep of her hands everything in the dingy little room. "And if I don't find some work very soon—I wonder if they have to wear a uniform in the workhouse—a sort of pauper dress so that nobody can mistake them for human beings—I didn't leave my address with Mabel because she didn't care about it—but Jack might have—he said——"

She began to struggle miserably with her tears. Just as she was about to throw up the sponge and have a really comfortable cry, a sudden rat-tat at the door startled her into some degree of composure.

Then Jack strode swiftly into the room. Madge sprang forward, but stopped as suddenly, and shook hands.

"Good morning, Jack," she said, in an off-hand manner, and then winked energetically in a vain attempt to recapture a tear that glittered upon the fringe of the little brown eyes. The truant having obtained his liberty tried to keep it, but at the very commencement of his explorations he fell head over heels and splashed right upon Jack's hand.

The latter, who knew something of the ways of women, discovered a sudden interest in some books that stood upon the table.

"'Landor's Imaginary Conversations,'" he said, with a long whistle of surprise; "and Potter's 'Antiquities of Greece,' Upon my word, Madge, you only need 'The Master Christian!' and your classical library's complete."

"They were left by my predecessor," said Madge. "How is Mabel?"

Digitized by Google

It was Jack's turn to look gloomy now. "I haven't seen her for nearly six months," he said. "Do you know our engagement is at an end?"

"I had not heard," she said simply.

"Don't sympathise," he laughed. "I must admit that my vanity has suffered more than any other part of me. Indeed, I think you and I are suffering from the same cause—your step-father's money. But what have you been doing in the last six months?"

"Looking for some work to do," she said miserably. But her tone was not half so gloomy as before.

"Looking for work!" he echoed. "Why, Madge, I know of exactly the thing. Now just listen to me." He drew his chair a little nearer to her own. He dropped his bantering tone and spoke with simple earnestness. "Do you know, Madge, I'm very pleased that Mabel terminated our engagement. We were not suited to each other. And I've been rather puzzled since then, because, instead of being troubled by thoughts of Mabel, I've spent a great deal more time in wondering how somebody else was getting on. Somebody with curly brown hair and the dearest little bright eyes you ever saw——"

"You said you knew of a situation for me?" she said stubbornly, and yet afraid to look at him.

"Can't you guess what situation I meant, Madge? I want you to spend the rest of your life making me happy. That seems a very selfish way of putting it, but you've only to say 'yes' to a question I'm going to ask you and the thing's done. Will you be my wife, Madge?"

And then she managed to speak, and said "no" a hundred times over, but meant "yes" two thousand times. And she beat her little wings against the prison of happiness in which he sought to hold her.

"No, no, Jack," she cried. "It can't be! It's utterly impossible."

"Do you love me, Madge?"

Something in his eyes forced the truth from its hiding-place, away down in the warmest corner of her heart.

"Yes," she whispered. But if she had spoken it twenty times as softly he would still have heard.

"If we love each other," said Jack sturdily, and sticking to his guns like a man, "what can keep us apart?"

"I'm too poor, Jack. I'm living here in these miserable lodgings and can't find any work to do——" She took out her purse and emptied the contents upon the table. "Fifteen shillings and twopence—and a penny stamp—and there is threepence-ha'penny on the mantelpiece and—and when that's gone, Jack, I shall have to go into the workhouse, and wear a horrid grey dress with broad arrows all over."

"But, my dear girl," expostulated Jack, keeping serious with difficulty. "You will not be asked to find any money. Your place is to provide the goodness and the daintiness and the moral qualities—I'll see to the financial side——"

"A letter for you, Miss."

The landlady entered the room so swiftly and unexpectedly that they had scarcely time to lean back in their chairs and look unconcerned. She backed slowly out, eyeing them with ill-concealed curiosity. Madge tore off the envelope, and read the contents eagerly. Then she waved the letter jubilantly above her head.

"Jack!" she cried. "Listen to this. It's from a firm of lawyers in the City, and they say:

> "Dear Madam,—The senior partner of our firm recently died after a long illness, and on going through his private papers we found a will, duly executed, and bearing the signature of your step-father recently deceased. As you appear to be the sole beneficiary I shall be obliged if you can make it convenient to call here. Perhaps Wednesday next, the 21st inst., will suit you for an appointment.
>
> "I have also written to Miss Mabel Bannister, now in possession, suggesting the same day and hour.—I am, Madam, your obedient servant, John Soames."

"Isn't it splendid, Jack?" she cried. "You see the money originally belonged to mother—who was his first wife, you know, so that I have a better claim to it than Mabel has."

"Is it much?" said Jack gloomily.

"Is what much?"

"The money," still more gloomily.

"About four hundred a year."

"Then you won't want me, I suppose." He took up his hat from the table. "This is the second time that blessed money has jiggered me," he added savagely.

But Madge flew to his side in a moment.

"Jack! You dear, stupid, old fellow! You don't suppose it will make any difference, except indeed, that I can—I can say 'yes' now."

It was a most wonderful circumstance that none of Madge's ribs were broken by the energetic way in which Jack hugged her.

"But perhaps——" he said presently.

"Don't you think——" she cried simultaneously.

"After you, Madge."

"Don't you think we might allow Mabel to keep, say, two hundred a year, at any rate until she marries?"

"And if she doesn't marry," said Jack heartily. "She might have it as long as she lives."

"But, of course, after—when anything does happen to her it would revert to—to——"

"To us—to you."

"If we are alive, yes. But if not—it should go to——"

"To our heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns," quoth Jack, gravely.

* * * * *

Of all the solicitors' offices in London, that of Messrs. Thurston and Soames is undoubtedly the mustiest, the fustiest and the dustiest. From these particulars it will readily be understood by the intelligent reader that the firm in question have a very good business indeed and are exceptionally trustworthy and honest.

Jack and Madge found their way to this office on the appointed morning. Madge felt a thrill of importance as she entered the room, but was somewhat chilled by the matter-of-fact way in which the office boy motioned her and Jack to a seat.

"Miserable little wretch," she whispered indignantly to Jack.

"Positively, his legs are so short that he has to climb up to his high stool."

"He didn't seem much impressed," agreed Jack. "But perhaps he's used to beneficiaries."

The entrance of Mabel cut short the discussion. Jack and Madge rose and greeted her without a trace of bitterness, but she sniffed scornfully at seeing them together, and passing forward, requested the boy to take her card to Mr. Soames. He clambered down from his stool with some difficulty, and disappeared into the inner room, without, however, closing the door behind him.

"There's anuvver of them there come," they heard him say.

"Ask the two ladies and the gentleman to step this way," said another voice suavely. Next moment the boy reappeared at the office door.

"Yer've got to come in," he said, jerking his thumb towards the inner room.

Mabel walked in first. Jack and Madge followed humbly. Their business did not take very long to transact. Mr. Soames read the will, which was very short, and in which everything was left to Madge.

Evidently the letter to Mabel making the present appointment had not contained this information, for her face whitened and her mouth twitched in sudden passion when she heard the news.

"It is most unfair—it's abominable," she cried angrily. "I don't believe father ever made that will."

"I can assure you, Miss Bannister, that he did," said the lawyer quietly. "And, in fact, his action is merely simple justice, for the whole of the money originally belonged to his first wife, the mother of Miss Madge."

Digitized by Google

The ... "PASS-IT-ALONG" Scheme.

FIRST AWARD £10.

SECOND AWARD £5.

THIRD AWARD £2.

Six awards of 10s. each.

AN ENTIRELY NEW FORM OF MONEY MAKING.

This novel and clever scheme will start in next Tuesday's SHORT STORIES, but we make this preliminary announcement in order that our readers may be prepared. Broadly speaking, the scheme is as follows:

Every person who buys a copy of "SHORT STORIES" will have the opportunity of entering for this scheme by first of all writing his or her name and address on a space which will be found at the foot of one of the pages, and then sending the copy of the paper to a friend whom the competitor thinks will be likely to sign his or her name in a space provided. This friend of yours will then post the copy to a friend of his or hers, and so your copy will go from one person to another for fourteen days, when you will find it returned to you. Then you simply send the copy to us, under the conditions which you will find next week, and if it contains more names than that sent by anyone else

You will get £10, and every person who has signed your papers will get £1 each.

Your whole expenses will be one stamp for sending a copy of Short Stories to your friend. Your friend, and his or her friends and friends pay the other postage. If, however, you don't want to send your own copy away, and you can't get a friend to give you his or her copy (readers, you will find, don't like parting with their copy of dear little S. S.), then why not get an extra copy of the next number, as thousands of other readers will do?

The copy will cost you one penny, and may bring you £10.

But don't leave it till Tuesday before you ask for your extra copy, or you will find your newsagent is sold out. Just ask him to keep it by for you till you call on Tuesday for it. . .

NEXT WEEK'S NUMBER, BY THE WAY, WILL BE A SPLENDID ONE. THE COVER DEPICTS ONE OF THE MOST PATHETIC SCENES POSSIBLE TO CONCEIVE—A WOMAN DENYING HER OWN CHILD, and the story embodying the incident is of intense interest and power.

Altogether, next week's number will be worth twopence in itself. But there's no need to pay twopence for it—only one penny. You get two copies for twopence—one to keep for reading, and one to make £10. . . . . . .

"I thought the matter over after reading your letter," said Madge, placing her hand affectionately on Mabel's shoulder, who, however, shook her away angrily, "and I want you, Mr. Soames, to draw up a paper making over to my sister two hundred pounds a year until she marries, and if she remains single, for as long as she lives."

"I shall carry out your instructions with great pleasure," said the old lawyer, tapping a very handsome snuff-box and then leaning over the table towards Jack: "May I have the honour, my dear sir?"

"Delighted," said Jack, looking exactly the reverse, for he loathed snuff.

In the meantime, Madge led poor Mabel—who had certainly had a very trying morning—to a chair beside the fire. But Mabel, after looking up at her with eyes full of mute entreaty, suddenly burst into tears and hid her face upon the elder girl's shoulder. Whereat the old lawyer produced a huge red silk handkerchief which he applied to his nose, a conjunction that resulted in several prodigious roars and snorts.

"Bless my soul and body!" he cried, taking Jack by the arm and dragging him bodily out of the room. "I do believe that young rascal of a boy is smashing the furniture or breaking the windows or something."

But the boy was sleeping with his head upon the hard wooden desk, and upon his dirty little face was a placid smile of immeasurable content.

Frank Wall.

Digitized by Google

The Masked Singer

The Tale of a Strange Adventure and its Sequel.

Sydney Dalton walked aimlessly through the dingy streets of the neighbourhood into which he had unconsciously wandered after having delivered his lecture on the discoveries he had made in electrical science. It is not given to many men to make themselves famous before the completion of their twenty-seventh year, and it was undoubtedly a great triumph to have been invited to address the members of the Royal Institution at a Friday evening meeting.

That was the previous evening, and on this, Saturday night, he had left his study for a breath of air after many hours of research. When he had a difficult problem to work out, he always preferred a walk—unless, of course, actual experiment was necessary—because he could think better while walking. He had wandered on and on, not noticing whither his ungoverned feet were taking him, until he was recalled to himself by the sound of a street organ and a woman's voice. To his amazement he saw that he was in a poor district and close to a group of rough men, women and children gathered in front of a small handcart, and two persons, a man and a woman.

The woman was commencing a fresh song, the man turning the handle of the piano organ which produced the accompaniment. Rousing himself, Sydney Dalton listened with rapt attention to the singing.

It was not the song that appealed to him, it was the voice. He was a judge of musical sounds, part of his researches having been devoted to that subject, and the ring of that voice—timbre, musicians would have said—was altogether unusual in a street singer. The song was one of the latest musical ditties, and it earned the enthusiastic approval of the admiring crowd, that was plain enough, but Dalton half closed his eyes and gave himself up to a study of the musical tones that came pealing forth.

The song was finished, and there was a shout for another. Dalton opened his eyes to gaze at the singer, and for the first time noticed that she wore a mask.

"Strange!" he muttered. "Why did I not observe that before?"

He could not answer his own question, yet that answer was not far to seek. When a man is so thoroughly occupied with one subject, as Dalton was, his faculties are abnormally sharpened in that direction and become duller in others, so that the most noticeable things are missed unless they are directly in the line of study.

The woman responded to the call with an old-fashioned song, which, in its way, appealed to the crowd as much as the newer production had. Curbing his natural bent, Dalton gave his undivided attention to the singer and her companion. It did not take him long to discover that, notwithstanding their poor garments, the pair were of gentle birth; the man's features betrayed the fact, and the figure, bearing, and general appearance of the lady—he called her that in his mind—afforded equally incontrovertible proof of a higher social position.

"Genteel poverty!" So Sydney Dalton explained it. "Still, it is a pity to see two young, able-bodied people take up this method of earning a livelihood. They are too refined. Why do they do it? H'm! Perhaps the poor young woman has some deformity of features; hence the mask. But the man looks able enough."

The man's face showed great anxiety, which was another novel trait. Organ-grinders, as a rule, exhibit no anxiety concerning their womenkind, who can generally take care of themselves.

The accompanist appeared to be concerned at the presence of Sydney Dalton; he shot several inquiring glances at him, as the young scientist gazed fixedly at the singer, and altogether he seemed to be feeling very uneasy.

That song also came to a conclusion amid a round of applause, and the singer made a collection among the crowd, holding a little tin cup into which the appreciative might drop a copper. As she moved among the rough crowd, the man followed her movements with increased anxiety, and twice appeared to be on the point of leaving the organ in order to stand by her side. As the cup was held out to him, Sydney dropped a sixpence into it, and received a grateful "Thank you!"

"Why do yer wear that kertin over yor face?" queried a coster, who was having a few minutes' rest from attending to his stall in a street near by. His wife was doing the work.

The street singer uttered a silvery laugh, but made no reply. When she reached her companion's side, he whispered something in her ear, and they both took hold of a shaft of the cart, and began to move on, not, however, till the young woman had shot another glance at Dalton.

"Oh, I say, yer must give us another!" cried the coster, taking his pipe out of his mouth, and speaking with a show of indignation. "Yer must earn the money! If yer don't work it out, yer ought ter give it back!"

There were other cries of "Gi' us another!" The singer halted, but her companion urged her on. The public is fickle; pleasure and contentment soon turned into annoyance and dissatisfaction. An indignant chorus arose, and the coster threw half a potato, picked up from the gutter, at the departing couple. The man's face flushed hotly, and in a moment he was at the rough, and had floored him with a blow from the shoulder. Other members of the crowd surrounded the organ-grinder, who well knew how to use his hands, but Sydney was diverted from his purpose of interfering to help him by the sight of a drunken fellow strutting up to the street singer and trying to lift her mask.

In his college days Sydney Dalton had been numbered among the athletes, and, although study had rounded his shoulders a trifle, and he was out of form, he could do more than the unskilled roughs about him. He bowled the drunken fellow over with a neat lunge and, hastily whispering to the singer to pull the handcart away if she could, responded to her intreaty by going to the rescue of the man.

The two soon gave a good account of themselves, but it would certainly have gone hard with them had not someone raised the cry of "Copper coming-!" The mob dispersed with commendable celerity, but the cry must have been a ruse on the part of some well-intentioned individual, for no policeman was to be seen.

The organ-grinder seized Dalton's hand and thanked him in a few well-chosen words. The singer also expressed her gratitude briefly, but warmly, and the two hurried away with their organ.

"That was a curious adventure!" mused Dalton, as he wended his way home. "The hands of both of those street musicians were white and delicate, and I'm certain that they are not accustomed to manual labour. What does it mean? And how on earth did I come to wander so far from home? I can't walk back—too far in my tired condition. Must take a 'bus or a cab!"

Sydney Dalton could not get that voice out of his ears; it seemed to haunt him, and he tried to reproduce it with his new singing arc lamp. In the meantime he was invited here and there, and became a well-known figure in aristocratic receptions, for the aristocracy always like to entertain men who have made, or are making, a name for themselves.

Three months passed, and Dalton found his researches somewhat hindered by attendance at this or that institution or gathering, and by invitations to fashionable parties. He was paying the penalty of greatness. He became better acquainted with the doings of Society than he had ever imagined possible; you are bound to hear rumours and gossip of all kinds when you take part in social functions and are buttonholed by two or three magnates in the course of one evening, and have to chat to ladies on various subjects. He was in danger of forgetting science and becoming a man about town.

Only a select few knew that Prince Alexander of Altenburg, who was spending the summer in England, was on the look-out for an English wife. Sydney Dalton was one of the select few, the details having been imparted to him by Lady Merton, sister of a well-known politician, to whom he had been introduced at a reception at which the Prince was present.

"The Prince is a pleasant young man," her ladyship had said, "and as you are aware" (which was not correct, but Dalton did not betray his ignorance), "he stands a very good chance of becoming the reigning Prince of one of the Balkan States. The affairs of that Principality are decidedly unsettled." She forgot that she had not mentioned the name of the State. "Well, he is anxious to have an English consort, and it is an open secret among some of us that he is here for the purpose of making a choice. You won't breathe a word, Mr. Dalton, I know! He has a fortune, so is not particular about money; but he wants a woman with certain qualifications, and I must say he is hard to please! It is most desirable that he should carry out his intention, because of the result of such an alliance when he becomes the reigning Prince. You can easily understand that a wife's influence would be great, and our Government desires to have that influence on the side of Great Britain!"

Dalton thought it would be a good thing for the British Government, but he did not care much whether the Prince married a British noblewoman or a Chinese. However, he heard more about the Prince, and at length had the honour of being introduced, for the Prince was scientifically inclined, and had heard of Dalton's remarkable discoveries.

It was about a fortnight later when Dalton made his way to the house of a nobleman just outside the Metropolis, but far enough away to be almost a country seat. This nobleman was giving a garden-party in honour of the members of an international congress that had met in London, and invitations had been sent by him to a large number of leading lights to meet the members of the congress, and so show the foreign gentlemen how British science could do them honour.

Here Dalton met the Prince, and here he met his mysterious street singer once more. A semi-formal concert was in progress in the great hall of Lyon House, and the Prince and Dalton were chatting near the entrance when the sound of a voice, singing a plaintive, old-fashioned air, made them both stop.

"A splendid voice!" remarked the Prince, his countenance lighting up with pleasure and pride.

"Yes!" rejoined Dalton absently, his mind reverting to that scene in the East-end. "Who is she? I could not find out, and, of course, I could not ask her to show her face!"

The Prince stared at Dalton, who was too deep in his recollection to observe that he was, apparently, talking nonsense.

"Science is sending him cranky!" was the inward comment of the Prince. And, finding that Dalton was still absorbed, he slipped away.

"Grand voice, isn't it?" asked Lady Merton's brother, the politician, coming up to Dalton a moment later. "I expect the Prince has left you to get near her. You know, my sister told you, that he—eh? Well, his present choice, between ourselves, is Lady Headland, and he is rather gone on her. Sings well, doesn't she? He is fond of singing. She will suit him, although she is too full of fun just yet, not stately enough. But that will soon come to her!"

"Oh, yes, certainly!" said Dalton, feeling that he must say something. But he was devoutly thankful when the politician went to talk to someone else.

Dalton entered the great hall, and stood just inside. He saw the singer, a lovely young woman, and he recognised the form. By her stood the organ grinder, turning over the music for her. Dalton's eyes were riveted on the pair; he was sure of their identity, but he could not understand.

"I was too late! I went to offer her my services." It was the Prince, with his pretty foreign accent. "What makes you look at her so, Mr. Dalton?"—rather sharply, this.

"I cannot persuade myself that I have not seen her before, Prince," replied Dalton.

"That is not surprising!" observed Prince Alexander, with just a touch of sarcasm. "She is one of the beauties of the season."

"I have seen her out of the pale of Society!" retorted Dalton nettled. "I'll swear that she is the masked street singer, and he is the organ grinder!"

At that moment the organ grinder turned with a smile from the piano, but the smile died away and a troubled look appeared on his face

"Why d'yer wear that kertin over yer face?" queried a coster from behind.

Digitized by Google

as he saw the Prince and Dalton together and looking at him with strange expressions. The change did not escape the Prince; he turned to Dalton and asked him to explain his strange words.

If Dalton had been a politician he might have scented danger; but being only an unsophisticated man of science, with mind and body steeped in electricity, so to say, he blundered on.

He told the story of his Saturday evening adventure, and told it graphically.

"And you are sure of the identity of those itinerant musicians?" queried the Prince. "Positive! Well, well! How curious! Ha, ha!"

The Prince excused himself, and Dalton, satisfied at having vindicated his sanity from the slighting reflection cast upon it by the Prince's sarcastic remark, strolled out into the spacious grounds. He was soon joined by the gentleman whom he had recognised as the organ grinder.

"We need no introduction, do we?" he remarked frankly. "I know now that you are Mr. Sydney Dalton, and perhaps you know that I am Lord Renton, cousin to Lady Headland, who was playing and singing just now—and the other Saturday! At least, she was singing then and I was playing the accompaniment, and we were both playing a part!"

The young fellow spoke lightly, jestingly, but he was troubled, and the cause was soon made apparent.

"I saw you talking to Prince Alexander inside the hall, Mr. Dalton. Did you—I hope you did not—that is, I suppose you mentioned to him that you had seen us with——"

"Yes, I did!" replied Dalton simply. "He wouldn't believe it at first, but I convinced him. I could not be mistaken in that voice. I have been trying to reproduce the timbre. What is the matter?" This question came in response to a groan from Lord Renton.

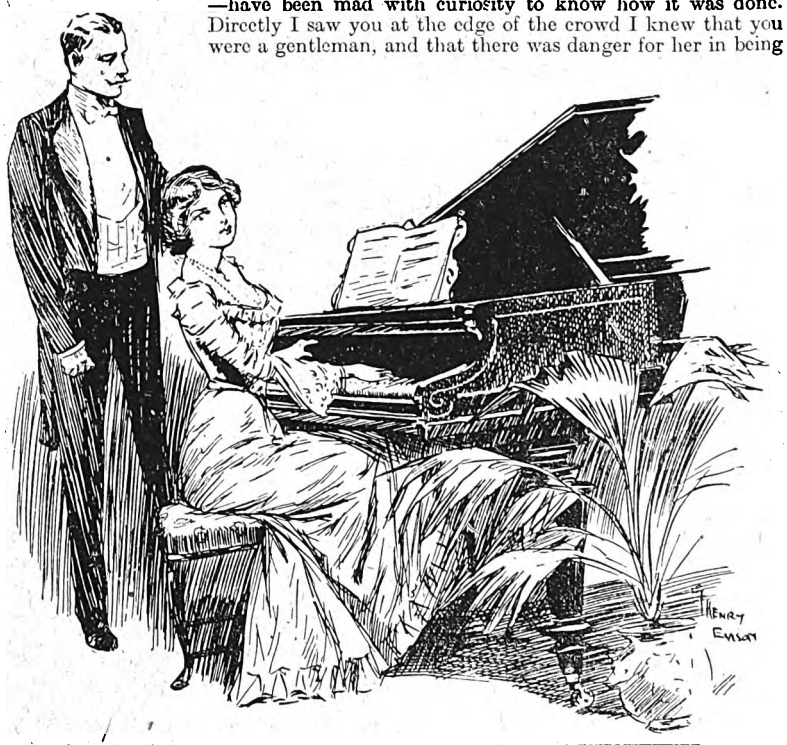
"I am afraid that you have spoilt a happy marriage and upset a grand diplomatic coup, Mr. Dalton. I was constantly in fear of disclosure. I was certain that the escapade would come to light! Well, it cannot be helped now!

"I'll tell you all about it," he continued. "There was a grand Society bazaar in support of a charity, I forget which it was. Royalties gave articles of their own making or sums of money. My cousin, being one of the season's beauties, was asked to contribute; she had no article of her own make, and her family is not well off, so she could not make such a show of giving as some of the others could. Then she said that to give money when you have a lot is not charity. Charity should cost you something. But if you have no money, you cannot give it, can you? So she declared that she would give money earned by herself, and the idea caught on. Everybody wanted to know how she intended to earn it, but she said nothing.

"She insisted that I must help her, and, as we have been more like sister and brother than cousins, I agreed. She kept the affair a secret, but a day or so later—on the Saturday, in fact—she sent a note and a bundle to me and asked me to don it, and meet her at a certain spot at half-past eight that evening. As soon as I saw the contents of the package, I guessed the truth. She intended to play the part of the street musician and I was to go with her.

"I called on her and tried to dissuade her, but she would not listen. If I did not care to go with her, she said, she would go alone, and get some fellow to drag the hand-cart. I couldn't let that happen, so I had to go. I met her, and found that she had a mask. I took her into a neighbourhood where the people have no great imagination and are accustomed to oddities; they might be rough, but they would not guess that the mask hid the face of a beauty of the season!

"I was in an awful state of anxiety all the time, fearing that some insult would be offered to her, but she was in the height of spirits. She is a bit of a tomboy, and liked the fun of the thing. She will steady down in time, of course. Well, the Prince was getting fond of her, and I am positive that she is in love with him; but I fancy it will be all off now. She knows nothing of the diplomatic side; it's a case of love. But you have told the Prince, and he is a great stickler for dignity. And I must admit that there was no dignity in that affair, although there was no harm in it. We got a good bit of cash, and handed it over, and since then our friends—and enemies—have been mad with curiosity to know how it was done. Directly I saw you at the edge of the crowd I knew that you were a gentleman, and that there was danger for her in being seen by one who might meet us again in our proper circle. Mr. Dalton, I don't wish to be rude, but I wish you had devoted yourself entirely to science instead of dividing your attention between science and Society!"



The masked singer was at the piano, and the organ grinder was turning over the music for her.

"So do I!" exclaimed Dalton heartily. "Can I do anything? Oh, here comes the Prince!"

"Ah, here you are, Lord Renton," said the Prince with feigned heartiness. "I have been looking for you to say goodbye. I have just bidden adieu to your charming cousin, whose lovely face will, I trust, never be hidden from the eyes of admirers. I must return at once. Adieu, my lord. Adieu, Mr. Dalton; I hope that science will not lead you astray again!"

A moment later he was gone, Lord Renton had set off in search of his cousin, and Sydney Dalton was vowing that he would eschew Society.

"A man of the world would not have made that blunder, I suppose," he said to himself. "That shows that one can learn many things even outside the laboratory!" Geo. Day.

Aphrodite of the Trout Stream.

A Charming Little Fishing Romance.

"My friend John Stuart Mill remarks——"

"Oh, never mind John Stuart Mill. What did he know of love?"

"As much as his nature was able to contain."

"Exactly, and Cupidon and John Stuart Mill do not go well together."

The speakers were two gentlemen standing on the bank of a pretty trout stream, on the flashing, darting waters of which through the over-arching boughs fell crimson patches of the setting sun.

The younger, a bright, handsome man of about four-and-twenty, was whipping the stream for a final bite; while the elder, near fifty, with a fine face and grizzled hair and beard, leaning against a tree, was putting up his lines.

"You asked me once," remarked the latter, "my definition of love. I'll tell you—a thing that enthrals man, debases him and sells him into slavery. A thing that renders some men idiots—others philosophers."

"And you, Walsingham, are of course of the latter," laughed the younger.

"And you, my dear Chesson, of the former, exactly."

"Thanks."

"Is it not true? You come here fishing; you catch a glimpse of a slim figure, a pretty face. From that moment you become idiotic; you declare that an angelic being has deigned to descend to prosaic earth; you rave, and for days have haunted this stream, in hopes again to see this houri—some pink-cheeked milkmaid."

"No milkmaid, my dear philosopher. But how is it, man, you never married? I will not believe you have reached nearly half a century and never loved."

"Married!" repeated the other, with an abrupt laugh, "and you have heard my opinion of love."

"Just so. Shall I tell you my definition of a philosopher? One who, having enjoyed the follies of life himself, would later instruct others under a cloak of wisdom."

Harry Chesson, laughing, strolled farther up the stream.

Matthew Walsingham looked after him thoughtfully, then drew a long breath, as he murmured:

"Perhaps he does not guess how near to the truth he is. Did I ever love?—did I?—would I could say no."

Just at that moment a cry of alarm sounded in the air. It was a young, fresh, feminine voice, and came from some little distance down stream.

Matthew Walsingham sprang erect. Harry Chesson had also turned; but the elder, in hastening in the direction had the advantage.

For a moment he could see no one, neither on the banks nor on the stones in the stream. He already had slackened his pace, when, just where the boulders formed stepping stones across, and where the eddying waters were deepest, he beheld something floating, like a portion of a woman's dress.

A few seconds brought him to the spot, when, to his horror, he beheld, lying in the bed of the stream, between the rocks, a young girl!

She was motionless, as one dead; her face, of a delicate beauty, was pale and still—her eyes closed—while the water carried her hair like threads of gold about the moss-covered boulders.

To jump down on to the boulders, raise the girl on to his shoulder, scramble out, and bearing her to the opposite bank, lay her down, was with Matthew Walsingham, the work of a very brief space. The girl gave no sign of life—she seemed as if dead.

The cause was apparent in a discolouration of the temple, which had been struck in her fall.

Perplexed, alarmed, Walsingham was kneeling, chafing the small hands, when a quick, startled cry from Chesson, who now ran up, caused him to raise his head.

"What is the matter?" he ejaculated, half irritably.

"It is she?" cried the young man, throwing himself on his knees. "Oh, Walsingham, for Heaven's sake, say she is not dead!"

"She—who?" was the sharp demand.

"She for whom I have been waiting, watching—she whom," his voice trembled and sank, "I love!"

"Pshaw!" but his tone lacked its habitual cynicism. "Far better help me to restore the poor child. It is evident she slipped on the wet moss, and in falling struck her temple. Had we not been near, she surely must have been drowned."

Harry Chesson's brain swam, his heart felt sick at the idea. Reverently he put the long, wet hair from the pale cheek; trembling, he chafed the brow, the hand he held.

Abruptly he drew back, colouring, half confused, as one detected in guilt. The girl's eyes—clear as crystal, blue as violets—had opened, and, after wonderingly regarding Walsingham, had wandered to him.

"Where am I? What has happened?" she whispered faintly.

"Pray do not be alarmed," said Walsingham—Chesson could not speak. "You slipped on the stepping-stones; that is all. We were near to help you. All is right now."

Her recollection was returning.

A vivid blush dyed her cheek.

"Ah, I remember! Thank you very much!" she murmured in confusion, trying to rise.

Walsingham aided her; Chesson stood aside. He noted her confusion, and guessed she could accept aid better from an older than a younger man. Yet how he envied his friend!

Rising to her feet, leaning against a tree, she shivered.

"You must get home at once, young lady," said Walsingham, gently. "Your dress is wet; I fear you will take cold if you remain still. Can you walk with assistance?"

"Oh, yes, I can walk even without," she replied, quickly. "I am better now," trying to press the water from her clothes. Then, fixing her eyes upon them with a glance neither forgot, she added: "I know I owe my life to you—indeed I am grateful; but—I cannot think of words now to thank you!"

"Oh, let us defer thanks until later!" laughed Walsingham, to put her at ease. "We must think of dry clothes first. I trust you do not live far away?"

"No, quite near."

"Will you try to get there? We will accompany you."

"Oh, indeed, I would not trouble you. There is no need!" she exclaimed.

But when she made an attempt to move, she had to admit there was, and accepted Harry Chesson's arm; for Walsingham, stepping back, had signed him to advance. He had even done him a greater kindness. He left him to have a tête-à-tête.

"I will go back and collect our fishing-tackle," he had said. "We will meet at the inn."

His friend had given him a look that said as plainly as words:

"I'll never forget this. You have made me your debtor for life!"

Then they two went along the banks among the ferns and tree-trunks; while Matthew Walsingham, re-crossing the stepping-stones, returned to where they had so hastily abandoned their rods, gathered them up, and strolled to the inn.

"If ever woman looked worthy a good man's strong love, truly she does," he reflected, as he went. "But did ever woman yet?"

It was nearly an hour before Chesson rejoined him. His step had a greater buoyancy, his eyes a clearer light; a smile was on his face.

"Well," said Walsingham, sitting in the window seat without his pipe: "'Prithee why so gay, fond lover? Prithee why so gay?'"

"You may laugh," exclaimed Harry Chesson, brightly. "Cynic as you are, you will confess that she is beautiful—worthy a life's devotion!"

Walsingham shrugged his shoulders.

"An Aphrodite, arisen—not from sea-foam, but the eddies of a trout stream."

"Nevertheless beautiful, old man. A wager — thou Diogenes—thou shalt be converted to a pleasant, kinder thought of woman and Ænone shall convert you."

Matthew Walsingham looked quickly round.

"Ænone!" he repeated. "Ye powers, what a name! So you have discovered Aphrodite?"

"Her mother called her by it. Her mother, who, hearing her daughter's story, prays you to accompany me to her cottage two hours hence, to receive her thanks, or——"

"Absurd! Or what?"

"She is so grateful, that if the mountain will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet must come to the mountain."

"Not if I know it," exclaimed Walsingham starting up, "A scene in this rustic inn! A weeping, grateful parent—and, shall I add, a match-making mother."

"Say what you please. I am too content to care. Only you will come with me, Walsingham?"

"Yes, I do not mind. I'll go to take care of you, my poor friend, after brief reflection," in a serio-comic tone. "Now let's have done with the subject, Romeo, until we start. Remember I am not a lover, and need dinner."

When through the soft summer evening twilight, the two started for the cottage, Walsingham half regretted that a curiosity he would not confess had urged him to give the promise he had.

Outwardly cynical, inwardly kind, generous, he hated to be thanked. Still there was no avoiding it now.

"What is this lady's name?" he asked, abruptly.

"I do not know. How, in the joy and the alarm, could I ask it. But she is a lady."

"And the father?"

"She is a widow; and has been very beautiful. There is the cottage."

It was a simple thatched dwelling, rendered pretty by roses and honeysuckle, and if not absolutely bespeaking indigence, showed small signs of wealth.

"My friend," remarked Walsingham, sententiously, "when poverty looks in at the door, loves make his bow at the window. You would prove an excellent catch to Miss Ænone."

"Possibly," exclaimed Chesson, gaily, as coming under the porch, he tapped lightly at the door. It was instantly opened by the widow herself, a slim, fair-haired lady, attired in plain, dark garments.

"Oh, you have come!" she ejaculated in a soft, sweet voice. "How kind of you, gentlemen! Pray enter. My daughter is lying down; I feared the chill, so kept her in her room."

Walsingham cast a whimsical glance at his friend, whose gaiety had at once, he knew, sunk to zero, as they followed the lady into the parlour. It was plainly adorned by those little touches, and books and flowers, which speak both of refinement and taste.

On the table stood a lamp. Reaching a chair, the widow turned to bring it for her guests, when her eyes rested on the face of the elder, who stood in the full light. Harry Chesson saw her expression change to amazement, blended with terror. A cry burst from her lips, she ejaculated:

"Matthew Walsingham! Oh! Heaven be merciful to me!"

Then she dropped on the chair, her face bowed on her hands, as she heard her friend's voice, huskily tremulous:

"Laura Greenlees! Here!"

Then a hand was put on his arm, and Walsingham whispered:

"Leave us, Chesson, dear lad."

Instantly he obeyed. As he drew to the door he was aware of the widow on her knees, her hands extended, her voice full of passionate pleading as she cried:

"Oh, Matthew, hear me! Pardon—forgive!"

Harry Chesson paced the lane in view of the cottage waiting. He was surprised, bewildered. What did it all mean? Would Walsingham explain? Who was this lady—Ænone's mother? It was close upon an hour afterwards when Walsingham came out.

"You have waited," he said, and Chesson observed a change in his voice, it was softer. "Thank you! We will not go to the cottage again to-night; let us return to the inn; I have much to tell you."

He had slipped his arm into the other's, and they already were proceeding down the lane.

"You know Mrs. Greenlees?" hesitated Chesson.

"Not Greenlees now, her name is Mrs. Marsland," said Walsingham, in a low tone. "Chesson, she was the only woman I ever loved—loved as few men do. I believed my affection returned, I was accepted, our marriage day was fixed. It arrived; I was ready—all were ready, only one person was missing—the bride—Laura had fled. When I heard of her again she was wedded to Arthur Marsland!"

He paused a second, then went on.

"I must be brief; things seemed to speak for themselves. I gave her no further thought—or tried not to; and condemning Laura, condemned all her sex."

"But!" suggested Chesson, eagerly, "there has been an explanation!"

"Yes! It appears that this fellow had inveigled her when a girl into a correspondence; at one time she had believed she loved him; he, soon after her acquaintance with me, made her fear him. Her—her love for me, made her more sensitive that the foolish past should not reach my ears; she fought her persecutor to the last, until the eleventh hour—then her courage failed; she could fight no longer; she yielded to his threats, and sacrificed her happiness to save her folly being revealed. Now, dear boy, you know all. Will you go on first? I will follow."

* * * * *

Before the summer of the next year Harry Chesson and Ænone Marsland were married, the bride being given away by her step-father—Matthew Walsingham.

As the young pair were about to start on their tour, Chesson, stepping to Walsingham, while Ænone embraced her mother, whispered merrily:

"Well, Diogenes, have I won my wager?"

"You have, my son! If that philosopher never discovered an honest man, I have discovered a woman worthy of a man's love; nay, the devotion of a life!"

G. Parkyn.

Digitized by Google

"IF ever I find money, I'll keep it. No advertising for the owner with me—not much!"

Many a time had Percival Langdon said this, with a careless glance down at the pavement and an odd feeling of wonder as to how it would feel were he to see a big roll of bank-notes at his feet. And now, there in his pathway, lay a pretty little purse, distinctly feminine, as unmistakably the lost property of a woman as if it had borne the name of the owner in big letters on the side.

Percival picked it up. It was a snake-skin, somewhat worn, but still dainty, and it had silver trimmings and a silver clasp. As the finder held it for a moment in his hand some strange force from the fingers accustomed to carrying it seemed to strike into his palm. It almost seemed to him as if he felt the warm weight of a little hand in his own. Who has not found this personality in a cast-off glove or shoe or other object strongly associated with its wearer? Even a cast-off relic of the dead has the touch and "feel" of the absent one long years after he or she has departed.

The young man looked up and down the street. Unconsciously his eyes sought out a short, stout figure, one befitting ownership of the little treasure trove which he had picked up. But there was no one in sight whom he could associate even remotely with the purse.

He laughed aloud.

"Well, by Jove, this is funny," he said to himself. "For years I have been wishing that I could find money and have planned how I would get rid of it if fortune ever favoured me, and the moment I really do find some, behold, I am looking for the owner. But perhaps there is no money in it to tempt me after all."

TREASURE TROVE.

The Tale of a Purse and its Owner.

He opened it. There were a number of samples of dress goods, a recipe for making soft gingerbread ("soft gingerbread—that's good," exclaimed Percival, smacking his lips. "If there is one thing I like better than another it's soft gingerbread!") a newspaper clipping containing three verses of sentimental poetry, a glove button-hook, a five pound note, and a handful of small change.

"My, what a tidy little sum!" cried Percival. "There's a box of cigars and a new suit. All I've got to do is to toss the purse into the sewer and put the money in my pocket!"

It was only a passing thought, a flash, the echo of ideas he had often had before when that dream which comes to all of us at one time or another—the dream of "picking up money"—lingered in his fancy.

But was there nothing in the purse to mark its owner? It did not appear so. "Women are so silly," he said. "No; it is I who am silly," he added, as it suddenly came to him that there was a back pocket in the purse. He lifted the cover. Yes; there was a narrow card tucked away in it. With blundering fingers he fished it out and turned it up so that he could see the name inscribed upon it—"her name." Somehow possession of the little purse had given him a sort of proprietary interest in the owner.

It was a pretty name, very pretty. Percy caught his breath when he read it:

MABEL SWEETBRIAR,
No. 77, Larkspur Gardens.

"Mabel! I always fancied that name." For some reason he could not understand Percy raised the bit of pasteboard to his lips, remembering that her fingers had touched it. "Mabel! Short and plump, with dark hair and big brown eyes. I'll bet that's what she is. Well, bless my soul, Percival Langdon, anyone might think you were already in love with her."

A moment later Percival was walking rapidly toward Larkspur Gardens. It was a mile away and in a rather aristocratic neighbourhood. But little thought he of distance. His one desire was to find the owner of the purse and restore her property before she had a chance to suffer much over its loss. Had he been a personal friend he could not have felt more anxious about it. As he went along he kept repeating to himself, "Oh, for the touch of a vanished hand!"

The touch of a vanished hand! Did he not feel it on the polished leather?

Langdon's heart was pumping like a fire engine when he rang the door bell of a pretty little house which bore the magic number "77" in gold foil on the glass panels. He was a good-looking young bank clerk, underpaid, as all bank clerks are, but earning a decent living, and able to dress well, and, as he would say it, live like a gentleman. He had an inborn honesty for which he did not give himself credit, for he often thought, given the opportunity, that he would appropriate a fortune without a tremor. And yet the moment he was put to the test he did not have an instant's temptation.

"Short and dark—I beg a thousand pardons," stammered Percival. "You—I was saying—is this Miss Mabel Sweetbriar?"

She clapped her hands.

"Oh, you have found it! I knew you would! I told mother you—that is, the finder—would read my name upon the card and bring it home. Mamma!" She raised her voice, and Percival noticed that it was sweet and fine. "The lost is found, dear! You will be able to see that specialist after all! But you must come in, sir! Mother—and I—will want to thank you."

"Yes, Mab," said a gentle voice from a room beyond. "Bring the gentleman in. He has taken such a load off our minds! You will excuse my not rising, sir? I am an invalid."

When Percival Langdon left the house an hour later, with an invitation to call again ringing in his ears, he waited until he got round the corner, and then he kicked himself.

"Down on your knees," he said to himself, "and thank God you are not a villain! If you had taken the earnings of that poor girl, already laid upon the altar of her mother's sickness, you would have been the most unmitigated scoundrel alive.

"It makes me shudder to think of it. But you were not tempted. You were not! The 'touch of a vanished hand' was on that purse, like a talisman. And what a plump little hand it was! Just what I conceived it would be. How warm it was and magnetic! She pressed mine and told me she was sure we would be great friends. Percival Langdon. I believe you are the seventh son of a seventh son. The glimpse you got of the owner of that purse was borne out by the reality in every respect."

* * * * * * * *

Six months later the plump little hand and the plump little owner thereof became the property of Mr. Percival Langdon for better or worse and all the rest of it. He is chief cashier at the bank now and has a salary not to be despised. And he will tell you, with a voice of pride and a smacking of the lips, that his wife makes the best soft gingerbread in all the world and other things just as good.

H. W. Raymond.

Digitized by Google

Pa's Restoration.

A Move from the Kitchen to the Sitting Room.

The girls were thoroughly enjoying themselves in the sitting-room. It was well warmed and lighted, and there was a sound of laughter and the hum of merry voices. Someone was tuning a mandoline to the piano, and there was a fluttering of music leaves. Some friends had come in, as usual, to spend the evening. The Moberly girls, that is, the three older ones, all had light hair, blue eyes, and lively, vivacious manners that proved very attractive to the young people in the quiet village.

"Pa" Moberly nobody knew much about. He usually sat out in the kitchen during the evening. It was a dingy little room, and often he had no light; only the dull glow of the stove and the red sparks of his old-fashioned pipe.

Pa Moberly was a little, timid, shrinking man. He had faded blue eyes, bent shoulders and toil-worn hands. He had worked hard for his girls. He had ungrudgingly given them his best. It seemed too bad that now he was old and they were grown to womanhood they did not care.

When Mrs. Moberly was alive, however, things were different. He had his comfortable easy chair then in the sitting-room; his slippers, too, and there was the sofa to rest on when he was tired.

But as his girls grew up, pretty, strong-willed and altogether selfish, Pa Moberly found himself banished from his comfortable quarters. A number of cushions too fine for use adorned the old sofa, and his armchair was bedecked with a gaudy antimacassar. He was soon made to understand that he was not wanted.

It was therefore not long before he began to stay in the kitchen, and by and by he sat nowhere else. He knew every figure on the dingy papered walls, and the only chair he had to sit in was a straight-backed wooden one, in which he could not rest.

He used to long sometimes for his old corner in the sitting-room, with its lights, its laughter, and its music, but to his gentle hints the girls gave scant encouragement. "They didn't want pa there," they told themselves.

The lonely, tired old man had many thoughts as he sat in the kitchen night after night in solitude, and he used sometimes to ponder the question in his gentle heart as to whether, after all, it paid to bring up girls who were ashamed of you when you were old.

Polly, his youngest, did not know about the changed condition of affairs. She was more like her mother than any of the others, being small, quiet, and brown-eyed.

She had been staying for three years in Scotland with an invalid aunt, after whom she had been named. Poor Aunt Bassett was dead now, and to-day Polly had come home again. She was upstairs, busy in the small back room that the girls had forgotten to make ready for her.

As Pa Moberly sat alone in the kitchen to-night he was thinking of Polly. In his yearning, fatherly heart there was a faint stirring of hope.

There was a chance that he might take some comfort with this, his youngest daughter. He had felt that from the time she was born. She wasn't like the other girls, and she had seemed so unfeignedly glad to see him. He still felt the pressure of her young arms about his neck, and her kisses lay warm upon his furrowed cheek.

In the darkness of the old kitchen he brushed a tear from his eye. He was thinking of Ma Moberly, too, and of her gentle, tender, womanly ways. He wished the girls were more like their mother.

Just then Polly came in. She went quickly to his side.

"Why, pa," she cried, "what are you sitting in the kitchen for, and in the dark, too? Is anything the matter?"

In the friendly darkness Pa Moberly took the little hand and stroked it. "Nothing, Polly," he said. "I—I always sit here."

Polly seated herself on his knee. "Always sit here?" she cried, in surprise. "Don't you go into the sitting-room in the evenings as you used to?"

Pa Moberly shook his head. "No," he faltered.

"But why?" insisted Polly. "You don't mean to tell me you don't sit in your old chair any more?"

Pa Moberly's chin quivered. Polly did not know, and it was hard to tell her. Polly was like her mother.

"Alice likes to keep that chair for her friends," he said, slowly. "Oh, I don't mind the kitchen so much, dear," he added, as cheerfully as he could. "At least I won't now, since you've come home. I do miss the old chair rather, but it's all right.

"The girls don't want me in there, Polly," he went on, huskily. "They're young, and there's always company, you know. I don't know that I blame 'em much. I'm old and worn out and behind the times. No, I can't say that I really blame 'em."

Polly laid her soft cheek suddenly against the wrinkled one.

"You're not old or worn out or behind the times, either!" she said. "It's a shame for you to stay out here!" Her sweet, girlish voice was full of indignation.

"But never mind, pa," she went on. "I tell you there are better days ahead. I've come home now, and I'm going to look after you, see if I don't. What would mother think if she were here, to see you sitting all alone in this dark old kitchen? Why, it would break her heart! Come with me, pa!"

"Where?" said Pa Moberly, hesitatingly, in his surprise.

"Into the sitting-room."

"Oh, I can't go in there, Polly; they don't want me."

"Yes, you can. I want you. You wouldn't refuse me anything on this, my first night home?"

Pa Moberly got up. The old wooden chair was uncomfortable, and he rose stiffly even with the help of Polly's arm.

"No, I couldn't, Polly," he said. "You—you're too like your mother."

As they left the dark kitchen together Pa Moberly grasped Polly's hand tightly. "I'm afraid, Polly," he whispered. "We'd better not."

But Polly only squeezed his hand in a reassuring clasp, and somehow Pa Moberly felt stronger.

Polly opened the sitting-room door, and a stream of light flashed out into the dark little entry. The girls were certainly having a merry evening.

A young lady in a blue dress occupied the piano stool. A young man, with his hair plastered down over his forehead, occupied Pa Moberly's armchair. He had a mandoline in his hand, and was strumming it to the young lady's accompaniment. Alice and Belle and Harriet were sitting about with the liveliest air of enjoyment.

As Polly and Pa Moberly entered, their complacency suddenly faded into astonishment and dismay. What did Polly mean, and what did pa mean, by intruding on their company in this fashion?

Digitized by Google

Polly advanced steadily into the centre of the room, still holding her father's hand.

How little and shy and bent pa looked, the girls thought, and how determined was the air Polly wore—like a young captain going into battle. It was as if Ma Moberly had come to life.

Alice rose. The young lady at the piano turned, the young man stopped his mandoline. In all the months he had come to the Moberly house, this was the first time he had ever seen the little, white-haired man who lived there. And who was that pretty brown-haired girl with flashing eyes?

Alice broke the silence. "My sister Polly, Mr. Bryant," she said, a little nervously, "and—my father. And this is our friend, Eva Brent. Pa, you know Eva?"

Pa nodded cordially; so did Polly. But something wholly unusual was in the air, and everyone felt it.

Polly led Pa Moberly up to the young man reclining in the chair. "Do you mind taking another chair, Mr. Bryant?" she said, pleasantly. "You see, this one is father's favourite. Mother gave it to him."

Alice and Belle and Harriet flushed, but Polly was quite undisturbed. The young man was astonished, but he rose quickly, with a stammered apology, and Polly calmly wheeled the chair nearer the pleasant fire.

"Sit here, father," she said, affectionately, "and let me turn the light so that it won't hurt your eyes."

She adjusted the light to her liking, then pushed Pa Moberly gently into his old place. His white air shone in the lamplight, and his lips trembled.

"There!" said Polly, in a pleased voice. "Isn't that better?"

Regardless of all onlookers, she stooped and kissed the withered cheek; then she turned to the others.

"Go on with your playing, won't you, Eva?" she said, gently.

Nobody spoke; then the young lady turned to the piano and the restraint was quickly over.

Pa Moberly's eyes grew moist. How soft the chair was, and how pleasant the fire, and how comfortable was the touch of the little firm hand upon his shoulder!

And there was something else. He knew and everyone else knew that his lonely hours in the old kitchen were over.

To-morrow the straight-backed wooden chair would be pushed back, to be occupied no more. The firelight could play on the dingy walls, the mice could scamper at will over the old floor. Pa Moberly would not be there to see. Polly had come home to take care of him, and Polly was brave. It was as if Ma Moberly had come to life again.

S. H. Martin.

Fate Again.

Brown: "I'm glad I met your wife. She seemed to take a fancy to me." Jones: "I wish you'd met her sooner."

The Difference.

Young maids sit—ah, happy chaps—young maids sit on young men's laps. Old maids sit—when past their primes—old maids sit in the lapse of time.

Spoilt by Money.

Jack: "Many a happy marriage has been spoilt by money." Tom: "Yes, it spoilt mine. She refused me because I didn't have enough."

Had Stopped Fights Before.

Passer-by: "Policeman, there's a fight round the corner." Policeman: "Thank ye, sir; I'll do as much for you some day." (And he walked in the opposite direction.)

His Very Reason.

She: "I do not care to marry you. I do not even care to talk to you." He (a widower): "That is precisely the reason why I want you to marry me."

Your Editor Chats.

You will probably remember that a week or so ago I stated in this column that I had a big scheme on hand, the object of which was to secure more readers for this paper and at the same time to give you an opportunity, unexampled for its simplicity, of making money—not merely by shillings but by pounds, not for yourself only but also for your friends. Well, this scheme is now prepared, and you will find the preliminary announcement of it on page 7. I want you to read this notice through carefully, then you will have time to prepare your friends, and they to prepare their friends, and so on for what is coming next week. In this way you stand a better chance of coming in first with ten solid sovereigns jingling in your own pockets, and a number of your friend's friends possessing single sovereigns for the little trouble they took in trying to help you. I am certain that the scheme will be a success, and the more sovereigns we have to give away the better we shall be pleased.

I have received a very interesting letter from a correspondent who is immensely delighted with the "Confessions of Cynthia," and wants me to disclose Miss Cynthia's real name. But no, I really mustn't do that. I'm afraid Miss Cynthia might have something to say to me were I to do so, for the very fact that her own real name and the other names in the confessions are screened from the public, has alone enabled us to publish the exposure. By the way, there is a very startling development in next Tuesday's instalment. Things are beginning to look decidedly black for Mrs. Norton.

I wanted to have published the result of the "Design" competition this week, but owing to the number sent in this is impossible. I hope to give the names of the prize-winners next Tuesday, and to reproduce some of the best efforts, which, judging from those I have up to the present seen, are really remarkable exhibitions of skill.

For This Week's Competition I am offering a Handsome Solid Silver Pencil-case to the reader who sends me the most sensible sentence constructed out of twelve words, the first letters of which, taken in order, spell "Short Stories." The ten competitors whose efforts come next will receive prizes of pretty little Rolled Gold Hearts and Rolled Gold Charms. Sentences should be written on the back of post-cards only, should be marked "Word," and addressed to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, W.C. The competition closes after the first post on Tuesday morning, July 8th.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.

Mrs. Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia: Her companion.

MY COUSIN RECEIVES A PROPOSAL OF MARRIAGE.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF NEW READERS.

CYNTHIA tells in the opening chapter of her arrival at her cousin's in the capacity of companion, and of her discovery that Mrs. Norton is taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money are being lost and won. The climax is reached one night when Mary Vernon stakes her diamond ear-rings (a gift from Lord Kinross) and one of the onlookers finds them to be paste. Mary Vernon declares that they are exactly as given to her by Lord Kinross, whereupon Kinross breaks off the engagement. The diamonds subsequently appear as a gift from Fluffy to Mrs. Norton, set in a pair of hat-pins. A few weeks later the notorious Mrs. Norton, with Fluffy's help, succeeds in stealing a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew at the Café Regal, by substituting for the millionaire's pocket-book one exactly like it. Later on Cynthia discovers the original pocket-book, empty of course, in one of her boxes. Not knowing what to do, she confides in Fluffy, who is very kind, but makes her promise to say nothing at all to anyone else on the subject. He takes charge of the duplicate pocket book. Mrs. Norton now moves into her new house in Pont Street.

THE next morning—our first in Pont Street—was a miserable one. Outside the day was gloomy, within it was not much better, for Frances, her amiability of the night before vanished, found fault impartially with everything and everybody. I endeavoured to dodge the domestic thunder-cloud and slipped into the library—Frankie had a lot of decent books—in the hope of a good read.

Not long was I left undisturbed.

"So you're here," Frances remarked angrily. "You are never to be found when you're wanted. Bring your books into the drawing-room, or, better still, get some work. I'm expecting somebody to call, and I wish you to be present."

Obediently I followed her, and sat and stitched till lunch-time, Frances sitting moodily by the fire, or pacing up and down the room with a swift, noiseless movement that reminded me of a feline creature in captivity.

She was never more fascinating than at such moments. Her long, graceful limbs outlined by the clinging skirt, her head thrown back in a defiant pose, eyes veiled with thought that yet revealed the smouldering fires of passion, lips red and ripe half parted showed the snowy white teeth.

"A dangerous woman," the old dowager had called her—something of what that meant, watching, I understood.

Lunch over, we changed our dresses, Frankie looking splendid in a tea-gown of daffodil satin with ruffles of Mechlin lace, while I was quite passable in a grey cloth gown with turquoise buttons.

Returning to the drawing-room, we sat and waited, hearing three, then four o'clock strike in silence. At last there came a ring at the front door, Frances leant forward, a scarlet flush in her cheek.

"Mrs. Norton?" It was Sir John's voice full of pleasurable anticipation.

I did not hear the maid's reply, but a few moments later the door shut and Sir John passed down the steps. I caught a glimpse of him as he went through the gate; he was wearing a frock coat suit of grey with a buttonhole of violets, and looked distinguished, but, I thought, tired and disappointed. I felt sorry for him, and vexed with Frances.

The next arrival was poor Fluffy, he also was sent empty away; with him an over-dressed young man, who bore a family likeness to the pink-faced youth I met at Lady Winchin's.

At five we had tea—Frankie stealthily watching the clock. I think she had given up hope of her visitor for that day, when a hansom stopped outside our door.

"It's Lord Kinross," I said quietly, and gathering up my work, prepared to leave the room.

"Sit down, sit down," cried Frankie; "I have something important to tell you. You remember Lady Westall, that horrid old woman we met at the races, and you remember also how she was pulling some woman's character to pieces the whole afternoon?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes, she was talking most of the time to Kinross. I was sorry for the poor woman she was speaking of, she said such nasty things."

"I am glad you remember. Lady Westall said the woman was an adventuress, with neither money, position, nor friends. I was the woman she referred to, Cynthia. I, your cousin!"

"Impossible, Frankie!"

"I tell you I caught my name. Besides, since that afternoon, Kinross has been different to me. He only called once at the Cecil afterwards, and was quite changed when I met him out."

"He can't believe that horrid Lady Westall?"

"What she said has had an effect upon him. He likes me, but has his suspicions all the same. Perhaps he thinks I want to entrap him into marriage—adventuresses always do that sort of thing, you know. Anyway, I am going to nip his suspicions in the bud. He shall hear from me this afternoon the history of my life—my girlhood, my marriage, who I am, where I come from, what I live on. I will tell him and he shall believe me."

Barely had she finished speaking when Lord Kinross was announced. I did not like his manner towards Frankie; usually I considered him a very charming person, that afternoon he struck me as being a touch too free and easy, familiar, almost wanting in respect.

Frankie seemed to feel the change; she was quite dignified, not to say stately in her greeting.

"You have worked a transformation here, Frankie," Kinross remarked, glancing round the room; "it's first-rate. Mrs. Ponsonby would not recognise her dingy apartment."

"I am so glad you like it," answered Frankie. "You are so terribly critical, I was afraid of your judgment."

"Never fear my judgment where you are concerned," he answered with an expressive look.

"Does that apply only to taste in furniture?"

"It covers everything."

"Do you know, I have been told you can be terribly severe, Lord Kinross?"

"An enemy's detraction—no more, Mrs. Norton. There's only one thing I can't forgive in man or woman"—he had grown suddenly grave, and spoke quite earnestly—"and that is deliberate deception. Anything else I would overlook—in you," he added flippantly.

"I wonder," she said with a laugh, "I wonder."

"Try me," he said, and came quite close, touching her with his hand.

Frankie did not respond to his advances.

"I thank your lordship," she said lightly, "and if at any time I feel disposed to forge your name, or steal your family jewels, I shall claim forgiveness."

"You may have the jewels without stealing 'em—under conditions," he said impudently.

"So? Then I'll borrow them some day. Say, when I am 'presented.'"

"Who's going to perform that office for you, Frankie—the invaluable Mrs. Ponsonby?"

"No, not Mrs. Ponsonby." Frances spoke in a deliberate fashion. "My late husband's cousin, Lady Gaveston, has expressed a wish that I should appear at Court under her wing. Otherwise my dear friend Lady Winchin would have presented me."

"Your late husband's cousin, Lady Gaveston," he repeated the phrase with unction—"is possibly the widow of the Scotch baronet, Sir Travers of that ilk?"

"Yes. Do you know her?"

"By reputation. I believe she is a good woman of the deepest dye—godly, sober, and righteous beyond endurance. You'll have to alter, Frankie, to find favour in her sight."

"My list of acquaintances—yes," she said with meaning.

"You needn't—Sir John will atone for a multitude of—Fluffies."

Frances flushed to her temples.

"One certainly cannot accuse Sir John of bad taste," she said pointedly.

Lord Kinross refused to accept the snub.

"He has the advantages of your tuition. One cannot help envying Sir John his opportunities. While as for Fluffy's—"

My cousin did not reply immediately.

"Poor Fluffy," she said at last with a half sigh, "and yet I don't know why I should call him 'poor.' There's a great deal to respect, indeed to admire in him. I, at least, cannot forget how good a friend he's been to me. There aren't many men who'd give up the time and thought to another's business that he has done to mine. My husband died very suddenly, Lord Kinross, leaving his affairs in a most complicated state, but for Fluffy's skill and patience in disentangling them I should be very differently placed at this present moment."

"Your husband's not been dead very long, Mrs. Norton?"

"Two years. He was a coffee planter in Jamaica. Fluffy was over there on business some six months before Mr. Norton's death. My husband and he took a great liking for each other."

"I suppose business fluctuates in Jamaica the same as in England," observed Lord Kinross flippantly.

"It does," Frances replied gravely. "My husband had been in treaty with several firms for the purchase of his estate, but nothing had been settled. At his death I found myself at a loss how best to act. None of the offers for the estate appeared to me good enough, and yet I was afraid to refuse them all."

"Fluffy, however, like a good angel, or a novelette, appeared in the nick of time and paid a thumping price. Eh, Mrs. Norton?"

"Nothing so melodramatic. He determined to form a company to take over the land at its proper value. The company through him was floated and the estate purchased. As a result I am richer by some thousands a year."

Lord Kinross bowed. "I congratulate you, Mrs. Norton, on your income and your friend. I wish I had one as serviceable."

"Oh, you're not likely to want friends," she answered. "You'll have plenty. Why not? Cynthia and I are different. Two forlorn orphans aren't likely to make many friends." She glanced at me and laughed. Then grew serious again.

"It's easy to smile now," she said, "but it was a different matter years ago, when we hadn't kith or kin in the whole world except each other. We were brought up from childhood in a convent school, and though the sisters were good to us, still it wasn't like being at home. I stayed till I was nineteen, and left to be married. Cynthia remained till she came to me."

"And did you meet the coffee planter at the convent?" His lordship's manner was serious, but there was a suspicious twinkle in his eyes. He seemed secretly amused, as if he suspected Frankie was not telling him the truth.

"Mr. Norton was a college chum of my father's," returned Frances. "He took the opportunity of a trip to Europe to come and see his old friend's little girl. And," she stopped, a sad look crept into her eyes, "he married me," she finished with a sigh.

Frankie's description somehow gave one the impression that her marriage had not been a success. Remembering Mr. Norton's kindly face and cheery ways I felt puzzled. Any woman, I thought, might have been proud and happy in his love.

"You must have missed your cousin terribly, Miss Hamilton?" said his lordship turning suddenly to me.

There was a keen look on his face, but a smile twitched at the corners of his mouth. The question took me by surprise. As a matter of fact, I had not felt my cousin's loss acutely.

"Yes," I said vaguely. "Yes."

"Poor little girl," said Frances tenderly, "how unhappy she was about my marriage. How she clung to me that last morning when I left; I could not say 'Good-bye' for tears. Do you remember my going, Cynthia?"

I remembered the occasion distinctly, but, oddly enough,

Digitized by Google

"CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA."
New Series of Stories.

my recollections did not correspond with Frankie's. My cousin, far from being overcome, had waved a cool "Good-bye" from the top of the coach, to which I had replied by one as calm from the convent window. Our mutual regrets were anything but keen.

"We used to lie awake at nights picturing our future—Cynthia and I. We imagined most brilliant prospects, and presented each other with the best of fortunes. But we always agreed to share our luck—if ever we had any, just as we shared our childish griefs and sorrow. Eh, dearie?" and she smiled at me.

She pinched my cheek playfully—but a little hard—when I made no answer. Somehow the right one would not come. I knew what I was wanted, what, indeed, I ought to say. Frances had been very generous to me since I became her companion, and it was only right I should acknowledge it. A vivid though unseasonable recollection obtruded itself and held me dumb. I remembered as a child at the convent, creeping to Frances in the night time, crying in the inconsistent and overwhelming fashion of childhood for my mother and my home. And Frances—well, she had not been quite kind.

My cheeks burnt under my cousin's reproachful gaze, but my heart was foolishly hot at the thought of the little crying child, and I sat silent.

And then Frances did a strange thing. She put her arm about my waist and bent over me caressingly, love and tenderness shining in her eyes.

"Cynthia," she said softly, "my dear little Cynthia, don't cry."

The words, the action, the soft touch of her fingers on my hair thrilled me. My cousin was a fascinating woman, and I a young girl, hungry for affection. The tears that had gathered in my eyes suddenly overflowed. I caught hold of her hand and held it tightly.

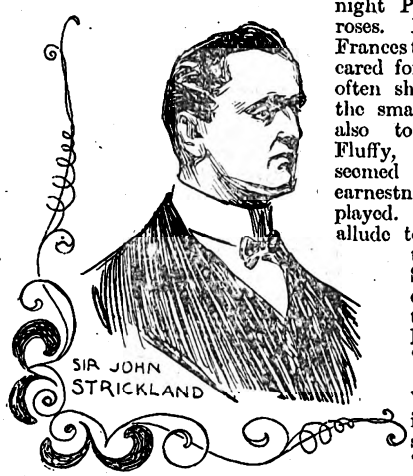
"Oh, Frankie, you are very, very good to me," I cried, and meant it every word.

Then fumbling for my handkerchief I made towards the door. Lord Kinross crossed quickly to where my cousin stood, his face was grave, and his manner quite abashed.

"Well?" she asked, throwing her head back, "well?" There was a note of challenge in her voice which Kinross answered.

He took her hands in his. "I offer my sincere apologies," he said. "I am convinced that Fluffy is a friend greatly to be desired, and I believe—whatever you choose to tell me," and stooping, he kissed her fingers. Frankie had triumphed, Kinross believed in her implicity.

I felt happier that evening than I had done—well, since the night Percival sent me the roses. It was so nice of Frances to show that she really cared for me. People didn't often show their feelings in the smart set. Nice of her also to have championed Fluffy, though he hardly seemed to call for such earnestness as she'd displayed. Frances did not allude to what had passed, to me, that is to say. She told Fluffy, who dropped in during the evening that his lordship had been "cheeky."



"That cat Lady Westall has been talking to him about me," she said viciously, "and other tabbies too, I expect. Lord, how I hate 'em all!" and she glared at her handsome face reflected in the glass as though for a moment she saw "the cat" referred to.

"Anything serious?" queried Fluffy. "I mean were you much annoyed?"

Frankie shrugged her shoulders.

"I've made it all right for the present," she said, "but—Jamaica's a nasty climate for reputations," she observed oracularly.

Sir John called early next morning, and left a beautiful basket of white lilac. Some half hour later Lord Kinross arrived with a suitable offering of violets and lilies. Frankie saw neither of them, but sent me down with a sweet message for each.

"Won't she see me, really, Cynthia? Not for a minute," pleaded Kinross.

I shook my head.

"Where is she?"

"In the morning-room, writing letters."

"Take me to her, like a good child."

"Certainly not. I'm afraid you're very forward, Lord Kinross."

"I'm certain you're very pretty, Cynthia. That's a sweet thing in gowns. As I can't see Frankie, I think I'll talk to you."

"You are extremely impertinent," I said indignantly.

"You are entirely charming. Look always thus, Cynthia, it is most becoming."

He gazed at me pensively, until I was obliged to laugh. It was no good to get angry with such an absurd person, and yet he irritated me, as he lounged gracefully against the mantelpiece, in a dark blue suit, with a buttonhole of lilies and a lovely thing in ties, I was obliged to own him charming. I studied his face intently—was he really the trifler he always appeared, or did this lightness of speech and manner merely serve as a cloak for sincerity? Had he, I wondered, a genuine affection for my cousin, or was he only playing, flirting with the most fascinating woman in London, as somebody called Frankie.

Sir John's straight figure and proud, set face came into my mind. How eagerly he had glanced up as I came into the room that morning, the brightness fading as he saw that yet again he was to be disappointed. No possibility of mistake there. He loved my cousin with the force of a strong, reserved nature, and so great as his love would be his suffering if—I did not care to continue that chain of thought, but returned to the consideration of his lordship.

I hoped that Frankie did not care for him; he was not, I thought angrily, capable of feeling deeply. I remembered poor Mary Vernon, and decided that had he truly loved her, he would have trusted and believed in her against all proof. I say that I decided this and approved of my decision—until I remembered Percival Hope and Mr. Pettigrew's pocket book, and grew troubled. But after all, that was quite different, Percival was nothing to me. A mere acquaintance, that was all. I sighed, and looking up, encountered Kinross' eyes.

"Well," he said, with a tolerant smile, "and what is your opinion? Am I a very worthless person, Cynthia?"

"I can't tell," I answered.

"Is my appearance so desperately deceitful? We are not all like your friend Sir John, who bears his character upon his face."

"Sir John is worth a hundred of—of other people," I concluded lamely.

"No, Cynthia, not of other people, but of me. You can afford to be candid, dear child, while your looks last."

"I did not mean to be rude," I said stiffly.

"Nor were you. Only delightfully ingenuous. Still the world isn't made up of men like me and Sir John. There are a few other types besides; and there always remains—Percival Hope." His lordship smiled maliciously, and took his leave.

Frances did not show any great enthusiasm for her flowers. I took them up for her, and was a little disappointed at her cool reception of the gifts—Sir John's at all events.

Digitized by Google

"He is very fond of you, Frankie," I said timidly, sniffing the lilac.

Frances looked up quickly.

"Fond of me," she repeated, "do you think so?" She seemed quite interested, and left off writing.

"His face changes at your name, and when he looks at you!—you do care for him a little, Frankie?"

Frankie laughed.

"Yes—a little," she said.

"I like Sir John so much," I continued, eager on his behalf.

"Sir John," she repeated. Then as her eyes fell on the basket of lilac she frowned, looking positively angry.

"You talk a lot of nonsense, Cynthia," she said. "Put the flowers in water and run away, I'm busy."

Frances was certainly most variable.

For the first week we did not have many callers in Pont Street. Mrs. Curtis-Blunt looked us up, accompanied by a man in glasses, so also did the pink youth. Percival Hope left cards, Sir John and Lord Kinross came regularly of an afternoon. Others than these, however, did not appear. Frances, indeed, kept very quiet. She went to the theatre but little, and gave up dining at restaurants altogether.

"I'm saving myself for Lady Gaveston," she told Lord Kinross. "Her ladyship arrives next week, I'm to be presented the week after. Until then I'm leading a retired life. After——" she laughed.

"What are your 'At Home' days?" he asked.

"The first and third Wednesdays in the month. Will you promise to turn up?"

"I shall be charmed. My sister Paula is anxious to know you, with your permission I will bring her."

"I should like to meet your sister above everything," said Frances, a pink flush on her cheek.

"That's very good of you. Say, Frankie, are you doing anything to-night?"

"Yes, entertaining Sir John."

"I was going to ask you for an invitation to dinner, but in face of Sir John—Good-bye, Frankie. I'll look you up next week. My love to Lady Gaveston."

Sir John was very silent that evening, but seemed to me more in love than ever. Frankie in a white chiffon gown looked girlish and dainty, and wore some of his flowers—he sent them daily.

"I like your dress," he said gravely, "it is so simple. A beautiful jewel does not require a rich setting."

"A charming compliment, Sir John and a pretty simile. I'm afraid it won't hold good in life though. A woman may be fair as Venus, it won't prevent her being overlooked if she wears a last year's frock."

"Is happiness dependent on a constant publicity?" he asked.

"That depends on one's notion of happiness I suppose."

"But you, could you not content yourself with a life of quiet interests and pursuits if—" he paused, "if shared with one you loved?"

Frances did not reply but drew out her cigarette case, a dainty toy in silver set with turquoises, and extracted a cigarette.

"A special brand—will you have one?" she asked Sir John. "They are worth trying."

She leant back in her low cushioned chair blowing dainty wreaths of smoke.

"You're an inveterate smoker, Sir John," she remarked, handing him a fresh cigarette. "Tell me, could you content yourself with an inferior tobacco and a wretched pipe, knowing better could be had—for the asking?"

He leant forward, a pained expression on his face.

"I don't pretend to misunderstand you. But—doesn't love count at all?" he said in a low, strained voice.

"Love?" repeated Frankie scornfully, rising from her seat. "Would any man who truly loves a woman ask her to give up—this—" and she glanced round the room rich with soft silken hangings, rare flowers and costly ornaments. "When I marry I lose it all—all," she repeated. "What is offered in exchange?"

She stood before him her face glowing, her eyes flashing, an embodiment of youth and power.

He came quite close and put his hands upon her shoulders.

"Nothing but two strong hands to work for you, two arms to shelter you, a heart to love you always," he said. "I have but little money as you know."

"You can make as much as you desire—if you really cared for me."

"How? Only tell me and I'll do it. Only promise you will give me my reward, and I will not shrink from hardship, labour or anxiety."

"'Tis nothing so dreadful," she returned. "A man of your abilities could make thousands to-morrow—in the City."

"The City?" he repeated. "I do not understand. I—" he paused. "I fear I am a little dull. Will you explain?"

She shrugged her shoulders. "Fluffy will do that," she said. "You'd better see him in the morning. He's always a hundred and one things on foot. He's just going to bring out a company. He might nominate you as director."

Sir John fell back.

"That," he said, "would be impossible. I know nothing of company work, and could not lend my name to an undertaking which I did not understand."

"You'll understand it all right. If not, well there's no harm in seeing Fluffy."

"I cannot——" he commenced but went no further.

Frankie had thrown herself into his arms.

"For my sake, John," she said, "for the sake of the woman who loves you. I cannot give you up, and yet I can't bear poverty. John!"

His arms about her, her fair head on his shoulder, her lips close to his own, what could he say? Was not she who asked him the woman he loved, the woman he'd dreamt might love him in return?

I went quietly from the room, but as I closed the door I heard his answer.

"For your sake, dearest, yes," he said.

And then he sighed.

And I, stealing softly through the darkened hall sighed also. I could not understand my cousin, and for the first time I doubted her. I did not believe she wanted Sir John to become a company director in order that he might make money for himself.

What then was her object? Like a flash the answer came.

To make money for herself and Fluffy!

Sir John's was a well known, indeed a famous name, many persons would take shares in a company of which he was a director, his name would stand as guarantee for any concern, and would induce hundreds to subscribe. So much the better if the concern were genuine, but, I remembered hearing someone say that certain of Fluffy's ventures were neither sound nor square. It might be that Sir John, in all ignorance, would lend his name to a company of this description, and thus induce people to risk their money, it might be their only savings.

I put the thought from me, but, try as I would, I still felt sad and ill at ease. Alas! All that I feared and dreaded for Sir John, fell short, far short of what the future brought him!

[Another dramatic incident in this powerful series is dealt with in next Tuesday's SHORT STORIES.]

Digitized by Google

Fish Stories.

WATSON: "What was the largest trout you ever caught, James?" James: "Let's see; what day of the week is this, Watson?" "Monday, I believe. What in the world has that to do with my question?" "Oh, nothing; only I think you'd better wait until Wednesday. I always like to get as far as possible from Sunday when I tell about my fishing experiences."

Dark Corners Preferred.

"LOVE is blind," and that is why he always seeks the seclusion of the darkest corners in preference to the painful light of the front parlour.

Evidently weren't Thirsty.

LADY JANE: "Have you given the gold-fish fresh water, Janet?" Janet: "No, mum. They ain't finished the water I give 'em t'other week yet."

Friend for Mutual Convenience.

"I SEE Miss Sanders and Miss Smiley are nearly always together. What dear friends they must be!" "Not at all. You see each of them has an unmarried brother."

Terrible Trouble.

MRS. HOLDOVER: "You are in trouble, dear. Let me sympathise with you." Miss Justout: "You can't possibly, dear. I have had three proposals, and must choose between them."

Effective.

THE lady occupied a seat in the carriage alone. The man looked in, and with a smile and a bow inquired: "Engaged?" "No, married," she responded, and he backed off.

The Candid Friend.

TOM (a dejected suitor): "I congratulate you, Miss Flurt, on your approaching marriage with Mr. Brown." Miss Flurt: "Why do you congratulate me?" Tom: "Well, I can't honestly congratulate him."

Needs to be Strong.

HOUSEKEEPER: "I don't see why a big able-bodied man like you should be begging for a living." Tramp: "To tell ye the truth, mum, folks is becomin' so hard-hearted that a gent has got ter be big an' able-bodied to beg without gettin' hurt."

A Narrow Escape.

YOUNG LADY: "I suppose you have had some narrow escapes, Lieutenant Dashaway?" Lieutenant Dashaway: "Y-a-a-s. Awfully narrow escape once, bah Jove!" Young Lady (breathlessly): "In what way?" Lieutenant Dashaway: "Vewy near ordahed on active service, don'cher know; but the war came to an end before we embarked."

Drew it at the Bill.

"I SUPPOSE, doctor, that a large proportion of the ills of your patients are imaginary?" "Yes, sir, quite a large proportion." "And your treatment of such cases, I suppose, is by imaginary pills?" "Well, I suppose you might call it that." "Then, of course, for treating imaginary ills with imaginary pills, you send in imaginary bills?" "Oh, my dear sir, nothing of the kind. There's nothing imaginary about the bills; I have to draw the line somewhere."

He Didn't Ask Pa.

HE (seriously): "Do you think your father would object to my marrying you?" She: "I don't know; if he's anything like me he would."

No Alternative.

SHE: "I am simply tired of your conduct. I wonder how a woman can ever marry a man." He: "Well, there's really nothing else to marry, is there?"

Righteous Indignation.

THE BRIDE: "Kiss me again, dear!" The Groom: "But Madge, I have done nothing but kiss you for the last three hours." The Bride (bursting into tears): "Traitor, you love another!"

A Combined Effort.

CHAPPIE: "I believe there is something in this thought twansfewence notion. Vewy often I notice that Cholly and I have the same idea at once." Miss Flyppe: "Perhaps it requires your united efforts to really entertain an idea."

Absolute Certainty.

CORONER: "You seem to be certain that the deceased accidentally fell into the water. How do you know that this is not a case of suicide?" Witness: "He was a brither Scot, and had a wee bottle o' whisky on him wi' ne'er a nip ta'en oot."

Satisfactorily Explained.

"HENRY," she whispered, as though fearful of the worst, "do you love me less than a fortnight ago when you brought me some flowers or sweets every night?" "No, Evelina, no," he answered, "but pay day is yet a week off, and I generally get broke about the middle of the month."

A Bitter Pill.

HIS SECRETARY (hopefully): "Sir, I have married your daughter." (After a pause, bitterly): "I suppose you have no further use for me?" Himself: "Your week is not up until six o'clock. You may sit down and draw a new will for me, leaving all my property to the Church."

Nobody Minded.

"Do you think your sister likes to have me come here, Johnny?" "You bet. You take her to the theatre and bring her chocolates." "I'm glad I can make her happy." "Yes, and the young feller what she's engaged to don't mind it either, for it saves him that much money towards housekeeping."

Resembling Feature.

THE addresses of a young man having been declined by a young lady, he paid court to her sister. "How much you resemble your sister," said he, the evening of his first call. "You have the same hair, the same forehead, and the same eyes——" "And the same nose!" she added quickly. He has stopped calling at that house.

Hadn't Read It.

THEY were talking of poetry, and as he held her hand and looked into her eyes she asked him if he remembered the name of a certain poet. "He writes the most uncommon poetry about common things," she said. "I cannot think of his name, you know; he is the poet who writes so much in the vernacular." "Yes, dear," he said; "but I never read that magazine."

Took the Bull by the Horns.

ONE of the clerks in a prominent banking-house, having an intimation that it was proposed to dispense with his services, boldly entered the manager's private room, and said: "Mr. Smith, I have made up my mind that the interests of this bank require that either you or myself leave its service. As you are the leading man of the bank, and have a large family to support, I have concluded to leave you your position, and retire myself."

Digitized by Google

Music the Mesmerist.

Telling of a Desperate Scheme which was Frustrated.

It was evident that she did not love him, and yet it was announced that she was to marry him. I was only a guest in the house, but the affair troubled me and I sought long and earnestly for an explanation of it. So far as I could judge Mary had a distinct aversion to Ralph Weston, rather than an affection for him, but nevertheless he seemed to dominate her life. She feared him, but for some reason chose to keep secret the cause of that fear. I could see her almost shrink from him when he called, but she dared not refuse to see him or break the engagement which her father had sanctioned.

What was the secret of his power? I asked myself. Why did she not go to her father—easy-going, blind old Mark Tottenham—and tell him she could not marry this man? I could see no reason why she should sacrifice herself. Her father was wealthy and Weston was not. Surely the latter had no hold upon the old gentleman that made such a marriage imperative. On the contrary, my observation led me to believe that Mr. Tottenham thought he was acting for the best interests of his daughter. He liked Weston—who could be extremely affable and entertaining when he wished, although usually rather taciturn—but there was nothing to indicate that he had his heart set on the match.

Yet Mary shuddered a little when her accepted suitor called, then greeted him with a show of cordiality and went blindly with him to the little reception-room, from which from time to time strains of music were wafted. Weston was a musician of no mean ability, and occasionally entertained us all with selections on the piano, but the fitful way in which he played when they were alone together impressed me as being rather strange. He seldom played a selection through in those circumstances, but seemed rather to run over the keys idly, improvising or giving a few bars from one air and then a few bars from another. Once when he was doing this I thought I heard a wild, pleading cry of "Oh, don't!" and then a half-smothered shriek, and, when he played for us all, the frightened look in Mary's eyes was enough to haunt a man for life. Apparently, however, I was the only one who noticed it.

Finally, overstepping even the liberty accorded to an old friend, I spoke plainly to her. I told her it was plain she did not love him and asked her why she did not go frankly to her father, tell him so, and break the engagement. The bare suggestion seemed to frighten her, and she shuddered as she answered: "I dare not, I dare not. He'd kill me."

"Kill you!" I exclaimed. "Nonsense! Your father has only your welfare at heart, and——"

"No, no; not my father," she interrupted. "I mean Mr. Weston. He has the keynote."

The keynote! I was more mystified than ever, but she gave me no chance to ask for an explanation. She hurried away as if already alarmed at what she had said; yet it seemed to me that she regarded me after that as one who was more in her confidence than others and to whom she might look for protection from some impending evil. Still I could not understand what she meant by the "keynote," and she avoided the subject as if it were fraught with great personal danger. When I asked her to explain she trembled and shook her head.

"No one would believe me," she said. "It is so strange, so weird. And he would kill me. He has threatened to and I know he would."

"Your nerves are overwrought," I replied. "Unless I misjudge the man, he would not know one end of a revolver from the other, and this is not the age for that sort of thing, anyway."

"But you don't understand," she insisted, laying her hand on my arm as if that gave her confidence, but nevertheless looking about her in a frightened way. "He has the keynote."

"That's what you said before," I returned, taking both her hands and holding her in front of me. "What do you mean by it? Tell me frankly. I'll believe you and I'll help you."

"If I thought you would?" she said doubtingly.

She seemed on the point of telling me her story, but evidently thought better of it.

"Wait," she said. "You shall see for yourself. He is coming to-night, and I will hide you behind the curtains. But don't let him kill me! If he tries to do it, knock him down—brain him—drive him away from the piano at all costs!"

There was a world of pathos in the earnestness with which she said that, and for the first time I began to understand the affair. There is a keynote to everything, as science has demonstrated. Just the right chord will make a glass shiver into a million pieces. If the keynote of St. Paul's Cathedral or Westminster Abbey could only be discovered, either structure might be crumbled into dust, and it is not an unknown thing for articles in the vicinity of great organs to fall in pieces upon the sounding of a certain note. Indeed, I myself have felt the sudden emotional thrill that comes from the striking of a certain chord, and, I meditated, it is quite possible that if Weston had discovered the particular note to which Mary's nerves responded he might be capable of doing her enormous bodily harm.

That evening I was carefully concealed behind the window draperies when Weston called, and it is needless to say that my interest was intense. She shuddered as he drew her towards him, but remained passive in his embrace.

"To-morrow," he said, "we will be quietly married."

"No," she replied, and I could see that it was only with an effort that she forced herself to say it.

"But I insist!" he exclaimed. "I will no longer run the risk of losing you, and you promised yesterday."

"I've changed my mind," she answered shortly.

"Have a care!" he returned menacingly, releasing her and moving towards the piano.

Whether it was my presence that inspired her I know not, but for the first time, as she afterwards told me, her spirit was roused and she dared him.

Digitized by Google

"Kill me if you will!" she cried. "Since the fatefu night since you first accidentally struck that chord and saw the effect it had on me, I have lived in almost constant fear of death or insanity, which is worse. I have trembled whenever you have touched the keys, even in the presence of others. You have played, as it seemed to me, on the live nerves of my body, and from very fear forced me to acquiesce in whatever you proposed, but I'll put a stop to it now. I will not marry you to-morrow or at any other time."

"Think again," he said softly, but nevertheless threateningly, as he seated himself at the piano and idly ran his fingers over the keys. "Remember! This is a power I will have always. I have no fear that I will kill you, but wherever I may find you I can inflict upon you the excruciating torture that you dread. Even at the altar this chord——"

He never finished the sentence, for as he spoke she uttered a sudden cry. Her face became deathly white and she swayed and shook like a leaf. I sprang from behind the curtains, but before I reached him he had struck the chord again and with a moan she collapsed and sank in a heap on the floor.

I did not handle him very gently, and when the others came in, attracted by the noise, he was in a fit condition to interview a doctor. He said when he left that he would find an opportunity to carry his threat into execution, and that she never would be able to escape that chord so long as both he and she lived.

She and her father left for a trip on the Continent a week later and Weston disappeared soon after. He intimated that it was his purpose to follow them. If he did, and her father remained in the same humour, in which I last saw him, I am satisfied that there is one musical genius occupying a grave somewhere on the Continent. But I have heard of no such tragedy.

E. Flower.

OUR COLOURED COVER FOR NEXT WEEK'S NUMBER.

"PITY! FOR YOUR CHILD'S SAKE." "MY CHILD! NO, YOUR CHILD."

A dramatic incident from our powerful story in next week's number, entitled:

"ANOTHER WOMAN'S CHILD."

CATCHING AN EARLY TRAIN.

One of the greatest delights of going into the country for the summer is the pleasure a man derives from his efforts to catch the early morning train by which he must reach the city and his business.

When he gets out of bed he looks at his watch and finds he has plenty of time, so he dresses leisurely, and sits down to breakfast in a calm and serene state of mind. Just as he cracks his first egg he hears the station bell ringing.

He starts, jerks out his watch, compares it with the clock, and finds that it is seventeen minutes slow, and that he has only six minutes left in which to get to the station.

In a fearful hurry he tries to scoop the egg out of the shell, but it burns his fingers and mashes into a hopeless mess.

He drops the whole concern in disgust, grabs a roll, and scalds his tongue with a quick mouthful of coffee, then he stuffs the roll into his pocket, while his wife hands him his bag and tells him she thinks she hears the whistle.

He plunges madly round the room looking for his umbrella, he kisses his wife as well as he can, says good-bye to the children in a lump, and makes a dash for the door. Just as he gets to the gate he finds that he has forgotten a parcel, and he charges back after it, snatches it up, and tears down the gravel path in a frenzy.

He doesn't like to run through the village because that would be undignified; but he walks furiously. He goes faster and faster. Half way down he does hear the whistle for certain.

He wants to run, but he knows that he will start up that dog there by the grocer's if he does. Then he actually sees the train coming into the station, and he feels that he must make a dash. He does. The dog becomes excited, and tears after him.

Six other dogs join in the chase, one after the other, and bark furiously, and frolic round his legs.

Small boys contribute to the excitement as he goes past, whistling on their fingers, and the men at work on the new village club knock off to look at him and laugh.

He feels ridiculous; but he must catch that train. He gets desperate when he has to slacken up until two or three women, who are on the pavement discussing the servant-girl question and the price of butter, scatter to let him pass. He arrives within one hundred yards of the station with coat-tails horizontal, and the dogs nipping his heels, just as the train commences to move.

He puts on extra pressure, and resolves to catch the train or perish.

He reaches it as the guard's van is going past. He seizes the handle, is violently jerked up and down, once or twice, but finally lands on the step on his knees, and is launched in by his coat-collar by the guard, hot, angry, dusty, with his trousers torn across the knees, his shins bruised, and three ribs of his umbrella broken.

Just as he gets into the van the train stops, backs up to the siding, and leisurely picks up a water-cress truck.

Then he is angrier than ever, and determines that he will move back to town to-morrow, and uses naughty words, while he looks out of the window and watches the dogs that followed him engaged in a contest over a bone, and he registers a silent vow to devote his first holiday to hunting up those dogs and braining them with a club.

J. L. P.

Digitized by Google

MRS. BRENNAN'S "KID."

A Charming Little Tale of a Three-year-old Peacemaker.

The entire neighbourhood had long since decided that Mrs. Brennan's youngest hopeful would close his earthly career through the unwelcome attentions of the proverbial hangman. Maggie Brennan, aged fifteen, was a popular employee at Johnson's cigar factory. Young Dan was a telegraph boy, and even little Jennie earned odd pennies by caring for the neighbours' children when the parents were called away to christenings, funerals and weddings.

But from the day that the "Kid," at the tender age of nine months, had fallen from a window to the area below, striking a clothes line en route, and had sat up howling vigorously, but unhurt, his young life had been marked by a succession of stirring and nerve-distracting events. Even his good-natured Irish mother had begun to regard him as hopeless, and his one friend was pretty Miss Harris, whose pink and blue blouses and daintily embroidered skirts decorated the Brennan clothes horse each ironing day. Meta Harris always declared that the "Kid" was particularly intelligent, and some day would perform a great deed.

On this afternoon the "Kid," having reached the age of three, and having acquired sufficient wisdom to snatch a stick of liquorice from a weaker and meeker playmate in the gutter, had wandered far from home.

An overdose of liquorice on this hot, sultry day had affected the "Kid" as nothing had ever done before. He yearned for the narrow, dim court and the towering tenement, to say nothing of a drink and his mother's restful bosom. But all around him was mud, the thick, yellow mud of a newly-opened street, and beyond disgustingly new cottages painted in æsthetic tints and surrounded by gardens laid out in geometrical flower and lawn patterns. That is, all were thus laid out, save one. It was overgrown with weeds, which had choked out the flowers planted there early in the spring.

A young man, in a natty flannel suit, had paused at the gate and was surveying, with a clouded brow, the scene of desolation. It hardly seemed possible that just four months previous he and she had planted those flowers, coming up each evening to water them, pick out the weeds and put finishing touches within doors.

The furniture had been put in place, even some of the shining crockery had found its way to the small pantry, when the quarrel came.

He had done his best to smooth over the difficulty, but finally one afternoon he had walked over to the little cottage, which represented his savings of two hard years, closed and barred the windows and doors, and with a heavy heart had walked out through the small gate. Never again had he been near the burial ground of his high hopes—until this evening. Vaguely he felt lately that something ought to be done with the place.

The frown deepened as he turned away and marched resolutely down the street. He would see an estate agent at once and offer the place at any sacrifice. Then he'd try his luck in South Africa. The papers all said there were splendid openings down there for clever fellows from home.

"Mamma! Ma——!"

Jack Griswold stopped communing with the disagreeable past and stared down upon a bedraggled, forlorn bit of humanity.

"Hello, old chap. What are you doing here?"

The "old chap" resented the familiar address, fell to weeping lustily and rolled disconsolately in the soft mud.

"Oh, I say," exclaimed Jack, bending over the little fellow, "you mustn't do that! You'll be a sight. I suppose you're lost."

Griswold glanced helplessly at the neat cottages and then at the child of the slums. How ever did the youngster get out here? And his sobs were actually pitiful. Jack thought of a policeman, but such officials were seldom needed in this quiet neighbourhood.

Finally pity overcame discretion, and Jack grasped a small hand and led the runaway towards the cottage over which he had but lately been gloating in misery. He unlocked the door and led the culprit to the kitchen, turned on the water and awkwardly washed the astonished denizen of Diggle's Court.

"There, when I get a few layers of dirt off I'll take you to the nearest police station and they can find your 'ma.' But I'll be hanged if I'd drag such a connecting link as you were through the streets."

A fresh handkerchief was sacrificed on the altar of cleanliness, and then Griswold started towards the door with his unexpected charge. But here another surprise was in store for him. The skies were overcast and lightning was playing along the horizon. There was nothing to do but wait till the storm passed by.

Griswold sank into a chair in the tiny parlour, and Mrs. Brennan's "Kid" clambered familiarly upon his knee. The afternoon was sultry, the little head sank lower and lower on Griswold's immaculate flannel suit, and soon a soft, even breathing filled the quiet room.

The storm gathered and burst, but the child slept on, and Griswold, with half closed eyes, lived over again the happy days when she and he had planned and furnished the cottage.

A sudden flash of vivid lightning and a shrill feminine shriek!

"Oh, Mrs. Brennan, if only I had a key we could get in here! And porches and trees are so dangerous!"

Jack rose to his feet, the sleeping child still clasped in his arms. There was no mistaking that sweet voice. For an instant he hesitated, then threw open the door.

Two women crouched in the portal. One was middle aged and haggard, her sleeves rolled up to her elbow, and her apron tossed over her head. The other was young, and dainty and fair to look upon, even in her tearful fright. They rose and faced the sudden vision in the doorway.

The older woman gave a scream, half of anger, half of joy.

"It's me Kid! Where did ye foind him?" Then without waiting for reply she jerked the sleeping child from Griswold's arms and fell to weeping and scolding over him in true Irish fashion.

Ten minutes later the storm died down as suddenly as it had risen, and Mrs. Brennan and her "Kid," duly provided with 'bus fare, were wending their way towards Diggle's Court.

The younger woman still stood at the window, staring out upon the weeds, which hung heavy with moisture. She tapped her fingers mechanically on the window pane.

"I had gone over to Mrs. Brennan's for a blouse I wanted," she remarked suddenly, as if she felt that an explanation was obligatory. "And she was nearly crazy about the 'Kid.' I felt so sorry for her, and we kept walking, and walking, and every one had seen the little boy, they said, and we followed the trail till we got here—and——"

She turned suddenly and faced Griswold, who was regarding her anxiously. The contrast between his grave, pleading face and his generally demoralised attire was ludicrous. The departed "Kid" had left as mementoes of his short stay liberal stains of liquorice and mud on Griswold's soft flannel suit. One grimy hand had evidently found a resting place on Jack's smooth shaven cheek.

Meta Harris stopped laughing and exclaimed:

"Oh, to think you'd be so good to that miserable 'Kid.' You've made me feel so—so mean and insignificant." Her face was very sober now. "Do you think, Jack, you could forgive me, and——"

"Bless that 'Kid,'" exclaimed Jack as they walked home in the twilight. Meta had resolutely refused to take a 'bus in consideration of Jack's soiled raiment. "When we get settled the little chap can play up here every Saturday."

"Yes," mused Meta, "I always said that boy would do something worth doing."

Cicely Allen.

Digitized by Google

YOU CAN BEGIN TO-DAY.

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

By HENRY FARMER.

Author of "Fettered Lives," "As a Man Sows," "In the Grip of the Law," etc.

For New Readers.

A BELT full of diamonds has been stolen from a safe belonging to Mr. Mansfield, a wealthy banker, by Seaton Revelle (who is a friend of the banker's) and an accomplice named Benjamin Beard. Revelle accuses Alec Scarsdale, who is in love with Esther, Mr. Mansfield's daughter, of the crime, and he is sentenced to sixteen years' penal servitude. Mr. Crump, late Chief-Inspector at Scotland Yard, feeling sure Scarsdale is innocent and Revelle is guilty, sets himself to prove the latter's guilt. Mr. Mansfield as fully believes in Scarsdale's guilt as does Esther in his innocence, and his friendship for Revelle increases. Revelle constantly visits the banker's house in an endeavour to win Esther's love, but so far has not prospered at all. While talking with the girl one day, Mr. Mansfield's new maid, Vance, enters the room with a tray bearing cups of coffee. No sooner does she catch sight of Revelle than she drops the tray, and, pointing to Revelle, screams: "That—that man is my husband!" But Revelle, by sheer force of will, compels her to acknowledge her mistake. In the meanwhile, Scarsdale, who has got into trouble for attacking a warder who jested with him about Esther, is taken seriously ill, and placed in the prison hospital, where he succeeds in writing a letter to Esther and giving it to a convict named Ben Needham, who has finished his sentence and has promised to deliver it to Esther upon his release.

At about this time Esther and Mr. Crump are walking together when they observe Vance about to throw herself in the reservoir. Crump stops her just in time—he and Esther taking her back to The Woodlands. Later on Revelle and Benny drive up in a dogcart, and suddenly, while talking to Esther, Revelle turns deadly pale. Crump is standing by, and quickly sees the reason for his emotion. Vance is approaching. She goes straight up to Revelle. It is a critical moment, but once more Revelle's iron will wins the day. Again apologising for her mistake in calling Revelle her husband, she allows herself to be led away. Later on she is placed in the county asylum. A charity concert is now announced, in which both Esther and Benny are billed to take part. Revelle, of course, is present; so also is Mr. Crump.

CHAPTER XX.

How Seaton Revelle Manœuvred to be Alone with Esther.

THE concert had not yet started when Seaton Revelle returned to his seat between Lady Eliza Normanhurst and Esther. Punctuality is not always a characteristic of amateur performances. A hum of conversation filled the room. The Vicar was talking with Lord Normanhurst most enthusiastically on the subject of the restoration of his church. Then came a momentary lull.

"That was a remarkable escape of that convict from Greystone Prison, wasn't it? I suppose you read about it in the papers. The fellow seems to have got clean away, what's more!"

The words, addressed by a man to his companion, reached Esther—and Seaton Revelle.

Greystone Prison! Alec was there! Surroundings were forgotten now. Esther's face had gone ghastly white. Her heart had ceased to beat. What if——

"Yes, I saw something about it. What was the fellow's name?"

It seemed an eternity of time to Esther before the answer came. Revelle, though seeming not to do so, was watching her out of the corners of his eyes. He inwardly reviled the man behind for having started the topic. It meant the awakening, perhaps, of what he told himself Esther was rapidly forgetting. Savage annoyance was his first feeling; then a shadowy look of uneasiness played across his features.

Greystone prison. Scarsdale was there!

"A fellow called Crofton—known among the prisoners as Gentleman Jack! By the way, Greystone prison's the place, isn't it, where that——"

The man stopped abruptly, coughed, and then stammered out something about the awful time they were being kept waiting. He had momentarily forgotten that Miss Mansfield was sitting in front of him. Scarsdale's name had been on the tip of his tongue when his companion had brought his elbow sharply home into his ribs.

The moment of suspense—for Esther—was over; but the uneasy shadow on Revelle's face seemed to have deepened. But he pulled himself together, and answered a question addressed to him by Lady Eliza.

"Yes! They are a long time; but the local orchestra opens the ball, and I've always noticed that amateurs take an awful time to tune up. They are at it now!"

The plaintive wail of stringed instruments floated into the room. Esther outwardly seemed herself again; but her gloved hands were tightly clenched. It was hard to bear! It was a hard, heart-straining part that she had set herself to play. And this was what Crump, as he sat holding Pollie's hot little hand, was telling himself.

"Yes, Pollie, yes!" he said aloud, "they are coming in now. We shall be starting in a minute. What's that funny looking thing? Why that's what is called a double-bass. Yes, it's a big fiddle; but too big to be tucked under anybody's chin. It's a kind of hoarse-voiced fiddle, and it grunts instead of squeaking. That gentleman, looking very important, with white gloves and the stick, is the conductor. The only thing that he beats is time, and"—the little man chuckled—"not always that, Pollie."

"Doesn't he sing, or play, or do nothing?" questioned Pollie.

"No, only wags that stick; he may get excited; but nobody will take any notice of that!"

"Then he's not much use!" said Pollie decidedly.

"Sometimes most useful, most essential—when he is paid attention to; but I don't think that will happen to-night!"

And Crump was right. The opening overture—after a false start—was played in a go-as-you-please style ; but it was all in the cause of charity, and charity covers a multitude of sins.

Then a pale young man tootled a melancholy flute solo that suggested wind escaping from bellows rather than melody.

After that, another young man, with long hair, and wearing pince-nez, evidently endeavouring to look as much as possible like Sir Henry Irving, recited "The Dream of Eugene Aram," ; he would have been more impressive but for an unfortunate lapse of memory ; but even as it was, he thrilled the sixpenny seats, and one lady remarked that "He'd fair given her creeps !"

Crump chuckled quietly to himself. He had a strong sense of humour.

A love ditty by a Miss Gushington followed, the first stanza of which ran as follows :

Love's twining fingers wreath my heart,
Alas, my own, that we must part,
Alas, to think that Cupid's bow
Could wing a shaft so full of woe !

And the curate, who accompanied her, bent over the ivory keys and heaved a bitter sigh. For he loved the fair Gushington, and, though she had embroidered a pair of braces for him, and had sent him a pair of slippers two sizes too small for him, he had not dared as yet to tell his love !

Then Mr. Faversham appeared on the platform. Very dapper he looked in his evening dress, and there was just a suggestion of the actor about his clean-shaven face. The man who is nervous in the drawing-room is frequently quite self-possessed and at home on a platform or stage. It was so with Benny. Had circumstance ordered his life differently, he might have made a name for himself on the music hall stage.

"Herbert Giles, alias the Tinker !" said Crump to himself, "the impertinence of the fellow is really almost delightful. It would be quite ; but——"

Then his little eyes wandered to where Esther was sitting, and he sighed. Tragedy and comedy were strangely jumbled together that night.

Suddenly, however, as the preliminary chords were being played on the piano, Benny showed signs of nervousness. He was conscious of a pair of dark eyes bent upon him—eyes that stabbed into his conscience, eyes that made him for the moment forget his words, and made him think of a "poor devil" away in a gloomy convict prison, doing time ! But he managed to banish the picture conjured up, just in time, and started to sing :

Oh, when I was single, oh, then,
Oh, when I was single, oh, then,
Oh, when I was single,
My pockets did jingle,
I long to be single again !

There were several verses. At the conclusion of the song, he was vociferously encored.

Pollie clapped her hands together most excitedly.

"Isn't he a funny man !" she whispered to Crump.

"A very funny fellow !" said Crump, with a twinkling of his grey eyes. "A very funny fellow, indeed, Pollie !"

It was useless for Benny to bow. He was compelled to respond with a second song.

"How delightfully funny he is !" said Lady Eliza Normanhurst to Revelle ; "you must dine with us one night at the Towers, and bring Mr. Faversham. He's quite too screamingly funny !"

Benny's next song, "The Polka and the Choir-boy !"—the Vicar looked a little nervous at first ; but it was genuinely funny without being irreverent or vulgar—was even a greater success than the first. Three times he was recalled ; again bowing did not satisfy the audience. They meant to hear him again.

"Encore, encore, encore !"

At last the applause ceased. Benny stepped forward to the edge of the platform.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "I'm sorry to say that I have run out of songs ; but, with your permission, in place of another song, I will give you a short recitation entitled 'Burglar Jack !'"

Revelle, clever as he was at disguising his feelings, tugged hard at his moustache, and vainly tried to conceal a smile. This was irony indeed ! A matchless piece of impertinence on Benny's part.

"What are you laughing at ?" asked Pollie, looking up into Crump's face.

"He's such a funny fellow !" chuckled the little man. "Oh, this is rich, very rich indeed !"

And Crump, for a moment only seeing the the humorous side of the case, grew quite red in the face with suppressed mirth.

The recitation proved partly humorous, partly pathetic—it dealt with a hardened, crime-stained burglar who was interrupted in the early hours of the morning by a little child, who ultimately melted his heart. Now there was loud laughter from, now a tendency to swallow at an invisible lump among the audience. The Vicar looked pleased. The recitation inculcated a moral lesson.

"Charming !" said Lady Eliza Normanhurst at the conclusion, "quite too charming ! Really he made me feel quite sad. He ought to have been an actor, Mr. Revelle !"

"I daresay," answered Revelle, "he would have been, if he had been compelled to earn his living ; but you know how often it is the case—money often suppresses talent. Where a fellow has no spur to drive him on, don't you know, he takes things slackly ; makes a hobby of a thing instead of going in for it in real earnest. That's been the case with my friend Faversham !"

"By the way, is he any connection with the Norfolk Favershams ?"

"Distantly related—yes !" replied Revelle unblushingly.

And Mr. Faversham, otherwise Benny Beard, alias Herbert Giles, the Tinker, who had suffered five years' penal servitude, went up thirty-five per cent., in Lady Eliza Normanhurst's estimation.

Esther rose up quietly, and made her way round to the room at the back of the platform where the performers were gathered together. After a second solo from the young gentleman on the flute, it was her turn to appear.

Revelle watched her as she moved on to the platform. Apart from her money, he told himself, she was well worth winning for herself. The song she sang was an old English ballad—there was nothing in it about "Love's twining fingers !"—and it went straight to the hearts of the audience.

"Your eyes are watering !" said Pollie, looking up into Crump's face, when the last soft notes had melted away.

"Yes, Pollie, yes !"—the little man blew his nose violently. —"I'm—I'm suffering from a slight cold in my head ! And, apart from that, the song was most touching, and"—he added to himself—"the singer !"

"Encore !" shouted the audience.

"I wish they wouldn't !" thought Crump, "I really wish they wouldn't. But they don't know the strain. Ah, it's the old play of 'Masks and Faces !'"

At the conclusion of the concert it was the general opinion that Miss Mansfield and Mr. Faversham had divided the honours between them. There was a touch of irony in that !

"And you've enjoyed yourself, Pollie ?" asked Crump, as they passed out of the building.

"Oh, ever so much. I liked that funny gentleman ; but I think I liked Miss Mansfield best !"

"I did !" said the little man.

Then a smartly equipped brougham dashed past them. Crump caught a glimpse of the two occupants—Seaton Revelle and Esther. Benny had acted upon the instructions given him, and had made himself scarce.

"What did you say ?" asked Pollie, as an exclamation burst rather suddenly from the little man to whose hand she was tightly clinging.

"Damp !" said Crump, "I was saying the evening air seemed a little damp !"

He felt compelled to tell an untruth. He could not have told Pollie what he had really said. It was quite the exception for him to use strong language; but on this occasion a strong word had slipped out, and "him" had followed it. He had jumped at a conclusion as to what would happen before the brougham reached the Woodlands, and his indignation had mastered him.

Digitized by Google

OUR NEW SERIAL.

"I think," said Revelle, "the whole affair went off splendidly, Miss Mansfield. You sang most charmingly!"

Esther could not help a little shudder. She was alone with the man whom, beyond all others, she loathed and despised. She was conscious of his eyes being upon her, could almost feel the look of admiration shining from them.

"I—er—I'm awfully sorry that your father couldn't come on with us; and yet I'm—I can't help being glad of this opportunity of being alone with you. Perhaps—perhaps, you can guess the reason why?"

At first Esther Mansfield had attracted him as other women had attracted him. She was pretty, fascinating, possessed of a peculiar charm of her own, and, one day, would inherit a fortune. He had entered the brougham believing that his heart was well under control of his head. Hitherto, he had never been led by passion. His utter selfishness had always been supreme. He was only conscious now that Esther appealed to him as no other woman had done before.

Away in the County asylum a lifeless-eyed woman, with an expressionless face, from which a former prettiness had been washed out, was talking to herself in a low monotone about Jim—her husband!

The good-looking man in evening dress turned his face towards Esther. She could not meet his gaze—a burning one now—lest he should read the fierce hate and loathing that burnt in her own—this man who had torn the man she loved from her. Instinct told her what was coming.

With a quick movement he took one of her hands in his own. With a little cry, as if his touch had burnt her, she snatched it from him.

Her action seemed only to embolden him. A moment later he had grasped her hand again.

"Esther," he breathed out quickly, "I want an answer to a question. I love you! Is there any hope for me?"

Her every feeling of delicacy was outraged. Though, womanlike, she had realised what was coming, though, in a measure, she had steeled herself to play her part in the presence of the man she loathed beyond expression, her first and almost irresistible impulse was to snatch her hand from the clasp that seemed to scorch her, and strike him across the face; and, with the blow, to shriek out her hate, her utter detestation for him!

Her face, white as death, was averted. The blue veins on her forehead throbbed with the pulse of passionate emotion. She had made no movement. Revelle still held her hand, icy, trembling, yet unresisting. He was well enough versed in the art of love-making. He had pleaded with other women as he was pleading now; but never before in such deadly earnest! She was different from those other women—something more to him than they had ever been!

"Esther, Esther!" He could not see her eyes, nor the strange fire that burnt within them. "You don't answer my question? I ask you again. Answer me. Is there any hope?"

A lamp burnt in the interior of the brougham. He could not see her eyes; but he saw the hot blood suffuse her white cheeks and mount to her forehead. And, with it, life seemed to return to her. With a quick movement she snatched free her hand. Her nostrils were dilated and quivering. Her bosom heaving tumultuously.

"Esther!"

"Don't call me by that name! Don't—don't speak to me!"

"Don't keep me in suspense. I—I must have an answer to my question!"

"You have no right to speak to me like this!"—the words came quickly, and so low that they were scarcely audible. "Have you forgotten altogether the past—my past?"

She had nerved herself up to play her part!

There was reproach in her words; but, to Seaton Revelle, it seemed not harsh reproach. He told himself that she was struggling between conscience and an inclination to listen to him.

"But surely," he whispered, "it isn't right that the past should enter into the present. The past is done with—I had hoped it was forgotten. It is the present, the future now."

"No"—there was a strange ring in her voice as she breathed out the words—"the past is not done with—for me! Do you think I can forget so soon?"

"I had hoped that time had deadened remembrance; that you had forgotten the man who wronged you so cruelly!"

She drew in her breath sharply. Woman though she was, at that moment she felt tempted to fly at his throat for the lying words he had uttered.

"But," he went on, "forgive me for having spoken as I have done. Forgive me if my love for you has carried me away. I don't ask for an answer to my question now. But I shall not change! I shall wait and hope. I shall ask you the same question again some day!"

He waited for a moment, as if expecting her to say something, but Esther neither stirred nor spoke. He held out his hand.

"Miss Mansfield, say you have forgiven me for what I have said! Tell me that it will make no difference in the future to our—our friendship?"

She took the outstretched hand. Her lips parted as though she would speak; but the words refused to come. Try hard as she would she could not utter that lie, though it would have been spoken to serve the man she loved. And yet she must say something!

"What has happened," she said at last, speaking in a low, quivering voice, "will make no—no difference, Mr. Revelle!"

No difference to her hate—no difference to her determination to struggle to bring the truth to light, to unmask the man beside her, who, mis-reading her words, utterly miscalculating, believed that he would win her yet! It was only a matter of time. He had spoken too prematurely, but he did look upon her refusal as final and absolute. He would win Benny's money yet!

"I couldn't bear to think," he went on, "that—that you would be any different to me from what you have been; that my presumption had sacrificed your friendship!"

He possessed all the outward polish of a gentleman. Had Esther only not known, there was nothing that he had actually said or done entitled to reproach.

The brougham drew up outside the Woodlands. Revelle alighted, rang the bell, then assisted out Esther.

"Tell me," he pleaded, "this will make no difference?"

"It will make no difference!" she answered mechanically.

If he could only have seen her a few minutes later, as, alone in her room, she buried her face in her hands, and gave way to a paroxysm of tears! Her very womanhood had been outraged. That he should have dared to speak to her as he had done; dared to assume that in a few short months she had forgotten the man she loved—would be willing to listen to another!

But Revelle had not seen, and, as he returned to the Firs, he was not altogether dissatisfied with himself. The thin edge of the wedge had been introduced. Then his face hardened a little.

Pah! But she was packed safely away. That corner seemed safely weathered. Twice, in the presence of witnesses, she had denied herself; yet——

He lit a cigarette. It was an unfortunate incident.

"So Crofton," he muttered presently, "has managed to escape. I'm glad—infernally glad—it wasn't the other fellow!"

The silent Railton admitted him. Mr. Faversham, he said, had already returned, and was in the billiard-room.

"How are you getting on?" said Revelle, in a low voice. "I saw you at the concert."

"Slowly, but well, sir! I am getting on very friendly terms with those two young constables. They are, sir, if I may use the expression, very 'green.' I am gleaning much information that may be useful. To-morrow evening, if I have your permission, I shall visit my friend, Mr. Piper, Lord Normanhurst's butler. His Lordship and her Ladyship are dining out."

Digitized by Google

"You're doing good work, Railton. I'm pleased with you!"

"Thank you, sir!"

Revelle made his way to the billiard-room where Benny, flushed a little with his triumph and a couple of whiskeys and sodas on the top of champagne, was knocking the balls about. He looked up as Revelle entered.

"You haven't won your bet?" he said.

"No," answered Revelle carelessly; "but there's still plenty of time!"

Benny gave a sigh of relief. He was a blackguard; but not absolutely a hopeless one. He was thankful—for Esther's sake!

CHAPTER XXI.
How a Letter Reached Esther.

A week had passed since the village concert, and the walls of Warham were placarded now with great posters announcing yet another and far more important festivity in connection with the raising of funds for the restoration of the Parish Church—a grand fête, under the direct patronage of Lord and Lady Normanhurst, to be held in the magnificent grounds that surrounded the Towers. In the village it was the one topic of conversation. In the posters much was made of the fact that Seaton Revelle, Esq., of the Firs, Warham, would in the course of the day, weather permitting, make a number of ascents in a captive balloon, taking with him a limited number of passengers. Tickets could be obtained either from the Vicar or Lord Normanhurst. The entertainment would conclude with a grand, free ascent by Seaton Revelle, Esq.

Tom Jackson, on duty outside the railway station, was scrutinising one of these posters.

A London train had just arrived, and a few passengers were passing out of the gates.

One of them was a powerful, broad-shouldered man, with rugged features, iron-grey hair, and on one side of his face stretched a deep scar that lost itself in his hair. He was wearing a peaked cap, and his coat, unbuttoned, revealed a blue jersey, across which was embroidered in red letters, "Salvation Army." He was evidently a stranger to the neighbourhood, for he looked about him with uncertainty, then moved across to Tom Jackson.

"Can yer tell me," he said, "whether there's a Mr. Mansfield living anywhere about here, and how I gets to his house?"

Tom Jackson looked at him with surprise, wondering what the Salvation Army man had in common with the rich banker.

"Why, yes, keep up the main road, and about a mile and a quarter on you'll see Mr. Mansfield's house, it stands off the road on the left-hand side."

"Thank yer, much obliged."

Tom followed him with his eyes.

"Rather a rough-looking customer," he said to himself, "wonder what his business with Mr. Mansfield is?"

"And now to see her," muttered the man, as he strode out with a peculiar dogged step, "and give them messages. I promised 'im, and Ben Needham keeps his word!"

When he had passed out of the village and there was no one to see him, he drew from his pocket two official-looking papers, and a dirty, thumb-marked, crumpled letter that had the appearance of having been rolled up, at one time or another, into a ball.

"It give me a lot of trouble to git it through, but in spite of all them searchings, I fair diddled 'em."

The name of Esther Mansfield was roughly scrawled in pencil across the smudged envelope.

Then, though he had read them through often enough before, he glanced at the other papers. One of them was a copy of His Majesty's license to be at large during the remaining portion of his term of penal servitude, and stated that if Benjamin Needham were convicted before the expiration of the said term of some indictable offence within the United King-

A New Industry for English Girls.

According to a statement recently made by the manager of a well-known London hat company, arrangements are now being made for the opening up of a new industry, viz., Panama hat making in England. This new industry, it is said, will provide employment for hundreds of girls. Factory life has, however, its drawbacks. Headache, biliousness, anæmia, and indigestion, prevail to an enormous extent amongst factory workers, but Bile Beans for Biliousness are a certain cure for these ailments. Proof of this is to be found in the following statement of Mrs. G. Woodcroft, a straw hat maker of 29 Essex Street, Luton. To a representative of the Luton Reporter, she said:

"Ever since I can recollect, I have suffered a good deal from biliousness. It has sometimes kept me from following my occupation at the factory for five days out of the six. When these attacks came on they were accompanied by giddiness. My sight was also affected, and I was unable to see anything very clearly. I continually experienced a sensation of coldness in my arms and legs, and even in the morning I felt sleepy and drowsy. A languid feeling would quite overcome me, and I could not take an interest in anything. I visited many doctors, and took bottle after bottle of their medicine. Then I tried various remedies that my neighbours advised, but still I got no better. Still determined to persevere in my search for health, I tried a number of patent medicines which I saw advertised, but none of them took effect, and I remained as far as ever from being cured.

"Last summer I saw in one of the London papers an account of the benefit that had been derived by persons taking Bile Beans, and I thought I would try them. I wrote for a box and began to take them. In a very short time I felt better. The languid feeling disappeared, and I do not now feel drowsy as I used to do, but on the contrary I have more energy than ever I had before. Since taking Bile Beans, I have not had a single attack of biliousness. Two years ago my husband went away to the war in South Africa, and I was very bad then with biliousness, but Bile Beans have created such a change in me that he will hardly know me when he comes home again. Bile Beans for Biliousness, which accomplished the above cure are purely vegetable in composition, and their excellence has been so well proved that many eminent doctors are now prescribing them largely. They are a certain cure for biliousness, headache, congestion of the liver, neuralgia, fainting fits, attacks of dizziness, indigestion, flatulence, pains in the chest loins, or back, defective secretion of bile, wasting affections, female ailments, rheumatism, gout, skin eruptions, and the host of ailments having a common origin in impurity of the blood, a general congestion of the system, and loss of vital force. Obtainable from all chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 & 120 London Wall, London, E.C., upon receipt of prices, one and three halfpence or two and nine.

The Only Efficacious Substitute for Cod Liver Oil—

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(Really Genuine.)

In patent air-tight tins, ½lb., 1/4; 1lb., 2/4; 2lb., 4/-; including tin and postage.

Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

Digitized by Google

OUR NEW SERIAL.

dom, such license should be immediately forfeited. By law if the license were forfeited, he would be liable to undergo a term of penal servitude equal to the portion of his term of ten years which remained unexpired when the license was granted.

The other paper ran as follows—

"Register No. X. 375. Name, Benjamin Needham. Take notice. You are required by Act of Parliament to report yourself to the chief police-station of the locality to which you may go within forty-eight hours after your arrival therein; and if you change your residence from one police-district to another, you must report it to the police-station to which you last reported yourself, before you go. If you omit any of the above particulars, you will be guilty of a misdemeanour, and, upon conviction, will forfeit your license."

The ticket-of-leave man folded up the papers with a grim smile; then tramped on again. "That must be the house," he muttered, some ten minutes later, "the question is how am I to git to see the young lady. I reckon she won't care about bein' seen talkin' to a cove who's out on ticket!"

He was staring up the drive, doubting what to do, when the front door opened and Esther Mansfield issued and came towards him.

"If this is the young lady," muttered Ben Needham, "I'm in luck!"

And with a husky cough he gripped the crumpled letter.

It was only when she had reached the gates that Esther noticed the strange man standing there. She glanced at his rugged, scarred face, noted the "Salvation Army" embroidered across his jersey, and would have passed on. She was conscious of the fact that the man was staring rather hard at her.

"Axin' yer pardon, Miss"—the man, with a movement of rough politeness, had doffed his cap—"but does a Mr. Mansfield live in yonder house?"

"Yes," answered Esther, a little taken aback by the question, "but he is in London. Can I give him any message?"

And Esther, in her turn, stared at the man's face, wondering what business he could have with her father.

"It ain't with Mr. Mansfield as I wants to speak, but Miss Mansfield. Axin' yer pardon, but I've a sort o' notion its Miss Mansfield I'm speaking to now."

"Yes, I'm Miss Mansfield, but you want to speak with me! What is it?"

Ben Needham glanced first at the house in the background, then down the road.

"I've just come out on ticket," he said, lowering his voice to a whisper. "There was a certain party from where I've come as was pertikler anxious to git a letter through to someone. He axed me to give it, along with one or two messages, to Miss Mansfield."

The first part of the man's speech was incomprehensible to her.

She did not know the meaning of the phrase "to come out on ticket," but the word "letter" had caused the hot blood to flood her cheeks, then the flush ebbed away, leaving them paler than before.

"A letter!" she gasped. "Quick, don't keep me in suspense—from whom?"

In her eagerness she took a step towards him and laid a trembling hand on his sleeve. Ben Needham drew the crumpled, dirty envelope from his pocket.

"From No. 35, Miss," he said, in a husky whisper. He saw her dark eyes dilate as they fell on the scrawled address; he heard the little cry of recognition, a cry of mingled pain and joy; and then, with a gulp, and drawing his hand across his eyes he turned aside his head and stared down upon the ground.

Surroundings were forgotten. Had the road been thronged with men and women, Esther would neither have seen nor heard them. With tear-dimmed eyes she read the pencilled words. He seemed to be speaking to her. Next to her heart she bore a letter—a letter that had passed under the eyes of prison officials. But this one was so different. There was no reserve; no holding back. Though many miles and prison walls intervened, he had spoken to her. Again and again she read the letter, until the fast-falling tears blurred her sight. Then she strained it to her bosom. It had strengthened her, and had given her fresh hope. There is a pain that is closely allied to joy—an indescribable emotion that now thrilled Esther's heart.

Ben Needham had not stirred; his grey head was bent forward, his eyes fastened on the ground. There was a delicacy of feeling somewhere concealed beneath the rough exterior of the ticket-of-leave man and ex-felon. He did not wish to intrude upon her thoughts.

Esther was the first to break the silence.

"You have some—some messages for me," she said, in a low, broken voice.

"Yes, Miss," answered the ticket-of-leave man huskily; "there was a number of messages as I promised 'im I'd give yer. And the last of 'em was ter tell yer—I was standing by 'im just after he'd writ that brief—was to tell yer, Miss—there, don't mind me, I'm an old 'un—was to tell yer that he loved yer!"

Then, haltingly, but almost word for word, he repeated the messages that Alec Scarsdale had whispered to him in the prison ward. He found it a hard task, and more than once he nearly broke down. His voice shook, and he kept his eyes averted, for Esther was crying now like a little child.

"There, there, Missie," he faltered, when the last message had been given, "don't take on so. Look at me, I've done twenty year's time, all told, and I've come out all right."

And, with a rough movement of sympathy, he held out his great, hard hands; Esther took them both in her own.

"He says," she sobbed, "that you have been a good friend to him—how can I thank you, how can I repay you for all you have done?"

"I don't want nor yet ax for nothing, Missie. I'm only too glad to think I've kept my promises as I made 'em—for his sake and for yourn."

"Are you quite sure there is nothing I can do for you. You have done so much for me!"

"No, Missie, I don't want nothink, I'm thankful to say. I've got a job to my liking, and a straight job, too, which ain't altogether usual with me!"

And the old burglar glancing down at the embroidery on his jersey gave a grim smile. Then he glanced up and down the still deserted road.

"Sometimes, Missie," he said, lowering his voice to a confidential whisper, "it makes me grin a bit when I thinks of myself in this 'ere kit, me, as only a few weeks ago was wearing the prison slops. It seems a bit late in the day to turn over a new leaf—I'm well past fifty, missie, and I cracked my first crib when I was a kid of six, my father shovin' me through a little window for to go round and unbolt the door for 'im and his pal, but they say it's never too late to mend."

Though Esther did not understand many of his words she followed his meaning. Looking at him with bewildered astonishment she realised that she had been brought face to face with a character who represented a side of life of which, till then, she had known nothing.

Ben Needham seemed to read her thought. Again he grimly smiled.

"You ain't met many like me, I'm thinking, Missie, and a good job, too! Well, then, I've kept my promise, and I'll be gettin' back agen. If I can be of any service to yer, you've only to write to Ben Needham, the Barracks, Mile End Road, London—that'll find me. Anythink I can do, I'll do and glad to do it, for yer own sake and for his'n!"

But Esther had a hundred questions to ask—many of them searching questions, prompted by instinct, about prison life in general. And Ben Needham, glancing down into the anxious upturned face, with its piteous, inquiring look, was constrained to twist and smooth over the real facts. He had not forgotten Scarsdale's request to keep from her the truth about prison-life.

Digitized by Google

EIFFEL TOWER

THE FINEST MESSINA LEMONS are used in the manufacture of 'EIFFEL TOWER' LEMONADE.

Dr. A. B. GRIFFITHS, the famous Food Analyst, says:—
"I can conscientiously state that it is impossible to produce Lemonade of a higher standard of excellence."

LEMONADE

2 Gallons for 4½d.

Also use Eiffel Tower Jellies.

KAPUTINE cures NEURALGIA equally as well as HEADACHE.
KAPUTINE is USED as well as recommended by MEDICAL MEN!

NOTHING LIKE IT OR AS GOOD

PACKETS 1/- OF 18 FOR

KAPUTINE THE SAFE REMEDY FOR HEADACHE CURES IN 10 MINUTES.

To convince sufferers of the sterling value of KAPUTINE we will send a supply FREE by return on receipt of Stamped Envelope

C. G. KAPUTINE, HUDDERSFIELD.

THE PREPARATION THE PEOPLE SWEAR BY.

Mr. GEO. R. SIMS'

"TATCHO"

FOR THE HAIR AND FOR THE LACK OF HAIR.

A feature the public will have observed in the "Tatcho" Announcements is the publication of the Full Name and Address of the grateful user.

"Reason to be satisfied."

"Castries, St. Lucia, B. W. Indies, April 11th, 1902.

"I have every reason to be satisfied with 'Tatcho' and mean to recommend it strongly."—(Mrs.) H. MITCHELL.

"Superior to all."

"23 Albert St., Belfast, April 17th, 1902.

"I find 'Tatcho' superior to all other dressings."—(Mrs.) JANE SEMPLE.

"Excellent."

"Chetwynd, Bassett, Southampton, April 22nd, 1902.

"We all find 'Tatcho' excellent for our hair."—(Mrs.) A. BEATTY.

DISTRIBUTION OF TRIAL BOTTLES.

4/6 FULL-SIZE BOTTLE FOR 1/10 POST FREE.

To secure one of these Trial Bottles, apply to your Chemist or Stores, or write to us mentioning "Short Stories.". Post your letter to "Tatcho" Offices, 81 Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., accompanied with postal order for 1/10, and we will post to your address direct in plain package one of the special full size 4/6 bottles of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' "Tatcho."

"TATCHO" is a brilliant, spirituous tonic, the colour of whisky, free from all grease.

"TATCHO" is not a dye, and contains no colouring matter or any harmful ingredient.

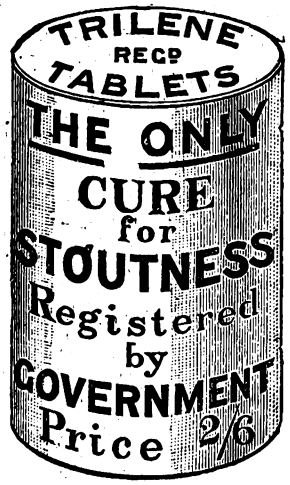
"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the world in bottles at 1s., 2s. 9d., and 5s., in addition to the special trial size referred to.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

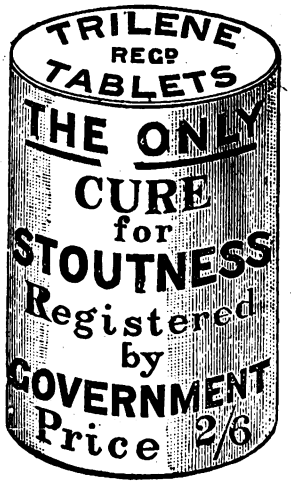
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Liatorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 3lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st., and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Miss JANE CARTER, of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets, I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

"Good-bye, Missie," he said at last; "don't forget my address. If yer wants me, to ax a sudden question like, the answer of which might ease yer mind, I'll come to yer."

Again Esther took the hard, rough hands in her own, and her words of thanks came from the bottom of her heart. There was a look of sturdy independence about the man that told her delicate sense of perception that to offer him recompense for what he had done in the shape of money would only hurt his feelings.

Raising his cap, Ben Needham said good-bye, and with the same, peculiar, dogged gait, walked back stationwards.

Esther returned to the house—her purpose in leaving it was forgotten—and, in the privacy of her room, again and again re-read the precious letter with its messages of love, of hope, of belief that ultimately justice would be done. Things were just as they had been, Scarsdale was still a prisoner; a terrible term of imprisonment still stretched between him and freedom; yet that letter and those messages had gladdened Esther's heart as it had not been gladdened for many a weary day. They had come as refreshingly as moisture to a drooping flower.

* * * * *

Some three days after Needham's interview with Esther, a registered packet arrived for him at his quarters.

On opening it, he found within a handsome gold watch and chain. There was no accompanying note, but on the back of the watch, plainly engraved, were the words, "To Ben Needham, from Esther Mansfield."

He stared at it; his rugged features twitched; the colour beneath his tan skin deepened.

"Gawd bless 'er! She ain't ashamed to couple her sweet name with mine—me, an old lag—me as ain't fit to breathe the same air as 'er!"

Again he stared hard at the watch and chain.

"I've handled dozens of 'em before"—the same grim smile played across the scared features—"but it's the fust one that I've come by honest. Gawd bless 'er 'eart!"

CHAPTER XXII.

Escaped.

"Now, Mrs. Cobb, I insist! I'm not going to do any work myself to-day. It's a general holiday. And I'm going to take you and Pollie over to this grand fête at the Towers. It is, they tell me, going to be a wonderful affair. Steam-horses, shows, even a balloon!"

"Well, well, Mr. Penworthy, it's very kind of you, I'm sure. Though I feel I'm getting too old for this kind of thing!"

"Tut, tut, tut!" said Crump, "that's settled!"

And half an hour later, Crump, his white-haired landlady leaning on his arm, and Pollie holding on to one hand, his homely face aglow—he loved to give pleasure to other people—left Woodbine Cottage for the Towers. His patience was being tried; but he possessed the faculty of being able to temporarily set his worries on one side; and though matters were at a standstill, he was not dissatisfied. His affairs were in good order, and his nets spread.

"Oh—o—o—oh! Look!" said Pollie presently, pointing excitedly upwards, "there's the balloon!"

A captive balloon, in the distance looking like a toy, had risen up above the tops of some trees, then presently came to a standstill, swaying to and fro like an inverted pendulum!

"Yes, that's the balloon, Pollie!" said Crump; then thought of Vance, away in the County asylum, just visible from the Towers, and Jim! The little man's face lost its look of gaiety, and Pollie tugged rather impatiently at his hand, and had to repeat her question twice—what made balloons go up into the air?—before Crump realised that he was being spoken to. Then he explained that it was gas, and added that gas sometimes was the power also that raised human beings into high places in the world as well as balloons!

Then Crump guided his two charges out of the road to one side as the rattle of wheels and hoofs told of an approaching carriage. The next minute, he was raising his hat deferentially to John Mansfield and Esther as they were carried past.

"I like that little fellow Penworthy, Esther," said the banker, "he's quiet, gentlemanly, and unassuming, and, moreover, he knows his business. That front garden of ours will be vastly improved by the time he's done with it. Hallo!"—he pointed to the distant balloon—"our friend Revelle is already sky high! I must say he is a tremendous addition to the neighbourhood, so full of enterprise. I hear there's some talk of his being nominated for a Justice of the Peace. Normanhurst has taken to him, and it's his idea!"

As the carriage rolled through the gates, two strapping young constables on duty outside brought their hands sharply to the salute, and one of them coloured up under his helmet.

"It seems only the other day," said the banker, "that Jackson was a slip of a lad in the bank. What a fine young fellow he's developing into. Scars——"

He stopped shortly, and coughed.

Esther winced; then seemed herself again. She was learning to school her emotions. The grounds were already thronged with folk, and many a young girl, as she watched the carriage roll past, heaved a sigh, and envied the rich banker's daughter. Surely she wanted for nothing!

Some little time after the carriage had passed through, Fred Wilton winked across at Tom Jackson.

"Tom!" he said, "here comes Uncle! Bless him! He's got old Mrs. Cobb and Pollie in charge, and he's looking as proud as an old hen out with a couple of chicks! Just like him! He's never so happy as when he's giving other folk a treat. Doesn't look much like a late chief inspector of Scotland Yard, does he?"

Tom Jackson nodded his head.; then his expression changed and he stared in the opposite direction. A distant cloud of dust was moving along the road. The sound of hoofs had reached his ears.

"Look out, Fred!" he cried sharply, "a runaway horse!"

Crump also had seen and heard, and was under the same impression. He hustled Mrs. Cobb and Pollie almost into the ditch. And then, with a remarkable agility, darted after the constables down the road.

"Go for the bridle, and cling on!" he shouted, "but let me have a try first, lads. I've had more experience than you! Let me get ahead. You drop behind! Let me have first shot!"

But there was no need. The horses—there were two—were not runaways. At the sight of the constables the riders reined in sharply.

"What's up?" cried Tom Jackson.

"A woman's escaped from the asylum," answered back one of the men quickly, "when she got away she was wearing the regulation dress. It's a case of looking sharp. She's suffering from suicidal mania; maybe, she got through into the grounds with the crowd, or has gone on to the reservoir!"

"I've been here since ten o'clock," answered Jackson; "no one in the dress has passed this way, I'm certain of that!"

"What's her name?"

It was Crump who asked the question sharply.

"Vance!"

The captive balloon was still up in mid-air, swaying to and fro in the breeze, and the figure, seated daringly in the rigging above the passengers in the car below, was waving a hat to the great, gaping crowd below!

"Vance!" cried Crump; "then, if you'll take my advice, one of you will go into the grounds, and the other ride at full speed to the reservoir!"

Instinctively he had taken command.

The stationary steam-engine, that worked the drum to which the wire that held the balloon was attached, started to pant and snort.

Seaton Revelle had signalled from his perch in the rigging.

The balloon was descending!

[Another splendid instalment of this powerful story will be published next Tuesday.]

Digitized by Google

IN CONFIDENCE

By MADGE MORRIS.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Who Should Start It?

You have often, writes "BESSIE," advised people to try and get introduced to each other by the aid of mutual friends. Now I know a young man by sight whom I should very much like to meet, and I think he would like to know me. For some time we have come no nearer an acquaintance. Should I make the necessary effort to get introduced or should I leave it to him?

Certainly, you should leave it to him. If he is really drawn towards you he will have more resources to secure the introduction to you than you to him, and further it is for him to make the overtures, not you. You had better wait and see if he makes any such attempts to know you, and if not rest assured that his feeling towards you is not so active as you imagine.

A Case for Caution.

"W. H. L." writes to me to tell me of a strangely sudden infatuation he has formed for a young girl of between sixteen or seventeen, whom he first saw in a provincial town, and afterwards at a place of worship at which both were attending. Her parents are very careful of her, and as to whom she meets. Should my correspondent seek to make her acquaintance, and if so, how. He fears by writing to her father, his intentions might be misunderstood. I think "W. H. L." had better postpone writing to the parent until he has tried other methods of securing a formal introduction. As he says, her father might quite easily be prejudiced against a communication from a strange man.

If he can get an introduction through the medium of mutual friends I do not see that her youth would be so serious a bar to an attachment, if they were on proper social terms. Seventeen is a fault a girl soon grows out of. If the introduction cannot be obtained, he might try and get to know the father on a social basis. This advice, I know, savours very much of intrigue, but there is little doubt that in love it is very difficult to get on without it. "W. H. L." must try his capacities in this direction, and if there is no result, he had better make a frontal attack and place his case direct before the parent, and ask his permission to pay his attentions, explaining at the same time his position and prospects in life. Straightforward conduct of this kind has in more than one case to my knowledge been successful.

Should He Tell Her?

"SHOULD a man tell his fiancée everything?" inquires "R. T." "Even when to do so might ruin their happiness?" The circumstances under which he writes are as follows: Early in his life he got into trouble over a money matter and was sent to prison. Since his release he went abroad, started a business in the colonies, and is now a prosperous merchant and engaged to be married. Is it his duty to tell the girl of his early disgrace?

If the nature of "R. T's" early trouble is known to the people with whom he comes into contact, and the stigma in any way still hangs to him, he should certainly make a clean breast of the whole thing. To ask his fiancée to tie herself to a man labouring under a disgrace would be an offence beyond condemnation, if she were not made aware of what she was facing. And if "R. T.'s" life will be far away from those who know his past, and where he is unlikely to meet any one who may reveal unpleasant things about him, I do not see why he need be afraid to tell her the truth and assure her that no stigma attaches to him in the place where he will dwell. If she is really fond of him she will not allow this to stand in the way of their union. He will have to break the news to her with skill approaching genius, however, as a clumsy revelation of the fact that her betrothed had been in prison might so terrify her that all would be lost. So try to tell the truth very carefully, "R. T."

A Very Simple Problem.

I DON'T want to appear unkind, but many of my correspondents put me questions which they should be able to solve themselves with the smallest amount of thought. If my advice can be of real assistance to anyone, I am only too pleased to give it, but there are cases in which one's own common sense is all that is wanted. Now "DOLLY GREY" has been for many years continuously in the company of a young man she has known from childhood. Naturally enough on growing older she has found that her feelings towards him have undergone a change, and has fallen in love with another man. But her previous lover still remains devoted to her.

Obviously "DOLLY'S" duty is to let the latter know the plain truth that she no longer cares for him. It is a very painful task to have to perform, but life is full of such things. Write to him, "DOLLY," and tell him exactly what your feelings are, and ask him as a man to cease his attentions. No, I should not ask the intervention of your new sweetheart. That would be an unkind thing to do. Any termination of your affair with his predecessor should be done by yourself. Men never tolerate the intervention of third parties in their love affairs.

A Great Big Shame!

"C. S." is in love with a girl who is only four feet eight in height, while he measures five feet ten. His friends tell him he would regret marrying her, but he is very fond of her and would not wish to give her up. Your friends may be right, "C. S." You have, no doubt, heard the song which describes the sorrows of the man who suffered continually from the nagging of a woman of four feet two, he being six feet three, a fact which the author suggested was "a great big shame." Little women proverbially exercise supreme control over their husbands, so you are facing rather serious possibilities. But what should this matter if you really love her. No, "C. S.," be a man, and do not be distracted from your intentions by the experiences of others. She may not turn out so formidable as you fear.

When is She an Old Maid?

ETHEL G. writes to ask at what age does a woman become an old maid. So far as I know there is no recognised boundary line in this country between girlhood and old maidenhood. In France, however, an unmarried woman is an old maid at thirty. She is still a young maid at twenty-nine years, eleven months, and twenty-nine days, but twenty-four hours later she has reached old maidenhood.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Good! it's Mason's

MASON'S EXTRACT of HERBS

THE BEST BEVERAGE TO TAKE WITH YOUR MEALS, AND AT ALL TIMES.
THE MOST SUITABLE FOR CHILDREN DURING WARM WEATHER.

A Physician states: "It assuages thirst, it is refreshing, and grateful to weak stomachs."

A 6d. Bottle of Extract makes 8 gallons. Bottle, post free, 9 stamps.

Manufacturers:

NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

SYMONDS' SAFE CYCLES.

Women, men, girls, and boys in all vocations are riding Symonds' Cycles Greatest value ever known for thoroughly substantial handsome machines Sales constantly increasing because of recommendations. Prices £4 to £8 Easy payments. No guarantors required. Now is the time to save money Catalogue free.

SYMONDS' London Stores.
66 Hatton Garden, London

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN. Free Wheels. Carriage paid to all parts.

£7-5-0 or 13/4 Monthly

Cash or 12 monthly payments.

£7	5s. ...	13/4
£7	15s. ...	14/2
£8	8s. ...	15/0
£9	5s. ...	16/8
£9	15s. ...	17/6
£11	0s. ...	20/0
£11	11s ...	21/0
£15	0s. ...	28/0

Corsair Plated Lamp, 2/9; A1 Rim Brake, 6/6; Scorcher Brake, 1/-. Cyclist Poncho, 2/9. Write at once for New Season's List of over 100 pages and over 500 illustrations of JUNO CYCLES and latest cycling accessories at lower prices than any other house. Sent Post Free. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd., S.Y. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate St. Without, London, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. Mrs. Conyers, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

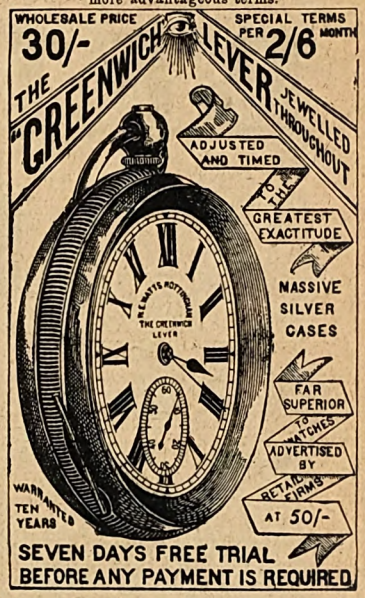
KEATING'S POWDER KILLS BUGS FLEAS FLIES BEETLES

TINS 3d. 6d. 1s- BELLOWS 9d.

WHY PAY

Extortionate Prices for unreliable Watches when you can obtain a High-grade Silver Lever timed to the greatest exactitude for less money and on more advantageous terms.



The "GREENWICH" Lever is without a rival and at the price offered cannot be equalled by any other firm in the world. It has a high-grade plate movement with improved Lever escapement, jewelled throughout, chronometer balance, dust-proof cap, and every part is interchangeable. The cases are Sterling Silver, of exceptional weight and strength. Every watch is adjusted and timed to the greatest exactitude, and absolutely PERFECT. Forwarded free per post, complete with warranty for ten years.

DON'T SEND ANY MONEY,

But write for the Watch, stating full Name, Occupation, Address, and mention Short Stories. The Watch is forwarded on approval for seven days, in order to afford an opportunity for TRIAL, COMPARISON, VALUATION, or any other test. If satisfactory, purchase can be completed on terms of 5/- deposit within seven days after receipt of watch, and 2/6 per month for ten months, or cash in full if preferred, when 3/- discount is allowed.

This offer is only made to persons in permanent employment, and young men under 21 years of age must obtain their parents' sanction to the transaction.

THE ONLY ADDRESS:

W. E. WATTS, WHOLESALE DEPOT

(Founded 1858).

106 and 108 DERBY ROAD, NOTTINGHAM.

VICTORY CYCLES

From 1s. weekly. Special Offer. £12 15s 0d. Sample for £6 6s. Carriage paid. PLATED RIMS, FREE WHEELS, RIM BRAKE FITTED FREE. Agents wanted. — Derbeham Road Cycle Co., Norwich.

MACKINTOSH'S EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!! DELICIOUS!!

PUREST OF THE PURE.

Sold Everywhere.

A Very Large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps
J. Mackintosh Ltd., The Toffee Mills, Halifax.
Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%
repayable on demand

The Birkbeck Almanack, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager

Digitized by Google

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

CURE

Bilious and Nervous Disorders.

Constipation, Indigestion, Sick-Headache, Dyspepsia, and all Stomachic Troubles.

Arouse Sluggish and Torpid Livers.

Purify the Blood, Remove Scurvy, Improve the Complexion, Regulate the System.

It is surprising how they do it, but they do—they get there—there is no mistake about it. They have a way of going straight to business that gives satisfaction, and that is the main thing. If Beecham's Pills did not give satisfaction no amount of forcing would induce the public to swallow them. It is because they have been found to carry out the requirements of an expectant and suffering humanity, going straight as an arrow to the seat of the mischief, that Beecham's Pills can claim such an enormous sale after a trial of 57 years.

The Sale exceeds 6,000,000 Boxes annually.

SOLD EVERYWHERE.

In BOXES, price 1/1½ (56 pills) and 2/9 (168 pills).

Digitized by Google

Short Stories.

THE DAINTY HOME FICTION PAPER.

No. 706.) Week Ending July 12th, 1902. (Price One Penny.

"PITY! FOR YOUR CHILD'S SAKE!"
"MY CHILD! YOUR CHILD!"

Digitized by Google

(A Dramatic Incident from the Powerful Romance, "Another Woman's Child.")

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

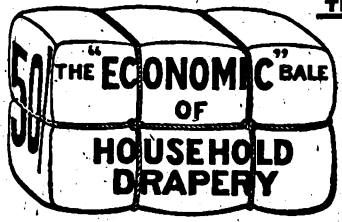
"LET'S TALK OF GRAVES" Shakespeare

The 'Economic' Bale

OF HOUSEHOLD DRAPERY

CONTAINING:

Large-size Alhambra Quilt, (red and white or blue and white), Pair Full-size Blankets (white whipped edges), Pair very Best Quality Twill Sheets, Pair Pillow Cases, Bolster Case, 3 Embroidered Toilet Mats, Embroidered Table Cover 30 by 30, 2 Turkish Towels, Best Quality Glass Cloth, Finest White Table Cloth (full size), Woven Turkey Table Cloth, Pair Special Design Lace Curtains, 6 Netted Dusters, Scouring Cloth.



TERMS OF PURCHASE

Send only 5/- the bale will then be sent to your address (carriage paid), and, if you are satisfied, complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of 5/- each.

You are under no obligation to purchase. If the Goods fail to come up to your expectations, return them, and your deposit will be refunded in full.

Please send a Post Card for our No. 2 Catalogue of Drapery, ... Costumes, &c., Post Free.

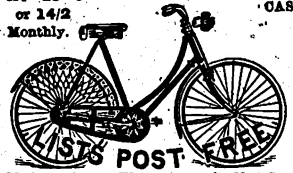
GOOD AGENTS WANTED

in every town and village in spare time. No Risk. Good Commission. Write for terms and particulars.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN. Free Wheels. Carriage paid to all parts.

£7-15-0 or 14/2 Monthly.



CASH or 12 monthly payments.

£7 15s.	14/2
£8 8s.	15/0
£9 10s.	17/1
£9 15s	17/6
£11 0s.	20/0
£12 0s.	21/8

Corsair Plated Lamp, 2/9; A1 Rim Brake, 6/6; Scorcher Brake, 1/-. Celluloid Mudguards, 3/9. Write at once for New Season's List of over 100 pages and over 500 illustrations of JUNO CYCLES and latest cycling accessories at lower prices than any other house. Sent Post Free. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd., S.Y. Dept. 75 Bishopsgate Street, Without, London, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H Room 8), 196 Oxford Street, London, W.

KEATING'S POWDER KILLS BUGS FLEAS FLIES BEETLES

TINS 3d. 6d. 1s-BELLOWS 9d.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2slb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

FREE TO ALL

MR. H. STANSFIELD (from a photo).

A trial of an entirely new method of curing

RUPTURE,

the same method that cured Mr. H. Stansfield. No cumbersome steel truss, and no loss of time from work. Write to-day for free trial and for interesting literature, including a book containing many testimonials.

DR. W. S. RICE,
57 Stonecutter Street, London, E.C.

Do your Dyeing at home.

It costs little, and you get quicker and better results than by sending to dyers, if you use

New Style Old Style

MAYPOLE SOAP

which is simple to handle and Dyes BLACK or ANY COLOUR, Fast, Permanent, and Beautiful.

ANY COLOUR, 4d. A CAKE. BLACK, 6d.

Send for Free Booklet, "THE PERFECTION OF HOME DYEING," to the Maypole Co., Ltd., 17, Cumming Street, London, N.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 706.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending July 12th, 1902.

ANOTHER WOMAN'S CHILD.

A Powerful Story which Tells of Love's Revenge.

"I HATE her! I hate her! I hate her!"

The words rang out in accents of passionate anger, beneath which could be distinguished a note of intolerable pain.

The girl who uttered them leant back against the gnarled trunk of an old apple-tree, her face uplifted to the man who stood beside her, embarrassment visible in every jerky movement he made, every nervous word he spoke.

"I say, Joyce, I'm most awfully sorry, but—but don't talk like that. She——"

"She has stolen you from me—and I tell you I hate her—I hate her!" the girl turned on him fiercely. "You loved me once. You loved me till she won you away from me with her beauty and her wiles, and now my heart is broken—broken!"

And sinking into a little miserable heap upon the ground, the girl broke into a storm of tears.

Embarrassment and impatience were the prevailing expressions on the face of the man who stood awkwardly beside her—a man whose weakness of character was written plainly on his fair, undecided face.

"I'm awfully sorry, Joyce!" he began. "I'm awfully sorry—but——"

She sprang to her feet again with an exclamation of scorn.

"What good do you think it will do to say you are sorry? Sorry! You say you are 'sorry' if you break a cup. You can spare your sorrow now! Do you think you are likely to be happy with this beautiful cousin of whom you tell me, whom you have won over another woman's heart, and by trampling on another woman's love? Will you be happy with her, I wonder? Why did you make me love you if this was to be the end?"

The sun filtered through the blossom-laden apple-trees upon the girl's fair face. Her blue tear-filled eyes smote the man who watched her with a momentary compunction. It was but momentary. Another face rose before him—a face as brilliant in colouring as a gorgeous tropical flower—eyes, in whose bewitching glances he had forgotten loyalty, truth, honour—a bewildering smile whose fascination had made his brain whirl with strange, new sensations, never aroused by his calmer, and better love for Joyce. The comparison in his mind between his beautiful, queenly cousin, Hilda, and the girl who stood before him now, drove from his heart that momentary compunction.

"After all," he reflected, "Joyce and I would never have been really happy together. A man cannot commit a greater folly than to marry out of his own station in life, and I should have done that if I had married Joyce. Poor little girl! She will soon forget me, and marry someone more suited to her, who will make her far happier than I could have done. I could not give Hilda up now. It is all for the best!"

So argued the weak, easy-going Aleck Baynes, the man whom Hilda Baynes, his beautiful cousin, had fascinated, as easily as a snake fascinates a bird.

"Joyce," he began again, touching her arm, "I cannot tell you—I cannot ever tell you how terribly sorry I am for having hurt you! I know I have been a brute, but I could not marry you now that I—that I——"

"Now that you love someone else better," she retorted scornfully; "now that this fine cousin you tell me about has taken you away. Where did you find this wonderful cousin you had not met before?"

"I met her at the house of a mutual relation," he replied, cautiously refraining from mentioning the locality in which Hilda lived.

"And she is very beautiful?"

"Beautiful?"—a little rapt look came into the young man's eyes—"she—she—I never saw anyone like her. She is wonderful—and she loves me—and——"

He broke off, with a sudden remembrance of who his listener was.

"Thanks!" she said sarcastically. "I don't care to hear your raptures about your new love. You had better make haste to say good-bye to your old one! Why did you ask me to meet you here—in the old place where we have been so happy? It was like an insult to ask me here—to this orchard. It hurts—ah! it hurts! Why did you make me come?"

"I wanted us to part good friends," he said weakly. "I could not bear to feel you were angry with me, Joyce."

"Good friends!" she exclaimed indignantly; "good friends! You and I can never be friends again. You cannot throw a woman's heart away as you would an old shoe! When are you to marry your cousin?" she asked abruptly. "Is it to be a grand affair?"

A dull flush mounted to Aleck Baynes' forehead, he stirred uneasily.

"Don't be so bitter, Joyce—Joyce, dear!" he stammered; "it—we, I mean the wedding, will not be grand at all. It is to be a—a secret marriage!"

"A secret marriage?" As the girl repeated his words, a gleam shot into her eyes, rightly interpreted by Aleck. He seized her arm.

"Joyce!" he cried, "do not take your revenge for the wrong I have done you by making our marriage known. I beseech you help us to keep it a secret. It is bitterly opposed by Hilda's people and mine. For the present it is imperative that it should be a dead secret. Joyce, for the sake of all that has come and gone between us, be good to me and keep my secret!"

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

His passionate, pleading voice died into silence. For a moment Joyce's face was set in lines of sullen resolve, then a gentler emotion swept them away.

"I can't refuse you," she said brokenly; "I never could. I will keep your secret, Aleck. I will not tell of your marriage, or injure you—and I hope—oh, I hope you may be happy!"

Then, with one long last look into the face of the man she loved, Joyce turned from him and walked away across the orchard, under the blossoming trees. She looked back at him once, but his eyes were fixed on the ground—he did not see her.

"Good-bye, Aleck, my darling!" she whispered; "good-bye, good-bye! I do not blame you so much. It is she that I hate—hate—hate. She has stolen you from me, and I hate her! Ah, if only I could punish her for what she has done, how gladly would I do it—how gladly!"

Thus the first seed of revengeful longing was sown in Joyce's heart, a seed destined some day to spring into a full grown tree.

* * * * *

Fate plays strange pranks sometimes. It played into Joyce's hands a year later.

The girl married shortly after Aleck's desertion of her—married a good man who had wooed her for years, and loved her steadfastly, and though she told him sorrowfully she had no heart to give him, he persuaded her to become his wife, and to let him try to comfort her. He and Joyce established themselves in a small house in London, and took in lodgers, and though it would be untrue to say that Joyce was happy, she worked loyally for and with her husband, and made him a good and faithful wife. But she never forgot the man she loved—and she never forgave the woman who had stolen him from her.

Just a year after her bitter parting with Aleck Baynes, there came to Joyce's house a woman who asked for rooms. She was singularly beautiful, and she told Joyce that she had lately lost her husband, and needed shelter for herself and for her unborn child. Joyce's heart went out to her, and she was even inclined to refuse the liberal prepayment which the stranger insisted upon bestowing upon her. Without further inquiries she agreed to help this lady in her trouble, and the best rooms were at once prepared for her.

Only after the beautiful stranger was installed did Joyce learn her name. Only after she had promised to succour and care for her did it become known to her that the woman under her roof was none other than the woman who had stolen her lover from her, but whom hitherto she had never seen—Hilda Baynes—now a widow and desolate! For one wild moment Joyce allowed her visions of revenge to run rampant in her mind. She would turn this creature out—she would——

But gentler thoughts followed, brought to her perhaps by the twining touch of her own baby's fingers—her month old baby, who had come to soften Joyce's heart. "No, no," she reflected, "I cannot take vengeance upon a woman, ill and in sore trouble. No, I will help Aleck's widow in this time of her sorest need, and if at some time revenge is put into my hands—it must not be yet."

So it came about that through the weeks that followed Hilda Baynes was totally unaware of the identity of the woman who tended her, never dreaming that her landlady—Joyce Carnegie—was the girl vaguely mentioned to her by Aleck, the girl from whom she herself had stolen him.

Perhaps Hilda was too utterly selfish to observe that Joyce's care of her was bestowed as a duty; she was so entirely self-absorbed that nothing outside her own immediate range of vision ever did impress her.

When her baby was born she showed neither love for it, nor interest in it.

"Take it away," she cried fretfully. "What can I do with a baby? Take it away!" Then she turned her face to the wall and railed against Fate, planning desperately how to circumvent this latest blow of fortune.

"A child!" she thought bitterly. "What shall I do now? My marriage has been successfully hidden; no one need ever have known it. I had not to change my name in marrying Aleck—the secret could have gone with me to my grave. But this wretched child has spoilt it all!" No spark of mother's love burnt in Hilda Baynes' bosom; no kindly thought of her helpless little one stirred within her; her own interests, her own ambition were all for which she cared.

The secret marriage had turned out a miserable failure; mutual reproaches and recriminations between the young couple had ended in an almost total rupture, and Aleck's death had been simply untold relief to his wife. Now at last she felt she would be able to attain the ambition which her temporary passion for her cousin had made her forget. She relegated her brief married life to the realms of nightmare, and indulged in blissful dreams of social triumphs and worldly delights such as her soul hankered after. With her great beauty she would make a great marriage, she thought, love might be set aside for ever, and ambition would be her god in his place.

And now the cup was dashed from her lips. This baby had spoilt everything. No man would wish to marry a woman who had previously contracted a secret marriage, and was burdened with a child. The man upon whom her ambitious soul was set was above all a man of honour and uprightness, who would despise her for her conduct, and turn his back upon her if he learnt of what had happened.

She clutched at the bedclothes in a paroxysm as her thoughts reached this point, and then all at once a smile hovered round her lips.

"I have it!" she whispered, "I have it! I believe it could be worked. I shall surely be able to carry it out successfully, and if so I shall be free—free—free!"

After this Joyce noticed how changed was Hilda's demeanour to her child. She seemed interested in it, even fond of it, and Joyce began to think that she had misjudged her rival.

The seed of revengeful longing in her heart came near to dying just then. Feeling she had misjudged Hilda the widow, she began to wonder whether she had perhaps misjudged Hilda the girl; but the seed of revenge lay dormant only for a while; it was to revive presently in its full strength.

Hilda recovered rapidly, and on a sunny May afternoon she summoned Joyce to her sitting-room, and said in her most charming accents:

"Mrs. Carnegie, you have been so good to me, that I have planned a tiny pleasure for you this afternoon. I want you and your husband to go to the theatre. I have taken seats for you, and you must really spare the time to go, I will take care of baby."

Much surprised, Joyce expressed the gratitude she felt, and early in the afternoon she and her husband started in the cab also provided by Mrs. Baynes, leaving the latter upon her sitting-room sofa, the baby's cradle beside her. But no sooner had the Carnegie's cab rolled away than Hilda leapt from the sofa, locked the door, and began with feverish haste to tear off the black garments she wore, replacing them by coloured clothes she drew from a box in the adjoining bedroom. She next proceeded to ransack cupboards, empty drawers, and to jam their contents pell mell into a large trunk, stopping now and again to laugh triumphantly.

"Thank Heaven, I gave her no address when I came to her," she said; "she will never be able to trace me. How could she do so? My name is common enough. When I marry again I shall insist upon a very quiet wedding. Joyce Carnegie will never discover me again—of that I shall make very sure!" Laughing still, she rammed the last remaining articles into her box, and banged down the lid resentfully.

Digitized by Google

"Thank Heaven. I have found a way of escape!" she cried. Her next action was to go into the sitting-room and look down at the sleeping babe, but there was no love on her beautiful face.

"I have found a means of disposing of you," she said; "you will be very happy as the Carnegie's child—you would be miserable as mine! You will be a companion for their own child—if you live, that is to say, and the doctor says you are very delicate!"

She then wrote a hurried note, after which she rang the bell for the maid of all work.

"I have a fearful toothache," she said, "Go to Holden, my chemist, and ask for some toothache tincture for me."

The girl hesitated, looking at her open-mouthed.

"Please ma'am, I can't leave the 'ouse," she said. "'Olden's a long ways off, and there's missus' baby and all."

"Do as I tell you," Hilda answered, "I am here, the house will come to no harm. Go at once!"

The girl fled incontinently, and as soon as Hilda had seen her out of sight down the street, she flung on a hat and cloak, and rushed to the front door to summon a cab.

Her beauty and her imperiousness paralysed the cabman into doing exactly what she wished, although as he told his wife later on, he had many misgivings as to her strange conduct in leaving a house apparently deserted, save for a sleeping baby in the cradle upstairs and another baby crying in the kitchen.

But in spite of his misgivings he fetched down her box, meekly remounted his cab and drove Hilda to Paddington—a handsome girl dressed in a dark red gown and a hat of roses to match it—a being as unlike as could well be imagined to the woman in sweeping black draperies who six weeks before had entered Joyce Carnegie's house.

Arrived at Paddington she ordered the porter in the cabman's hearing to label her box to Cheltenham, but when the cabby had departed she calmly told the man that she had made a mistake, and for Cheltenham substituted the name of a remote station in Devonshire.

Late that afternoon Joyce and her husband reached home. The front door was flung open by the little slavey who greeted them with a storm of words out of which only two were comprehensible.

"She've gone—she've gone!"

"Who has gone?" cried Mrs. Carnegie.

"She've gone and left the baby. Oh the wicked woman! Send me out she did and back I come to find both the blessed babies screaming their little 'earts out."

Trembling in every limb and with a face as white as death, Joyce flew upstairs to the sitting-room lately occupied by Hilda and now a scene of desolation. Drawers were pulled out and empty, the cupboard was empty too, a litter of paper strewed the floor and table, and on the bed next door lay an untidy heap of the black garments lately worn by Mrs. Baynes.

The baby was once more asleep, and by its side lay a note addressed to Joyce, which she hastily tore open and read. It was very short.

"I am leaving hurriedly. You have often expressed such fondness for children that I leave my child to your tender mercies. Bring her up with yours if she lives—which I doubt her doing—I was never intended to be a mother.—H.B."

With the letter was a five-pound note and that was all!

Joyce uttered a little cry, then with a gesture of inexpressible anger she tore the letter into tiny fragments and stamped upon them.

"Baffled" she cried, "baffled! But I will find her. I will find her if I have to track her till the day of doom. She stole the man I loved. She has deserted her child and left it to my 'tender mercies!' Tender mercies indeed! If it were not Aleck's child as well as hers I would send it to the workhouse—but—but—" and kneeling beside the cradle Joyce broke into a passion of weeping.

Then she rose suddenly to her feet.

"Hilda Baynes" she said aloud and solemnly "I will seek you—seek you till my dying day. You shall pay for all that you have done and I will be avenged. You shall not escape scot free. I will have my revenge!"

Hilda had vanished into the great wilderness of London and left no clue but the seed of revengeful longing grew and flourished in Joyce's heart till it became a great tree—a tree destined to bear bitter and terrible fruit.

* * * * *

Lady Trevor—the most beautiful woman in London—stood in the midst of her great drawing-room giving directions to an army of workmen anent the ball which that night was to make her more than ever famous. She had vowed that her ball should eclipse every function of the kind hitherto held, and what Lady Trevor vowed she was generally capable of fulfilling, she made all things about her bow to her imperious will. Rich, handsome, adored by her husband and flattered by an admiring circle of friends, she might well feel that the world was at her feet, and she had determined that to-night, the world for whose approving voice she cared more for than anything else in the universe—should stand speechless with admiration and amazement.

There were to be acres of flowers in her spacious rooms—fairy lamps were to glow by thousands in every corner of the stately mansion which called her mistress, the supper was to include every out of season delicacy that imagination could devise—no expense was to be spared to make the occasion something to be dreamt of and talked of for weeks to come.

Hilda Trevor had attained to the first of her ambitions when Sir Alfred made her his wife. The handsome, self-willed girl had vowed that she would marry wealth and birth, and she had done both; and though, heartless and cold herself, she had not even the fraction of a heart to bestow upon the distinguished man who married her, he blindly worshipped the very ground upon which his wife's feet trod, and bestowed upon her a passionate and adoring love.

She was very beautiful.

Tall, graceful, stately, she moved across her great room like some Eastern Queen of old, in her dark, wonderful beauty. Her eyes were black as night, and glowing with the excitement of anticipations as she pictured her triumph of the night. Her raven locks framed a face over which artists raved, so exquisite were its outlines, so rich and glowing the colouring of her marvellous complexion. She turned to her husband with a smile.

"A bank of roses, there, Alfred, will make this room complete," she said.

"What you like, dear," he answered cheerfully, "choose everything you think best, I trust entirely to your taste."

She was turning from him to give the necessary order to a respectful foreman who stood at her right hand, when a footman crossed the room, bearing upon a salver a note which he handed to his mistress. A look of surprise crossed her face as she took up the envelope. It was dirty, untidy, and crumpled, singularly unlike any communications this spoilt child of fortune was in the habit of receiving.

"What a nasty document!" she exclaimed, opening the envelope with a distasteful glance, "some begging letter, I suppose."

Digitized by Google

"Let me look at it for you," said her husband, but even as he spoke the colour faded from his wife's face, the eyes she had fixed upon the letter in her hand grew strained and fixed, she swayed where she stood and would have fallen but for Sir Alfred's supporting arm.

"What is it, dear?" he cried, "has that note——"

With a violent effort she recovered her self-control, and drew herself away from his arm. The semblance of a smile trembled across her deathly white face, she crumpled the letter in her hand, and said quietly, though in a voice that shook.

"Oh, my dear Alfred, no. The note is merely a line—from a poor woman I am employing. I—I think I must be a little tired, the heat has upset me I expect. I felt quite faint for a minute. I will go and rest."

Her husband's face was still full of anxiety, tenderly giving her his arm he led her upstairs to her luxurious bedroom, brought her salts and eau de Cologne, and only left her at last when she declared that she felt really better, and would lie down on her sofa, and try to get a little sleep. But no sooner had Sir Alfred's steps died away in the passage than she sprang from the couch, hastily turned the key in the lock, and began pacing the room like a caged beast, clenching and unclenching her hands in ungovernable passion.

"How has she found me out? How has that woman found me out?" she cried aloud. "I thought I was safe from her for ever. How has she discovered me, and what must I do?"

That was the sum and substance of all her musings—what must she do? What could she do now that Joyce Carnegie had discovered her whereabouts and her identity with the Hilda Baynes of a year before? Would her secret be known to Sir Alfred and the world? This was the dread question which rioted to and fro in her brain. She unfolded the note that was still crumpled in her hand.

"You must come to me, or I will come to you"—so it ran. It was signed "Joyce Carnegie," and an address followed.

"At all costs I must prevent her from coming here," Hilda reflected, "at all costs that must be stopped. Good God! I thought I was safe from her for ever!"

With desperate haste she tore from her wardrobe a long, fur-trimmed cloak which covered her from head to foot, and hid the scarlet folds of her gown. She pinned on a large hat covered with ostrich feathers, and then, opening the door cautiously, she stole out into the passage and down the stairs. As she passed the drawing-room door she heard her husband's voice giving orders to the workmen, and, still unseen, she went on across the hall and out of the front door.

For half a second she stood irresolute on the pavement outside, then she hailed a passing hansom, and giving the man the address which already seemed to be burnt into her brain in letters of fire, she was whirled away Eastwards.

But in her haste and desperation she had overlooked one thing. That crumpled note which had wrought such havoc in her mind, lay white and prominent upon the carpet in her bedroom, where, in her feverish pacing she had dropped it. There, half an hour later, her husband found it when he stood gazing blankly round his wife's empty room. Mechanically he unfolded the soiled sheet and read the note—read it over and over again, his eyes wide with dismay. Then he tore it into a thousand fragments.

"What in the wide world does it mean?" he cried. "What can it mean, and who is Joyce Carnegie?"

[The conclusion of this story (describing the incident shown on the cover) will appear in next Tuesday's Short Stories.]

THE DOCTOR'S MOTOR.

And How It Played the Part of Matchmaker.

"I shall go to South Africa," he said, gloomily.

She made a little gesture of vexation. She drummed on the carpet with a pair of small, strong heels.

"For goodness' sake," she cried, petulantly, "try to do something less hackneyed. Nowadays every man who thinks he likes a woman who doesn't happen to be prepared to marry him at a moment's notice, goes off to South Africa."

He turned upon her sturdily.

"Indeed! If you imagine I'm going there heart-broken you're mistaken. I'm going there to make my fortune. I shall take that post Levy offered me on his ranch. I shall combine it with doctoring, and between the two I might make money."

She had turned toward him with rather a serious expression.

"Really?" she said, slowly.

"Really," he said, emphatically.

She did not look so confident as she had looked some minutes earlier. There was a little whitening of her cheeks. He was a fine-looking, well-set-up young man, for whom any woman might have cared. But he had committed that most foolish of love's many blunders; he had proposed to a woman without having given her time to know whether she cared for him or not. The wise man defers his proposal until the woman has begun to tremble lest it shall not come. In life we value most the things we think or have thought ourselves in danger of losing. Impetuous of disposition, he had fallen in love with her at first sight. She was of calmer temper; but although she was not prepared to accept him in a moment, neither was she prepared to lose him in a moment. This notion of South Africa affected her more than she was able to explain to herself.

"To make a fortune is a very poor ambition for a young man," she said, loftily.

"Possibly," he agreed, "but the fortune made is a very comfortable condition for an old one."

"How clever you are," she said, with a rallying smile.

But he did not rally.

"You'd far better remain here," she resumed, glancing sidelong at his rueful countenance. "You're getting on well in your profession. Since you set up people seem to have fallen ill just for the sake of adding to your practice. In old Dr. Jarvis's time nobody was ill. Now it seems as though the lease of everybody's constitution had suddenly fallen in."

"Oh I'm doing well enough," he said, dejectedly. She was so serious and yet so gay, so prudent and so charming. Her blue eyes showed sincere, yet full of humour. The red lips from which her wisdoms fell seemed made for kisses. Her curls were such a charming golden frame for common sense. Yet where was the use of his doing well, or of her lips and curls, if these were to fall to the lot of some luckier man? He could not bear to think of it. He stifled a groan and took up his hat. She stood there in her fresh print frock. She wore a charming apron, with lace frills and pockets. She was a delightful young farmer. When her father died, some two years earlier, she had taken up his work, and was doing it successfully. Her butter, the making of which she personally superintended, had a fame for miles round. He had been called in this morning to see an ailing dairymaid. Having prescribed for the dairymaid, he had proposed to the mistress.

Digitized by Google

The scene had been enacted in the pretty parlour of the old farm house. Through the opened windows came the perfume of roses and syringa, and a tangle of sweet lilies. Bees hummed, birds twittered and sung. Life was a poem. He stifled a groan, and taking up his hat moved some paces toward the long French window.

"At all events, you will not be leaving us just yet," she said, a trifle persuasively.

"Not till next month," he responded gravely, and with the air of a man who has made his final plans. He was guilty of a second of love's blunders. "No" to him spelled nothing but "No!"

"Next month?" she cried, dismayed. "Oh, what madness it is to let another person so affect your life."

"It might have been the sweetest madness in the world," he said, ardently.

She stirred restlessly. She fanned herself with her big sun hat. There was a fire in the air that seemed to burn her cheeks. But she would not be serious. She dared not be serious until she should be left alone to think.

"Your lovely new motor-car?" she challenged him. "You cannot take it to South Africa, and you will never have the heart to leave it."

From where they stood they could see it at rest before the opened gate. It sparkled in the sunshine. It was clean and smart of line, and cosily cushioned.

"I had it built for two," he said, and added, "I was a presumptuous ass."

He bowed his good-byes and escaped across the daisied lawn. She flung herself into a chair and started weeping.

* * * * *

He had made his rounds and, returning, fell into a bitter reverie. Now, although a motor car is as safe as any other form of locomotion, it is as well when driving one to keep the hand and mind upon the steering wheel.

Dyson, since the morning's disappointment, having had the subject next his heart, he elbowed aside, perforce, such mere commonplaces as a baby's teething, a schoolboy's measles, or a mother's indigestion, flung physic to the dogs and allowed himself a violent reaction. Knowing the straight clear road of some two miles before him, he dropped his head absently upon his chest, and in the dusk and silence of the scented woods through which his way ran, groaned out his desolation.

He would get away from it post-haste. He had made up his mind to that.

Every well-remembered signpost, every rustic homestead, every spot of beauty turned him sick. Yesterday he had seen these glorified by hope; now that he was hopeless they were sword thrusts at his heart.

Jack, his younger brother, who had just qualified, and was looking for a post, should take his practice at once, leaving him leisure to pack his traps and be off in a fortnight to Johannesburg. The fresh surroundings, the new, rough life, would give him something to think about besides golden hair, blue eyes, and the dearest, sweetest, gayest spirit in the world.

He looked up for a moment. There was a hedge which marked the furthest limit of her small estate. Yesterday, at sight of it he had broken into whistling. To-day—! He choked. A mist swam before his eyes. Two minutes later he pulled himself together. His road branched at an angle from the straight broad highway he had been following in a dream. His hand gripped the steering wheel, his eye marked hawthorns overhanging the corner of the lane down which he must turn; but his mind was in a certain room in the pretty, well-beloved farmhouse to the right of him.

Just as he turned into the lane, with wandering, dejected wits, a woman picking blackberries from the hedge, a baby hanging on her arm, suddenly shrieked and stood still, panic-stricken in the middle of the road.

Either he must run her down or he must ride into a bank. He chose the bank. He swung round his steering wheel, shut off the engines, and prepared for—anything.

Dorothy Lentham, musing in her garden, heard the well-known "Teuf-Teuf," guiltily blushed, and wondered how she would be able, without undue injury to her pride, to dissuade him from wrecking his future in South Africa.

Then came a sudden scream, a masculine exclamation—a thud—a crash and rattle, then—silence.

Hatless, breathless, blanched of face, she ran down the garden and out through a rustic gateway into the road.

The gaily-painted car stood on its hind wheels apparently uninjured, its front wheels raised and embedded in a grassy bank. Dyson, who had been thrown violently out, lay senseless in the road. The woman wrung her hands and wept above the scene. The baby howled and slapped its mother's face.

* * * * *

He came to his senses with the touch of a light hand on his brows. He opened heavy eyes and peered about a darkened room.

"John," he demanded of his dispenser, "what the deuce is up?"

But John was not there. He thought he must be dreaming still when the voice which had haunted him sweetly and mercilessly for many a week besought him to be quiet.

"You had an accident," she told him, with the sound of tears in her voice.

"Ah!" he said, and remembered. What a confounded nuisance! After all, he would not be able to get away as soon as he had hoped. Dazed as he was, that necessity to escape from the scene of his misery possessed him.

"Any bones broken?" he murmured.

"No," she said; "only brain concussion. But you must keep perfectly, perfectly still, Dr. Edwards says."

After a minute:

"Miss Lentham," he said, feebly—he was conscious of being able, had he wished, to speak more strongly, but the words sounded better uttered feebly—"would you mind just kissing me once—in case I should—should die, you know?"

There was a pause, which seemed to him an age.

Then he felt the red lips softly and rather timidly on his. Concussion seemed to have shaken discrimination into him.

"Good heavens!" he cried, in a wonder of amazement, "do you——I say, Miss Lentham, after all, do you——by Jove, I think, after all, I'll get well!"

"But you won't go to South Africa?" she wailed

"Not if I know it!" cried he.

The motor-car was so little injured—having safely and softly embedded itself—that not three months later, it took the couple for whom it had been built honeymooning, all over Wales.

ARABELLA KENEALY.

A Hate Match.

MISS SMILAX: "And so Miss Passe and Mr. Gotnix really got married. Was it a love match?" Mary: "On the contrary, I should call it a hate match." Miss Smilax: "Why? I don't understand you." Mary: "Why, she hated to be an old maid, and he hated to be poor."

To Keep them Humble.

FRIEND: "One of your clerks tells me you raised his salary and told him to get married, under penalty of discharge." Business Man: "Yes, I do that to all my clerks when they get old enough to marry. I don't want any of your independent, conceited men about my place."

Digitized by Google

THE LORD OF THE EAGLES

By VICTOR PITT-KETHLEY.

PHILIP DRAKE was an artist, and he had come to the out-of-the world Spanish Pyrenean village of Turgiana in search of unhackneyed subjects. He had not been disappointed. Savage-looking, but eminently picturesque muleteers and their gaily-caparisoned beasts; the curious peasant types who frequented the little venta * at which he was staying (and where he made shift to exist on a menu composed largely of omelettes, washed down by fiery mountain wine); the shepherds; the dirty, but surpassingly beautiful children—these, set in a background of wild and rugged mountain, and moving in an atmosphere far removed from that of the bustling English city whence he had come, provided Philip with endless studies. And as the weeks glided on the handsome foreign señor became known to everybody in the village, while all—especially the privileged ones who had sat to him—agreed that no such painter had ever been heard of. An opinion in which the padre, whose heart the young artist had won by various acts of kindness, fully joined.

For his excursions into the mountains Philip engaged the services of a young man from the village, one Pepe Nerito, who soon began to conceive a dog-like affection for the tall young Englishman. One day, when they had penetrated into a wild and rocky valley, where, amid a setting of savage rocks and beetling precipices an impetuous mountain torrent dashed over a cliff in a cascade of milk-white foam, Philip noticed, on an eminence above him, a curious looking building, half castle and half dwelling-house. An indescribable air of desolation and decay seemed to brood over this strange habitation, set like an eyrie on its precipitous crag, and now bathed in a flood of blood-red light as the last rays of the setting sun fell upon it.

"Who lives in yonder house?" asked Drake, curiously.

Pepe glanced over his shoulder at the castle, and then crossed himself hastily.

"May the saints preserve us, señor!" he replied uneasily. "That is the Castle on the Rock. Old Don Andrea the witch-man liveth there, the Lord of the Eagles."

"Don Andrea the witch-man!" repeated Drake. "Who on earth is he?"

Pepe glanced once more at the grim building on the hill, now gradually fading into the evening mists. Then he spoke.

"I call him witch-man, señor," he explained, "because they say that he is not as other men—that he possesses the evil eye, and that he can cast spells upon his enemies. Once, years ago—my father told me the story—Don Andrea passed through the village, and the children mocked him and threw stones at him. He cursed them and their parents, telling them that a great evil should overtake them. That very week a strange sickness seized the flocks on the mountains, and ruin fell upon many in Turgiana. But that was not all. When the hot wind came out of the south a fever broke out in the village, and the first to die of it were the little ones who had mocked old Don Andrea. Since that day he has never been seen in Turgiana, but some of the muleteers have seen his daughter at different times, roaming alone over the hill-sides. She, they say, is fair as the lily, but the Don keepeth her away from all mankind."

"This is very interesting," said Philip, who was too well acquainted with the Spanish temperament to cast doubts on his guide's superstitious gabblings; "but why do you call this old hermit 'Lord of the Eagles'?"

"It is soon said, señor," replied Pepe. "Look at his castle and tell me what you see."

"I can see birds hovering round it," said Philip, after a pause; "small, black birds."

"They look small from here," said Pepe, "but were you nearer, señor, you would see that they are eagles—the great black eagles of the Sierras, cruel and terrible birds. And we call Don Andrea Lord of the Eagles because they come and go at his call—even eat out of his hand, so the people say. Were it not for the eagles, excellency, it might well have happened that the men had burnt his house over his head when the flocks have sickened through his spells. But he needeth no watch-dogs while he hath his eagles. Sometimes they swoop down upon the village, and steal sleeping babes from their cots, or fly at little children. The people tell tales of men who, in their cups, have gone up the mountain to beard the Don in his den. But none have ever returned—save only one, and he came back sightless, and an idiot!" He shuddered as he finished speaking.

On the way back to the village Philip thought over the wild and fantastic story his simple guide had unfolded to him. He was of a somewhat romantic temperament, and he was charmed to find this fragment of blind superstition lingering in the mountains. He determined, if possible, to find out more about the mysterious occupant of the Castle on the Rock. To this end he called on the old padre, the most intelligent person in the little community.

The priest was by this time quite an intimate friend of the young Englishman's. He had been first attracted to him by the fact that the latter was a Roman Catholic, and the bond of interest thus established had been strengthened by the kindly act of the young artist in executing a masterly copy of the old man's treasured Madonna, which hung in the village church. He received Drake with great heartiness.

When Philip mentioned his conversation with Pepe relative

* Wayside inn.

Digitized by Google

to the strange inhabitant of the Castle on the Rock, however, the old padre's gentle face clouded.

"There are indeed strange tales about concerning Don Andrea," he said. "May the saints grant that they be not all true! What I know of him is not much, señor. He is the last of his race, the Almanzas of Navarra, and the Castle of the Rock and the mountain on which it stands are all that remains of their ancient estates. Many years ago he brought to that desolate house a young bride—if my memory serves me, a compatriot of your own. He treated her harshly, so it was said, and the tender northern flower faded away until she died, after giving birth to a little girl. Her death, I suppose, soured him, although he was always of a saturnine disposition. From that day to this, señor, he has held no communion with his fellows. The daughter has grown up as beautiful as her mother—and that is saying much. I have not set eyes on her since her childhood, but her mother I remember well."

"But what is all this wild talk about Don Andrea bewitching the village, and possessing powers over the eagles?" asked Drake.

The old priest stirred in his chair. "There is much talk on that subject, my son," he said; "but you and I know that by the goodness of Heaven such things as the evil eye cannot exist. As to the eagles, however, there can be no doubt that Don Andrea does possess some strange influence over them. Often do we see them circling over the Castle on the Rock, and when foolhardy men, drunk with wine, have gone forth, as they said, to bait the old man, they have been attacked by the eagles and killed or disfigured. Know you old Beppo, the blind beggar?"

"A half-witted man with scars on his face?" asked Drake.

"That is he," replied the priest. "Three years ago he was a muleteer, upright and strong, and possessed of his sight. Two of his mules died of a mysterious sickness, and he would have it that Don Andrea had cast his eye upon them. So the misguided man set forth to punish the old Don. Late at night some people on the outskirts of Turgiana were aroused by wild screams, and on going out, they found Beppo lying on the ground frightfully torn and disfigured, and covered with blood. Both his eyesight and his reason were totally gone."

"And was this done by the eagles?" asked Drake incredulously.

"Even so," said the priest gravely. "In his moments of sanity the poor wretch sometimes babbles of his terrible adventure of that night, and one gathers from his story that it was Don Andrea who set the eagles at him, as we might a watch-dog on a robber. Curiously enough, the crest of the Almanzas is a mountain eagle."

Drake was keenly interested in the curious story he had heard, and he secretly resolved to try and find out something for himself about Don Andrea and his daughter. Particularly was he interested in the beautiful girl—the daughter of an English mother—and he pictured to himself how unutterably lonely her life must be, cut off as she was from the society of her sisters in the outside world, and doomed to spend her young life in the company of an old madman—for such Drake judged Don Andrea to be.

In pursuit of his intention, he went day after day to the grim valley underneath the rock on which the castle of the Almanzas stood. Ostensibly he was there to paint the cascade, but more often than not, over a meditative pipe, he would watch the grim old building above for half an hour at a time. The only signs of life he saw about the place, however, were an occasional thread of smoke and the circling of the eagles, which certainly seemed to make their home somewhere in the recesses of the castle.

Since Drake had taken to visiting the valley, Pepe had been requisitioned by his father to aid in some building operations, so that the artist had the place to himself; for even had there been any pasture in this forbidding place it is doubtful whether the superstitious shepherds would have brought their flocks thither, so afraid were they of the evil eye of the Lord of the Eagles.

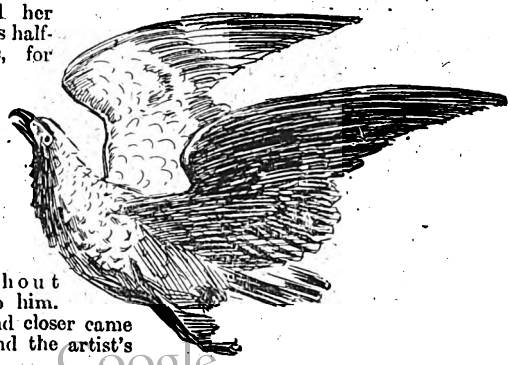
It came about one day that Philip set eyes, for the first time, on Don Andrea's daughter. Coming suddenly round a corner on the way to his painting-spot, he was startled to see a slight, girlish figure sitting on a rock. He had a momentary glimpse of a beautiful face, browned by exposure to the sun, and yet fairer in complexion than the average run of Spanish girls, and then the girl fled, like a frightened fawn, up the crags, skipping from rock to rock with the agility of a chamois. Drake felt certain that this shy maid of the mountains could be none other than Don Andrea's daughter, and he chuckled to himself at the idea that a creature so fair could possess the evil eye.

On the following day, as he sat at work, his thoughts every now and again straying to the fair apparition of the previous morning, he suddenly got it into his head that he was being watched. He scanned the rugged precipices around him, but saw nothing; he strained his ears for sounds, but all that came to him was the dull roar of the cascade. Nevertheless, he had an uneasy feeling that someone was near him, and although he feigned to be absorbed in his work, he kept on the alert. Once, hearing a slight sound, he turned his eyes cautiously in the direction whence it emanated, and fancied that he saw the girl's face for an instant behind a rock, but so quickly was it withdrawn, that he could not make certain his eyes were not deceiving him.

And then he thought of a plan whereby he hoped to make the watcher, if it were indeed the Don's daughter, declare herself. His picture needed a human figure. On a rock in the foreground he started to work in, with rapid strokes, a presentment of the girl he had seen for a few fleeting moments in the little cleft. The sketch grew under his hand in a way which surprised even himself, and he felt a glow of satisfaction as he contemplated the work.

At lunch-time he left the picture, and sitting down at some distance from it, ate his lunch with keen relish. Then he smoked a pipe in thoughtful fashion, and finally made elaborate preparations for a siesta. In full view of any watcher he spread himself out behind a convenient rock and was soon, to all appearances, fast asleep. In reality, however, he was very much awake indeed, for he had laid a little trap for the spy whom he felt convinced was lurking somewhere among the rocks. If Don Andrea's daughter had in reality been observing him, he argued, she would have seen that he had put her into his picture. That being so, she would naturally, being a woman, wish to see how he had portrayed her. Her curiosity might bring her near enough for him to speak to her—for he had been curiously struck by her beauty.

Half an hour passed, and nothing happened, save that an eagle flapped lazily over the valley at a great height, a black blot against the cloudless azure of that burning southern sky. Drake was beginning to revile the clumsiness of his scheme, when suddenly he fancied he saw a slight movement behind a huge rock a little to his left. In a few seconds his suspicion became a certainty; a figure darted to a rock still nearer—and he knew it was the girl he had waited for. Nearer and nearer she came, still keeping under cover, until at last she had reached a boulder a little to his rear. Drake chuckled to himself as he watched her through his half-closed lids, for he noticed that if the girl came forward past him to look at the picture she could not very well run away without speaking to him.



Closer and closer came the girl, and the artist's heart beat fast. Now, he knew, she was scrutinising him to see whether he was likely to wake immediately. Would she decide, he wondered, that the risk of his waking and catching her was too great, or would she proceed to gratify her curiosity?

Digitized by Google

His cogitations were set at rest by the girl's next act. With a light step she tripped straight across from her place of concealment, cast one searching glance at Drake's immobile features, and then hurried on to the canvas, examining the portrait of herself with wide-opened eyes. While she was thus occupied Drake sat up. Now that for which he had schemed had come to pass, he felt rather ashamed of himself. Fortunately for himself, he was a fluent Spanish scholar.

"Is the señorita interested in my attempt to place her upon canvas?" he inquired.

The girl started violently and turned round, a wave of crimson spreading over her lovely face as she did so. She cast one look at Drake, and then her large, expressive eyes darted to the rocks behind him.

"I do not know what you must think of my intrusion, señor," she said at last, and the suspicion of a smile lurked for an instant round the corners of her mouth. "I thought that you slept—and—and——"

"Pray do not apologies, señorita," cried Drake "I can assure you that I have been hoping to see you again every day, in order that I might beg of you the favour of a few sittings, so that I may complete my rough sketch."

The girl blushed again. "Are there not girls in Turgiana?" she asked.

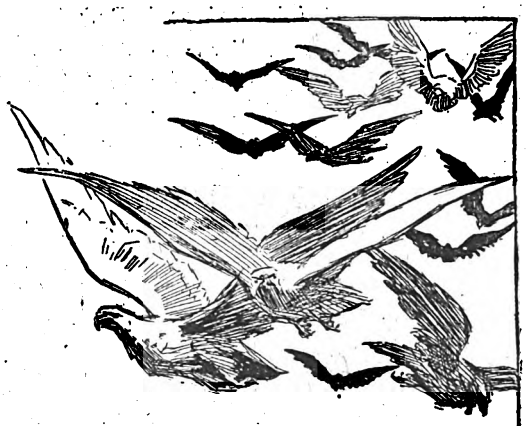
"You see, I have decided to put you in," said Drake. "And, besides, as you live so near the cascade, you have an interest in the picture."

"How do you know where I live?" asked the girl, her dark eyes resting on Drake's face.

"I guessed," confessed Drake. "Are you not the daughter of Don Andrea up at the castle yonder?"

"Yes," she said simply. "Then you have heard about my father?"

"I heard that he lived alone with his daughter," said Drake evasively, "and from the description I judged it to be you when I first saw you."



"Tell me," said the girl suddenly. "You are an Englishman?"

"Yes."

"My mother was an Englishwoman, but she died when I was a child. Tell me about England—what it is like."

Drake gave her a rapid sketch, as best he could, of his native country, but the girl clamoured for yet more information. She drank in his words with surprising interest, never once taking her lustrous eyes from off his face. At last, however, he stopped abruptly.

"We have quite forgotten the answer to my question," he declared laughingly. "You will give me some sittings, won't you?"

"I will try," she said. "Adios, señor."

And before he could thank her she had slipped past him, and was running swiftly up the mountain side.

The meeting of that afternoon was the forerunner of many. On the day following their tête-à-tête Don Andrea's daughter suddenly appeared in the valley and greeted the artist with a shy smile. She consented to sit for just a few minutes. The minutes became an hour.

Drake had already completely lost his heart to this bewitching little mountain fairy, and he listened with the keenest pleasure to her conversation. Confidence once established, Juanita—for that was the girl's name—rapidly became communicative, and prattled unceasingly.

Drake learnt, in the first place, that she was lonely, unutterably lonely, which explained, perhaps, the interest she had taken in the strange painter señor who had penetrated into the valley. Drake learnt that it had been her custom from childhood onwards to ramble over the hill-sides. Her father, she said, was a strange man, a man of wild moods, and of late, but rarely to be seen. There had been a time when he had devoted a certain portion of each day to her education, but now he left her entirely alone, shutting himself up in his study in the watch-tower, where he fed and caressed his pets, the eagles. She was afraid, she said gravely, with a troubled look in her brown eyes, that he was going mad, for his heart seemed filled with bitter hatred towards his fellow-men.

Digitized by Google

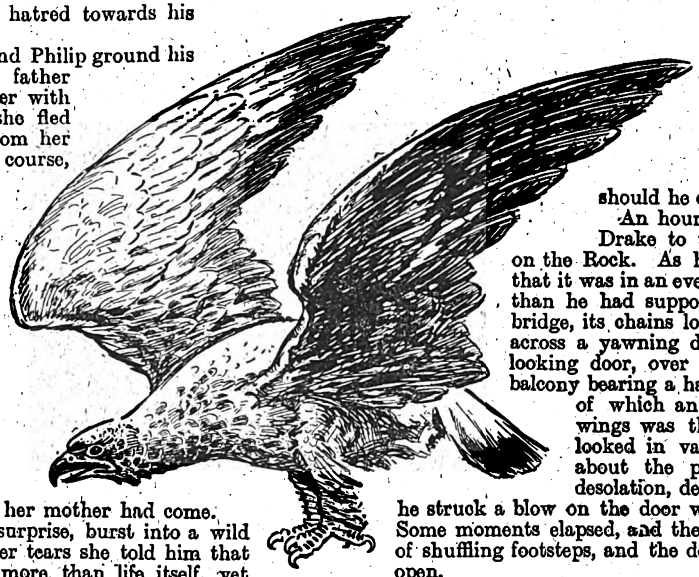
Sometimes, she said—and Philip ground his teeth at the recital—her father had beaten her, lashed her with a cruel whip, so that she fled from him screaming. From her entire seclusion she was, of course, entirely ignorant of events in the world around her; but she possessed an amazing quickness of observation which enabled her to readily understand and assimilate things that were new to her.



At last there came the climax that might have been expected. Philip told Juanita of his love, and how he wished to make her his wife; to take her away to that northern country whence her mother had come.

The girl, to his utter surprise, burst into a wild tempest of sobs. Amid her tears she told him that although she loved him more than life itself, yet she could never be his; that her father's insane hatred for all humankind would be a fatal bar, for he would assuredly kill both her and Drake when he heard of their intimacy.

"Courage, querida mia," said Philip, cheerily, taking the sobbing girl tenderly into his arms. "There will be no killing, I am sure. I will come up and see him, and explain matters, and then I daresay he will give us his blessing."

He spoke brightly, but as a matter of fact he did not quite know how this strange old man was to be approached.

Juanita sat up, her face white with terror.

"You would come to the Castle on the Rock?" she cried. "Felipe, that may never be. Do you not know the fate that overtakes all who come there? Have you no fear of the eagles that come and go at my father's word? They would tear you to pieces! And me—he would lash me, and never let me roam the hillsides again, so that I should never see you more." And she sobbed anew.

"I don't think I'm afraid of the eagles, dearest," said Philip. "Any how, I'm coming up to see him, and if he refuses his consent—well, then, I'll take you without, and we will get the padre at Turgiana to marry us. I'm not going to have you run any risks of perpetual imprisonment, or lashings, or any nonsense like that."

His determined tone somewhat reassured her, and the lovers parted, Juanita, however, still pale and trembling.

That afternoon Philip unfolded the whole history of the affair to the good old padre, who listened with open mouth and staring eyes. At first he was disposed to chide the young Englishman for having any dealings with the daughter of so strange a man, but finally he became keenly interested in the poor girl, shut up in that ancient castle with a brutal and apparently maniac father.

"Failing her father's consent, padre," pursued Philip, "I intend to take her away without it, as it is abundantly obvious that Don Andrea is no fit person to look after her. Moreover, she is of age. You shall marry us, padre, then and there, and I will take her away to my people in England. Thank God! I am well able to support her."

The priest had many objections to offer, but one by one these were demolished, and presently something of Drake's own enthusiasm infected him. He was much perturbed, however, at Philip's intention to visit the Castle on the Rock. He pointed out the dangers—no less real because imperfectly understood—that threatened him, and begged him to at least take some one with him. But Philip scoffed at the idea of danger, promising only to take a revolver in case of need. And so he departed.

No sooner had he gone than the old priest sent for Pepe and talked rapidly to him for some time. Ten minutes later Pepe set off swiftly up the mountain, keeping in Drake's track, but yet well out of sight should he chance to look round.

An hour's toilsome climb brought Drake to the vicinity of the Castle on the Rock. As he approached it, he saw that it was in an even more ruinous condition than he had supposed. An ancient drawbridge, its chains long since rotted away, lay across a yawning dry moat to a forbidding-looking door, over which projected a stone balcony bearing a half-obliterated escutcheon, of which an eagle with outstretched wings was the main device. Philip looked in vain for any signs of life about the place — everywhere was desolation, decay, and silence. Finally he struck a blow on the door with the stick he carried. Some moments elapsed, and then there came the sounds of shuffling footsteps, and the door was suddenly thrown open.

Inside the portal stood an old man, a man as tall as Drake, and straight as a die. His head and the lower part of his face were covered with a tangled mass of grey-white hair, but the most noticeable feature was his eyes, which burnt with extraordinary brightness from under his shaggy brows. He was attired in a long, loose-fitting coat of rusty black, belted at the waist.

"Well?" he demanded, in a deep, menacing voice, while his bright eyes looked the visitor through and through.

"My name is Drake," said Philip, unabashed. "I wish to see Don Andrea Almanza."

"I am he," replied the old man, sullenly. "My daughter told me you were coming. Enter, and come with me."

Philip stepped inside the great door, which the old man flung to behind him. He found himself in a wide and spacious hall, full of suits of armour and sculptured shields, all now thickly covered with cobwebs and dust.

The Don led the way to a room at the bottom of the hall. It contained a large oaken table and a few chairs, while light was afforded by a hanging brass lamp.

On one of the chairs the old man seated himself, and Philip, unbidden, took another. The Don stared at him coldly, evidently expecting him to speak.

"I gathered from your remark that your daughter has mentioned my name to you," began Drake, awkwardly. "To be brief, señor, I love your daughter, and she loves me. I desire to make her my wife, and——"

Before he could say more the old Spaniard turned upon him, his terrible eyes blazing with wrath.

"Say no more," he thundered. "You shall have my answer now. Against my express commands, that foolish girl has permitted herself to associate with people outside. For that I will see that she is properly punished. My answer to you is No!—do you hear me? No! Juanita lives and dies here with me. I am the last of my race, and my word is passed."

He spoke with extraordinary vehemence and bitterness.

"The man is evidently quite mad," soliloquised Philip.

"You express your views with unnecessary heat, sir," he said, aloud. "Surely you understand that a young girl cannot be cooped up for ever in a lonely house, shut off from all intercourse with the world. If by your reference to punishment of Juanita you allude to physical violence, I can only inform you that I have come here to-night with the firm intention of taking her away—if possible, with your consent, but if not without it. The priest of Turgiana will marry us, and she shall go home with me to her mother's country."

Digitized by Google

Don Andrea turned on him, his glaring eyes literally snapping fire.

"You talk to me like that, you young English dog," he shouted. "Do you know that, if I will it, you will never reach yon village alive? Do you not know, fool, that I have sworn never again to hold communion with mankind, but to live and die here among the eagles, the birds of my house? Go, before my anger overpowers me. Juanita I will fittingly punish for her folly. She will never be yours—nor any other man's."

"You talk vainly, sir," said Philip, hotly. "Your insults and threats do not frighten me. It is quite evident to me that you are no fit person to have charge of Juanita. She leaves this place with me to-night, if I have to search every room in the house for her."

With a howl of concentrated fury the old man started to his feet, and something bright flashed upwards in his hand. There came a quick movement from behind, a shrill cry, and as Philip started back a stiletto went hurtling harmlessly towards the ceiling. Juanita, pale and trembling, stood by his side.

"So," hissed the old man, his baleful eyes now fixed on his daughter. "You would save his life, she-cat?"

"Father," said the girl, in a firm, clear voice, "your attempt to murder Felipe has decided me. I shall leave you for ever. You have for years ill-treated me, as you ill-treated my poor mother. Day by day you have got wilder and stranger in your moods, until it has come to this. Felipe," she said, turning to her lover, "I will come with you."

"It is well," replied Don Andrea, slowly, his burning orbs fixing themselves with slow malevolence on the pair. "You have marked out your own path. Go, and may my curse rest upon you, faithless daughter of the Almanzas. Go," he continued in a louder key, "you shall never darken the doors of the Castle on the Rock again."

He made towards the door, Drake and Juanita following him. In the hall he paused and looked back at them, standing hand in hand.

"Go," he said again, pointing with his bony finger towards the great door. "You shall see how the Lord of the Eagles pays his debts." He turned on his heel and disappeared.

"Come, Juanita," said Philip, turning to the girl. He noticed for the first time that she was dressed in her outdoor garb.

Drake unbarred the door, and threw it back. The night was cold and dark, and a faint mist filled the valleys.

Philip led the trembling girl across the drawbridge. As he passed under the shadow of the balcony, something liquid fell upon him—a warm sticky fluid, which made him start, fearing foul play. But no sound came from above, and wiping the stuff from his face he hastily cleared the narrow bridge, breathing a sigh of relief as he left the terrible house behind.

A hundred yards from the house Juanita stopped.

"Felipe," she said in an agonised voice, "What is this on your coat? Is it blood?"

"No, dearest," said Drake, linking his arm in her own. "Something or other dropped on me just as we were coming under the balcony."

"Jesu!" he heard her gasp. "Can it be?" Then she stopped and pressed her face to his coat. "Mother of Heaven, yes!"

"What is it?" asked Philip, struck by her terrified manner.

"He has covered you with the eagle-food," she cried, despairingly. "They can scent it miles away, and they will come to us. Madre de Dios, that he should be my father!" She burst out, with passionate energy.

"Great Scott!" said Philip. "Do you mean that this stuff attracts the birds, and that they will——"

He did not finish the sentence, for the terrible fate of poor Beppo occurred to him, and he shuddered at the devilish scheme which had sent him forth, with this hapless girl, to disfigurement and probably to death. It was quite useless to throw away his coat. He knew, but did not tell the girl, that the stuff had soaked into his shirt and had also covered his face and hands. Then he hurried her onward.

The path was difficult and hard to find, butalthough they strayed once or twice, Juanita knew the road too well to go far wrong. She clung tightly to her lover, but said never a word; only the look in her eyes told of her terror. Presently she looked over her shoulder into the blackness behind them. She said nothing, however, only hurried the faster. She appeared to be listening, and Philip found himself following her example. There came a momentary lull in the wind, and he fancied he heard another and different sound, somewhere high above him. Yes, he was sure of it—it was the whirring of wings!

"Felipe," said the girl, and her voice was calmer now. "Do you hear? It is the eagles; my father has sent them after us."

"I've got a revolver here," replied Drake, but in spite of himself he felt shaken by the eeriness of his surroundings. "We may be able to frighten them off if they come close."

The sounds were now manifestly closer, and occasionally a hoarse cry made them start with apprehension. Philip set his teeth and breathed a silent prayer. Danger in any tangible form he could have grappled with light-heartedly, but death from out of the dark—death in its most fantastic and horrible form—he knew not how to combat.

Suddenly there came a rushing sound above him, and a huge body swept just over his head. Quick as thought he snatched out his revolver and fired at it. A hoarse scream showed that the shot had taken effect.

Juanita, with a low moan, fell forward fainting. Scarce knowing what he did, Philip threw her across his shoulder and started to run. There came another rush of wings, and yet another bird sailed down upon him, its pinions striking his face. But again the revolver spoke, and although the bullet went wide the great creature flinched at the flash and disappeared in the darkness.

Streaming with perspiration, the young artist struggled onwards. Ever and anon he stumbled, for the way was rocky and the night black as ink, but now he could see the lights of the village far below him, and he prayed that he might be able to reach them before the eagles returned to the attack. But even as he ran two huge birds launched themselves at him, their cruel beaks and talons working savagely. He dodged the onslaught of one, but the other's claws tore at his shoulder until a third shot drove it away. The other bird then darted at him and with a blow of its wings sent him reeling to his knees, while its beak laid open his forehead. Blinded with blood, Drake nevertheless struggled to his feet, mindful even in this dire extremity of the necessity for keeping in motion. A fourth shot gave him a temporary respite, and he staggered onwards, scarce able to stand.

Again the dreadful noise of beating wings, again the hoarse cries from out the void, and the terrible birds of prey were on him once more. Their number he could not gauge, but they attacked him with incredible ferocity, flying always at his face. Beaten and buffeted by their great wings, his garments torn to shreds and his body bleeding in a dozen places, Philip at last realised that the end had come. A muffled groan from his unconscious burden told that she, too, had not escaped unscathed.

"Good God!" breathed Philip, hoarsely. "Her eyes!"

Too exhausted to run further, and weak from loss of blood, he placed the girl on the ground, face downwards, and stood over her for his last fight. He knew that there were but two cartridges between him and death—death by inches. This, then, was to be the end of his wooing—this was how the Lord of the Eagles was paying his debt!

Digitized by Google

Soon his last two shots were fired, and still the eagles flew at him, screeching shrilly. He was now an unrecognisable mass of blood and wounds.

"God help me! This is the end," he gasped, as with his last remaining strength he struck at the head of a fiendish bird with the butt of his weapon.

Suddenly he became dimly conscious of a running figure carrying a huge torch.

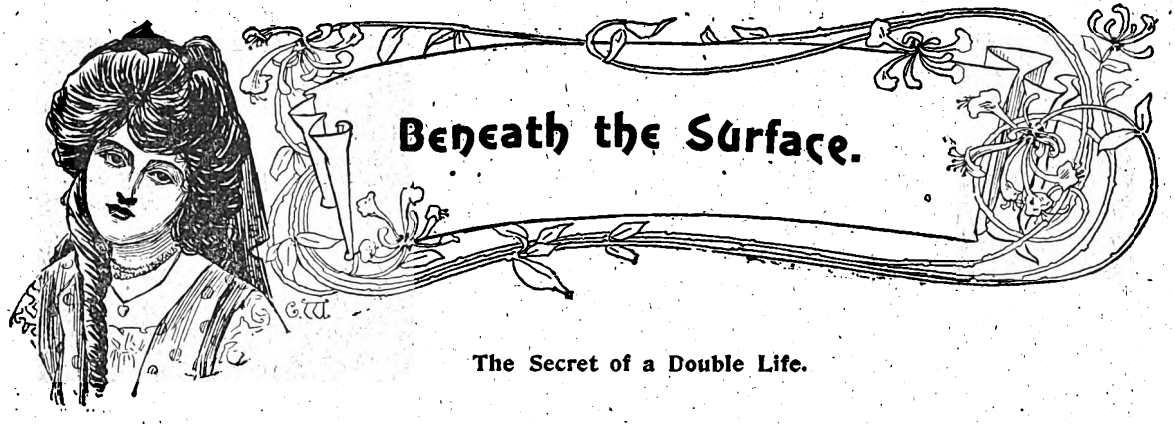
"Courage, señor," cried a well-known voice. "Courage. I am coming to you."

In a few seconds the courageous Pepe had reached him, and was striking right and left with his blazing brand. What the revolver had failed to do, the fire accomplished, for the eagles, affrighted at the blaze and heat, drew off sullenly. Pepe presently dragged his master and the girl into a sort of cave under some boulders. With his torch he lit a huge fire of moss and twigs, and then busied himself in tying up Drake's wounds. Juanita, with the exception of a bite in the arm, appeared to have escaped unhurt.

Next morning Pepe left the cave early, and soon returned with a procession of excited villagers carrying litters. Both Philip and Juanita were quite unconscious, and Philip's wounds caused horror-stricken comments among the peasants. Fortunately, however, his eyes had escaped injury. Under the care of the padre and a doctor, fetched from the nearest town, both gradually recovered, though for long hours Philip raved in a terrible delirium, brought on by his fearful struggle on the mountain-side.

At last, however, the day came when both were quite recovered, and then they were duly married by the old padre. Subsequently he broke to them a piece of news.

"Don Andrea is dead," he said gravely. "He died by his own hands. A large party of villagers went up to the Castle on the Rock to arrest him, as they said, for his unspeakable crime. They found him sitting dead in his study in the watch-tower." He crossed himself devoutedly. "May God rest his soul," he said. "The Lord of the Eagles will trouble you no more."



Beneath the Surface.

The Secret of a Double Life.

"What is this, Nora!—five hundred pounds? Nonsense! Tell Rose from me, that, as her guardian, I should not think of withdrawing so large a sum; just that she may squander it upon some calculating pauper or another!"

"But, Richard! why? It is a large amount, I know; but I think that you may trust Rose; while she seems to have an idea that she has a right to it; and that the one month only now remaining before she becomes legally entitled to the full possession of her fortunes is not worth reckoning with as a reason for not granting her request."

"Woman's logic!"

"Then I am to say to her that you refuse to do as she asks?"

"Yes. Stay, though!" (and he hurriedly turned, and sat down to his desk, drew a cheque-book from a drawer, and proceeded rapidly to fill in a form)—"There, give her that! (holding out the cheque) it's for fifty pounds, and drawn upon my own private account. When I hand over my responsibilities to this very liberal young lady's representatives, I want the trust funds to look as well as possible."

"Of course," said Nora Halpin, a trifle bewilderingly; for what knew she of ambidextrous money-juggling? "but you will have in the end to repay yourself out of the trust fund, won't you?"

"Well—no; this is a present of my own, and Rose is at liberty to make ducks and drakes of it, if she chooses."

"It is very good of you, Richard, to give her such a handsome present, but I am sadly afraid that she will be disappointed at the denial of her request."

"Woman's logic again! But she will thank me in a month's time for that same five hundred pounds."

The two speakers, Nora and Richard Halpin, were brother and sister. Living in a semi-fashionable West-end neighbourhood, they, with the addition of Richard Halpin's ward, Rose Ashenden, were, to all appearance, a fairly happy household.

Some five years before, the orphan daughter of Tedworth Ashenden, gold prospector, New York company-promoter, and of a hundred other equally indefinite occupations, came to England, consigned to the wardship of Richard Halpin, Ashenden's early chum in more than one expedition in the "Rookies."

With the girl came also a matter of £30,000; of which sum, till the heiress should attain her majority, Dick Halpin was appointed absolutely sole trustee.

The nature of the latter's calling, or business, was a mystery, not only to the world in general, but to those domestically connected with him. "Something in the City" might have fitted him, for every other day at least he paid it a visit of a few hours in the afternoon. On fine mornings, and occasionally at other times, he might be met with in Bond Street, or other "society" haunt.

But after the conclusion of the eight o'clock dinner, Richard Halpin's movements were known to no man. He left the house in Barchester Gardens, Earl's Court, in evening dress under a long ulster, and on foot, returning in precisely the same manner at an early hour the next morning. He was supposed to be at his club, he himself endorsing the supposition by an occasional reference to the fact.

There was never any money stint in the Barchester Gardens' establishment, everything being ordered on the most liberal scale. But there was no social entertaining; and for the very good reason that the master of the house was never at home to receive guests. Nora and Rose had one or two girl intimates, old schoolmates of the former's, but beyond that it was a peculiarly isolated one, so far as "society" was concerned.

Digitized by Google

The Halpins' father had been a rich man, and, at his death, left a good provision for his daughter, and a not insignificant fortune to his son. And yet, altogether unknown to his sister, Richard Halpin was soon at his wit's end for ready money. Up to that time, he was free living, certainly, but not secretive.

Then, less than a year after his father's death, Rose Ashenden became a member of his household, and there was a curious launching out in every direction. A larger house was taken, an extra carriage added, and a greater display made generally.

It was about a year before his ward's twenty-first birthday that he became conscious of a feeling for her, different from anything which he had hitherto experienced.

Four years had worked wonders, and the sixteen-year-old child had developed into the lovely woman.

She was in direct contrast to Nora Halpin, being tall and singularly dignified in carriage and manner. Nora, on the other hand, was petite, and brimful of Puck-like merriment.

It was not surprising, therefore, that the somewhat blasé man of thirty-five should be attracted by so charmingly innocent a daughter of mother nature, or that the guardian should give place to the lover.

But, somehow, he seemed fearful of making any advance, and it was not until Nora one day taxed him with it, that he acknowledged his passionate soul-mastering love for his beautiful ward.

The revelation was a matter not only of surprise but of distressful concern to Nora.

"Richard," she said, "apart from the fact that Rose is far too young as a wife for you, there is a reason why it cannot be; a reason which, if you persist, will assuredly mean trouble both for you and—for her."

"Reason! what reason?" he cried angrily. "I know of none; and if you are, as you seem to be, better informed, why have you not told me? Why have you kept me in the dark?"

"I am very sorry," she began.

"That is as it may be," he retorted, with a shrug; "this reason—what is it?"

"Well, I fear—I mean I am sure, that—that—there is—someone else."

"Someone else! But she sees nobody! It's impossible!"

"I am afraid not, Richard."

"Who is it? Tell me that—who is it?"

"You know that young fellow—Mr. Doyle, I think his name is—who comes every month from Varr's Bank—I suppose on Rose's business?"

"A two-penny halfpenny bank clerk!"

"He is really very nice, Richard!"

"Oh, I see! You are one of the conspirators, then?"

"I don't know what you mean," she replied. "There is no occasion for you to be rude."

"Why did not you tell me of this before?"

"I am beginning to regret that I have told you now."

"That is no answer to my question!" he blazed out. "Send Rose to me!"

"Certainly not! She is in the drawing-room, and if you wish to see her, you had best ask her for an interview—yourself!"

The offended little lady then swept out of her brother's "den," and left him to his devices.

The interview which followed between guardian and ward was stormy, but in every way definite.

"Young Doyle," he said coarsely, "wants your money! At least that cannot be said of me."

"Such an insinuation!" she indignantly replied, "is a cowardly slander, Mr. Halpin! And even had I not already made up my mind to reject unequivocally your somewhat condescending offer to marry me, that which you have just said of an infinitely better man than yourself, behind his back, would most certainly incline me to come to the same resolution."

"Well, I shall forbid Sidney Doyle the house, giving the bank people to understand that the appointment of another agent is, from my point of view, desirable. I prohibit any communication whatsoever between you. Remember! until you are finally freed from my control, my word is law!"

"How very courteous!" she, with a peculiar smile, remarked in reply. Then, rising from her chair, she moved towards the door. Reaching it, she turned quickly, and faced him.

"Could I but follow my own inclinations," she said, with fine scorn, "I would leave your house on the instant. But you have the law on your side. However, I think we understand each other," she added, meaningly. "You cannot prevent my loving Sidney Doyle or he me; and I tell you that his little finger is, in my esteem, worth more—a hundred times more!—than are you—body and soul!"

"Understand each other!" he said to himself after she was gone. "What can she mean? She knows nothing! She can know nothing!"

Others, beside Richard Halpin, live in the delusive and unhealthy atmosphere of a "Fool's Paradise." Richard Halpin continued so to live, until the day when his sister Nora first began to suspect his honesty and truth; the day of his refusal to Rose of the five hundred pounds she had asked him for from the trust funds.

On the evening of that day, upon the stroke of ten, a card was brought to his "den."

He was ready dressed to go out; was in the act of lighting a cigar.

"Gentleman to see you, sir."

"Gentleman to see me, at this time of night!" he said, picking up the pasteboard from the extended salver. "Mr. Sidney Doyle! I am not at home, Clarkson!"

"Pardon me, Mr. Halpin," said a tall, fair young fellow, who stood in the doorway, "but my business is imperative. I must see you!"

"Sir! is this your house!—or is it mine?"

"Yes, I know that my visit is ill-timed probably, and that I am, perhaps, taking too much upon myself, but I deemed it fair to give you the opportunity of making an explanation."

"An explanation!—to you?"

"To me."

"May I ask," said Richard Halpin icily, "the nature of the explanation?"

"I desire to put a question to you."

"And that is——"

"I want you to tell me, Mr. Halpin, here and now, what has become of the £30,000 invested in Three per Cents, and standing in your name as trustee for Rose Ashenden in the books of the Bank of England, the dividend warrants of which have been held by Varr's Bank as security for a drawing account of the Ashenden Trust."

Richard Halpin's face paled ever so little, though his heart stood still, as he said, somewhat mechanically the other thought, "I do not, in the first place, recognise your right to put such a question to me; but if on this day month you can show me to my satisfaction that such a right is yours, I will do my best to satisfy you—then——"

"It might have been better for you, perhaps, to have answered me now. As to my right, Miss Ashenden will, I believe, be willing to make that point perfectly clear—should you care to ask her."

Digitized by Google

"I have an appointment, sir, and, therefore, have no time to waste in idle talk."

"So be it, then; I will ask you this question again on this day month. Good evening."

"You young fool!" cried Halpin, as the door shut behind his visitor. "To-night you would have triumphed had you insisted upon the truth. On this day month it will be my turn, for either the trust fund will be found intact, or Dick Halpin will have returned again to the golden fastnesses of the dear old 'Rockies!'"

He relit his cigar, which had gone out during his interview with Sidney Doyle, buttoned his big coat, pulled down his crush hat well over his eyes, passed through the front door, and so into the street; his face turned eastwards.

When a dozen yards away from the house, a man dresed in grey tweed slipped out of the shadow of the next doorway, and followed at a prudent distance stealthily in Halpin's wake.

It was Sidney Doyle, Rose's lover.

* * * * * *

Haul-Bowline Alley is a blind court, or narrow yard, within a stone's throw of Limehouse Church.

It is dirty, fœtid of odour, and contains just ten houses—or, rather, shanties—five on either side.

These dwellings all belonged to one man, whom no one ever saw, the rent collection being in the hands of a local agent. The landlord lived in the West-end, and apparently concerned himself but little with the affairs of his East-end property.

One curious fact in connection with the place was that everyone of its sixty or seventy inhabitants was Chinese. It was, indeed, an Oriental colony.

The five houses on the left hand as you entered, were practically knocked into one, and run as one establishment.

Opium-den, low lodging-house, gambling hell, and what not, it was peculiar in this, that to it, at all hours through the night, until daybreak, there came men of all nationalities; most of them decently, some of them well dressed, who stayed—any time from a quarter to half an hour—in private talk with the master of the house.

The latter was a Chinaman, who, however, was never seen about the place until an hour before midnight.

Chi-Lung was a mystery, even among his compatriots. His business, when on the premises, was to regulate the "fantan" and "poker" tables in the gambling department, and to receive and deal with the night visitors already mentioned.

Sometimes it happened that the caller arrived in a cab, with a bulky cargo. In such a case, the stranger was evidently expected, as one or two low-class Chinamen were invariably in waiting under the entrance archway. These rapidly removed the contents of the cab into the last house on the left of the alley, in which was situated Chi-Lung's sanctum. The new-comer then followed quickly, and the cabman, always paid by one of the Chinamen, drove swiftly away.

When Richard Halpin, on the night of his interview with young Sidney Doyle, left Barchester Gardens, Earl's Court, his course was steadily eastwards.

Along the Old Brompton Road, through Knightsbridge, and past Hyde Park Corner, up Piccadilly. Long Acre reached, he turned into a certain little public-house at the corner of a court, and called for a whisky and soda.

This disposed of, he made a sign to the barman, who, nodding in reply, came through into the bar, and unlocked a door, which led up to the first floor.

Clicking the door behind him, Halpin mounted the stairs, at the top of which was a small bedroom, the door open.

The gas was lit, while on the bed were carefully laid out what looked like a fancy-dress ball costume.

It was a Chinaman's dress, the outer sleeveless jacket being of fine black silk.

Closing the door, and then looking at his watch, Halpin proceeded to rapidly divest himself of his dress clothes, shoes, and shirt.

In less than seven minutes he had donned the Celestial garb, and, when he had deftly and quickly stained his face, neck and hands, put on a scalp wig, with a pigtail attached, that, fitted to perfection, he stood confessed the veriest Chinaman that ever walked the streets of Peking.

When, a minute later, he left the room, the immaculate European clothes had taken the place of the Celestial on the bed.

Going past the door which led into the bar, and through which he had entered, the passage, the pseudo-Celestial, producing a key, opened a door at the end of the latter, and passed into the court.

Cautiously looking about him, he turned to the left, and out again into Long Acre.

All the way from Barchester Gardens had Sidney Doyle followed in the wake of his quarry.

He had distinctly seen Halpin enter the "saloon" entrance of the public-house, and there his quest ended. About a quarter of an hour after he saw a Chinaman in native garb issue from the court into Long Acre, but as to sign of Richard Halpin there was none.

Whether it were intuition or inspiration it is hard to say, but something impelled him to take up the trail of the Celestial.

Right along Holborn he followed him, over the Viaduct, up Newgate Street, Cheapside, Leadenhall Street, Whitechapel, Commercial Road, East India Dock Road, until Limehouse was reached.

It was a long and weary walk for even a strong young fellow like Sidney Doyle, but he was fairly athletic, and held on bravely.

As for the Chinaman, he plodded along in steady fashion, quite oblivious, however, of Nemesis in his rear.

It was not until the entrance to Haul-Bowline Alley came in sight that Doyle, who, up to that moment, could not have located his man, made a discovery.

It suddenly flashed upon him that the walk of the man in front of him was familiar. Where had he seen it?

Then it came to him! It was the peculiar wide-legged stride of Richard Halpin!

Putting on steam he tried to come up with the other; but just as he came within hailing distance, Halpin turned smartly into the alley and vanished.

Doyle stopped, and looked down the wretched place, but the place was silent as the grave.

He ventured a few steps into the alley, but was obliged to confess to defeat, and to turn back.

While hesitating as to what he should do, a four-wheeler drove up, out of which got a sprucely-dressed man, carrying a large "Gladstone."

The usual thing was about to happen, the two Chinamen issuing out of the archway shadows to proffer help if needful. In this instance it was not, one of them merely paying and dismissing the driver.

But the unexpected followed close upon the heels of the usual.

No sooner did the man with the handbag make to pass under the archway, than a cloud of policemen seemed to rise out of the ground.

Two of them seized the new-comer, easing him of his "Gladstone," while two others laid hands upon Sidney Doyle.

It did not take long for the latter to explain his position, the superintendent in charge of the raid consenting to accept the young bank clerk's assistance, in view of Doyle's knowledge on certain matters connected with the case.

"You see, sir," the policeman explained, "there was a big robbery of diamonds down in the country last week; nearly seventy thousand pounds worth; belonging to the Countess of Rugby.

Digitized by Google

"We lost sight of the thieves altogether till this morning, when one of them split, and told us that this joker we've just nabbed would come here to-night with the stuff on him, to do a deal with Chi-Lung."

"You seem to doubt that this Chinese 'fence' is really Richard Halpin, who is more than suspected of breach of trust in connection with the Ashenden Trust Fund?"

"Well, sir, I do; because I've seen this Chi-Lung several times, and am prepared to swear almost as to his nationality."

"A very little time will show," said Doyle, "and then I, for one, shall be intensely surprised, should my surmises turn out to be incorrect."

The police raid on the Limehouse den was abundantly detailed in the newspapers of the next day, and most people must be fairly familiar with the particulars.

The most important detail, however, was the escape of Chi-Lung, otherwise Richard Halpin.

With the daring natural to him, he contrived to reach Barchester Gardens before the police arrived there.

Nora was, of course, asleep, and started with fright to see her brother standing by her bedside.

"Have you any ready money?" he said. "I am summoned unexpectedly to Paris, and must catch the earliest train to Newhaven."

"Richard! you look ill! What is the matter?"

"Never mind what is the matter! It is money I want, as much as you have by you."

"I have a hundred pounds of my own in my desk."

"Give me the key!"

"Here it is! But do tell me what it all means?"

"You will know soon enough. Meanwhile answer no questions. Good-bye!"

A rush into Nora's sitting-room, a seizing of the notes; and leaving the key in the desk, Halpin, who had changed his clothes and disguise at the little public-house in Long Acre, threw a big coat over his arm, and strolled out at the door into the street.

In Earl's Court Road he hailed a crawling hansom, directing the driver to make good speed for London Bridge Station.

He chose this terminus instead of Victoria or Addison Road, cunningly calculating that his chances would be better in the city.

Within half an hour of his leaving the house, the police arrived.

The two girls were both terror stricken, and distressed beyond measure.

Woman's sympathies are always easy to invoke on behalf of even the very worst, who are in danger of the law's grip. Nora, as the defaulting trustee's sister, was, of course, more keenly grieved and overcome. Rose Ashenden, who as yet was ignorant of her loss of heritage, feeling only that general pity, the pity for the hunted, howsoever criminal.

With the police came Sidney Doyle, who did all he might do for the girls' comfort and protection.

He felt bound to confide to Nora the truth of the disappearance of the trust funds, and she, though bitterly conscious of the shame and disgrace which must inevitably fall upon herself, had to confess that the news did not come to her altogether as a surprise. Though certain of nothing, she had suspected for long that something was amiss.

Leaving them to their rest, Sidney Doyle returned to Barchester Gardens the next morning, and at an interview with the two, suggested and carried his point that they should avail themselves, for the present at least, of his sister's hospitality.

Early in the day, the move was effected, and though the young fellow's income is by no means colossal of proportion, still the probabilities are decidedly in favour of an early wedding with Nora as bridesmaid.

Not that the latter is unmindful of the brother who left her, with means of her own certainly, but practically alone in the world.

On investigation it transpired that every penny of the Ashenden Trust money had been transferred to his own account, and that at the time of the exposé, it had absolutely melted away. Where it went to has never yet been traced.

Halpin had, it seemed, purchased the Haul-Bowline Alley property soon after he commenced to tamper with the Fund, with the idea—which he eventually and fully carried out—of making it the basis and centre of a vast criminal undertaking.

A marvellous actor, he succeeded for a period of nearly three years to deceive native-born Chinamen with his assumption of the role of Chi-Lung.

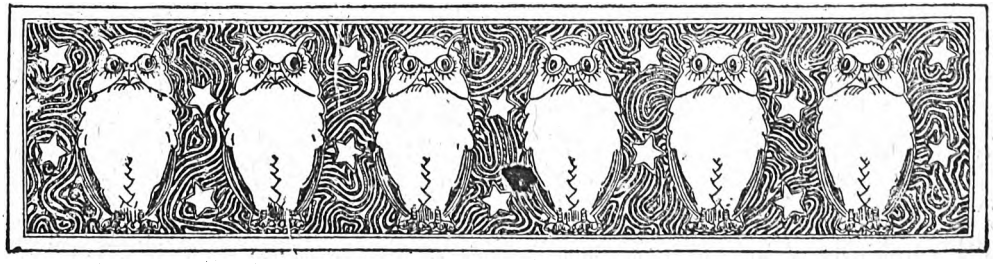
Always using pigeon English of the purest variety and accent, he, with a long experience in the North-West provinces of the Chinese Empire deluded the very elect.

He had hoped to recoup some heavy losses by the buying of the Rugby diamonds, but failed, as we have seen, to carry out the transaction.

What has become of him no man can tell. Probably he is in some far-away Western or North-Western State, where gold may be had for the delving, but where life is held in but very little esteem.

That his end will be peace is unlikely; while should he seek to lead the double life in a place where men do not readily brook the imposture which aims at their own throats, it is on the cards that he will meet the fate of his sometime chum and partner, Tedworth Ashenden, who, a rich man, and on the eve of enjoying his wealth, met his death in a Western "saloon" at the hands of the bully of the community.

Ralph Enderby.



Digitized by Google

The "Pass-It-Along" Scheme.

FIRST AWARD, £10. SECOND AWARD, £5. THIRD AWARD, £2.

SIX AWARDS OF 10/- EACH.

(A)

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE COMPETITOR WHO SENDS THIS COPY.

When you have carefully read these rules, put an ink line round the instructions in the next column, write your name and address in the space at the foot of this page*, and in the next column; wrap up this copy of SHORT STORIES in a wrapper, fix a penny stamp on it, and post it to a friend of yours whom you think will help you. Then wait until the copy is returned to you.

All you need do is to send out your copy or copies of SHORT STORIES and wait until it comes back to you with the names filled in.

The first prize will be awarded to the person whose copies of SHORT STORIES contain the greatest number of names of people to whom the copies have been sent, provided that the wrappers which carried the copies of SHORT STORIES through the post to each person accompanies the list.

It is not necessary for you to know the people whose names you will find on your list when your copy comes back; they will, of course, be the friends of your friends.

There is no absolute necessity to write a letter to your friend explaining the scheme, but if you did so it would carry more weight.

HOW TO SEND IN.

Keep the wrappers as they are sent to you, and when this copy comes back send all the wrappers together with this copy to the Editor of "Short Stories," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., in an envelope marked "PASS-IT-ALONG," to arrive not later than Thursday, July 24th.

NOTE.—Competitors may send out at the same time any number of copies of this issue.

The Editor's decision is final, and readers may enter only on this understanding.

(B)

INSTRUCTIONS TO THOSE WHO RECEIVE THIS COPY BY POST.

This copy of SHORT STORIES has been sent to you by a friend who is interested in this competition and who wants to win one of the prizes offered. When you have read this announcement write your name down in the space provided, and then forward this copy at once in a penny wrapper to a friend of yours. If you have no friend to whom you can send it, return the copy of the paper, together with the wrapper in which you received it, to the original sender.

If the original sender of this paper (whose name and address is written at the foot of this page) wins the first prize, you will receive £1; if second prize, you will get 10s. The paper must be returned to the original sender on or before Saturday, July 19th.

You must at once return the wrapper in which this copy reaches you to _____

_____

(Competitor must insert here his or her name and address.)

IMPORTANT.

Fill in your name at once and post it on the day this is received. If you keep it longer it will lessen the chance of the original sender securing the first prize, as the paper will not be able to get into so many hands within the time limit.

If you receive this copy on Saturday, July 19th, fill up your name and post it at once to the sender, whose name appears at the foot of this page.

Why Not Try Yourself?

If you want to enter for this competition yourself, and win one of the prizes get a copy of SHORT STORIES from your newsagent at once, and follow the instructions marked "A."

This offer will be repeated in SHORT STORIES for July 26th (the next number but one), when another £20 will be offered in awards.

Those to whom this copy is sent sign here.

	NAME.	ADDRESS.
1.
2.
3.
4.
5.
6.
7.
8.
9.
10.
11.
12.

Those who sign here will get £1 each if this wins first award.

*Name and Address of Competitor.....

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.

Mrs. Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia: Her companion.

FRANKIE IS PRESENTED AT COURT.
PERCIVAL HOPE MAKES A DISCOVERY.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF NEW READERS.

CYNTHIA tells in the opening chapter of her arrival at her cousin's in the capacity of companion, and of her discovery that Mrs. Norton is taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money are being lost and won. The climax is reached one night when Mary Vernon stakes her diamond ear-rings (a gift from Lord Kinross) and one of the onlookers finds them to be paste. Mary Vernon declares that they are exactly as given to her by Lord Kinross, whereupon Kinross breaks off the engagement. The diamonds subsequently appear as a gift from Fluffy to Mrs. Norton, set in a pair of hat-pins. A few weeks later the notorious Mrs. Norton, with Fluffy's help, succeeds in stealing a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew at the Café Regal, by substituting for the millionaire's pocket-book one exactly like it. Later on Cynthia discovers the original pocket-book, empty of course, in one of her boxes. Not knowing what to do, she confides in Fluffy, who is very kind, but makes her promise to say nothing at all to anyone else on the subject. He takes charge of the duplicate pocket-book. Mrs. Norton now moves into her new house in Font Street, and it is while here that Sir John Strickland, a poor baronet, proposes to her. She refuses, but hints to him that if he will consent to allow his name to appear on the directorate of certain companies he will be bound to make money, and then her answer might be different. Mrs. Norton is now to be presented at Court by her friend, Lady Gaveston.

LADY GAVESTON arrived late in the evening of a very rainy day. She was a tall and rather bony person, with a large head, and dressed in a painfully uncompromising fashion, strong-minded from the crown of her deerstalker hat to the hem of her homespun skirt. She arrived in a four wheeler, and altercated fiercely as to the correct fare from St. Pancras. This last much to the scandal of Skinner the butler, Frankie's latest addition to our household. Having worsted the cabman, and abashed Skinner, milady retired in triumph to the house and received Frankie's welcome with toleration if not affability.

"Dear Lady Gaveston, it gives me such pleasure to have you," said my cousin sweetly.

"Thank you," returned the elder lady, "you've a very impudent fellow for a servant, and there's a deal too much flummery about your rooms, draperies I suppose you call 'em—for health, still I've no doubt you are well intentioned." She smiled grimly at Frances, who, for the moment was at a loss for reply.

"She's rather dreadful," murmured she, when Lady Gaveston had departed to her room, "and very hideous, still no one can deny she's unimpeachably respectable," and my cousin went into peals of laughter.

It soon became plain that the relations between Frankie and Lady Gaveston were of a strictly business character. No love was lost between them, neither was there any waste of hate. Milady chaperoned my cousin unremittingly if severely, and received every courtesy and attention in return. The keen, shrewd Scotchwoman, puritan, with a dash of worldly wisdom, did not approve of my cousin, neither her house, nor the company she kept, but having undertaken—for a consideration—to ascertain things, those things her ladyship would carry through.

We were very busy those days at designing new costumes, and discussing the all important toilette for Frankie's presentation.

As a rule my cousin spent but little time in choosing her frocks, she knew exactly what suited her, and never hesitated as to style, colour, or cut. But over her Court gown she deliberated long and gravely. The result paid handsomely for her pains.

One afternoon, the day before the presentation, we were sitting in the drawing-room, Lady Gaveston, Lord Kinross and myself, when suddenly Frankie appeared in her court dress.

"I thought you'd like to see my frock, Cynthia," she spoke to me but looked towards Lord Kinross. "It's just come home."

Digitized by Google

She stood near the window, tall and slim and fair, the spring sunshine falling on the red gold of her hair, her soft white neck and arms glittering with jewels. Her gown was satin, of a deep shade of cream, falling softly from the waist and wonderfully embroidered with silver fleur-de-lis—a purple petalled iris peeping every here and there, or a faint-hued leaf of green. The bodice was veiled with lace, kept in place by tiny butterflies of emerald and amethyst with golden wings. The train also of satin lay in rich folds a yard or so upon the floor, showing a glimpse of the lining of mauve silk with dainty frills of pale green chiffon. A fine necklet of gold and emeralds was clasped about her throat; on her hair were diamonds.

I think we all admired her, though each showed their admiration in such different ways. Lady Gaveston stared hard, and gave a little sniff; Lord Kinross smiled in the leisurely approving fashion that most men adopt at the sight of a handsome woman well gowned, while I uttered an exclamation of delight.

"Oh, Frankie, you are perfect. Isn't she, Lord Kinross?"

"Quite," he said softly, "quite," then bending towards her, half smiling. "Shall I send you round the family jewels? You said you'd like to wear them at your presentation."

Frankie laughed and shook her head. "I wouldn't run such a risk for all the world. Suppose I lost them?"

"That wouldn't matter, they are insured."

"All the same I should feel responsible."

"The fact is you don't like to appear in borrowed plumes—or rather jewels."

"Perhaps."

"Well there are other diamonds beside the Kinross heirlooms—emeralds don't suit that gown, Mrs. Norton."

"I don't agree with you."

"At all events that necklet isn't becoming, the style is too severe, not like you a bit. It reminds me of Sir John—had he anything to do with its selection?"

"You are inquisitive, Lord Kinross."

"Interested merely, Mrs. Norton. Sir John's taste is too simple, I understand what suits you much better. I am convinced you should wear diamonds."

"I am not sure——" she began.

He interrupted her. "Suspend your judgment till to-morrow."

She glanced at him interrogatively, but he merely bowed and smilingly took his leave.

Sir John did not call on us that day, he was very busy company promoting and spent nearly all his time in the City.

His work seemed to agree with him however, he looked younger every time he came.

"I'm sorry Sir John can't see you, Frankie," I said, "you look so very nice."

"Oh, he's sure to look in to-morrow before we start. He'll find a spare half hour for that. Eh, Lady Gaveston?"

But the Baronet's widow made no reply save for a slight sniff.

The next day was bright and sunny, and my cousin in high spirits and good humour; Lady Gaveston in her court gown of stiff grey silk trimmed with Irish point, if not prepossessing, was undeniably good style, Frankie had never looked better in her life.

Sir John called early in the morning, with an exquisite bouquet of orchids, pale mauve shaded to a deep purple, with trails of asparagus fern. Just after his arrival there came a special messenger with a small parcel addressed to Frankie in Lord Kinross' writing. I took up the parcel and the bouquet to my cousin's room.

"Sir John's downstairs Frankie, he's brought these orchids—aren't they exquisite?" and I handed her the flowers.

"Yes—what's this packet?"

"A messenger just brought it from Lord Kinross."

For a moment Frankie hesitated, colour flushed her cheeks and she fingered at the string.

"Sir John's waiting, Frankie," I urged quietly.

"I know — but I must see what's inside." She opened the packet as she spoke. It contained a jeweller's box of red morocco leather; with an exclamation she pressed the spring, against the satin lining lay a necklace, shining and glittering in the sun, a necklace of diamonds.

"How beautiful, how beautiful! She took the necklace in her hands holding it against her throat, against the fine gold chain, simple and severe, that Kinross had found fault with. Watching her face reflected in the glass, I saw her expression slowly change. She seemed to grow hard and cold before my eyes, hard as her diamonds.

With a sudden gesture Frankie unclasped the chain and laid it on the table, then with a curious uncertainty she took up the diamonds.

I could not bear that she should wear them, I could not bear that she should fling that other gift, Sir John's, so contemptuously aside.

Downstairs he was waiting, watching for her with impatient, eager eyes.

Would she go to him wearing another man's jewels?

"Sir John's waiting, Frankie," I said once more, and wondering at my own audacity, I placed the diamond necklace in the box, and snapped the spring.

Frankie watched me with a funny little smile, then with a shrug turned away.

"Silly child," she said. "You're as sentimental as Sir John himself. No, I won't put on his emeralds, if I can't wear what I like, I'll have nothing." She stood for a moment by the door, then called me to her quickly.

"Bring the necklace down, Cynthia, the diamonds I mean. Sir John won't stay long, and——"

"You're going to wear it after all?" I cried.

"Of course, did you suppose it was only to be looked at?"

She ran quickly down the stairs, paused for a second outside the room where he was waiting, then entered—I doubt not with the smile he knew and loved so well.

Their interview was short. Lady Gaveston, the soul of punctuality was impatient, and but a few minutes elapsed before I was called down.

"Yes he's gone, give them to me." Turning, she clasped the jewels about her throat, careless of Lady Gaveston's gravely disapproving air.

I watched her down the steps into the carriage—on her way to Court.

I was puzzled for something to do for the next few hours. It was too fine to sit at home, and yet I had nowhere particular to go; it is so dull to walk by one's self, this perhaps accounted for the pleasure I felt at sight of Fluffy.

"Suppose we go and have a look at the débutantes, Miss Cynthia. The carriages stand for hours along the Buckingham Palace Road and I should like to see your cousin."

"What a splendid idea. I'll get ready now and come with you. I was just longing to go out."

Fluffy suggested a hansom to Victoria, but it was too fine a day to waste, so we walked up Piccadilly and down Grosvenor Place to where the stream of carriages commenced. There were plenty of sightseers, besides us, young girls of the middle class eager to criticise their more fashionable sisters, to envy and admire their clothes; some there were of the very poor; women with babies in their arms, and children

Digitized by Google

"CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA."
New Series of Stories.

dragging at their skirts, flower sellers, hawking sweet violets, a British matron or so, and a plentiful sprinkling of street boys.

I cast an inquisitive glance at the inmates of most of the carriages, fair girls dressed in white, young married women blazing with jewels, stately dowagers with severe head dresses.

"Well, what do you think of the show, Miss Cynthia?"

"They all look nice, but none of them touch Frankie."

"No? Well I think you're right, there's your cousin, Miss Cynthia." He pointed out the carriage, but made no attempt to draw any closer. "By the by, she's wearing some fine diamonds?"

"Yes, Lord Kinross sent them," I answered unthinkingly, remembering too late that I was forbidden to speak of my cousin's affairs.

"Ah? Your cousin's lucky, Miss Cynthia."

"I think so. Is Lord Kinross very rich, Mr. Thomson?"

"He has about £20,000 a year."

"As much as that?" I sighed; poor Sir John, why had he only fifteen hundred?

"Do people get rich quickly in the City, Mr. Thomson?"

"Some do, Miss Cynthia, smart men make their pile as quickly there as anywhere else."

"Could a smart man make as much as £20,000 a year?"

"He might make more."

"Really? I am glad of that." He smiled at my enthusiasm, but I did not mind, I felt happy to think that after all Sir John might not have to wait so very long to marry Frances.

A great many people came to Pont Street that afternoon after Frankie returned. Some of Lady Gaveston's friends dropped in, Lord Kinross turned up with two or three men, and Mrs. Curtis Blount brought the man in glasses. The drawing-room seemed quite full, everyone was chatting and laughing, congratulating Frankie on her success and admiring her gown.

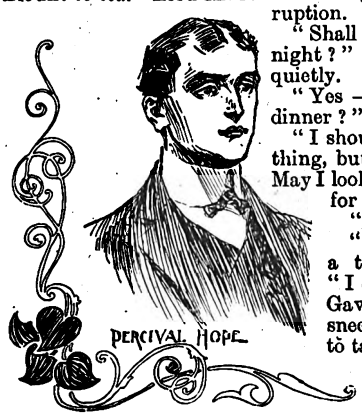
She had it seemed made a sensation, and it was reported that a certain royal personage had signified his admiration in a marked manner.

"You've made a tremendous hit, my dear," said Mrs. Curtis Blount. "Lady Chanleigh declared there was no one there to hold a candle to you—or your diamonds." There was a note of malice in the last remark that did not escape my cousin.

"It's nice of you to admire me, Vi dear," she answered sweetly.

"Did you see Mary Vernon?" continued Vi in a loud tone of voice, "I am told she was there—in white, you know, all virgin innocence and pearls, I wonder she chose pearls, paste's more in her line—eh Frankie?"

Frankie, however, closed the conversation by pressing Mrs. Blount to tea. Lord Kinross seemed grateful for the interruption.



"Shall you be at home to-night?" he asked my cousin quietly.

"Yes — won't you stay to dinner?"

"I should like to above everything, but I can't manage it. May I look in about nine, in time for coffee?"

"We shall be delighted."

"We?" he repeated in a tone of dissatisfaction. "I don't want to see Lady Gaveston, or," he gave a sneer, "Sir John. I want to talk to you, shall you be alone?"

Frankie flushed, hesitated—the opportunity for reply was lost, Fluffy quietly but firmly demanded tea.

"Cynthia, why don't you look after people," said my cousin sharply.

"I offered Mr. Thomson tea some time ago," I answered, "but he wouldn't have it."

"A thousand pardons for troubling you, Mrs. Norton, but you always remember how I like my tea; Miss Cynthia forgets."

Fluffy smiled serenely and helped himself to sugar.

For the remainder of the afternoon he kept quite close to Frankie, and somehow prevented Lord Kinross from further confidential conversation with her, though his Lordship did his best.

Opposition made him but the more determined. He waited until nearly everyone had gone; then, turning his back to Fluffy, approached my cousin.

"I may hope to see you, then, to-night?" he asked.

Over his shoulder Fluffy telegraphed a most emphatic "No," but Frankie frowned at the signal.

"No," reiterated Fluffy, with eyes and hands and head.

My cousin smiled. "I shall expect you," she said sweetly, "about nine."

I had occasion to fetch something from the drawing-room, about half an hour later. Fluffy and Frances were still talking.

"You'll take your own way, of that I am aware," he was saying as I entered, "but remember, I've warned you."

"What is your reason?" she retorted. "Why should I not see him to-night? 'Tis your insane jealousy, nothing else."

Fluffy laughed. "I rather think I'm past that sort of thing," he said quietly.

"What other explanation can there be?"

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Explanations are things I carefully avoid," he said. "I merely give advice, or, rather, offer it."

"You must be more explicit."

"Pardon me, there is no compulsion."

"But——" she paused, silenced by what she read on his face.

"You prefer not to take my advice?" he said. "Very well, it is your affair. I shall, however, look in some time after nine. You may be glad of me."

He spoke quite softly, amiably even, but Frankie, with heightened colour, swept from the room, without a backward look. I saw her no more till after dinner; she was tired, and had some food sent to her room.

No wonder, I thought, if she were worn out, considering what an eventful day she had passed through. To have been presented at Court, to have achieved so marked a success—her gown would be reproduced in all the fashionable papers, and her diamonds were mentioned in the Queen—these things, if exhilarating, were fatiguing. Still, the day had been a triumph, and now, to crown her victory, behold Lord Kinross at her feet, praying for a private interview.

"Lord Kinross is here, Frankie, are you going to see him?"

"Yes, this minute. And, Cynthia, don't let anybody interrupt us."

I followed her downstairs feeling most unhappy. "Frankie," I said as we reached the hall. "Frankie——" then hesitated.

"Well, what is it?"

"You're not going——" I paused. "Sir John——" I stammered, but could get no further.

"Now look here, Cynthia," said my cousin sharply. "I'll have no more of this. It is no business of yours who I see or what I do. Hold your tongue, and don't dare to interfere with me, or back you go to Bruges," and brushing past me into the drawing-room, she smartly closed the door.

My cousin had been with Lord Kinross for about ten minutes when there was a sharp ring at the visitors' bell.

"Mrs. Norton can't see anyone, Skinner," I cautioned the butler, "she's particularly engaged."

"Very well, miss," said Skinner with a grin, and passed on to the door.

Digitized by Google

Apparently his representations were unavailing, for the next minute a tall figure passed up the hall.

"Sorry," said a pleasant voice, "but I know Mrs. Norton's at home, and I'm bound to see her."

The intruder was just outside the drawing-room. I sprang forward to detain him.

"You can't go in!" I cried. "Why, Mr. Hope, is that you?"

"Yes, I've come to see your cousin on an affair of some urgency."

"I will tell her. Will you wait a minute?"

"Who is with Mrs. Norton?" he asked. "Oh, I know the question's an impertinence. Still—I must speak to her, Miss Hamilton."

"Lord Kinross is with my cousin," I answered stiffly. His manner puzzled me.

"Kinross here!" Percival Hope deliberately walked past me, and threw back the door.

My cousin was sitting in her favourite lounge chair by the fire, Lord Kinross bending over her. He was flushed, and his eyes were bright. There was a look of expectancy on Frankie's face turned up to him, her lips half parted as though ready to answer some anticipated question. It seemed to me that, had our entry been delayed ever so little longer, Lord Kinross would have asked that question. As it was the words were stayed.

"Cynthia!" cried my cousin in annoyance. And "Hope!" said Kinross. "What on earth do you want here?"

Percival paid no heed to him, but marched straight up to Frankie. "I'm a late visitor, Mrs. Norton," he said quietly, "but I am charged with a special message from a friend—Miss Mary Vernon."

"Yes? I did not know you were acquainted." Frankie's tone was insolent, her look contemptuous.

"I have known Miss Vernon for years," he said. Then "I should, perhaps, speak to you in private?" he asked slowly.

Frankie flushed, and for a moment seemed to hesitate; she glanced inquiringly at Kinross, but his lordship, leaning stolidly against the mantelpiece, stared into space.

"I have no secrets with you, Mr. Hope," she said at last; "unless Mary charged you to speak to me alone, I don't see the necessity."

"I was not thinking of Miss Vernon," Percival answered quickly. There was a suggestion of unpleasantness in his manner and in his voice.

"Pray deliver your message!" Frankie rose, something of defiance in her attitude.

"You have so great a friendship for Miss Vernon that she feels sure my news will give you pleasure."

"Anything that pleases Mary will gratify me."

Percival bowed.

"Miss Vernon desires that I should tell you this: she has discovered the thief who stole her diamonds. And——" he broke off short.

Frankie, ashen white, was clinging to Lord Kinross for support.

[Next week Percival Hope makes some startling revelations.]

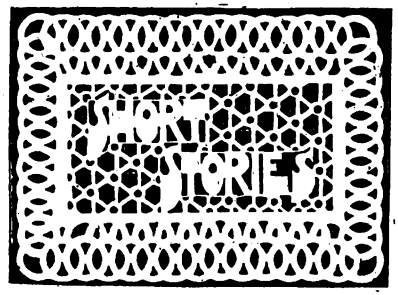
Your Editor Chats.

This week you will find the announcement of the new scheme which I mentioned last week, and I feel sure that, on reading through the conditions, you will agree with me that no simpler method of making a little money could be devised. All you have to do is to send this copy of Short Stories to some friend of yours, and then await developments. Your friend will, in turn, forward this copy, after signing it, to a friend of his or hers, so that you do not have to trouble any more about the copy until it is returned to you by the person who last signs his or her name.

If you care to drop a line to the friend to whom you send this copy, pointing out the reason why you forward it, there is no objection to your doing so, and it may certainly carry weight and increase the chances of your succeeding in winning the first prize. If you do write a letter don't forget to mention that, in the event of your winning the first prize, your friend will get a sovereign, and in the event of your winning the second prize, your friend will get ten shillings.

The scheme is open for a fortnight, so there is no time to lose. You must post this copy to-night. Don't procrastinate. If you don't do it now you will keep putting it off until it is too late.

The winning design.

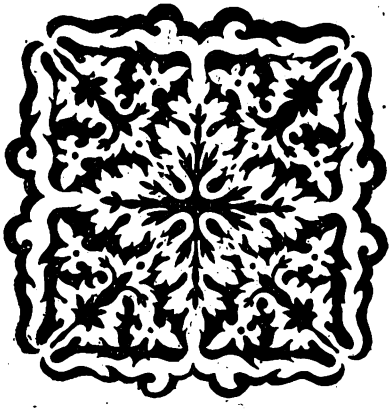


The second best design.

In the letters R, R, E, E, L, O, T, N, I, N, G, A, G, P, E, U, O, U, there are three English words, and for this week's competition I want you to tell me what they are. The reader who first sends in the correct words using up all the letters will receive a handsome gold-plated pencil-case, while the twenty readers whose attempts are next received will get consolation gifts of rolled gold hearts and dainty little charms.

Post-cards only, please, and these must reach us not later than the first post on Tuesday morning, July 15th, addressed to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C. Post-cards should be marked "Three Words."

I am now able to give you the result of the Design Competition, and to reproduce the three best efforts which I received. The first prize goes to E. Payne, 73 London Road, Clapton, N.E. The second and third awards are taken by Mr. Walter P. Neighbour, 55 Lanercost Road, Tulse Hill Park, S.W., and Mr. Fred Tole, 57 Hope Road, Sale, near Manchester, while the fourth and fifth prizes go to Mrs. J. Millership, 16 Blowman Street, Rugby, and to Mrs. Fisher, 63 Bold Street, Altrincham, Cheshire.



Winner of third prize.

Digitized by Google

Extremely Awkward.

"I HEAR there's trouble between you and Miss De Trop." "Yes; everything is declared off." "What was the matter?" "We went into my usual restaurant the other evening, and I ordered lemonade for two. The stupid waiter served it in such a manner that she got hold of my glass, which contained something more."

Her Reason.

"How did you come to marry him? Were you in love with him?" "Oh, no, but another girl was."

Love's Greatest Test.

SHE: "What makes you think he loves me so desperately?" Simplex: "Oh, a thousand things! He always looks pleased, for instance, when you sing and play."

A Poor Money-Maker.

SAMSO: "He is not rich, and yet he makes a great deal more money than he spends." Rodd: "How can that be?" Samso: "He works in the Mint."

Too Early to Tell.

FIRST FAIR ONE: "So Fred and Arthur both proposed to her? Which was the lucky man?" The Other Fair One: "They don't know yet. Fred married her."

Considerate.

LADY (to nursemaid): "Caroline, see you don't let the children sit on the wet grass, they might catch cold. If they are tired you can sit on it yourself and take them on your knee."

One Better.

CRŒSUS: "When I came here I didn't have a penny in my pocket." Midas: "When I came here I didn't even have a pocket." Crœsus (admiringly): "How?" Midas: "I was born here."

Her Real Object.

"SURELY, mademoiselle, you have not come here in search of health?" said a gentleman to a young French lady at Trouville last summer. "Not precisely. To tell the truth, I came here with the object of finding a son-in-law for my mother," was the candid reply.

A Dangerous Tie.

STRAWBER: "Old man, I'm going to take the fatal step to-night, and propose to Miss Quillcutter." Singerly: "Are you going to do it in that necktie?" Strawber: "Why, yes, of course." Singerly: "Then if she says 'Yes,' old fellow, you may be sure it is a case of true love."

How He Knew.

SHE: "That couple in front of us—do you think they are married?" He: "Yes, I am sure they are. They have been married a long time, too." "Why, how do you know?" "Have you noticed that when a pretty girl comes on the stage she always hands the opera glasses over to him?"

Fellow Feeling.

MR. AND MRS. FITTS were out driving. "I wonder," said she, "just what the poor horse's feelings are. It must be just horrid to be driven and dragged about without any idea as to where one is going, except as someone else directs." "I think I can appreciate his feelings," replied Mr. Fitts. "I imagine that he feels just about as I do when you take me out on a shopping trip."

Very Cutting.

ETHEL: "I confess that my sole object in life is to kill time." Maud: "So that he can't tell anyone your age, I suppose!"

He Did His Duty.

HE: "How chilly it is to-night. I could hug a stove, I feel so cold." She: "Is that so? Why, I'm so warm I feel just like a stove."

A Money Hunter.

"AND why, Jennie, did you tell Willie you wouldn't be his little wife?" "'Tause he didn't ast 'till he knowed I had a new sixpence."

To Keep the Balance.

HE: "Is my hat on straight?" She: "Yes. The idea! Why do you ask such a question?" He: "I'm going out in a canoe, and don't want to overbalance it."

The Streets were up.

"I GOT tired of riding home in crowded 'buses, so I bought a bicycle." "So you are going to ride home on that hereafter?" "Well, I don't know. I got it only yesterday, and last night I rode home in an ambulance."

But the Baron Didn't.

MISS BRENTON: "I'll marry you under one condition." Baron Hartz: "I vill agcept any condition, mein own." Miss Brenton: "Get Dick Westend's consent. I've been engaged to him for a week, and he might want to keep me."

You Never Know.

JEWELLER: "The inscription you wish engraved on the inside of this ring, I understand, is 'Marcellus to Irene'?" Young Man (with embarrassment): "Yes, that's right. But—er—don't cut the 'Irene' very deep, I may want to use it again."

As Much as He Could Expect.

HE: "What allowance do you think your father ought to make us when we are married?" She: "Well, I think if he makes allowance for your faults he will be doing as much as can be expected of him."

The Marks of Love.

MISS LUVLY: "Do you know Mr. Stevens by sight? I left the verandah after having a little flirtation with him just a moment ago, and now I can't find him anywhere." Miss Waspish: "I saw a man hurrying along with a great pink and white mark on his coat lapel. Perhaps that was he."

It Didn't Work.

YOUNG Mr. Muscle left at a very late hour, and the old man stood at the head of the stairs, chuckling in fiendish glee. Then there was an awful disturbance in the front garden, and the aforesaid old man laughed, "Ha, ha!" Then came the cry of "Help!" "What's wanted?" shouted the aged sinner. A clarion voice rang out, "I want somebody to help me bury a dog!"

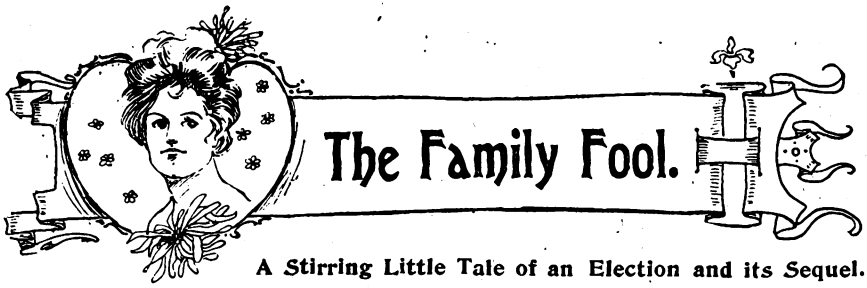
Catching an Expression.

PHOTOGRAPHER (to sitter): "I saw you at church last Sunday, Miss Smith." Sitter: "Oh, did you?" Photographer: "Yes, and also your friend, Miss Brown—if you could raise your chin a trifle, thanks—and what an atrocious-looking hat she had on." (After a pause.) "There, Miss Smith, it is over, and I think we have caught a very pleasant expression."

The Drawbacks.

TOM: "Yes, we swore to remain true to each other. Then I went away for a long time." Jack: "And she was always in your thoughts?" Tom: "I thought a good deal of her—I mean I thought of her a good deal." Jack: "And when you met you embraced her fondly, of course?" Tom: "I would probably have done so were it not for our surroundings." Jack: "The encounter was public?" Tom: "Yes, and both her husband and my wife were present."

Digitized by Google



The Family Fool.

A Stirring Little Tale of an Election and its Sequel.

"I've made up my mind! so there's an end of it!" said Mr. Alderman Gulliver, Drysalter and Magistrate, by virtue of his office, for the City of London, setting down his coffee-cup noisily, and his foot figuratively. "If he ever comes before me for any seditious act, I'll treat him as a rogue and a vagabond! I'll out-Brutus Brutus!"

"Papa, you are very hard on poor Dick! It is not as if he had done anything wrong."

"Not done anything wrong! What do you call his senseless throwing up of a fine position in my business—that he might do what? Mix himself up with a parcel of noisy East End Radicals, who never do any work, but swill beer, and spout treason, while their wives and children are starving! And you say he hasn't done anything wrong!"

"But, papa, he believes himself to be right in what he is doing."

"Does he? Then he's a bigger fool still! To think that my son—my only son!—with advantages greater than any nine out of ten, should deliberately set himself to thwart me in this way. It's a pity he has that five hundred a year of his mother's; without it, he'd be forced to come to me, and study my wishes."

"Well, papa, Gerald says that——"

"Ah! there's a young fellow of a thousand for you! Gerald Haynes would never have had my consent to marry you, had I not been convinced of his good and respectable principles."

Mr. Gulliver was so filled with admiration for his future son-in-law, for himself, and for the said good and respectable principles, common, as he fondly imagined, to both of them, that he quite failed to notice his daughter Mabel's badly-concealed expression of mirthful dissent.

"I was going to say," she observed soberly, "that Gerald has heard some news of Dick lately."

"Nothing to the young rascal's credit, I'll be bound!"

"Oh! I don't know! Falling in love isn't so very discreditable a proceeding; at least it has been more or less the fashion from Adam's time until now."

"Falling in love! Dick! Some factory girl or bargee's daughter, I suppose!"

"Well, I do not think our Dick would look quite so low as that; although I don't see why a factory girl or a bargee's daughter shouldn't be as good as—well—as Lady Marjorie Underwood, for instance."

This was probing the Alderman in a peculiarly sore spot.

"You're as bad as your brother, girl, every whit as bad. Lady Marjorie, indeed! The—the daughter of a hundred Earls! Poor the last two or three of 'em, I grant, but the blood was and is there—and it's the blood that's the thing! The blood that tells!"

"Oh! I am not belittling Lady Marjorie; I like her. She's an especial friend of mine."

"I had set my heart upon a match between her and Dick!" went on the Alderman. "Money and blood! But she wouldn't look at the young fool now!"

"Perhaps she wouldn't, for Marjorie has, I know, set her heart upon mating with a wise man."

"Sensible girl! sensible girl! But how is Gerald's canvassing getting on? It's a pity that he is putting up for an East End constituency, even though it be in the Conservative interest."

"I fancy that he has made an advance during this past week," replied Mabel. "But I hear his voice in the drawing-room. I knew he was coming here early on his way east; but not quite so early as this."

She tripped out and ran upstairs.

"Gerald," she said, with a roguish smile, and after the usual lover's greetings, "Papa has been going on terribly about poor Dick—it is a shame!"

"Yes it is—rather—but we mustn't forget, dear, that your father is deeply disappointed in Dick. I am sadly afraid, too, that, were he not my old college chum, the prince of good fellows, and—my Mab's brother, I should be sorely tempted to regard him in anything but a friendly light."

"Why?"

"Why? Why, because he is about the worst enemy—politically—that I have in Whitechapel, and because, unless the gods are very good to me, he is the one man in all the world who will be responsible for my defeat, should I lose the day."

"Are you sure of this, Gerald?"

"I am. He is moving Heaven and earth now, in the organisation of a monster meeting, to be held somewhere in the neighbourhood of Tower Hill. This is to be a decisive demonstration against my candidature, and I am only afraid that it will end in riot and trouble for Dick."

"Are you going eastwards now?" she asked.

"Yes, I am going to try and see Dick, in the hope that I may persuade him, if possible, to adopt a more moderate course."

"Will you take me with you?"

"Do you think, Mabel, that it would be advisable?"

"I have my reasons—strong reasons, for wishing to go."

"Come, then, by all means, dear! But you'll find it anything but a pleasure-jaunt."

Seeking her father again in the dining-room, Mabel made her petition for leave of absence.

"Gerald will take care of me—and—and I want to go! So you must let me!"

"Well, if you must—you must, I suppose. But tell Gerald to be sure and not to take you anywhere near the scene of action."

"Trust Gerald for that, papa! He is nearly as bad as you are in thinking me to be china—of the easily-breakable sort."

* * * * *

Everywhere in the immediate neighbourhood of the morrow's contest, there were outward and visible signs of what might then be expected. Not that there was much noise or disturbance, it was simply that printer's-ink, in every colour of the rainbow, flowed and overflowed from wall, and hoarding, and window.

But there was another, and, to the intelligent spectator, more portentous spirit abroad—a spirit that whispered in alleyways, and at street corners; a spirit that was wholly ignorant, and might, therefore, be wholly dangerou .

When Gerald Haynes and Mabel left the train at Aldgate, and faced the malodorous shamble-stores of "Butchers' Row," the pavements of the big thoroughfare seemed alive with the threatening silence of the coming storm.

Knots of two or three, or of half-a-dozen denizens of the district, stood about at every vantage point, discussing in low tones, some evidently weighty matter. Flitting from group to group were a few better-dressed men, whose mission it seemed to be to keep popular interest in the subject under discussion up to standard point.

At the corner of Commercial Street the knots of men appeared to crystallise, the police good-humouredly taking little notice, so long as the road traffic was not interfered with or impeded.

"Gerald, there's Dick!" exclaimed Mabel, as they were preparing to cross the road.

She was pointing excitedly towards a tall man in a coarse tweed suit and a golf cap of the same colour.

Digitized by Google

The man was talking to a lady, who had just descended f om a hansom, that waited by the kerbside.

Tall, dark, and stately-looking, and dressed in well-fitting tailor-made dress and jacket, the latter was rapidly exciting in the male East End mind undisguised admiration for her aristocratically handsome face.

"By Jove! So it is!" replied Gerald Haynes, "and if I'm not very much mistaken, the lady who is engaging his attention is Lady Marjorie!"

Pushing a way for himself and Mabel through the fast-increasing crowd, he soon came abreast of the man in the tweed suit and his companion.

Their eyes met simultaneously, the whole four of them, quite oblivious of the comments of the man in the street, giving themselves up unreservedly to the pleasure of the unexpected meeting.

Unfortunately, Richard Gulliver, the Socialistic pioneer, the leader of men, the man who, it was rumoured, had given up a fortune to help his East End brother, was recognised by an enthusiastic follower.

The news spread like wildfire. In an instant Dick and his friends were hemmed in so closely, that to get clear of the press seemed an absolute impossibility.

Now, Dick was a giant among men; stood, indeed, Saul-like, above his fellows from the shoulders upward.

This fact stood him in good stead now, inasmuch as it enabled him to look round for a means of escape from his admirers.

On the side of the Mile End Road where they stood, was the entrance to a large hall, wedged in between two shop fronts.

It was in this hall that the meeting referred to by Gerald Haynes was to be held at two o'clock on that day.

Whis ering to Gerald to take quick advantage of his next move, Dick squared his shoulders, and elbowed himself backwards towards the door of the hall. Putting Mabel and Lady Marjorie before him, and thus between himself and Dick, Gerald followed up, step by step, the former's retreat doorwards.

The moment Dick Gulliver reached the door, he, deftly taking a large key from his pocket, felt behind him for the keyh le, and before the crowd could realise that their idol had disappeared, he and his friends were safely inside the closed door of the hall.

Suddenly there was a sound as of an ever-nearing roar of a human Niagara! Ten thousand throats seemed splitting—ten thousand voices seemed shrieking in hideous discord in the street outside.

"Follow me!" cried Dick, as he sprang up a steep flight of stairs to the left of the entry. This brought them on to a landing, the window of which overlooked the main road.

Looking down, they saw a huge seething crowd, principally men, frantically struggling to reach one objective point—the entrance to the hall.

Scattered here and there throughout the throng, and hanging, Uh an-like, on to the fringe of it, were individuals whose political opinions were manifestly not in accord with those of the great majority. These indulged in vexatious wordy warfare with the "reds," who, roused at last to frenzy, took the matter into their own hands, and started a campaign of fist and foot reprisals.

"Dick," said Gerald Haynes, "you have let loose the flood! But can you stop it?"

With that, he threw up the lower sash, leant both his hands on the window-sill, and made as if to speak.

"Are you men or brutes?" he cried, in stentorian tones. "I neve taught you to tear each other's throats! You are a disgrace to the cause you profess to champion! Ah! you coward"—as a stone, flung from the centre of the crowd, struck him on the forehead. "You are as fickle as women, without woman's excuse! From this hour I renounce yo i and all yo r works! Lead yourselves, and see where you wi l arrive! Henceforth, I go to the Gentiles!"

There was an attempt at silence during this speech, but with the last word, the uproar renewed itself with tenfold o ce.

Mabel and Lady Marjorie were too terror-stricken to speak, although the latter, directly Dick started to address the mob, drew nearer to him. When he was struck, she quietly produced her handkerchief and wiped the blood that streamed from a nasty wound in his forehead.

In ten minutes the police arrived in sufficient force to disperse the crowd.

An inspector and two constables demanded admi tance at the hall door in the King's name.

Dick went down with the keeper of the hall and answered the summons.

"Is your name Richard Gulliver?"

"It is."

"Then I hold a warrant for your arrest," said the inspecto-, "for inciting to sedition the King's subjects, and for conspiring against His Majesty's peace."

Gerald Haynes, with the two girls, accompanied the prisoner to the Guildhall, where the sitting Alderman happened to be Horace Gulliver, Esq.

A few formal preliminaries and Dick, Lady Marjorie's handkerchief as a bandage still round his head, stepped quietly into the dock and faced his father.

There was hardly a soul in the court but knew the history of the Alderman and his son. It was common property.

"Gaoler! The prisoner's name."

"Rich—Richard Gulliver—your worship, begging your worship's pardon."

"You needn't beg my pardon! What's the charge?"

"Inciting to sedition, and conspiring against the King's peace, your worship."

"Have you anything to say, prisoner?"

"I did my best to stop it," was the reply.

"'Um. Didn't find it so easy as egging 'em on to it."

"No, I am sorry to say."

Two policemen and a witness who professed to having heard the prisoner the night before uttering at a meeting violent threats against the Government, having given evidence, the Alderman, in the absence of any rebutting test mony, expressed his intention of dealing with the case a week from that date.

"I should like to say a word," interrupted Gerald Haynes, standing up in the well of the court.

"Well, sir," said Mr. Gulliver, looking through his future son-in-law as if not seeing him. "What have you to say? Is it anything in the prisoner's favour?"

"As the Conservative candidate for the district, I may perhaps be permitted to say, that, being present the whole time, I saw nothing—practically nothing, which could in any way support a charge of sedition. More than that, the prisoner, whom I have personally known and esteemed for many years, acted in a manly way to quell the disturbance; so much so, that, should I be elected to-morrow, I shall regard his action as having materially contributed to my success. I may add that I am prepared to offer bail to any amount for Mr. Richard Gulliver."

Gerald Haynes, when he sat down, distinctly felt a warm little hand steal into his, and though he looked for no reward, his sweetheart's appreciation was very sweet to him.

"Well, I shall remand the prisoner for a week, and shall require one substantial bail to the amount of a thousand pounds."

Needless to say that it was immediately forthcoming.

But Dick never appeared on the remand, other than to be at once discharged, for, in the meanwhile, the Alderman had received an intimation from the Home Office that his conduct savoured largely of the ridiculous, and that his granting a warrant at all for his son's arrest on such slight grounds, placed him in rather an awkward position.

Poor man! he had a peculiarly warm time of it at home, what with one and another; and he was not really comfortable till the day of the double wedding; when Lady Marjorie, to the old man's great delight, took Dick for better and for worse; and then the new Conservative member for Whitechapel and Mabel Gulliver followed their friend's very good example.

E. Ralph.

Digitized by Google

YOU CAN BEGIN TO-DAY.

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

By HENRY FARMER.

For New Readers.

A BELT full of diamonds has been stolen from a safe belonging to Mr. Mansfield, a wealthy banker, by Seaton Revelle (who is a friend of the banker's) and an accomplice named Benjamin Beard. Revelle accuses Alec Scarsdale, who is in love with Esther, Mr. Mansfield's daughter, of the crime, and he is sentenced to sixteen years' penal servitude.

Mr. Crump, late Chief-Inspector at Scotland Yard, feeling sure Scarsdale is innocent and Revelle is guilty, determines to prove the latter's guilt.

Mr. Mansfield as fully believes in Scarsdale's guilt as does Esther in his innocence, and his friendship for Revelle increases. Revelle constantly visits the banker's house in an endeavour to win Esther's love, but so far has not prospered at all. While talking with the girl one day, Mr. Mansfield's new maid, Vance, enters the room with a tray bearing cups of coffee. No sooner does she catch sight of Revelle than she drops the tray, and, pointing to Revelle, screams: "That—that man is my husband!" But Revelle, by sheer force of will, compels her to acknowledge her mistake.

In the meanwhile, Scarsdale, who has got into trouble for attacking a warder who jested with him about Esther, is taken seriously ill, and placed in the prison hospital, where he succeeds in writing a letter to Esther and giving it to a convict named Ben Needham, who has finished his sentence and has promised to deliver it to Esther upon his release. He accomplishes his mission a week or so later.

At about this time Esther and Mr. Crump are walking together when they observe Vance about to throw herself in the reservoir. Crump stops her just in time—he and Esther taking her back to The Woodlands. Later on Revelle and Benny drive up in a dogcart, and suddenly, while talking to Esther, Revelle turns deadly pale. Crump is standing by, and quickly sees the reason for his emotion. Vance is approaching. She goes straight up to Revelle. It is a critical moment, but once more Revelle's iron will wins the day. Again apologising for her mistake in calling Revelle her husband, she allows herself to be led away. Later on she is placed in the county asylum.

A charity concert is now announced, in which both Esther and Benny are billed to take part. Revelle, of course, is present; so also is Mr. Crump. It is while returning from this concert that Revelle proposes to Esther but is refused.

The great balloon incident now approaches. There is to be a grand fête in Lord Normanhurst's grounds, the chief and closing event being a balloon ascent by Mr. Seaton Revelle. Everything goes well till two horsemen arrive with the news that Vance has escaped from the asylum. Crump advises them to go straight to the reservoir.

CHAPTER XXII.

Escaped.

CRUMP'S advice was taken. One man dismounted his smoking horse, the other pelted forward at a break-neck pace, bound for the reservoir. Crump was looking seriously distressed as he turned to where Mrs. Cobb and Pollie were standing.

"Mrs. Cobb," he said, "this is very sad, this. I'm going to ask you to excuse me. I don't suppose that I shall do any good, but I must help look for this poor woman. Now, if you will just go into the grounds, I shall hope to join you later."

He nodded to the two constables, and hurried off, bent on taking a short cut to the reservoir. From his previous experience of Vance, he told himself that she was far more likely to be found there than in the grounds. He reached the reservoir to find the asylum attendant already there; but no sign of Vance. The little man at once made for the spot where, when in company with Esther, he had seen Vance standing on the edge, staring down into the water. He stooped down and examined the ground.

"I don't think that she has been here!" he said to the attendant.

"Well," answered the man, "I don't quite see how you can tell that by just examining one particular spot for foot-marks!"

"A poor creature bent on suicide would, I fancy, make a direct line for the water. In particular if she were conscious of pursuit. The bridle-path is the only approach to the water from the north, the asylum side. But I may be wrong. I am open to correction!"

Crump was a stranger to the attendant.

"You might be a detective from the way you talk!"

Crump shook his head, and handed the man a card—the "Penworthy" card, on which was inscribed "Landscape Gardener and Horticultural Specialist."

"I am interested in the poor woman, because I found her that morning when she wandered here. If, as a private individual, I might make a suggestion, I should communicate at once with the police at Ashbrook, and ask that a man might be told off to keep an eye on this reservoir. It is possible that she may arrive here later. And in the meantime I should be very pleased to wait here. I think it would be as well!"

"Thank you. Much obliged!"

The man rode off. Crump remained, staring meditatively at the water, occasionally shaking his head. He had looked forward to a day's enjoyment with Mrs. Cobb and Pollie, and the episode had cast a shadow. On the arrival of a policeman in plain clothes, he returned to the grounds.

The balloon had ascended again with another load of passengers. Crump glanced up at it and the figure seated in the rigging.

"I wonder," he said to himself, "if you've heard yet of this poor creature's escape! I may be wrong in my estimate of your character, but I look upon you as a heartless, cold-blooded scoundrel, Mr. Seaton Revelle, exceptionally so, in fact. And I do hope that sooner or later—preferably sooner—I shall have the supreme satisfaction——"

The stern look that had momentarily crossed the little man's face melted into a smile.

"He's a blackguard; but his impertinence tickles me!"

Digitized by Google

OUR NEW SERIAL.

He had caught sight of Mr. Faversham. Lady Eliza Normanhurst was with him, and had taken his arm. She had been charmed with his performance at the concert, and was he not of the Norfolk-Faversham stock? It was rather an ordeal for Benny. "Upper circles," as he put it, "were not much in his line; and he was uncertain on matters of etiquette. It was a case of trusting to luck. It was all very well for the Marquis. He took to the upper circles as a duck takes to water."

"You're not a balloonist?" said Lady Normanhurst.

"No!" said Benny, "I prefer to have my feet upon my native heath; feel far more at home on terra cotta!"

Benny wondered why Lady Normanhurst laughed. He was under the belief that terra cotta and terra firma meant the same thing; but having the reputation of being a funny man, his ignorance passed for funniness. It happens so sometimes.

At that moment they were joined by Lord Normanhurst.

"I've just heard," he said, "that there's been an escape from the asylum. There's just a chance that the poor woman may have made her way here, and got into the grounds with the crowd."

"Who is she?" asked his wife.

"That unfortunate servant of Mansfield's who so suddenly went out of her mind."

Benny thought of the Marquis. Revelle had assured him that he had never set eyes upon the woman before that evening when he was dining with the Mansfield's; but, for all that, Benny had been haunted by certain doubts on the matter. He was, as Crump had put it, a blackguard; but he was not entirely without a conscience, and there was a humane side to his character. He had no scruples on the subject of cracking a crib, if the affair ended there; but it was another thing when it entailed undeserved suffering on innocent people. Much as he admired the Marquis, and very much under his thumb as he was, there were moments when the relations between the two men were liable to be strained; and, moreover, Benny was inclined to be jealous of the silent Railton whose praises Revelle had a way of singing, and who was completely in his confidence.

The balloon was being hauled down. After the disembarkation of the passengers, Revelle himself sprang out. Since the rejection of his proposal, he had met Esther frequently. He had behaved as if no such thing had taken place. Afterwards he had told himself that he had acted prematurely; but he flattered himself complacently that Esther's rejection of his advances was half-hearted; that it was not so much the remembrance of Alec Scarsdale, but rather the worldly dread of what people might say. He was hopelessly out in his calculations, and his error was largely due to his infinite belief in himself. Besides himself and Esther, only one person (not counting Benny) knew of the proposal—Crump. Esther had told him. She had also told him of the letter that had reached her from Alec through that rough diamond, Ben Needham. The little man had grown right into her heart. She had come to look upon him in the light of a second father. There was a delicacy about him, a certain tenderness, that made her feel somehow that she could tell him things which she would not for worlds mention to anyone else.

The fête provided many attractions; but the balloon was the greatest, and Seaton Revelle undoubtedly the hero of the hour. He was rapidly becoming a very popular person in the neighbourhood.

Many eyes followed him as, having left the captive balloon in charge of some attendants, he made his way through the crowds to Lord Normanhurst.

"Just taking a bit of an easy!" he said, "I have been making money fast. Normanhurst, you must come up with me next time. I'm thankful that there's no wind to speak of, and what little there is looks like dropping. A captive balloon's no good in a wind."

Lady Normanhurst had carried off Benny to a small tent where a lady of title, who had made a study of palmistry, was reading characters and foretelling the future.

"Now," said Lady Normanhurst, as the lady palmist took one of Benny's hands in her own, and started to examine the lines. "I'm going to hear your true character, Mr. Faversham!"

"Heaven forbid!" said Benny to himself; and, after it was all over, again to himself, "Heaven be thanked! Not a bit like it!"

Lord Normanhurst accompanied Revelle back to the balloon. Some stir was created when it was known that his Lordship was going to make an ascent.

"By the way," he said, as they neared the car, "have you heard of this escape from the asylum? That poor woman, Vance."

A momentary shadow darkened Revelle's face.

"No, I hadn't heard. When—when did she get away?"

"Some time this morning. There's a rumour that she may be somewhere here in the grounds. I trust not. She's only dangerous to herself, they say; but if the rumour gets about, I'm afraid it will cast a gloom over the proceedings, and so far everything has been going splendidly!"

A cheer went up as Lord Normanhurst climbed into the car. Revelle shouted out an order. The engine started to pay out the wire cable. The balloon rose up. Presently Revelle signalled down. The engine stopped. He took a pair of field glasses from a case, and handed them to Lord Normanhurst. After sweeping the horizon and the crowd below, he handed them back. Revelle, having adjusted the focus, glanced away to the distant County asylum. His face hardened a little. He had fancied that she was safe enough there. Then he, too, scanned the crowd below.

Was it possible that she was somewhere down there? Was it possible, that before the day was out, he would have to face another such ordeal as he had gone through that morning outside John Mansfield's house?

Lord Normanhurst was becoming accustomed to his novel situation.

"I say, Revelle, would it be possible for you to make your free ascent a little later—after dusk in fact. You see, we are going to illuminate the grounds, and I've been wondering if you could manage to blaze off a firework or something when you were up aloft!"

Revelle was still staring through the field-glasses.

"Well, yes. I could go up just before dusk, and show a coloured light or something, don't you know!"

Was she somewhere down below—this woman who was his lawful wife?

He cursed the asylum people under his breath. What had they been doing to let her escape?

Where was she?

* * * * * * *

"Up in a balloon, boys, up in a balloon!
Flying up sky-high, boys,
Trying to reach the moon!"

The words, crooned out in a weird monotone, came from behind a great clump of gorse where a woman, her dull eyes dilated and fastened on what, in the distance, looked like a tiny globule suspended in mid-air, crouched—a lonely, hidden figure on the desolate common that stretched away on all sides. Presently she rose up, glanced round her furtively; then crept away to another clump, a little further along, and, crouching down again, crooned out the same refrain.

"Is it Jim up there?" she whispered. "It reminds me of old times. He loved me for a little time; then grew tired. But I love him still, so much that I won't betray him. But, oh, how he looked at me! Those eyes of his, that old hard stare!"

She shivered; then, straightening up again and glancing round as though she were afraid of pursuit, she crept forward to another clump. Her movements were those of a hunted creature.

"He wants me out of the way, wants to be free to marry her. Shall I go to her, tell her that he'll only break her heart as he broke mine? Warn her against his handsome face?"

Digitized by Google

For a moment the dull eyes lighted up with a look of jealousy, but it flickered out. She sank down on to the turf, and buried her face in her arms.

"They would only take me back, and laugh at me. I'm mad. No, I'll wait till the darkness comes, and then I'll go to the water. Rest's waiting for me there, looking up from under the water, and beckoning, always beckoning, and holding out its arms to me!"

When the sun, like a great red ball of fire, seemed to be resting on the line of the horizon, the demented woman was sitting in the shadow of the gorse, her knees drawn up to her chin, waiting for the darkness, and again crooning to herself the old refrain.

The great red ball sank out of sight, leaving the sky a crimson-yellow hue that softened into greyness. Then heavy, ominous-looking clouds crept up over the horizon-ridge.

"Hooray—hooray—hooray!"

The distant cheers stole over the deserted common like a faint whisper.

In the far-away grounds a great crowd had gathered round the balloon. The cable that hitherto had held it captive had been detached. A number of men were holding on to the car that was heavily weighted with ballast. The grounds were beginning to twinkle with fairy lights.

Seaton Revelle had entered the car. The cheers had been for him. The wind had dropped completely.

"Can't quite say" he called out to Lord Normanhurst, "where I shall come to ground. But if I can strike the current I want I shall probably drop on to Aversham Common—plenty of room there!"

"I shouldn't like to be going up!" said Pollie to Crump, whose hand she was holding.

"Nor should I, Pollie!" answered the little man; then he was seized with a violent fit of sneezing that necessitated an immediate recourse to his handkerchief. It was quite a prolonged fit, and for some little time his face was completely buried in his handkerchief.

"Dear me!" said Mrs. Cobb, who was on his other side, "I'm afraid that you've caught cold, Mr. Penworthy!"

"I'm afraid that I have!"

But, as a matter of fact, he had not caught cold; but had caught sight of the face of a man who had edged his way through the crowd, and was standing near him—a man with an expressionless countenance and rather fishy eyes, Railton, Mr. Seaton Revelle's valet. Only when he had pushed his way still further ahead, and was well in front of him, did Crump cease to blow his nose.

"Hooray!"

"O-o-h!" cried Pollie, "it's going up, going up!"

Straight as a die, amidst ringing cheers, the balloon shot up into the evening sky that was growing more grey and dark with every moment.

"Dear me!" exclaimed Crump as he stared up watching the balloon growing smaller and smaller, "I'm sorry. This rain will spoil the evening for many people, I'm afraid!"

A drop of heavy rain had pattered down on to his face. It was a prelude of a downpour, so heavy that a few moments later there was a general stampede for the many marquees and tents that dotted the grounds.

Had the evening been clear, the balloon would have been distinctly visible, but the blackness of banking rain-clouds darkened the sky.

"As long as there's no lightning," said John Mansfield to Esther, "Revelle will be all right. I think we are in for a regular downpour. I'm glad that I ordered the carriage early. But I'm sorry. I'm afraid the evening is spoilt!"

Several letters awaited the banker when he reached home. One of them was from an old friend.

"Esther," he said, "a letter from Sawyer. Most kind of him. He suggests that we should pay him a visit at his place at Gurlstone Bay, while the summer's still at its best. He's got a yacht down there, and proposes a coasting cruise. I think we ought to go!"

He stroked her dark hair tenderly.

"I don't think my little girl is quite looking herself. Yes, I think I'll write and accept for both of us!"

"I think I'd rather stop here, father. We only seem to have just come back."

The banker shook his head.

"No, Esther, I shall accept!"

Esther still hesitated. Warham was the scene of action, the field on which she felt the battle was being fought; yet she was conscious of a longing to get away for a little while, away from that man whose almost daily presence sometimes became well-nigh unbearable.

"Father, will you give me till to-morrow to make up my mind?"

She meant to consult Crump.

"Very well, Esther, you shall sleep upon it!"

That night, when alone in her room, Esther drew back the curtains and stared out into the darkness. The rain was still pelting down steadily. Her heart was heavy within her. She had heard of Vance's escape. Where was she? What had happened to the poor woman?

Then her thoughts changed into another channel. The silence of the darkened room was broken by a woman's voice that cried aloud—

"Alec, my love, my love, if I could only see you, speak with you!"

Silence followed for a while.

Then came the cry of many men and women—the cry of the captive craving for freedom, of the lover for his love, of genius unrecognised. A cry that has often winged its way to the throne of the Omnipotent!

"Oh, God, how long, how long!"

CHAPTER XXIII.

"Jim!"

Above, moon and stars were shining out; below, what looked like a billowy silvered sea; below that, darkness and rain. The balloon, with its solitary occupant was in the upper heavens, above the clouds that blackened the world below. With some men, the awful loneliness of space, the myriad constellations, the baseless, silvered cloud-ocean below, would have conjured up a deep sense of awe, a feeling of one's own micrososmic pettiness, a breathless wonder at the mysterious vastness of the universe!

Revelle, his coat-collar upturned, peered over the edge of the basket-car. The vastness, the immensity of it, all made no impression upon him.

"Curse the night!" he muttered, "I had calculated on a clear evening. Once I drop through those clouds I shall be in pitch darkness. I haven't the vaguest notion where I am. It will be all a matter of guess-work!"

He glanced at the barometer. It was possible to read it by the clear moonlight.

"Nearly four thousand feet up, I shall have to chance my luck! Goodness only knows where the currents have been drifting me to. There's nothing to gauge my position by!"

He pulled the valve-rope. There was a hissing sound of escaping gas. The balloon dropped downwards towards the fantastic, silvery billows below. A moment later it was shrouded in a cold, damp, black mist. Moon and stars were blotted out. Then the mist gave place to an intense, but clear darkness and a steady, pelting, rain. The balloon had dropped through the clouds. With a sound like the frou-frou of a society lady's skirt, the balloon's silken envelope swished under the lash of the water.

The sound of escaping gas ceased. There seemed no breeze, but an imperceptible current was bearing the balloon along.

Revelle was staring down. Immediately below was darkness, but here and there in the distance lights were twinkling out. One set of lights might have been a pattern picked out by glow-worms. Even as he stared down light after light went out.

"The grounds," muttered Revelle. "They've given it up as a bad business and are putting out the lights, or the rain's doing it for them. Reckon by the position of those lights, and the darkness below, that I must be about over the common!"

Digitized by Google

OUR NEW SERIAL.

He swung overboard a three-pronged anchor. The balloon tilted over to one side, then he opened the valve again.

Again the hissing sound of gas and a gentle, downward motion.

"Thank Heaven for that!"

The continuous cloud-bank overhead had suddenly rifted. The moonlight, struggling through, illumined the drifting balloon with a pale light. Revelle could almost distinguish the nature of the ground beneath.

"If it will only last I shall be able to see what I am doing. I'm over the common right enough!"

Down, gently down, and drifting slowly along! So close to the ground now that the trailing anchor almost brushed the top of the gorse. The pale light of the moon was still holding good.

The valve was closed again. Revelle, his hand on the rope, was leaning half out of the car watching his opportunity.

Suddenly he saw a figure rise up, more like a ghost than human being, from out the shadow of a clump of gorse.

"Jim, Jim," crooned up a voice, "is that you? Have you come for me?"

"My God!" hissed out Revelle.

The figure was no longer visible, hidden beneath the car. The next moment there was a jerk as if the anchor had clawed the ground; the car heeled over to one side, but went on drifting, dragged down at an angle.

A woman was clinging to the anchor, being dragged along, her feet sometimes clear of, sometimes scraping the ground.

Revelle relaxed hold of the valve rope, sprang across the car, and stared down, the moonlight was upon the clinging figure the pale, upturned face.

It was the face of his mad wife!

"Jim!" —the panting words reached him—"Up, up, up, let's go up together! Up—away—from the cruel world—to Heaven—to rest!"

The man's face was an ashy colour now. With a swift movement he dashed the sweat from off his forehead, then stooped, snatched up something, and heaved it overboard—a bag of ballast.

The balloon shot up.

"Jim!"

He stooped again. A moment later another bag of ballast struck the common with a dull thud. He peered over the edge of the car. The moonlight was full upon the white, upturned face of the mad woman as she swung along through the air.

"Jim!"

His wife! Cruelty, terror, was shining from his eyes, but not mercy!

Then, as suddenly as it had opened, the rift in the cloud-bank closed up, and all was darkness again and rain.

"Jim!"

A third bag of ballast slipped through the air, and struck the ground with a dull thud. Then a current of wind caught the balloon and drove it towards Warham reservoir.

The basket car still listed heavily to one side.

Then, suddenly, it righted itself, and the balloon, relieved of a heavy weight, shot upward like an arrow!

The man in the car was the grey colour of death now. His teeth were chattering. Clutching the edge with a shaking hand, he forced himself to peer over. Once again the cloud-bank rifted, and for a brief moment the fickle moon showed her face. Something shimmered below coldly. Water!

CHAPTER XXIV.

Scarsdale is Transferred. "Change 'ere for Gurston Bay!"

"WHY am I to go before the Governor?" asked Scarsdale wearily. "Have I been reported again? Does it mean another dose of punishment cells?"

The warder, who had replaced Pettigrew, had entered Scarsdale's cell with the information that he was to go before the Governor. He was cast in a different mould from Pettigrew, and was friendly-disposed towards his charges.

"No; it's not that, this time. But the Visiting Director's here, and the papers have been made out transferring you to some other establishment—you'll know which, soon enough."

"Transferred?"

"Yes; it's a little way they've got with fractious prisoners. The Governor was fined fifty pounds on account of Gentleman Jack's escape, and he doesn't want to lose another. He's a bit anxious, and won't be sorry to have you off his hands."

Scarsdale smiled grimly, and glanced down at his leg-chains.

The warder's statement was confirmed when Scarsdale was brought before the Governor and the Visiting Director. He was formally told that he was to be transferred to another convict establishment.

A prisoner under Special Orders is neither allowed to write nor receive any letters. But Scarsdale was informed that on his arrival at his new quarters he would be allowed to write one letter informing his friends of his transfer.

This in itself was something. When he was back again in his cell, Scarsdale felt a feeling akin to excitement. Any change was welcome after the terrible monotony of the past, although he knew that he was to be transferred to a Public Works Prison that had a notorious reputation for the stringency of its discipline. He had met prisoners who had "done time" at Wrackam Convict Prison, and they had never spoken of it but to revile it. One of them had called it "the hell of English prisons." Situated close to the banks of a great river, the prisoners were mostly employed in building fortresses, docks, and basins.

That evening when the warder entered his cell, he told him that several others besides himself were to be transferred to Wrackam. He would have companions on the journey.

Scarsdale slept but little that night; and when he did snatch a few moments, he obtained no rest. The same wild dreams of escape tortured him—vivid dreams that haunted him when awake.

He was up and dressed and feverishly pacing his dark cell long before the prison bell jangled out its harsh note. He climbed to the iron bars and watched the grey light of dawn spread across the moor. Recollections crowded through his brain, all grim and dark. What might be in store for him in the future, he did not know; but he thanked God that he was leaving that horrible place with its rankling associations of injustice.

When the bell rang out he remembered how, when first hearing its notes, it had chilled him with the hopelessness of despair. He listened to the slamming of the doors, the rattle of feet along the corridors, and the cries of the warders as they shouted out "Brooms in!" How strange it had all seemed to him at first—how horribly familiar it had all become now!

Silently he took in his breakfast—an eight-ounce loaf of bread, sodden with some gruel that had been slopped over it, and the pint of "skilly." He had scarcely tasted his first prison breakfast; now he devoured it ravenously. He was marched down into the receiving ward. Besides some half-a-dozen other convicts, the Governor, the Chief Warder, and a small crowd of principal warders and warders were present. His letters were taken from him, and he was marched into an adjoining room, where he was stripped to the skin and thoroughly searched. Returning to the ward, his name, sentence, and official number were called out, and he surrendered up his official ticket. The identification of each convict having been assured, the little gang was then marched off to the chain-room, more commonly called the jeweller's shop.

Scarsdale was still wearing his leg-chains, but they did not save him from being handcuffed. There were seven convicts, all told, and, when each man had been handcuffed, they were formed into two groups of four and three, fastened together by a long steel chain attached to the handcuffs of the left hands.

Digitized by Google

Then each man was given a haversack containing a couple of eight-ounce loaves, a small piece of cold beef, and some quarter of a pound of cheese. A long day's journey lay before them, and they were not expected to reach Wrackam till late that night.

A clumsy-looking omnibus was drawn up in the parade-ground; the men entered, two warders with them. Two other warders took up their positions on the steps outside, while another climbed up beside the driver. They were all armed with cutlasses, and carried revolvers in their pockets.

Once beyond the confines of the prison-walls, the convicts began to talk to one another in low whispers. The warders did not attempt to prevent them. So long as the gloomy blot on the moor remained in sight, Scarsdale felt compelled by a strange fascination to watch it. He gave a deep sigh of relief—why he could not have explained—when at last it disappeared from view. The road was hilly, and once the men were ordered out to walk.

To Scarsdale it was like a brief glimpse of freedom. He forgot his hideous dress, the fetters and handcuffs, as he tramped up the hill, drinking in the invigorating air. There was a wild, rugged beauty about the surrounding country. There was no prison, no civil guard, no sentinel-box in view now to mar the effect.

Even the warders seemed to have relaxed, for they did not prevent conversation, and occasionally joined in themselves.

"Bust me tight," exclaimed one convict, a wizen-faced, keen-eyed little Cockney, who had been sentenced to five years for being found with his hand in somebody else's pocket, "bust me tight if this ain't a reg'lar Heaster Monday Bank 'Oliday picnic!"

"Yes," said one of the warders, "only there aren't no pockets to be picked round about here, 564!"

Whereat most of the others laughed heartily, 564 included. It was the laugh and the jest that recalled Scarsdale to himself. It grated upon his nerves. It brought him down again to a sordid level.

The hill had been climbed, and, once again within the vehicle, Scarsdale took stock of his comrades. Though they had all come from the same prison, none of them were known to him. He himself composed one of the little gang of four—each man of a different and distinct type. Next to him was an old man, grey-faced and haggard; there was a weary, broken aspect about the droop of his head. The features were refined and intellectual; there was a deep pathos in their expression of passive suffering. His neighbour was the little Cockney, sharp as a needle, full of native wit, and utterly devoid of conscience. He had picked pockets before he came to prison, and he meant to start picking them again as soon as he had served his time. The fourth man was of a tall and commanding appearance; he had been a promoter of bogus companies in his day; he had ruined homes and robbed hundreds of their hard-earned savings. He had been sentenced to ten years' penal servitude. It was said that when he came out he would be immensely rich. The spoil that he had amassed had been transferred to someone else's banking account before the crash came.

The other little group of three was composed of a man who had been sent to prison for manslaughter; a lad of twenty who had fallen into the hands of racing sharps, and had stolen money to pay his debts; and the head of a notorious gang of London coiners.

Such were Scarsdale's travelling companions. It was the man next to him who interested him most. He glanced at his badge. He was serving a sentence of fifteen years. He wondered if he would live through it, and what his crime had been.

But his thoughts were temporarily distracted when the omnibus entered the outskirts of Plymtown. Every convict face was pressed against the windows—to obtain a glance of the free and outer world.

It was so long since Scarsdale had seen anything but convict-clad men and uniformed officials, that the sight of men and

The Most Singular Town in England.

Berwick is the most singular town in the British dominions inasmuch as it is really both a town and a country to itself. Elwick, a neighbouring place, has recently become almost equally interesting on account of a remarkable cure worked there by Bile Beans. Mrs. Matthewson, the wife of an Elwick farmer, related the facts of the case as follows to a "Berwickshire News" reporter:—"My daughter Mary suffered from anæmia for many months. The illness came on by slow degrees, so that for some time no one regarded it as being serious. But as she grew more feeble, we became alarmed. She could not take her usual food, complained of a weak stomach, seldom had any appetite, and became awfully emaciated. This went on for months. I tried several vaunted remedies, but they proved worthless. Then a doctor prescribed for her, and attended her. She got better for a while, but ultimately went back to her old condition. The doctor said she was bloodless, and attended her for several weeks.

She was then ordered to have some teeth drawn, which had a good effect, but the improvement was again merely temporary. Seeing an advertisement of Bile Beans we resolved to get a box, and give them a trial. The effects of the first box were most gratifying. Indeed, before it was finished, there was a noticeable improvement in her condition. By perseverance with the Beans, she grew stronger bit by bit every day. Her appetite increased, and very soon she was better in many ways than she had been before. To-day, thanks entirely to the Beans, she has been quite cured, and both looks and feels remarkably well and strong." The remedy which worked this cure is the world's specific for anæmia, debility, headache, lassitude, weakness after influenza, indigestion, female ailments, and all liver and kidney disorders. Of all chemists for one and three-halfpence or two and nine per box. Never sold loose. The above is but one instance out of thousands of their marvellous power.

GIVEN AWAY

with next week's

HOME NOTES

PAPER PATTERN of this SILK OR MUSLIN SLIP

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

OUR NEW SERIAL.

women in ordinary clothes seemed quite strange. The very advertisements on the hoardings were full of interest.

"Lor' bless us," said the little Cockney, "if Charley's Aunt ain't still running; but it strikes me people has taken to washin' more, or pretendin' to. I've already seed three advertisements for new soaps as I never heard of afore I come in."

The omnibus had already begun to attract attention. A number of ragged little urchins had begun to keep pace with it; people in the streets turned round and stared after it. Scarsdale turned away his head from the window, a crimson flush of shame on his cheeks. But worse was yet to come. The moment the vehicle drew up in Plymtown Station, a crowd gathered round and pressed so close upon the convicts as they passed in that the warders had to push them back. They were stared at as if they had been wild beasts or freaks of human nature. Audible remarks were passed.

"Look at that one with chains on his legs as well as his wrists. My eye, I shouldn't care to meet him alone in a dark lane at night!"

On the platform it was no better. A hundred eyes were bent upon them. Well-dressed men and fashionable ladies behaved as the rest—all seemed filled with the same prurient curiosity.

To Scarsdale it was all so much horrible humiliation. Never had he felt his degradation so keenly as at that moment. But others of the gang, less sensitive than he, seemed rather to enjoy their notoriety—the little Cockney in particular.

"All right, marm," he said to one old lady, who was glaring at him through a pair of spectacles, "you may come a bit closer; nothink ain't charged for 'aving a look at us, and we don't bite!"

And suddenly rattling his handcuffs, he caused the old lady to take three quick paces to the rear.

Scarsdale's head was bent forward, his eyes fastened on the ground. He could not endure to look around him. But he thanked God that there was no one there who had known him.

A third-class saloon had been reserved for the convict party.

The moment the train ran into the station the warders gave the word, and the prisoners, passing between two lines of spectators, entered the carriage. The little Cockney scattered his chaff right and left; the coiner begged one or two of the men for a morsel of "baccy."

The windows of the saloon were open, and the people still crowded round and glared in. Scarsdale prayed for the moment to come for the train to start.

"'Ere," cried the Cockney, "you've had a good stare at us for nothink. Shy in a handful of baccy!"

A man on the platform took a handful of tobacco from his pouch and threw it in through the open window. In an instant all was confusion and uproar. The warders endeavoured to get hold of it; the convicts struggled and fought among themselves for it, in spite of chains and handcuffs, and, when at last order was restored, every vestige of tobacco had disappeared. However, more than one convict's cheeks were bulging out suspiciously, the little Cockney's in particular.

There is always a certain amount of latitude on the occasions of transference of prisoners; and the warders allowed them to enjoy their luxury in peace.

Amongst others who stared in at the window was a clergyman, evidently taking mental notes for the following Sunday's discourse.

"Hullo, Mr. Sky-Pilot," cried the irrepressible Cockney, "don't forgit to put me in the sermon as the bad little boy wot wouldn't do no work and growed up to be a bad man and was sent to quod!"

Scarsdale gave a deep sigh of relief as the train steamed out of the station. Those hard, staring eyes had recalled to him the day when he had stood in the dock of the Old Bailey. He glanced at the old man beside him. Their eyes met.

"As if," he said, in a low, unsteady voice, "our punishment was not great enough without this last humiliation—to be stared at like wild beasts—to be made the subject of jest and scorn. Have men and women no decency?"

The old man lapsed into silence. It was a dreary, monotonous journey, and presently Scarsdale dropped off, in spite the surrounding discomfort, into a doze.

The next thing that he realised was that the train was stopping, and a porter was shouting out:

"Roxeter Junction! Change 'ere for Wrackam!"

Then, after a pause:

"Change 'ere for Gurlston Bay!"

CHAPTER XXV.

Found!

"Good morning, Mr. Penworthy."

"Good morning to you, Miss Mansfield!"

Crump raised his hat, and, breaking off the discussion in which he was engaged with Banks, the gardener, joined Esther. The morning sky was clear, and the heavy rain of the night before had given a peculiar freshness to the air. Banks moved away to another part of the garden.

"I hope," said Crump, "that you avoided getting wet last night, Miss Mansfield. The sad news about that poor woman's escape and the sudden rain-storm cast quite a gloom over yesterday's proceedings!"

"Has anything been heard of her?"

"I'm sorry to say—nothing!"

The little man shook his head sorrowfully. Knowing the woman's tendencies, he dreaded lest something serious had happened.

"And I'm sorry to say," he went on, with a distinct note of annoyance in his voice, "that I have just heard that the policeman who was told off to keep watch by the reservoir was withdrawn after dark. A most unwise act. I wish I had known before."

Esther's dark eyes dilated with a look of horror. Crump saw, and changed the subject. He asked her advice as to the shape and arrangement of a certain flower-bed.

"And now," she said, the question settled, "I want to ask your advice!"

She told him of the invitation to her father and herself to pay a visit to Gurlston Bay, of her father's wish to accept.

"But I feel," she said, in a low voice, "that I oughtn't to go away from here. Yet, for some reasons, I should like to get away for a little time."

"My dear young lady," said Crump, "if I were you, I should certainly go!"

He saw that the strain was telling on her. A change would do her good. Fresh surroundings, fresh faces, would help to distract her thoughts.

"You see, your interests—and his—will be looked after in your absence to the best of my poor ability. I should go. I think you would be the better for getting right away from this immediate atmosphere, if only for a short time. I know—I know how great the strain has been. I know how much almost daily contact with a certain person must have affected you!"

"Then I will go!"

"That's right, quite right. And we—that is, Tom, and that young rascal Freddie, and your humble servant—will be doing our uttermost for you while you are away. And I shall take the liberty of writing to you frequently."

The little man shook his head.

"It's slow work—very slow work; but we must be patient, all of us!"

They moved away to the end of the drive. Esther leant upon the gate.

"Good morning, miss!" said a passing farm-labourer, as he touched his cap. "The balloon come to ground all safe and sound at Ocklington last night, close upon midnight. I've just seed Mr. Revelle. Good morning, miss!"

And the man went on his way.

"Do you think," questioned Esther presently, "that we are—are moving forward?"

Digitized by Google

Good! it's Mason's

MASON'S EXTRACT of HERBS

THE BEST BEVERAGE TO TAKE WITH YOUR MEALS, AND AT ALL TIMES.
THE MOST SUITABLE FOR CHILDREN DURING WARM WEATHER.

A Physician states: "It assuages thirst, it is refreshing, and grateful to weak stomach."

A 6d. Bottle of Extract makes 8 gallons. Bottle, post free, 9 stamps.

Manufacturers:
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

You must try
E. & T.
PINK'S
JAMS they are
Absolutely Pure

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%
repayable on demand.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS.
EPPS'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA
BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

KAPUTINE cures
NEURALGIA equally as well as
HEADACHE.
KAPUTINE is USED as well as recommended by MEDICAL MEN!

NOTHING LIKE IT OR AS GOOD AS KAPUTINE
THE SAFE REMEDY FOR HEADACHE
CURES IN 10 MINUTES.
PACKETS OF 18 1/- FOR

To convince sufferers of the sterling value of KAPUTINE we will send a supply FREE by return on receipt of Stamped Envelope

C. G. KAPUTINE,
HUDDERSFIELD.

Mark!
Timely Advice

To ensure having good time, buy one of our famous watches,

Lady's "Acme" 25/-
for 25/-.

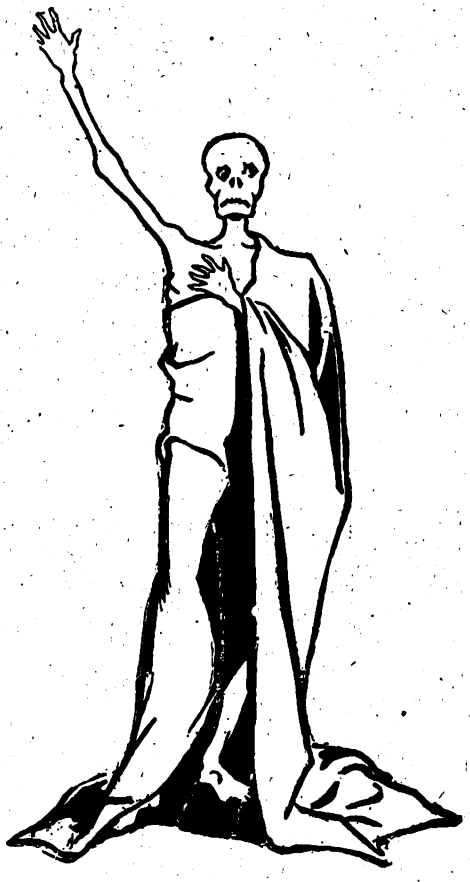
Solid Silver Cases, beautifully engraved, dust and damp proof cap, fitted with latest patented improvements.

Full value in every part.
A splendid timekeeper; most handsome appearance.
Guaranteed for 7 years.
Good service for a lifetime.
Sent post free for P.O. 25/-
Half your outlay saved.

Write for our Big Bargain Book.
free to you on request, 260 Pages, 3,000 Engravings of Watches, Clocks, Rings Chains, Cutlery, Plate, &c.

H. SAMUEL (Dept. 29) MARKET STREET MANCHESTER.

DAY



THE BLACK DAY.

The black day is fast approaching—the day which will long remain in the publishing world as a day of mystery—for the Publishers of Professor Boyd Laynard's world-renowned work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE," have received instructions from the author to withdraw all cheap editions of his famous book on the last day of this month. The present stock is not over large, and the publishers feel that all SHORT STORIES readers who have not yet secured a copy are entitled to this offer, which will be their last opportunity.

To those readers who are not acquainted with the contents of this world-renowned work, the following list of subjects will give some slight idea of its scope. A complete syllabus, showing the contents of the whole of the 127 CHAPTERS, enumerating upwards of 500 SUBJECTS and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the publishers. The complete work, if ordered direct from the publishers on Order Form below, will be forwarded, carriage paid, for ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE, the same edition as sold in the ordinary way for Two Shillings.

The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Some strange facts concerning the variableness of beauty—"Odd-faced" beauty—The countenance the counterpart of the mind—How pleasing expressions become permanent — How a person's habitual look is acquired — How permanent expressions can be transformed—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individuals look younger than others at a certain age—Discovery of a great metaphysical secret—Wonders of the skin—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superfluous hairs and how to treat them—Wrinkles: their prevention and treatment—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose can be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Round shoulders and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions—Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influences upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How the mind can cause dyspepsia—Effect of the direction of thought to the heart—How real diseases often supervene upon fancied ailments—How violent passions injure health—Laughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine, their various influences upon the physical system—Health-preserving diet and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—The influence exerted by the mind upon the appetite and digestion—Some perilous articles of food—Exercise and its relation to health—Baths and bathing: their influence upon health—The way we breathe, and how it affects our health — The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades, and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Insomnia, and its treatment—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its cultivation and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Sudden failure of memory—Rules for cultivating the memory—Influence of diet upon memory—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Nervousness—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—Compendium of the mental, moral, physical, and external influences that lessen the years of our earthly existence—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 30 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The eight signs of long life.

ORDER FORM. 415216.

To HAMMOND, HAMMOND & CO.,
19, 21, and 23 Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.

Please forward me Professor Boyd Laynard's complete work, "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE" (carriage paid), for which I enclose the sum of One Shilling and Sixpence.

Name.....

Address.....

"To be quite frank with you, at the present moment we are standing still; but I believe that, sooner or later, we shall be moving on again. I am expecting something to happen. What at present I am not justified in telling you. You see, my dear young lady, unfortunately the rascals who robbed your father's safe, had the start of us. I do not doubt that the diamonds and banknotes were turned into hard cash at once. In spite of the assistance of some very able former colleagues of mine, who helped me for the sake of old times, we have not succeeded in tracing the stolen stuff—as yet. If we could find the man through whom it was disposed, we should soon bring the guilt of the robbery home to the guilty parties; but perhaps we shall——"

He stopped abruptly. He had caught sight of a man, coming from the direction of the reservoir, who was hurrying along the road. A scared look was on his face.

Crump jumped at a conclusion—a terrible one.

"Miss Mansfield," he said quickly, "perhaps you had better go back to the house!"

She looked at him inquiringly.

"I'm afraid something has happened. Please go!"

The man was close up to the gate now.

"The poor woman that escaped from the asylum—she's wearing the dress——"

"Please go!"

Esther, with a shudder, turned and hurried away to the house; but she had guessed.

The panting man had paused for breath. He had turned, and was pointing behind him.

"In the reservoir!"

A further thrilling instalment of this story appears next Tuesday.

SIXPENNY EDITIONS OF FAMOUS COPYRIGHT NOVELS.

A HONEYMOON IN SPACE. By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE. By CUTCLIFFE HYNE.

THE MASTER KEY. By FLORENCE WARDEN.

THE PHANTOM ARMY. By MAX PEMBERTON.

THE FINAL WAR. By LOUIS TRACY.

FURTHER ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE. By CUTCLIFFE HYNE.

A PATCHED-UP AFFAIR. By FLORENCE WARDEN.

THE ADVENTURES OF NELL GWYN. By FRANKFORT MOORE.

BECKY. By HELEN MATHERS.

Price 6d. each, or post free, 8d.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of .....
for which I enclose the sum of 8d.

Name.....

Address.....

Ask and it Shall be Given Thee.

"ETHEL, dear," said Bessie Brown, with proud eyes, "my brother, Philip Estes Brown, from South Africa."

Lieutenant Phil bent over the dainty hand of his sister's chum, mentally contrasting her radiant fairness with the sunburnt faces of the Boer ladies, his principal feminine society for two long years.

"I am pleased to meet you," he said simply. "Bessie has often written of you. I can't express how glad I am to be shaking hands with a genuine English girl again after so many months of desolation."

"And I," said Miss Mackay, with charming seriousness, "am glad to meet one who has given up home and business to uphold his country's flag. My father fought for it in the Crimea. Bessie told me," she continued, when the three had adjourned to the veranda, "that you received your wound in saving one of your men. Would—would you mind telling me about it?"

"There isn't much to tell," said Phil with an embarrassed laugh. "Bessie," with a fond glance at his sister, "has constructed quite a romance out of it, with me for principal character, but it was the other fellow who was the hero."

"We ran into an ambush about a dozen miles from camp—twenty of us, myself, the only officer, in command; and only by the greatest good fortune escaped annihilation, but we managed to reach cover with only half a dozen wounded.

"It was a sort of natural pocket in the rocks, a regular little citadel; but while the enemy couldn't rush us out of it, we couldn't get out either, for we were completely surrounded, and they numbered ten to our one.

"For two days we lay on those broiling rocks, hoping for the help which didn't come, till the heat and the want of water—for that had given out the first day—began to make the men go off their heads, and the suffering of the wounded made my heart ache.

"Things looked so black that I had about made up my mind to give up in the morning of the third day, when one of the men—Rogers his name was, a splendid fellow—came up to me and saluted.

"'Lieutenant,' he said, 'there's water out there about two hundred yards to the left of us. I saw it as we were driven in. I can take half a dozen canteens, and when the moon goes down behind that cloud make a rush. If I get back we can last another day; if I don't—well, it's a man's death, that's all.'

"I wrung his hand impulsively. 'Spoken like a gentleman and a soldier,' I said, for I had long known he was a gentleman, though only a common soldier.

"He reached the water safely, but half-way back the Boers saw him as he crossed a patch of moonlight, and fired; then he fell and lay still, and—and," continued the lieutenant lamely, "I went out and brought him in."

"He brought him in on his back," broke in Bessie, "with two bullets in his own shoulder. And what do you think, Ethel—the man's name wasn't Rogers at all, but Mackay."

Ethel had risen with staring eyes.

"What was he like, this man?" she whispered. "Was he he tall and fair, and did he have a scar across his emple—so?"

"Why, yes," said Phil, wondering at her agitation. "He was just like that—how did you——?"

"He was my brother," she cried. "He left home angry with father. I can't tell you why now; but father was in the wrong He isn't dead—he will get well?"

"Oh, yes," said Phil; "he's all right, and there is a commission waiting for him when he gets out of the hospital."

"I must go at once and tell father," said Ethel hurriedly. "Won't he be glad—and proud! But you," turning suddenly; "what can I say to you, who saved my brother's life?"

"Perhaps," he said, audaciously; "when I come back for always I may ask you for something. May I hope that——?"

A sudden flood of red dyed the girl's pure face.

"Ask, and it shall be given thee," she quoted softly.

J. P.

Digitized by Google

IN CONFIDENCE

By MADGE MORRIS.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Would it be Etiquette?

"FIVE O'CLOCK" is at home two days during the month, and generally has a good many callers. She asks my advice as to how to tactfully get out of the following predicament: She is engaged in a very interesting conversation with one guest, when a fresh caller is announced. Should she leave off the conversation and devote herself to the new caller? While this would be strict etiquette, would it not be rather hard on the person with whom she was talking, to suddenly leave her?

❦❦❦

I think a little tact would soon put the matter right. On the new guest arriving, "FIVE O'CLOCK" should exchange a few well-chosen remarks, nice and to the point, should see that tea was given her, and, if possible, that she was left talking to some other guest, and then return, with an apology, to the guest with whom she was talking. To leave the latter for any length of time would be in bad taste, though only too many hostesses offend in this particular, out of supposed adherence to etiquette.

❦❦❦

Won't Raise His Hat

"RABY" is in sad trouble. She recently met "WALTER," to whom she took a great fancy. This she told her friends. Now, "WALTER," though a very nice boy, has the very slightest knowledge of good manners. Whenever "RABY" meets him she bows very nicely, but "WALTER" never raises his hat. This has gone on for such a long time that "RABY" asks my advice as to how to convey to "WALTER" his proper duty when meeting a lady.

❦❦❦

Let "RABY" go out with her brother, or cousin, or male friend, and when next they meet "WALTER," and she recognises him, let her request her escort to raise his hat in a very conspicuous way. If "WALTER" does not see from example what is the proper thing to do, then he must be lacking in intelligence as well as knowledge of good breeding, and would scarcely be a nice man for "RABY" to wish to cultivate.

❦❦❦

The Too-Dignified Barmaid.

MY correspondents include a great many different kinds of people, and this week I have to solve a little problem for "BELLA," who is a barmaid in Tooting. Now "BELLA" believes she is a pretty and attractive girl, but finds that three years have passed away and she has never found a young man to be attentive to her. She says she has always behaved in a very dignified way at the bar and never been familiar with anyone. On the contrary, she has always maintained the bearing of a lady, and kept obtrusive people at proper length.

❦❦❦

Well, "BELLA," has it occurred to you that you have carried that idea of being a lady rather too far, and that this is the reason for your non-success with the men? There is no need for a girl in your position to be familiar with your customers, but a nice charming manner towards everyone would do you no harm at all, and would be just as lady-like as "aloofness." After all, your position makes it necessary for you to serve men. Why not do it gracefully and agreeably? Try it for a time, and if someone does not start paying attentions to you I shall be very surprised.

❦❦❦

A Matter of Dress.

"LUCINDA" dresses very smartly, but her husband goes about attired like a labourer, whereas he is a man in a good position. How can "LUCINDA" induce her husband to dress in a becoming manner, as her own social position is handicapped by his appearance. Whenever she broaches the matter to him, he replies that he cannot afford to spend money on clothes, a statement which, "LUCINDA" assures me, is untrue.

❦❦❦

I know a woman who cured a similar tendency on the part of her husband in the following way: She took a suit of his clothes to a tailor and told him to make another to the same measurements, of a superior pattern. When her husband arrived home one evening, he was confronted with his new suit. After roaring about the expense for some time, his wife said she was very sorry, but was quite willing to pay it out of her own allowance if he wished it, rather than see him continue so shabby. He tried on the clothes, which fitted him well, and went out with his wife, who kept up a running fire of compliments on his appearance the whole way. This so pleased him that from that moment he begun to take an interest in his appearance, and soon a good many more suits came from that tailor. "LUCINDA" might try the same scheme.

❦❦❦

Wants a Wife.

"WESTRALIAN" is sixty-six years of age, and wishes to know if he is too old to marry. He is well off, and wants a wife not too old. In his own words the nice girls ("those up to forty") are soon picked up by younger men. "WESTRALIAN" has no infirmities.

❦❦❦

Of course in the Colony in which my correspondent resides, he may find a dearth of promising widows or spinsters of from forty upwards. I do not know the conditions out there. But I do not think he would find any difficulty if he went the proper way to work. Of course, even a widow of forty-five might rather shrink from the idea of marrying a man of sixty-six, but let "WESTRALIAN" just propose to a few of them, and if, in face of the actual proposal, somebody does not (after the usual correct remark about its being sudden, etc), consent, I shall be surprised. I know several charming ladies of mature age who would be only too willing to marry such a man as "WESTRALIAN," and if that is so here, perhaps it is the same in the Colonies.

❦❦❦

The Literary Prodigy.

I DO not wish to discourage you, "ISABEL," from writing stories, but you are only fifteen, and therefore cannot yet have the experience of life and manners necessary to publish fiction. At present you should seek the criticism of well-read friends, and abide by their opinion. There are so many professional story-writers whose experience covers years that the path of so youthful an aspirant as yourself would be full of disappointments.

❦❦❦

In any case, you should spend your time during the next few years in closely observing life and character and keeping your imagination constantly at work in trying to discover new and interesting situations. Do not be in too great a hurry. If you start actually writing four years hence you will be in ample time, as experience in quite as necessary in a writer as talent.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

EIFFEL TOWER LEMON JELLY

We are Lemon experts—having personally visited the Messina Lemon Orchards to select the finest fruits for our celebrated Eiffel Tower Lemonade. We are now using our special knowledge to produce a most delicious Lemon Jelly. Pint packet, 3½d.

FREE SAMPLE, send to C. FOSTER CLARK & CO., Lemon Produce Importers, MAIDSTONE.

FREE!

Send for free catalogue of our cycles, and learn how to get a reliable, warranted mount on easy payments, prices £4 to £8; no guarantor required. Symonds' Cycles are best low priced machines in the world, hundreds being sold weekly. Order now to save money. Address:—
SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 66 Hatton Garden, London.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

From 1s. weekly. Special Offer. £12 16s 0d. Sample for £6 6s. Carriage paid. PLATED RIMS, FREE WHEELS, RIM BRAKE FITTED FREE. Agents wanted.—DERBHAM ROAD CYCLE CO., NORWICH.

THE PREPARATION THE PEOPLE SWEAR BY.

Mr. GEO. R. SIMS'

"TATCHO"

FOR THE HAIR AND FOR THE LACK OF HAIR.

A feature the public will have observed in the "Tatcho" Announcements is the publication of the Full Name and Address of the grateful user.

"Reason to be satisfied."
"Castries, St. Lucia, B. W. Indies, April 11th, 1902.
"I have every reason to be satisfied with 'Tatcho' and mean to recommend it strongly."—(Mrs.) H. MITCHELL.

"Superior to all."
"23 Albert St., Belfast, April 17th, 1902.
"I find 'Tatcho' superior to all other dressings."—(Mrs.) JANE SEMPLE.

"Excellent."
"Chetwynd, Bassett, Southampton, April 22nd, 1902.
"We all find 'Tatcho' excellent for our hair."—(Mrs.) A. BEATTY.

DISTRIBUTION OF TRIAL BOTTLES.

4/6 FULL-SIZE BOTTLE FOR 1/10 POST FREE.

To secure one of these Trial Bottles, apply to your Chemist or Stores, or write to us mentioning "Short Stories." Post your letter to "Tatcho" Offices, 81 Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, W.C., accompanied with postal order for 1/10, and we will post to your address direct in plain package one of the special full size 4/6 bottles of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' "Tatcho."

"TATCHO" is a brilliant, spirituous tonic, the colour of whisky, free from all grease.

"TATCHO" is not a dye, and contains no colouring matter or any harmful ingredient.

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the world in bottles at 1s., 2s. 9d., and 5s., in addition to the special trial size referred to.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street London, W.C.

MASTERS' KEYLESS SIX PRIZE MEDAL SOLID SILVER LADIES' WATCH.

30/- 30/-

£1 10 0

honestly worth double.

Modern improvements and up-to-date methods have reduced the cost a half in the making of this watch. Ten years ago you would have had to pay 60/- for a keyless watch as good as the one we now offer you for 30/-.

You could not have a better or more reliable Watch than

MASTERS' 30/-
SIX-PRIZE-MEDAL WATCH

and our popular credit system will allow you to own it and pay for it in small payments of

5/- PER MONTH.

A Fully Jewelled Keyless Watch Warranted for Seven Years - £1 10 0

SPECIAL CREDIT PAYMENT.

J. N. Masters Ltd. supply this watch on convenient monthly payments. First send 2/6 and watch will be sent you on approval. If satisfactory, send 2/6 more on receipt and 5/- each month for five months; or if you send the full amount we give you as cash discount. Your money back if watch does not satisfy you and is returned at once.

A STERLING SILVER ALBERT FREE

CATALOGUE (1,500 Illustrations) POST FREE.
AGENTS wanted. Write for particulars.

J. N. MASTERS LTD., Dept. 201, WATCHMAKERS, RYE, SUSSEX

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH

Should you have any difficulty in obtaining supplies, two 6½d Tins will be sent Postage Free, (with address of nearest Dealer) on receipt of P.O. or Stamps for 1/-.

Manufrs—THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH Co Ltd, LEEDS St LIVERPOOL

Chapman's ENTIRE-WHEAT Food

IS NOTHING NEW, BUT HAS Without Advertisement Stood the test of 30 years.

Every Physician knows that it contains the Greatest Nutriment in Smallest Compass.

BUILDS & SUSTAINS THE BODY.

Stocked by all Chemists.

CHAPMAN'S FOOD COMPANY, BATTERSEA.

MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very Large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

"KKOVAH"

FLAVORED ONLY WITH RIPE FRUIT JUICES.

SUTCLIFFE & BINGHAM Ltd No 7, 'KKOVAH' WORKS MANCHESTER

JELLIES

You can run

with ease—walk with pleasure—jump for joy and dance with comfort, after using

M. F. THOMPSON'S
(FOOT COMFORT)

CORN PLASTER.

It is thin like silk—easily applied—most effective in use, and quickly cures the most obstinate corns, bunions, or enlarged toe joints. PACKETS, 1/1½ post free from

M. F. THOMPSON, Homœopathic & Dispensing Chemist,
17 GORDON STREET, GLASGOW.

Ask for Thompson's "Guide to Health and Beauty," FREE.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London W.C.

Digitized by Google

No. 707.) Week Ending July 19th, 1902. (Price One Penny.

SHORT STORIES

A KODAK for 5/-

The No. 1 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2½ by 2½ inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 BROWNIE is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK

The No. 2 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3¼ by 2½ inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Everset time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of

KODAK LTD., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, W.C.

LET'S TALK OF GRAVES'

"Enterprise" Parcel 25/- Shakespeare.

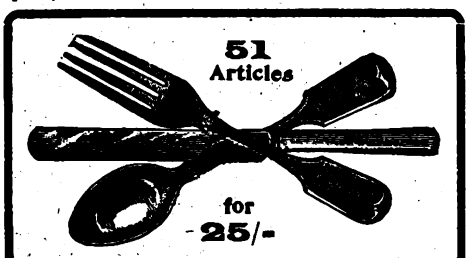
Contents: 6 Table Knives, 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Knives, 6 Dessert Forks, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 1 Pair Sugar Tongs, 2 Table Spoons, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Silver Mounted Bread Knife.



J. G. GRAVES is the only Manufacturer who supplies the public direct, and the whole of the Goods are manufactured in the Firm's own Factory in Sheffield.

HOW TO PAY. Send 3s. with order and complete purchase in six more monthly payments of 3s. and one of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment.

If you are not satisfied, return the Parcel, and your deposit will be refunded in full.

No. 1 ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE. POST FREE.

GOOD AGENTS wanted in every town and village. Good Commission. Apply for terms and particulars.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 67 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Walnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

1902 MODELS NOW READY

IT IS THE LAW of common sense that a firm could not sell cycles on instalments, expecting persons to pay while using the machines, unless they were really strong, handsome, and easy riding. We have sold over 15,000 cycles on easy payments; invariable satisfaction given. We deal with all classes of people. Prices £4 to £8 for warranted cycles. Catalogue free. Mention this paper. SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 66 Hatton Garden, London.

KEATING'S POWDER KILLS BUGS FLEAS FLIES BEETLES

TINS 3d. 6d. 1s-BELLOWS 9d.

THE ONLY EFFICACIOUS SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

ABSOLUTELY PURE.

NO PRESERVATIVES USED.

(Really Genuine). In Patent Air-tight Tins.

½-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin & Postage.

Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, DEVON.

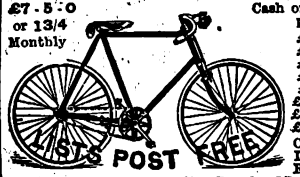
JUNO CYCLES

ARE THE VERY BEST FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN. Free Wheels. Carriage paid to all parts.

£7.5.0 or 13/4 Monthly

Cash or 12 monthly payments.

£7 5s. ...	13/6
£7 15s. ...	14/3
£8 8s. ...	15/0
£9 5s. ...	16/8
£9 15s. ...	17/6
£11 0s. ...	20/0
£11 11s. ...	21/0
£15 0s. ...	28/0



Corsair Plated Lamp, 2/9; A1 Rim Brake, 6/6; Scorcher Brake, 1/-. Cyclist Poncho, 2/9. Write at once for New Season's List of over 100 pages and over 500 illustrations of JUNO CYCLES and latest cycling accessories at lower prices than any other house. Sent Post Free. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd., S.Y. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate St. Without, London, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very Large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Short Stories

No. 707.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending July 19th, 1902.

Murder by Speaking Tube.

A Powerful Narrative in Two Parts, of which this is the first.

By EDWIN S. HOPE.

CHAPTER I.

There was a skeleton in the house of Dr. Featherstone, where old Mrs. Peake, a wealthy old lady who had lost her only child, a son, in the South African War, was staying as a paying guest—not, be it understood, in the character of an invalid. Mrs. Peake was not the skeleton. She was rather the elderly household fairy who, without knowing it, frequently waved the magic wand which kept the skeleton mostly invisible.

Mrs. Featherstone was pretentious and extravagant; that was one part of it, and for another her husband was accustomed to instal a locum tenens from time to time without regard to holiday seasons, and hie him to London and elsewhere with a frequency highly detrimental to his dwindling Boscall practice.

The doctor was supposed to be engaged on a great medical work, and the eccentric Mrs. Peake, who seemed to be gradually transferring to him the love she had once lavished on her son, took a fussy but unintelligent interest in his unspecified studies, and petted and coddled him on his brain-weary returns from the excursions referred to. She had, through her cheque book, a part in the furtherance of the great "work" of which she was extremely proud.

Mrs. Featherstone observed this comedy with furtive contempt. She knew that her husband's lapses from regular work were due to distaste for steady exertion and a passion for cards and horse-racing which were relics of more prosperous times. Consequently, she had for his "studies" an attitude of alternate sympathy and reproach, according to whether they temporarily made him or broke him.

One way and another things had now reached a crisis, and Doctor Featherstone had been experiencing a domestic bad quarter of an hour.

"If it were not for that dear old lady upstairs we should have been in a pretty mess before this, my dear," he said. "It was a fortunate day when she insisted on helping me in my researches; and a happy turn that made her cause that help to be periodic. You always get a share of the money, you know, so you have little room to talk."

All rights reserved.]

Mrs. Featherstone flushed. "It makes me feel horrible, Fred," she said. "It is mean of us! It would be nicer for me, you will admit, if you could make the money properly out of an increasing practice such as yours ought to be. And suppose anything happened to this paying guest of ours? If she died? In your position, which they will define, I am sure, as her doctor-in-charge, you have no right to accept such large gifts. I am afraid you could be made to disgorge."

"Don't!" Featherstone winced and flushed.

"You deserve to have the fact put brutally."

"There is no fear, as it happens. I will tell you. Do you know why I show such delicacy about taking her help?—why I say I could not cold-bloodedly take a cheque to the bank and receive her money?—why I declare that if anybody had a hint of the thing I should die of shame?"

"I have not accused you of real delicacy, have I? Why have you gone through all that performance? It has hurt me, Freddie dear, more than the taking of the money."

"I have gone through that performance, woman——"

"How dare you——"

"I have gone through that performance, woman," he repeated, and his face took on an ugly blotchy pallor, "because it has always ended in the poor deluded creature drawing the cheque to self, cashing it herself and bringing me the money. She respects my feelings"—a tinge of colour came back to his face—"and never a soul knows but ourselves that the money comes to me at all. Poor Mrs. Peake, she is a bit wearying."

Mrs. Featherstone, mimicking the old lady, smoothed her husband's brow with her jewelled white hand and murmured affectedly, "The dear doctor!—his poor tired brain! I know what these headaches are."

"She's as good as gold, though."

"You certainly find her so."

"And you. I won't have a word said against her," said Featherstone in a sharp outburst of loyalty; "she has been a mother to us both since she came here. Now, what have you to say?"

"Only that you make me a little bit sick, Freddie dear."

Featherstone smarted over this for hours. Before the day was out, however, he had an unexpected triumph which he felt would restore him somewhat in the esteem of his pretty, extravagant wife. The paltriness of his conduct he knew he could never justify, and he had in him manliness enough to make him shrink in the consciousness of it. But he knew that his wife would overlook much if only the family finances could be placed on a sounder basis.

Digitized by Google

The event of the day was a respectful summons to the office of Mrs. Peake's solicitors.

The firm, assembled both in an impressive manner, began by congratulating him—one kindly, fat-headed, white-whiskered old gentleman on either side holding a hand and working an arm up and down with a suggestion in the act peculiarly significant of first aid to the drowning.

"It is a bit unusual," began the senior partner pressing him gently into an easy chair, "but the fact is, it is by the wish of our client, Mrs. Peake, that we have asked you to make this call. Her emotions would not allow her to impart a certain—ah—matter to you herself, so we are desired to acquaint you with the fact that she has to-day executed a will in which she leaves you everything."

"Ab-so-lute-ly everything!" said the junior in an unctuous echo. "It is, of course, very unusual——"

"Very," said the senior, "but Mrs. Peake insists upon it, and what can we say? I mean," he added hastily, "unusual to have the one benefitted informed—particularly in such circumstances as these. You are overcome, my dear sir, and no wonder! A glass of wine, perhaps?"

"It is all right now," said Featherstone faintly, and he turned abruptly round in his chair and laid his head on his hand.

Strange to say, his first thought had been—the thought arising from his perfect knowledge of Mrs. Peake's character—"A thousand to one but the old girl, with all her emotion, will want to see me at the earliest possible moment to judge how I have taken the news!" And as he was thinking he caught sight of the dim shape of her towering bonnet bows intercepting some of the light which fell from the corridor windows on the glass panel of the door. The "old girl" was eavesdropping.

"I refuse it!" he exclaimed. "Why, great heavens, Hylton—and you know it, Wilks—if this were known I should be ruined."

"A ruin worth forty odd thousand pounds," said Hylton softly as he eyed him keenly.

"I value my reputation at a higher price than that," said Featherstone hotly. "You surely don't think I refer to my beggarly Boscall practice, do you? I am working quietly for something wider than that. My book — but, really, gentlemen, this is kind of the dear lady. She has been a mother to me."

"Well, this looks particularly like it, doesn't it?" said Mr. Hylton rubbing his hands and smiling pleasantly. "Wish somebody would be a mother to us, eh, Wilks?"

The old boys chuckled in unison and poured out for each other glasses of port.

"I can't accept it, I can't!" said Featherstone in a tone of anguish suggestive of refusing a dose of cod-liver oil. "There will be nasty talk—undue influence ——"

Mr. Wilks coughed. "I certainly suggest," he said, "that you join us in persuading our client to make her home anywhere but in your house. It would look better. The old lady has not a relation in the world and if she chooses to make you her son by adoption who is to say nay? She has all her wits about her; and as for influence—we can speak about that. We have questioned her most earnestly, and her accounts of your diffidence over accepting a sixpence more than the payments for her board—extremely moderate charges, I must say—show us that you have taken no advantage whatever of her infatu—I beg pardon, her intense regard for you—er—hum—ah—what do you say, Mr. Hylton?"

"From what I can see, you have lost money by her, doctor, up to the present."

"Don't! don't!" said Featherstone, thinking what a brick the old lady had been on this very delicate point. "You can't tell how good she has been to me or you would not say such a thing!"

"The dear, dear fellow!" The soft whisper went up to the grimy ceiling of the glass corridor, the old lady's eyes turned up raptly in the same direction, and several weak tears ran down the pretty old apple-streaked cheeks in the direction opposite, while the upstanding bonnet-bows quivered in every silken length with a most luxuriant emotion.

"Of course," said Mr. Hylton, "we are not going to shout the provisions of our client's will from the housetops, but for your sake, when it comes out afterwards, it would be better for Mrs. Peake to resume housekeeping on her own account."

"Never!" arose the whisper without. "He must drive me like a beggar from his doorstep first—and then I will not alter the terms of my will. The dear, dear, doctor!"

Dr. Featherstone had succeeded in making the best of good impressions on the lawyers before he left their office. If there was a suspicion of over-acting about him, the good old gentlemen did not see it, and sent him away with heaps of fatherly advice.

There was a scene at home with the sentimental old lady, out of which Featherstone came with a half submission to Mrs. Peake's wishes, and a character with her for disinterestedness higher than ever. He had actually persuaded her to leave a few thousand pounds to King Edward's Hospital Fund!

"You fool!" gasped his wife when she heard the news, and her joy in the coming wealth was lost in the tears she shed over the odd thousands thus wilfully thrown away.

"You do not see my great wisdom, dear," said he sweetly, "because you are a little blind."

Six months passed before his "studies" called him again to the metropolis—six months of financial worry, deepening debt, and spasmodic fits of household extravagance. Mrs. Featherstone enjoyed a round of galeties during the time, and her husband was in continual dread lest a crash should come and lower him in the eyes of Mrs. Peake, who still remained with him, in spite of gentle and even loving remonstrances.

Then, with a gift of fifty pounds from the old lady, a gift not this time shared with his wife, Dr. Featherstone went up to London for a three weeks' stay.

In three days he returned.

"Minnie," he sobbed, putting his arms round the wondering wife in the hall, "it's all over. We are ruined!"

"Come in here," she said, pulling him into the little dispensary, out of danger of being overheard. "Now what is it?"

"Good-bye to our fortune!" he said wildly. "I have seen young Peake, alive—no mistake, Mary Havers with him—alive, I say, and we are ruined!"

CHAPTER II.

Mrs. Featherstone covered her face with her jewelled hands, leant against the wall and wept bitterly, and her husband watched her with reddened, blinking eyes while he beat out the devil's tattoo on the table beside him.

"When will he be here?" faltered the wife at last, wiping her eyes and trying to force a feeling of calmness.

Digitized by Google

"I don't know."

"Didn't you speak to him?"

"I hadn't a chance. It was at Earl's Court. They were across the lake, and when I got over the bridge they were gone."

"What!" said she, "have you lost your senses? To decide on a mere glimpse like that! It was not young Peake. Why"—she laughed hysterically—"you had been drinking. Go to your room, dear, and wash those silly tearmarks off your unmanly face. The idea! Upsetting me like that. It was Mary's new lover. She has known him a long time. Flirted with him before young Peake went away, they say."

"It was George Thornton Peake, I tell you!" he said with sullen fury. "I have eyes like a falcon. It was George, thinner and with a moustache, but still—George!"

Mrs. Featherstone had certainly heard rumours that Mary Havers, the pretty, peachy-faced, brunette sweetheart George Peake had left behind him, had found another lover since she had gone from Boscall. She had been seen with him by one of the gossiping natives. Less than a week ago this had happened, though—the other particulars had merely grown on to the original piece of gossip.

Mrs. Featherstone had listened with only a languid interest, and had remembered imperfectly. Mary Havers was no favourite of hers, and she had helped to widen a little breach which had grown between the bereaved sweetheart and mother owing to the former having disparaged the doctor before his fond and foolish worshipper. When she had gone with her people from the neighbourhood she was practically forgotten by the doctor's wife.

Again Featherstone insisted on the recognition—he knew the type of face through all the changes.

"Perhaps," suggested his wife, with a sudden fear of her own, "Mary has spited you by looking up some unknown cousin, who may one day contest—stay; have some tea and try to be easy about it. I will contrive to visit Mary Havers—message of reconciliation from Mrs. Peake or something—and I'll find out all I can. Leave it to me."

Featherstone tried to feel hopeful on just that small point of possibility, but he was heavily dejected, all the same.

His wife contrived to call as suggested, but returned in a very much perplexed state of mind.

"That girl is like a black sphinx!" she said angrily, "I can make nothing of her and her maddening, stony smile. It would not do to press too much, but I feel doubtful now. There is something impending. I am getting alarmed!"

"She may well smile, and she would smile wider if she knew about that very useless document—the will."

"Why useless?"

"Because the old cat will have no use for it when her own kitten comes home. It is George right enough. In spite of the ignorance of the War Office I feel sure of it."

"You want to think the worst," said his wife. "I think it is a cousin, dear, I do, really. It may mean contesting the will, but you must be cautious and make the undue influence harder to prove by any next of kin. Hylton and Wilks believe in you?"

"Yes, for I have already borrowed a couple of hundred on the strength of the 'certainty'!"

"You villain! And not a farthing to me! How have you got rid of it?"

"Mind your own business. There are more serious things to think about now."

That was true. They were their two hearts nearly out brooding over them. Mary now began to cultivate the old lady's friendship again, and journeyed over for a brief visit three days in succession. She seemed surprised at the interest shown in her affairs, and was more sphinxlike than ever.

There was an air of thick gloom over the Featherstones, lightened only now and then by lurid flashes of forced gaiety. Poor, flighty-headed Mrs. Peake did not observe any difference in their manner towards her. Perhaps if she had noticed the gloom she would have put it down to their anxiety concerning her health. This for a time had been low, but it was remarkable that the more healthy she became the more of an invalid she believed herself to be. She grew more flighty, conceited, self-centred and fussy every day, and at times was a great trial to the "dear doctor."

"If she would only die!"

That was an unspoken thought. Featherstone had been sitting with the ladies for half an hour without uttering a word. Mrs. Featherstone, also, was more silent than usual, replying to Mrs. Peake's almost ceaseless chatter with a mere word now and then, while she stole anxious looks at her husband's dull eyes and drawn, dragged face.

"The dear boy!" said the old lady, following the younger lady's glance and observing the worried look of the doctor, "it's those nasty, difficult cases, I know it is. They are dreadfully trying, Minnie, I assure you."

She spoke with an air of imparting knowledge to the doctor's wife.

With a tender expression, but an all too fussy manner, Mrs. Peake crossed over and stroked Featherstone's forehead. "There, there!" she said.

"Thank you, dear Mrs. Peake, your touch is so soothing," said he in a half whisper; but the look in his melancholy eyes as he turned them furtively and exchanged glances with his wife was full of anger and disgust, and the thought in his wife's mind was that Mrs. Peake looked like a silly hen fussing over a sick lizard.

"I have a lot of difficult cases," admitted Featherstone, "they take much thought; but I ought not to bring my worries into the drawing-room."

"Can I help you?"

"No," he said aloud—"at least, not yet." He remembered that she had offered to study up so as to one day help him, and that he had given her a lot of obsolete medical works to fool herself with against the day when he should take up that West End London practice.

"Ah," said Mrs. Peake solemnly, touching her own forehead as if posing for a country photographer, "that reminds me. I meant to give an hour to my books this afternoon—half an hour's reading and half an hour's meditation. Forgive me, Frederick, I know I am too ignorant at present! I am—I will not be contradicted—I am far too ignorant! But wait awhile. Be patient with me, and one day I will astonish you!" The stiff black silk dress swished through the portière and she was gone.

"If she could only die!"

The words were not yet spoken, but as the lean-faced little man raised his melancholy eyes to his wife's, some mysterious intercommunication between the two brooding brains awakened the same thought in her head. But Mrs. Featherstone uttered aloud the words which he only formed in his inner soul.

"Minnie!" he said in horrified reproach, but she gave him a glance of defiant recklessness, knowing that he echoed the wish.

His eyes lowered.

"With her money," she said, "you could lift me from Hell to Heaven."

His chin fell lower on his breast.

"She has already given it," pursued the woman, "and it is in a sense ours. It is unfair for it to be taken from us again!"

It must have occurred to her that young Peake, if he truly lived, had some rights in the matter. Her husband must have felt so too. Yet they shared the feeling expressed in her words. Even a thief who picks up a fat purse, but has it reclaimed before he can move off with it, has a sense of being defrauded.

Digitized by Google

Featherstone now spoke openly.

"If she had only died first! In a couple of years or so it would most likely happen in the ordinary way. She is not strong. Without my constant care—you know how I have done my duty, Minnie?—she would not have lasted eighteen months altogether. I have really doubled the last years of her life."

"It is cruel!" she wept. "Why should this fellow turn up now to rob us?"

"You mean," said he desperately, "why has Mrs. Peake lived so long?"

"Only two years to live," she whispered, searching his troubled face with eager eyes—"two years, anyhow. What does it matter? Could you—you are accustomed, every doctor is, to give things to ease, even if it hastens certain death. You know what I mean," she said hurriedly, her eyes groping after a look from his averted face. "It is considered merciful to hasten it in some cases. Many of our ideas about these things are mere conventions—to hasten by minutes is right—by months wrong. I—I should not love you less, Frederick"—she nestled to his shoulder, leaning forward—"it would not make me shrink from you—I swear it solemnly!"

He shrank from her, and shuddered from head to foot.

"Forget what I said," she added quickly, "I am half mad!"

"Never think such a thing again," he whispered, kissing her, and the next moment he had left her.

He was passing Mrs. Peake's sitting-room and was arrested by the sound of the old lady's shaky, high-pitched voice. The door was ajar, and he stood at the turn of a corner beyond to listen. Mrs. Peake was boasting to a caller, another elderly lady. Sad to say, she was, in her silly vanity, telling little untruths in an unblushing manner.

"I am quite a doctor myself, Julia, I am really. Perhaps it would be more correct for me to say doctor's assistant. The dear doctor always—or rather, often—asks my opinion in difficult cases. And, do you know, I repeatedly assist him in the dispensary."

"How delightful!" said the other old lady.

A grim smile stole on the face of Featherstone. There was some foundation for the latter boast. To flatter her vanity, the doctor, when, as now and then he did, he made up a bottle of medicine for a patient, would let her imagine she was helping him! It amused him to see her excitement and childish delight when he would say—"Now, dear Mrs. Peake, be very careful, I implore you—fourth bottle on the right—no, not that shelf, but the one above, and fourth from the other side, not that. Bravo! Thank you. I can use it without looking at the label, though a mistake might easily kill one of my poor patients."

Then she would say, "No, no, doctor! Frederick, you must not trust to me too much. Look at the label, I insist!" And he, pointing to the name on the bottle which had taken three shots to find, would say, "You see, I can trust you!"

A beautiful superstructure upreared itself on this small foundation. It was capped, domed, spired, or cupolad with the following boast:

"I am now beginning to make up prescriptions alone!"

This was startling, and a little annoying. It might be damaging. But the listener reflected that Miss Fryar doubtless did not believe a word she was told.

"'Sul. Quin.,'" said Mrs. Peake affectedly, "I read that, say, and I know at once, of course, that it means Sulphate of Quinine."

"How clever of you. I should never remember!"

"Yes; then, suppose it is 'Io. pot.'—that's tincture of iodine, Julia."

"I should have thought," said the other old lady meekly, "that Io. pot.' meant Iodide—or dine, or something—of potash."

"Oh, dear no," said Mrs. Peake irritably, "you are quite mistaken. That has another little mark over it—and then it means potassium. 'S-i-u-m,' dear, not 'h.' You see the difference, don't you?"

It cannot be denied that Julia's tone in reply bespoke some measure of doubt, and Mrs. Peake's further remarks sounded flurried.

Featherstone tip-toed away.

Later on Mrs. Peake sought him out in the surgery.

"Will you—oh, will you—do me a great great favour?"

"Anything you like to mention," he said recklessly.

"I have been very wicked," she said, wiping a tear from either eye; "I have been boasting and going a little—very little beyond the truth."

"Great Scott!" he thought, "does she think I'm going to be a father to her?"

Her next words showed that this was a very odd penitent. She proposed to cover up the one little sin with another piece of deceit broader and more substantial.

"Show me how to make up a draught for one of my headaches, and let me make it up myself afterwards in the dispensary—without you. Julia is coming to see me again to-morrow afternoon, and she does so greatly admire the outlook from the little dispensary on to the garden. I proposed giving her a cup of tea there if—if—I said to her if I should happen to be in charge during that hour, as I expected to be."

Featherstone looked his surprise.

"Do help me in this," she went on pleadingly. "Julia, Miss Fryar, you know, doubts my having assisted you to dispense. I want to convince and astonish her as well as annoy the spiteful, unbelieving—excuse me, doctor, but I saw her smile in a furtive, unpleasant way, and I was so irritated. Do help me, Freddie! It is a very harmless little deception. You could mark the bottles with numbers '1,' '2,' '3,' and so on, so that I need make no mistake. And more than that, you could tell me something about the more dangerous things, so that I could lift a bottle or two down and talk of their effects so as to make her scream—at least, make her flesh creep a little."

"It cannot be thought of," said Featherstone, with professional sternness. He was so truly in earnest—so annoyed at this injurious sort of foolishness—that Mrs. Peake was frightened and began to weep.

A change came over Featherstone's face as he looked contemptuously down on her. Certain words, his own thoughts a while ago, his wife's outspoken utterance, throbbed in his brain—in time to the rhythmic tortures of a swinging headache.

"If she could but die! If she could but die!"

And here was chance making to his hand!

The conclusion of this story appears in next Tuesday's issue.

Digitized by Google

THE WHITE WITCH OF HENLEY.

An Up-River Love Story.

"ANOTHER quarter of a mile, Sid, and I'll show you just the loveliest thing to be seen on all the river, from Lechlade to Sunbury!"

"What! at this time of night?" (it was striking ten by Shiplake Church clock) derisively replied Sidney Lane over his shoulder, to his companion.

"Ah! there's the beauty of it!" said the latter, triumphantly, "for it's only when the stars are out, that the Queen of the Night is to be seen in all her glory!—as she really is."

Oh!—then it's a woman?"

"A woman!—why, of course!—what else would so move me to enthusiastic praise?" said Ray Maskell, with the suspicion of a sneer in his tone.

"Faith!—I don't know!" said "stroke" drily, "except it were a new edition of the old creation."

The pair-oar was passing Shiplake as Lane uttered this "cut" at his friend's well-known susceptibility of temperament.

Henley, with its snugly anchored house-boats, came dimly into view round the bend, there being just light enough to see the after-dinner crews amusing themselves on deck, while through Nature's silence sounded the tinkle of mandoline or guitar, the merry ripple of girlish voices, and the untranslateable joyous hum which hangs like a summer cloud over the hereabout boat world at this hour.

"There, Sid!—what do you think of that?" whispered Maskell, as their craft came abreast of an unusually large house-boat, moored, alone, under a canopy of leafy greenness. Sidney Lane held his breath, as he ceased rowing, and saw a vision!

Unmistakeably it was a woman—young—fair, and divinely tall—whose almost unearthly pallor gave point to the name by which she was known among the pleasure-loving boating crowd, "the White Witch of Henley."

She had all the appearance of a statue carved in white marble. Everything about her dress—features—hair—gleamed ghost-like, in the misty half shadows of the summer night.

Not a single light showed on the house-boat, so that this figure—weird in its mysterious whiteness against the background of dark trees—standing, statuesquely still, by the outer rail of the upper deck, startled Lane by reason of its utter unlikeness to anything that he had ever seen.

Old Colonel Sir Harry Vinden, K.C.S.I., was the one up-river mystery, people had as yet failed to solve. He—or rather they never sought the society of those who literally burned to penetrate their secret.

Ray Maskell's solution of the problem seemed to be the most popular, as it was certainly, all things considered, the most feasible.

He imparted it to Sidney Lane as they drifted past the silent, dark water-dwelling.

"Who is she?" he said, in answer to a whispered query of his companion's. "Why—the old Colonel's wife! May and December, you know."

"Unless you know anything definite on that head," replied Lane. "I should say that you are wrong."

"I don't think so," said Ray Maskell, testily, "whenever they indulge in an excursion inland (which isn't often) Esmé Vinden invariably takes the old gentleman's arm; while his attitude toward her has the true matrimonial hall-mark."

"That is no proof!" answered the other. "For my own part, I should be inclined to say that she is the old man's daughter."

"You're wrong, old chap! you're wrong! and this, in spite of the fact that the majority of the men are crazy about her."

"And you—are you, too, one of the victims?"

"Why shouldn't I be?"

"I am sure I don't know; only that falling in love with married ladies is just a wee bit—well—bad form, isn't it?"

Sidney Lane, as he bent to his oar again, could not see the evil expression in the other's eyes, so that his thoughts, so strangely stirred by the glimpse he had caught of Esmé Vinden's beautiful, yet death-like face, were undisturbed; while his determination to know more of its fair owner, intensified with every dip of his blade in the rippleless water.

As for Ray Maskell, the implied imputation of bad "form," had viciously sealed his lips.

It was practically two dumb men, therefore, who headed the pair-oar for the boat-house on the left shore.

Lane, who had been staying at Penton Hook, had left there during the afternoon in his friend's boat, for the Henley Regatta week. There was not much in common between the two; Sidney's openness of disposition, and sunny, good-humoured nature, appealing but little to the blasé man of the world.

Still, it is just possible that the former would have gone to his rooms at the "Red Lion" and Maskell to his diggings without, in the case of either of them, anything other than a mere hand-cloud, which the next morning would assuredly dissipate—but for a chance remark of Lane's at parting.

"Do you know the Colonel, and—and Lady Vinden?" he asked.

"Well—no!—I don't," was the evidently reluctant reply.

"But you know about them?" persisted Lane.

"I know, as nearly everybody else knows, that both Sir Harry and—and the lady are absolutely social hermits—that he is quite seventy years of age, while she—Esmé Vinden—wife, or what you will, is barely out of her teens, and that to penetrate the mystery surrounding them, nine men—and for that matter, nine women out of ten, would give more than they could probably afford to lose. But why are you so eager for information with regard to them?"

"Oh, I have a fancy for mysteries—especially one such as this, where the central figure is so weirdly, yet so magnetically fair."

"My dear fellow!—I wouldn't follow up this particular history, if I were you—there's nothing in it—nothing!"

"Perhaps not!—but my curiosity is piqued, and since you it was that raised it, you certainly ought not to be the first to discourage any desire on my part for satisfaction."

Digitized by Google

"Well—do as you please!" retorted Maskell, with an unpleasant laugh, "but take my advice, and bar the Romeo business—and midnight out-pourings of the soul; for people say—and—rumour does not always lie—that the old knight carries his antipathy to all intruders, to the extent of a belief in firearms as an effectual, if not exactly legal preventive. Good-night!"

* * * * *

In the sitting-room of the Iris house-boat, an hour or more after the pair-oar had passed it on the way from Penton Hook, a lady and gentleman sat at a well-appointed supper-table. Although the cabin was well lighted by hanging and bracket crystal lamps, not a ray of light escaped to the outer world, so effectually screened were the windows by means of thick curtains—ventilation, and a free air current obtained through an automatic overhead "punkah."

Erect, alert, and well-preserved to "dandy" point, Sir Harry Vinden looked to have no nonsense about him—was indeed the beau ideal of an old soldier.

His companion, a beautiful girl of eighteen or thereabouts, was remarkable, with regard to her features, for an extraordinary lack of colour. This was accentuated by her style of dress which made in loose, yet clinging robe fashion, was of some soft, dead white material.

The first thought of a stranger would, not unnaturally be—"ill-health."

But Esmé Vinden's ringing laugh—her smile—her infectious flow of joyous, almost child-like spirits, gave the lie to this, and proclaimed her to be a splendid example of Nature's handiwork.

"Esmé!" said Sir Harry, as he drew a wine decanter towards him, "it seems that this desire of mine for perfect peace, and rest, after the heat and turmoil of Indian military life, is going to land you and me—you especially—in a very awkward position."

"How, dad?"

"Why, I heard indirectly to-day, that folks take us, you and I, that is, for husband and wife!"

"Well, I always told you, dad, that to isolate yourself in the very heart of a social colony, such as this is, was a mistake, and that it would most surely have unpleasant, or at least, undesirable results."

"But why should the fact of other people's being fools, prevent me from doing as I like?"

"That's all very well in India, dad; but you see it will not work here."

"No, I see it won't. But my dear, what shall we do? Break out in the opposite direction, and invite all Henley and his wife to feast and frolic?"

"No!—I don't think we will do that, for it would entail the presence of a gentleman whom I especially dislike, although we are personally unacquainted."

"That's odd!—do you know his name?"

"Yes. Prynne discovered it, when she went into Oxford for me yesterday."

"And it is——?"

"Maskell; Ray Maskell. He is most rude."

"In what way?"

"Why, he lets his boat drift past here if he sees me on deck, or at a window, and stares in the most objectionable manner."

"Does he?—then I shall probably have something serious to say to Mr. Ray Maskell, unless he ceases annoying you in this fashion."

"You know how I like to be on deck in the late evening-time?—he has, I suppose, found out this little fad of mine, and for the past three or four evenings, has behaved abominably."

"Has he!—well, it is not far off mid-night now, and the air is lovely. I'll go up with you for a bit, and wait developments. Has this—this gentleman honoured you as yet this evening with his attentions?"

"Not exactly. A couple of hours ago, he passed, with another man, in a pair-oar, and for decency's sake, I suppose, behaved himself."

"Then we may expect another, if a later visit. Brookes! some cushions for my folding chair on deck!"

When the handy man-servant had, under Esmé's directions, placed his master comfortably, the girl leant upon the outer rail, relapsed into silence, and fixed her eyes up-river.

Sidney Lane was one of the best-hearted fellows breathing; one, too, who never "nursed" a wrong done to himself. So it was, therefore, that when, a few paces from the door of the "Red Lion," he overtook his late boat-companion, he persuaded him in to sup with him.

"No!—I won't take any denial! We'll just have a social snack and a pipe, before I turn you out, and turn in."

Ray Maskell would far rather have gone to his own rooms, and talked with himself; but the other was so genially insistent, that he saw no other way out of it, save by a rude refusal.

In free and easy fashion, in their flannels, they discussed their meal, and sat by the open window in Lane's sitting-room, to finish their modest bottle of claret.

"I can't get that girl out of my head," said Lane, after a five minutes awkward silence. "Do you mean to say that nobody knows anything about her?"

"Nobody, and—nothing. Old Sir Harry has been in India, I believe all his military life, and beyond a week in London after his arrival from Calcutta (where, by the way, he saw nobody) this is his first appearance upon the scene."

"I've got an idea that my old governor knew a Vinden in India, but I've been so long in England that I've forgotten."

"Even if it was the same, you would not know the lady, for, as I've said, she is quite young, and could only have married the old chap within the last couple of years, at the very least."

"Ah!—I still hold you to be in error, old man!" said Lane, deliberately—"that girl is no more a wife, than I am a benedict."

"Well, after all, it doesn't matter so very much—she is nothing to you—or—to me."

"No, of course not, how could she be? I don't know her—but there's no saying, I may—I may."

This harping on the one string was evidently having an irritating effect on Ray Maskell, and making him to materialise ideas which, otherwise, he would have let sleep.

"And so may others!—so may I, perhaps!" he blurted out aggressively. "Meanwhile"—lifting his glass above his head—"here's to the lovely mystery of the Upper Thames!—to the "White Witch of Henley'!"

Sidney Lane, who, till the last half dozen words were spoken, was prepared to do honour to the toast, brought his glass down upon the table with such force, that the stem was splintered.

"That," he said hotly, "is surely an insult to the lady. Such a name cannot be applied without offence intended and implied."

"Oh!—as to offence—I meant none!" said Maskell. "I merely—well—gave utterance to a jest."

"Which, on second thoughts, you must agree was ill-timed, if nothing else."

"If you like to have it so—although every man is entitled to his own opinion, isn't he?"

"I suppose so—within limits."

"Come!—don't let us quarrel, Lane, and spoil the good time we hope to have——"

"Quarrel—not I! There's my hand upon it! But I do not feel in the least like going to bed!—I am half inclined to take a midnight spin for an hour—I think I know where my man has stowed my boat."

"Then you're more mad than I gave you credit for being. Good-night!"

* * * * *

It must have been nearly twelve o'clock, when Esmé Vinden suddenly startled her father out of a nap.

"Dad!" she cried. "Dad!—wake up!—there are two single sculls coming down!"

"Hoh—hoh!—this is getting interesting!" said Sir

Digitized by Google

Harry, sitting up, and looking in the direction his daughter was pointing.

"See!—the first one is not Mr. Maskell!—I am sure it is not! The second one keeps a good distance behind—and in the shadow of the bank. I don't think the first one sees him."

"Number two must be watching number one, then, I should say," remarked the old gentleman.

"Now number one puts on a spurt!" cried Esme, excitedly, "and the other is pulling out into mid-stream!"

By this time, the foremost boat was within snap-shot distance of the Iris.

The sculler, who was now clearly conscious of his pursuer's presence, showed no sign of slackening speed, and, though casting an earnest look at the house-boat, would, no doubt, have kept on his course.

But the man in the craft behind had soon, by dint of strenuous exertions, brought the bow of his boat right up till it touched the stern-post of the one in front.

His object was to get the inner or left bank side. This, number one did his utmost to prevent, shouting out to the other to keep clear.

"You rascal!" roared Sir Harry from the deck of the Iris—"I'll find out who you are, and have you posted everywhere!"

Then, a shriek from Esme—the overturning of the second boat, and the disappearance of its owner in the water.

"Hi!—Brookes!—scull out the dinghy!—the fellow mustn't drown! Why, the chap he tried to run down has gone in after him!—Good boy!—good boy! He's got him into his own boat! He's sculling to us! Here!—Esmé—go down, and see about some hot flannels, and things!"

In less than ten minutes, Ray Maskell was lying, breathing stertorously, on the couch in the sitting-room of the Iris.

It must be confessed that Esmé, womanly and tender though she was to her finger-tips, gave the most of her attention to Sidney Lane's watery condition.

Here was a man, she said to herself, who actually risked his own life to save that of the coward who had done his best to drown him.

"Yes, sir," said Sir Harry, emphatically, and when Lane had duly introduced himself, "I'm proud to know you! and if you were only the same flesh and blood as my old comrade Archie Lane, commanding in Poonah ten years ago, why! I'd be the happiest man in all England."

"Do you mean General Lane, now commanding in Ceylon?"

"Yes—yes!"

"Well, I am his son, if——"

"His son!—Archie's son!—God bless you, my boy!—you've just done what your father would have done!—Esmé!"

But Esmé had gone up on deck again.

"Go up and bring her down, Sidney—why, of course. I remember you know, as a baby—baby Sid, your father used to call you!—go up and bring my Esmé down!"

But it was a longer operation than the patience of the old soldier could stand, so stumping up the companion, he broke in upon their tête-à-tête.

He found them—both leaning upon the rail; Sidney pouring into her ear, Othello-wise, some wonderful story, maybe, of adventure by flood or field.

And this was by no means the end of it, for, the spell being once broken, Sidney Lane took good care that, so far, at least, as he was concerned, it should never again haunt the Iris or its mistress.

Ray Maskell came to himself before daylight, and getting into his recovered and "righted" boat, pulled away, and was seen no more.

* * * * *

Lane—Vinden.—On September the 5th, at St. George's, Hanover Square, Esmé, only daughter of Colonel Sir Harry Vinden, K.C.S.I., to Sidney, only son and heir of General Sir Archibald Lane, K.C.B., D.S.O.; commanding in Ceylon.

It is not curious, that from the night Ray Maskell was saved from drowning by Sidney Lane, the "White Witch" disappeared from Henley, and, to the astonishment of the wiseacres, has never been seen there since.

Ralph Enderby.

Hugging.

A North country paper, to encourage hugging in the locality in which it is published, says: "A Liverpool man, while hugging his girl one evening, received a telegram stating that he had fallen heir to a fortune."

The paper is right in its efforts to stimulate a healthy sentiment in favour of hugging, but it does wrong to hold out such inducements, as it will not be one time in ten thousand that a man, while hugging a girl, will receive such a dispatch.

He will oftener receive a dispatch bound in leather, from the girl's father, which will inform him that he has fallen over a doorstep, and is heir to a lame back.

There should be no money consideration in a case of hugging, and no hope of falling heir to anything. It is fortune enough for a man to have a girl to hug.

Hugging can never become what it should be, our great national recreation and enjoyment, our picnic, as it were, until all thought of outside matter is eliminated from it, and the hugging is simply done, for instance, because there is a good opportunity and no one to say nay.

The difference in hugging can readily be seen by those who have done a little of it themselves, if they go to a theatre and watch the actors and actresses.

It is not once in a hundred times that hugging on the stage is done because both parties like it, but it is always done for money, at so much a week, and wardrobe furnished.

The actor puts his arm round the actress as though he were holding up a sign, and the actress smiles a two-for-a-penny smile and looks as though she was taking pills.

We have often seen a couple of lovers in the audience, who probably know scientific hugging when they see it, look at this stage hugging and curl up their lips with scorn, and look at each other as much as to say:—

"If we were on the stage playing that scene we would give the audience something for their money."

Occasionally a couple of stage lovers unbend themselves, and get in a hug or two that breaks a string; but in those cases one or the other blushes and looks round at the wings to see whether the actor's wife or the actress' husband is looking.

There has got to be a certain amount of fellow-feeling between the hugger and the huggee, or it is a mere matter of form and not worth the price of admission.

Sometimes we think we would like to go on the stage and give some of those actors a few points that would be of great benefit to them in their business; but if we should offer to do so they would probably impute sinister motives to us, and hit us.

It is not that we would care for the hugging, but the advancement of art.

There are some actresses that the best hugger in the world could not hug and feel that he had got the worth of his money, and there are others when an actor would be justified in playing without a salary and boarding himself, just for one hug per evening, and Wednesday and Saturday matinees.

D. Huggins.

All Amateur Photographers Should Possess

HOW TO TAKE AND FAKE PHOTOGRAPHS.

The book costs 1s. at all Railway Bookstalls, Booksellers, etc., or post free for 1s. 2d. from

THE BOOK PUBLISHER, 17 HENRIETTA ST., W C.

Digitized by Google

A TERRIBLE ERROR.

Which, after Nearly Ruining Three Lives, was Happily Rectified.

"THANK Heaven, that burden has rolled off my shoulders at last!" exclaimed Matthew Wadleigh, as he counted out and rolled together £30 in Bank of England notes. "That," he continued, as he placed an elastic band round the roll, and put it in his breast pocket, "pays the last penny of the mortgage on the little home, and it shall be a birthday surprise for the wife. Dear little Nina," he thought, "how hard she has tried to help me, and now, please God, we can take things a little easier for the rest of our lives," and with a lighter heart than he had possessed for the past five years, he locked his desk, took down his hat, gave it a thoughtful brush, and flecking some dust from his coat, left the office.

So happy was he that the dear little home was at last to be all his own, freed from all incumbrances, that he could not refrain from whistling a merry air as he waited for his 'bus, and all the way home his mind was busy with what Nina would say, and how her face would light up with pleasure when he should show her the money, and tell her that the only cloud which had in any way darkened their five years of wedded life, would at last be lifted, and that henceforth nothing but the bluest and brightest of skies would shine upon her; for Matthew Wadleigh was still very much in love with his wife, in spite of those five years.

"I think I'll wait until to-morrow before I tell her, and then Metcalf will be gone and we shall be by ourselves once more," he said to himself as he ran up the steps of his home.

Metcalf was a friend of his boyhood days, of his youth, and of his manhood; a most eccentric fellow, of a sombre, taciturn disposition, and few liked him, because few knew him well enough to know the finer qualities of the man. There was something repellant in his manner, a something which seemed to surround him in mystery, which none dared for an instant to try to penetrate. Yet, for all this, he and Wadleigh had been drawn together most strangely when they were boys, and as they grew to manhood and Wadleigh never questioned him regarding himself or his family, the friendship had continued, and after Wadleigh had married and had a home of his own, both he and his wife had always made Metcalf most welcome, whenever business or inclination called him in that direction.

Now Metcalf was going away for an indefinite period, and had been making his farewell visit. To-morrow he was to leave, and Wadleigh was not a bit sorry, for the cosy, pleasant evenings that Nina and he spent together could once more be resumed. All this was passing through his mind as he entered the hall, and there he saw a man's hat and overcoat on the rack. For an instant he wondered to whom it could belong, and then saw it was Metcalf's. "Wonder what brought him home so early," he muttered, and then remembering he was to leave early the next morning, continued: "I suppose he came home to pack up." He was about to pass up the stairs in search of Nina, who evidently had not heard him enter, when his attention was arrested by the sound of voices which reached him from the drawing-room. Pausing a moment until he made sure it was his wife's voice he heard, he crossed the hall to the drawing-room door, which was slightly ajar, but across which a curtain was drawn, hiding the inmates from view. His wife was speaking and with no intention of listening, the words he heard held him spellbound. "I never dreamt of this, Herbert!" he heard her say, and then he only caught a word or two—"you can never know—happiness—two people"—— Here Metcalf's voice broke in—"could only persuade you—never regret—life-long—to repay——"

Wadleigh's brain whirled, and for an instant he was powerless to move. What could it mean? He could not even think; but one thought was in his mind, could it be?—here he grasped the back of a chair for support, while an iron ball of a ton's weight seemed to drop into his heart.

A movement behind the curtains, the voices coming nearer, the words: "God bless you, little woman, for the comfort your assurance gives me," brought him to himself. With long strides he noiselessly crossed the hall entered his own "den," and locked the door.

He sank into a chair, and sat there like one in a dream, and as one in a dream hears voices, so the words he had heard sung themselves over and over in his brain.

At length his reason came to his rescue, and, springing to his feet, he shook himself and muttered: "What a fool I am making of myself! What if I can't explain it—Metcalf, my old friend, the last man in the world for me to mistrust, and the last man on earth to make love to anyone! And Nina, my own little Nina, of whom I have never had a suspicion! Yes, I must be a fool!"

He determined to put the whole thing away from him; he would not even ask her about it; he knew she would tell him when she had an opportunity, after Metcalf had gone; and then as he heard her coming towards his room, he rose and opened the door for her.

"Why, Matt," she exclaimed, putting up her lips for his usual kiss, "I didn't hear you when you came; why didn't you call me, dear?" As much as he determined to forget the incident which had so unnerved him, he could not help noticing the flush upon her cheeks, and a little nervousness in her manner. He drew her into the room, and putting his arm around her, lifted her face to his as he answered her, "Yes, dear, I came home a little early, as this is to be Metcalf's last evening with us," and then as he looked long and earnestly into the blue eyes, he asked: "Tell me, darling, will you be sorry when Metcalf is gone?"

She looked at him in surprise for an instant, and then laughingly said: "What a queer question for you to ask me, Matt! I am indeed sorry for the poor fellow, he seems so alone in the world, and always so sad. I am sure he must have had some great trouble in his life, and if he can find any comfort with us, I am always glad to have him come; but you have heard of people who make you twice glad, haven't you? Well, he is one of that kind. I am always glan when he comes, and glad when he goes, for, Matt, dear, you know we can always have much nicer times when we are all by ourselves!" and she nestled up to him in such a purring little confiding way that, as he stroked the shining brown head, he despised himself for ever having had a thought of ill regarding her.

Digitized by Google

In spite of himself, he watched Metcalf a little closely during the evening, and knew that it was not his imagination that Metcalf's unusual cheerfulness was forced, and that at times his mind seemed ill at ease and far away. Long after Nina had retired for the night, the two men sat together over their cigars, and more than once Wadleigh caught his friend looking at him with a most peculiar expression. At length he drew a long sigh, and said: "Well, old boy, we have been friends a long time, and you have always been good to me, have always trusted me, and I want to say to-night that you little know the good you have done me—but—I feel that this is the end"—speaking slowly, and then he continued, his voice filled with emotion: "God only knows how and when we shall meet again—if ever—but I want you to always think as kindly of me as you can, for you who have everything that makes life dear to a man, can never know the desolation of my heart and life!"

While he had been speaking, Wadleigh's face had been growing paler and paler, his lips were dry and colourless, and now he sprang to his feet, his breath coming thick and fast, and exclaimed: "For Heaven's sake, Metcalf, do you know what you are saying? In Heaven's name, what do you mean?"

Metcalf was a little surprised at the undue excitement manifested by his friend, but looking at him intently, while he gently blew the smoke from his mouth, he answered: "Some time you will know, old chum; perhaps sooner than you think. Many a time since I have been here, I have been tempted to open my heart to you—but no, the time will come when you will understand all. Let the mystery, which you have never sought to penetrate, remain. Why, Matt, old boy, don't look like that; here, drink this," and he poured him a glass of wine, "and then we'll change the subject." Wadleigh's brain had grown more and more confused as Metcalf's strange words came to him, and he could only formulate one idea, until at last he found himself trembling in every limb. Metcalf's reference to his condition, and the wine which he eagerly swallowed, brought him to himself, and calmed his nerves somewhat.

He forced a harsh and cheerless laugh as he said: "Your words were enough to give anyone the horrors! What are you going to do, commit murder or suicide? Perhaps it might save trouble all round if you did open your heart to me, and perhaps I could help you!" But, no; Metcalf, seeing in what state Wadleigh's nerves were, led him away from the subject, to talk of other things.

At last Wadleigh was left alone, and then all the suspicions and fears which had so harassed and unnerved him since his return from the office came back to him with renewed force. Again he went over the words he had heard fall from his wife's lips; again the thought of the something odd in the manner of both during the evening, a strained effort it had seemed to him, to act natural, and then the unfathomable mystery of Metcalf's words!—was there a connection in it all—why was he left so alone in the dark, if they did not intend to—! "O, pshaw," he finally exclaimed, "it can't, it can't be that; beside, a man doesn't generally come to a man and tell him so, if he contemplates—robbing him! and that makes me think," he continued, and pushing back his chair, he took the roll of bank notes from his pocket, that he had placed there with such gladness of heart, and crossing the room to a little desk, placed the money in a secret drawer and locked it, thoughtlessly leaving the key in the lock.

The sight of the money, and the remembrance of its mission, served in a measure to divert his mind from the problem he had been trying to solve, and resolving to ask Nina what it all meant, the next day, he turned out the gas and sought his own room.

* * * * *

The next morning it seemed ages to Nina before Metcalf and her husband finally took their departure. As Wadleigh left the house, he turned back to give Nina another kiss, remarking as he did so: "I shall be home earlier to-night, and I have a little surprise for you; be careful of yourself, and now good-bye"; but the next instant, as he turned to join his friend, he saw a glance of understanding pass between the two as Metcalf raised his hat to her.

An hour or so later Nina came down stairs dressed in outdoor things, a small bag in her hand. She called to the servant and told her she need not prepare lunch for her, as she could not tell at what hour she would be home. As she passed the door of the "den," she glanced round the room, and her eye fell upon the keys still hanging in the private drawer where her husband had left them the night before. Of course her woman's curiosity prompted her to unlock and look into the drawer, before she put the keys away for safer keeping, and she gave a cry of delight when she spied the roll of notes. "So this is the surprise he had in store for me," she said to herself as she took the elastic band from the roll and counted the money. "Perhaps he will be the one to be surprised, after all," she continued, as she lovingly fingered the bills, and then her better self whispered to her and told her to place the money where she had found it—but no, she had hesitated too long, the temptation was too great, and taking the roll again from the drawer, locked it, put the keys where they were kept, and left the house.

If she could only have known the bitter misery which was to overwhelm three lives on account of her silence in regard to the errand that sent her forth from her home that morning she would have hesitated long before she had yielded to Metcalf's persuasions.

That was an awful day for Wadleigh. After seeing the train depart which bore Metcalf away, and feeling at the time as though he never wanted to see him again, he turned his steps towards the office. It was in vain he strove to fix his mind on the duties of the day; between him and the piles of papers on his desk floated the fair face of his wife, and when he tried to read the morning's mail, the words all blurred before his eyes, and then formed themselves into the snatches of words Metcalf had uttered. Every time the telephone bell rang, every time a rap sounded on the office door, the perspiration stood upon his forehead in great drops. He was over-shadowed during all the long, troubled day with a foreboding of coming ill, of some calamity which he was sure was to overtake him before many hours. Time and time again he found himself wondering if Nina was all safe at home, and more than once was on the point of sending a messenger to the house, to find that all was well, and then thinking better of it, would try to assure himself that it would be utter nonsense, and that it would only startle Nina. And so the weary hours dragged themselves away, and with the most hysterical haste he prepared to leave the office. It seemed an interminable length of time before the 'bus came along, and when it did come it crawled along so slowly that he jumped out and hailed a cab. In a few minutes his home was reached, but to his dismay it was in darkness. This need have given him no alarm, but the feeling of some horror about to fall upon him, and which had hung over him all day, so increased in intensity that it was with the trembling limbs of an old man he ascended the steps. He entered the hall—darkness and silence—no cheery voice called to him, no sound broke the stillness.

Digitized by Google

He found the way to his own room, and rang the bell. He heard the servant light the lights in the hall, as she came to him, and then, "When did Mrs. Wadleigh go out, Kate, and did she say when she would be home?"

He made no movement, expressed no surprise when she answered: "She left the house about an hour after you did, sir, and told me I need not prepare lunch as she did not know when she would be home. Shall I serve dinner now, sir?"

"No, I want nothing now," he answered, and she went out and left him alone with his misery. The blow had fallen! His fears were realised, his impressions had been correct; Nina was as false-hearted as every other woman that ever lived—they were all alike, not one could be trusted—and Metcalf—his friend—the man who had shared the comforts of his home, had sat at his table and eaten his bread! "O, fool, fool, fool!" he exclaimed, why didn't I understand and kill him before he ever left the house?—and he had just the same as told him—told him what—that he was about to rob him of his all. Was that what he had meant by his mysterious words of the night before?—and he wanted Wadleigh to always think kindly of him! What a smooth villain he was, to be sure, to make such a fool of him! But Nina, he might have saved her—but no, if she preferred such a contemptible thing as Metcalf to himself, why, what could he have done?—but Metcalf? Yes, he understood it all now, and even as Metcalf had said, sooner than he expected. O, if he had only killed the man—but there was yet time. Oh, yes, he would surely kill him sometime. Then he glanced round the room with the eyes of a raving maniac, to find the little note he felt sure Nina had left for him; it would be pinned to a pin-cushion, or perhaps in a corner of the mirror; that was what they always did, and it would read something like this: "I hope you will forgive us, but I have learned to love him better than I do you. I know you will soon forget me, and try to be happy without me." And then he gave forth a laugh that was horrible to hear.

How still the house was, as though death was there.

Hark! a carriage was driving slowly towards the house—perhaps there had been an accident and they were bringing Nina home dead to him. Would to God they were—she would still be his! But no, the carriage had passed the house. As his eyes turned from the window they lingered a moment on the desk. Hardly knowing what he was doing, he rose and tottered to it, and after a moment's feeble work, he unlocked and drew out the private drawer—it was empty, the bank notes were gone! With one long, bitter wail of "Nina, oh, God, a thief beside!" he threw up his hands and fell heavily to the floor.

How long he lay there he never knew, but when at last he opened his eyes, the first faint streaks of a dull, grey morning were creeping in through the windows.

It was with great difficulty that he raised himself and crossed the room. As he caught a glimpse of himself in the mirror, he gave a startled cry, for the face he saw reflected there, was drawn and shrivelled like that of an old man, and his hair was white as snow!

What did it matter, he said to himself; it was better so. The old life, the old self, was dead, dead, dead, and now the only object in life was to seek out and to slay so foul a thing as Metcalf, and then—oblivion forever.

* * * * *

A year had passed. One evening a stranger entered a hotel in the North of England. He asked for a room, and after signing the register, strolled into the smoking-room, took up a newspaper, and began to read. Soon his attention was called to two men, engaged in earnest conversation, seated not far from him. The one facing him was short and thick-set, while the one whose back was turned was tall and slight of build, had bent shoulders, and a head of snow-white hair.

"That's queer," the stranger said to himself, as their voices became louder, "I would have taken my oath that was Matt Wadleigh's voice, and it looks like his form, only so much older—it can't be him with that white hair!" And he turned to his paper again. But the next instant he heard the stout man exclaim: "I'll tell you what it is Wadleigh——" The stranger waited to hear no more, but hurriedly rose from his seat, and crossing the room laid his hand on the shoulder of the man he had heard called Wadleigh, and said: "Can this be you, indeed, old friend—why—Matt—in Heaven's name, what does this mean?"

At the touch and the first words uttered by Metcalf, for it was him, Wadleigh had sprung to his feet, his face like that of one dead—a cold, cruel glitter in his eyes; his breath was drawn in hard, dry gasps, and his lips and hands twitched convulsively. He shuddered again and again as he shook off the hand upon his shoulder. At last he hissed between his tightly-closed teeth:

"So I have found you at last, you ——! Five minutes more and my work will be done, and you—you will be in perdition, the place you came from, you black-hearted scoundrel!"

His hand stole towards a bulging pocket.

"I have been prepared for you a long time, you see, but before I send you to your doom, you shall tell me what you have done with the woman you——"

"For God's sake, Wadleigh," broke in Metcalf, "you are either insane or else you are under some horrible delusion."

Metcalf's face had also grown white as was the other's, and, as Wadleigh mentioned a woman, a terrible fear of he knew not what came into his heart; but he controlled himself, and, without showing any personal fear, he continued:

"I don't mind your using that weapon on me any time you like, for God knows my life is bitter enough; but if you are going to give me five minutes, let's use it in straightening out this affair. You have suffered enough to kill ten men, I can see that by your looks; but as that God, before whom I am so soon to stand, is my witness, I have had nothing to do with it, so far as I know, and it is only just to me that you should explain yourself!"

The earnestness with which the man spoke, the utter absence of anything like guilt in his eyes, his fearlessness, all served to sooth and calm the excited man. He was still trembling, and he handed his neat little revolver, a weapon he had carried ever since the fatal day, to one of the by-standers, saying: "Take it, lest I kill him before his time." Then turning to Metcalf, he said: "You fooled me once with your smooth-tongued lies, and escaped me, but now you shall tell me the truth, and then—you shall not escape me!" And he ground his teeth and his eyes flashed fire. After a moment of silence, in which the two men stood looking into each other's eyes, Wadleigh continued, while a sob choked his voice: "Tell me what you have done with the woman you stole from my home, and whose soul you will have to answer for."

A look of horror came into Metcalf's eyes, as he stepped nearer to Wadleigh and said: "Matt, I don't know, I can't imagine what you mean, but I have never laid eyes on your wife, have never heard one word from her since that morning, a year ago, when I left your house in your company. I always had the deepest regard for your wife, but there was never anything between us, and this I know, old man, that oxen could not have dragged her from your side, with her consent. You were her world, and in that world alone she lived and breathed, and I would stake my life on her honour and faithfulness!"

Digitized by Google

As Metcalf finished speaking, his words having brought more peace to the aching heart than it had known for a year, Wadleigh suddenly grew faint, and sank into a chair. He lifted up his agonising face, and exclaimed: "Then, God in Heaven help me, what did become of her?"

Little by little, he told Metcalf the whole story, the conversation he had overheard, all his suspicions, and as much of the year's agony as he could put into words. While he was speaking, a great fear began to grow in Metcalf's heart, but of this he said nothing to his friend. He took his watch from his pocket and studied it, and then nervously consulted time-tables, and finally said to Wadleigh: "Will you take the midnight express with me, back to Hampden? I may be able to help you find some trace of your wife; and on the way I will tell you everything, the meaning of that conversation you overheard, and the words I spoke to you that last night we were alone. Come, will you go?" And once again he laid his hand on his friend's shoulder.

So completely exhausted by the reaction of his feelings, so overcome by the words he had heard, and so broken down by the awful anxiety that he hardly could keep his senses, he seemed perfectly willing to do as Metcalf bade him.

After the train rolled out into the black night, Metcalf said: "I won't bother you with any details, Wadleigh, but will make my story short. There were four of us in our family, and none ever lived to reach his fortieth year without being insane. Insanity was born in us, was our inheritance. Two of my brothers died in the asylum, and then my sister, a most beautiful girl, and to whom I was always greatly attached, grew so bad that I knew the time had come when the asylum must be her home. Many and many a time she has begged me never to let her be carried there, but what could I do? Well, she grew worse so fast, and had so completely turned against me, that I knew two things must be done. She must be carried there before I went away, and someone else must go with her, for she would never have gone with me, and so—God forgive me—I asked your wife to go with her. I had made every arrangement, even to engaging the carriage, and she, blessed angel that she was, promised to do for her as she would had she been her own sister. That night she was going to tell it all to you. I was always a selfish fellow, Matt, and I didn't want you to know it, for fear you would not let her go, but if I had ever dreamed that any harm would have come to her, I would have cut off my right hand before I would have asked her. That my sister arrived there safely I know from the authorities of the institution, from whom I have heard every month. Yet there is a chance——"

Here he stopped, as he caught sight of Wadleigh's face; for an instant he could not speak, for he felt the whole burden of that agonised soul roll on to his own heart, and the horror of all that he had in a measure made his friend suffer swept over him. At last he said:

"This is terrible, terrible, Wadleigh, and even now you must feel like killing me; but my whole life shall be given to finding your wife." A sob choked his speech, for then he realised that perhaps she could never be found.

At last the journey was at an end, and they entered the living tomb which held so many to whom life was worse than death.

"Yes," the matron was saying, "Mr. Metcalf's sister was as well as could be expected, and, to tell the truth, did not seem at all insane except on one subject. From the very first she insisted that a great mistake had been made, that she was not Miss Metcalf, but that her name was Wadleigh——"

"Take me to her, take me to her at once," cried Wadleigh, a new light and a new hope springing within him—and then, as the next instant he was gazing once more on that beloved form, he cried again: "God is good, it is my darling wife!"

* * * * *

With all the cuteness of an insane person, Metcalf's sister had made the authorities believe that Mrs. Wadleigh was the real patient and that she had brought her there, and had appeared so sane that she had not been doubted.

Nina soon regained her accustomed health after she was back in the old home, safe in her husband's love. The sister was never heard from again, although they left no stone unturned to find her.

Like the remainder of the family, Metcalf's mind gave way, but fortunately he lived but a short time, and it was Nina's voice that soothed him, and Nina's hand that closed his eyes.

J. P. Wood.

OUR COLOURED COVER FOR NEXT WEEK'S NUMBER.

A pathetic incident in a powerful tale which appears in next Tuesday's "SHORT STORIES."

"EMILY, if William to-day asks you to marry him, you must tell him to speak to me." "Yes, mamma; but if he does not?" "Then tell him I want to speak to him."

"JOHN," exclaimed the nervous woman, "do you think there is a burglar in the house?" "Certainly not. Why, I haven't heard a sound all night." "That's just what alarms me. Any burglar who wasn't foolish would keep perfectly quiet, so as not to excite our suspicions. Indeed, John, I do wish you would get up and look through the house!"

CUSTOMER (who has just purchased a wonderfully cheap set of furniture): "Do you always pack furniture carefully before delivering it?" New Boy: "This kind we do, 'cause the jarring would shake it to pieces."

A GROUP of children had been attentively watching the antics of a dancing bear that looked very much the worse for wear. At the close of the performance one of them presented the owner with a bright new sixpence. "I hope you will get enough," she said, "to buy the bear some new furs. The ones he has on are awful wore out."

Digitized by Google

The Temptation of No. 49.

A Thrilling Tale of a Convict's Escape.

"Suppose you sit here, ladies," said the new governor of the prison, drawing chairs near the window, "and you will see the convicts as they file in from the workshops and from outside. It is just leaving-off time. You will see as good a collection of rascals as you can hope to set eyes on anywhere!"

The two elder ladies sank into the proffered seats with languid murmurs of: "How interesting!" The girl who stood on the other side came hesitatingly. The horror of prison life, as she had seen it that afternoon for the first time, filled her with fear and pity, pity even for those who, she knew, were criminals of the worst class. It was a living death, and she was a highly-strung, impressionable girl.

"Come, Edith!" said Captain Burnett, the governor. "This chair will do nicely for you."

Captain Burnett had only been appointed one month, and the appointment was due rather to influence than to any special qualifications for the post; he had distinguished himself in a post of military administration abroad, and this was a kind of retiring situation. He had a good salary instead of retiring on half-pay.

His daughter, Edith, had been living with her aunt, one of the ladies seated near her, since the death of her mother, and the new governor now intended to have her with him. Edith had arrived that morning, with her aunt and uncle, and half a dozen other guests—these latter of the masculine gender—in time for lunch and had done the round of the prison in the afternoon.

"Here they come!" said one of the ladies.

The convicts now filed across the yard to the main building in order to go back to their cells for the night. Edith shuddered at the sight; they were like so many machines, clothed in a uniform with its distinguishing broad arrows, men whose identity was sunk in a number and who were remembered by their crimes.

To an impressionable girl the sight was a saddening one, saddening to an almost incredible extent. She grieved to think that men could fall so low as to render their incarceration a matter of duty. Then there were others who had made one false step, for which they repented bitterly, but who were here to expiate their criminal folly and whose lives would be spoilt for ever by that one wrong act. Her vivid imagination conjured before her mental vision the monotonous round of existence, apart from the world, shut off, entombed, yet so very near it. Always under supervision, their every act controlled by regulations, the same routine day after day. It was too terrible! She stifled a cry by a great effort and slipped from the room unobserved.

She made her way through corridors from this, the official portion of the governor's wing, to the private rooms, and reached the dainty sitting-room panting with haste and excitement. This afternoon's experience had upset her so! She felt that she could never live here; yet her father wished it and—she might get accustomed to it! At least, she would not see them every day, although she was sure that she would think of them.

She caught the reflection of her face in a glass opposite her and she started at her own paleness and at the broad arrows that danced before her eyes and seemed to be moving all over her own dress. That mark was the stamp of ownership, and those men were so many chattels belonging to the government, they did not belong to themselves.

She closed her eyes for a minute; when she reopened them she gave a little scream of fear, for she saw the reflection of a convict in the glass. Springing to her feet, she faced about and saw him in the flesh, standing in the doorway. She tottered and fell on the couch in a swoon.

A refreshing coolness on her forehead was her first sensation on regaining consciousness; then she saw a kindly face bending over hers—a clean-shaven, clear-cut face, regular features and keen eyes; a handsome face, it deserved to be called.

"Where is he?" she asked, as she remembered. "How did he come here?"

"I hope you are better now, miss. I will go. I regret that I should have frightened you. I shall get into trouble for dipping that antimacassar in the water, but there was nothing else handy."

The voice was that of a cultured man. She rose to thank him, but the words froze on her lips and her hand dropped. It was the convict himself!

"I am going," he said bitterly, noticing that she shrank from him. "I am a convict, an everyday sinner, a thing of contamination from which all shrink as from a dread disease! You ask why I am in this part of the—prison." He hesitated at the word. "I am one who has behaved himself well and has earned a privilege. Ask the new governor if you wish to know more! I am not a fit person to be near a lady like yourself! Yet, five years ago, I—it was different!"

The bitterness and pathos in his voice moved her. She recognised that she was confronted by one who had held a good, social position. He might be one of those who had made the one false step that ruins a life. How terrible must be this prison life to him! She inwardly reproached herself for having caused him pain by her involuntary sign of aversion and abhorrence, and she approached him with an outstretched hand.

"I am sorry that I hurt your feelings, Mr.——" She stopped and coloured slightly; in her impulsiveness she had forgotten the immediate circumstances.

"I have no name here," he said, the bitterness in his tones becoming more intense. "I am No. 49!"

He stood erect, in spite of the humiliating confession, and she could not help observing how handsome he was. The sort of man who would be a leader of his fellows; she could imagine him as a dashing cavalry officer and a hero. Yet he was a criminal, an everyday sinner, as he himself had said. No! He was more sinned against than sinning!

"I am No. 49," he continued. He spoke in a low voice, more to himself than to her. "I am permitted to do odd jobs in the governor's garden and even in his house, free from the watchful eye of the warder, but only now and then. Captain Burnett and my father were brother officers and he recognised me—and stretched a point or two in my favour, for the sake of my dead father and my poor invalided mother!" He faltered as he uttered the last words. "My mother! They told me in the last letter that she might not live to see me released, although that will be only four months. I shall have served five years and a quarter out of seven years and then have a ticket. Mother! I may live to make amends to my sister for what I have brought upon her, but for mother I shall have no chance of doing anything—perhaps I may not have the joy of hearing her say that she forgives me. I know she does, but I want to hear her say it!" Edith could not move or speak; she listened as the man poured out his heart unconsciously.

Digitized by Google

"The misery of this life," he continued, clenching his hands passionately. "It is sometimes more than I can bear. I——"

"Have you never tried to escape?" interrupted Edith breathlessly.

"Escape?" He came back to his immediate surroundings. "No! I have known two men to try it and I have no wish to share the same fate. How can one escape with these clothes? To run away is to be hunted down, shot at and dragged back. But I must be getting back to my cell! I thank you—Ah! You are like the governor, you must be his daughter. Heaven! That we should meet in this manner when — when our fathers had — had such plans!"

She scarcely realised the full significance of his words, but she laid a detaining arm on his as he turned to leave.

"Could you escape if you had other clothes?" she asked in short, quick accents.

He stared at her.

"I might!" he almost gasped.

He looked into the pitying eyes and prudence fled. He would have a better chance and he would see his mother. Something else seemed to float through his mind, but he could not remember it, something that appeared to have a restraining influence, but was crushed in the fierce desire to escape that now possessed him.

"I can give you other clothes and money," she said hurriedly. She plunged her hand into her pocket, but her purse was not there and she gazed at him curiously, an incipient revulsion of feeling coming over her.

"I have not taken your money!" He drew himself up haughtily. "I am a convict, but I am not a thief!"

Then she looked towards the couch and saw the little purse lying there; she must have dragged it out of her pocket with her handkerchief, when she wiped her damp forehead.

She snatched it up, caught his arm and drew him into the corridor.

"I have wronged you. I will make amends by helping you to escape from this living death. Come!"

She led him to her father's room, where a travelling suit lay on the bed; a new suit, just received from the tailor.

"Dress yourself in that, quick! I will wait outside!"

She shut the door and waited. In an incredibly short space of time he came out, entirely changed; only the closely-cut hair betrayed the convict.

"Come this way," said the girl. Her heart was beating fiercely. "You can pass through the garden and out beyond the boundary. You will pass warders, but you can evade them. Take this cap, which my father has bought for travelling. There! You are quite altered!"

It was a fact. The cap covered the cropped hair and he might have been taken for one of the governor's party. His face wore an expression of grim determination.

"If I am to get away, I must have your assistance, Miss Burnett. You must walk with me and chat, so as to draw attention from my features."

She hesitated a moment, but her scruples vanished as she saw the set cast of his countenance. Picking up her parasol, she walked by his side into the open.

"The sun is warm still," he said with the ease of manner that betokens the man of society. "Allow me to open your sunshade."

They were coming into full view of anyone who might be about. He opened the sunshade, carrying it with ease and in such a manner as to shield her and hide his own face.

"I wonder if I shall see you again after I'm free," he presently remarked, "then I shall feel that the light has not altogether gone out."

The girl remained silent. Her pretty face showed her terrible anxiety lest the warders should find out before her companion had left the prison.

No. 49 noticed this and begged her to talk so that the warders they were now approaching should have no ground for suspicion.

She rose to thank him, but the words froze on her lips. It was the convict himself.

Digitized by Google

For some moments therefore they kept up a forced conversation; she a little tremulously, and he in a disguised voice, yet with perfect ease and coolness; for they were passing men who were employed in the prison and a false move would be fatal. Several eyes were upon them, but he manipulated the sunshade with great dexterity. His absence he thought, would not be noticed for a while, as he was supposed to be doing odd jobs in the governor's house, but if a warder set eyes on his face, the game was up.

They strolled with apparent calmness through the grounds and out through a gate reserved for the use of the governor. There was no guardian at this little gate, for the governor's residence was really outside the prison wall, the end of the official and residential buildings abutting on the prison wall, and only the upper apartments having windows in that end. It was at one of those upper windows that the governor and his party had watched the procession of convicts.

"There are armed warders still on the look-out," said No. 49, bending towards her and speaking softly. "We must still keep up the fiction. If you do not move your head and look up at me, I may yet lose my chance of escape."

He held the sunshade at the back now, jauntily and as a man would who had nothing to worry about. All the time his restless eyes were seeking an enemy and his heart was beating hard.

Edith racked her brains for subjects to talk about and succeeded in conducting a spirited conversation to the no little admiration of No. 49.

"That's right!" he said approvingly. "We never know who may be near us in this road, so we must chat gaily, especially just there, for it passes some of the prison buildings—near enough to be awkward if anyone is there. Tool houses or something of the kind, I believe. Yes," he continued, raising his voice to the ordinary level, and skilfully directing the sunshade to the dangerous side, "there is not a great chance for prisoners to escape from here." Then for a moment the convict was silent.

"I took her for a romantic girl who would be impressed with all heroism in the abstract," he was thinking, "yet incapable of doing anything brave herself, but there are not many girls who would have dared to do what she is now accomplishing." And he gazed on her with wondering gratitude.

The armed warder was on the look-out in the wall tower and his rifle could not reach them yet. In the tool houses, as No. 49 believed them to be, there were signs of life that told them they were not out of danger.

He chatted volubly and gaily, keeping the sunshade between the danger point and his own face, yet continually moving it, twirling it about and protecting her from the rays of the evening sun. He drew in long breaths of the sweet air and his heart was glad with the hope of liberty.

Edith felt a chill at her heart; she feared that No. 49 might yet be caught and she tried to imitate his lively manner lest someone should see them at a bend of the road and her white countenance might "give it all away," as he said.

The danger point was passed, the armed guard was out of sight, and they were approaching the cross roads where he must leave her. It would be unwise for her to go farther, and he was safe so far. He could get away to the cover of the woods, in which he would lie till night was covering everything with a dark pall, and then, in the moonless gloom, he could walk some miles in order to reach a certain spot at which he could take the train, without fear, to London and thence to his home. Not all at once, though, for the detectives would be watching; he must arrange some plan, his mother might be able to travel, so that they could meet elsewhere. He did not know yet what he should do.

"Here we part," he said, a trifle sadly.

They had reached the cross roads, and he handed her the parasol as he spoke.

"You will want money. Take this!"

She held out the purse. He did not hesitate to accept it.

"Yes. I expect I shall need it, but I will repay you one day. I will, however, beg you to let me keep the purse as a souvenir."

She flushed, and then she asked him the question that had been hanging on her lips. She remembered his remark about an everyday sinner, but that might have been in mere bitterness of spirit.

"Were you—were you really—guilty?" And the voice trembled which had remained firm while there was danger.

The handsome man who stood before her—surely he could not have been guilty of a sordid crime? He must have been the victim of a miscarriage of justice, an innocent man wrongly convicted! He read the thought in her appealing glance; for once in his life he became a coward and flinched before her honest gaze.

"Don't make a hero of me!" he laughed harshly. "I am not worthy to stand by your side; I was guilty of a crime which I committed deliberately. I said just now that I was not a thief, but the world would say differently perhaps. But what matters it? I have my liberty, I shall see my mother and obtain her forgiveness and the remembrance of you will keep me in the right path for the future—if I make good my escape. Good-bye!"

He seized her hand and raised it to his lips; then strode down one of the cross roads and was lost to view, never once turning to see the arms outstretched in appealing gesture.

As she neared the prison she came upon a party of warders headed by her father.

"I am glad you are safe!" he said with evident relief. "A convict has escaped, dressed in my new suit. One of the men says he saw you walking with a gentleman; is that right?"

"Yes, father. I walked with him along the road."

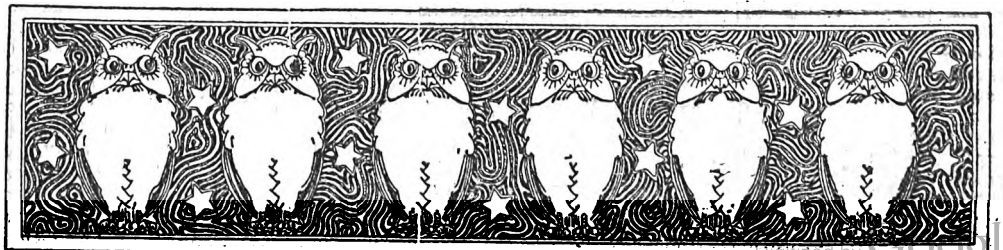
"Good Heavens! Then he even deceived you into taking him for a visitor. Hurry, my men!"

"It was very imprudent, Edith," said her father, more severely than usual. "You should not have sauntered off with a visitor, however certain you might have been that he was a guest. Let us walk back. How did you meet him? That fellow was the son of an old chum, and I extended him a privilege which may get me into trouble. I accepted his word of honour that he would not try to get away if I gave him more freedom and I thought that there was still enough of the old blood in him to keep his parole. He has broken his word! Whatever made him do that?"

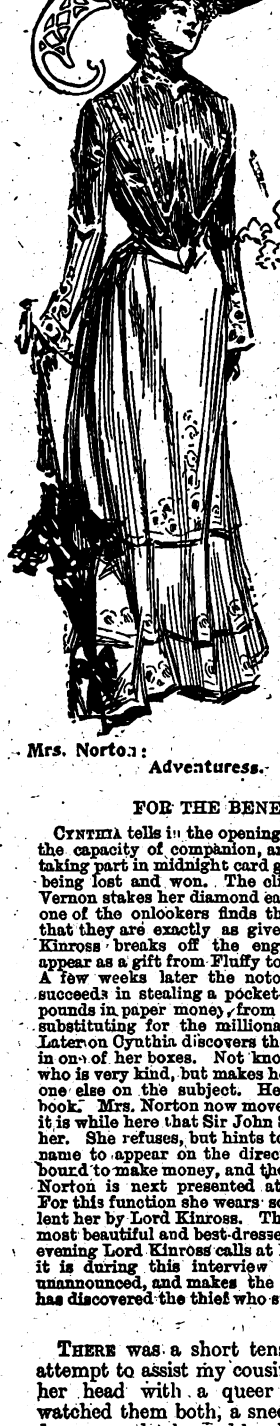
There was a pause, and the girl stood before her father and looked at him with shame writ large on her countenance.

"He was tempted, father!"

G. E. Lingen.



Digitized by Google



THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE	Pettigrew's secretary.

Mrs. Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia: Her companion

PERCIVAL HOPE HAS MANY CLUES.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF NEW READERS.

CYNTHIA tells in the opening chapter of her arrival at her cousin's in the capacity of companion, and of her discovery that Mrs. Norton is taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money are being lost and won. The climax is reached one night when Mary Vernon stakes her diamond ear-rings (a gift from Lord Kinross) and one of the onlookers finds them to be paste. Mary Vernon declares that they are exactly as given to her by Lord Kinross, whereupon Kinross breaks off the engagement. The diamonds subsequently appear as a gift from Fluffy to Mrs. Norton, set in a pair of hat-pins. A few weeks later the notorious Mrs. Norton, with Fluffy's help, succeeds in stealing a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew at the Café Regal, by substituting for the millionaire's pocket-book one exactly like it. Later on Cynthia discovers the original pocket-book, empty of course, in one of her boxes. Not knowing what to do, she confides in Fluffy, who is very kind, but makes her promise to say nothing at all to anyone else on the subject. He takes charge of the duplicate pocket-book. Mrs. Norton now moves into her new house in Pont Street, and it is while here that Sir John Strickland, a poor baronet, proposes to her. She refuses, but hints to him that if he will consent to allow his name to appear on the directorate of certain companies he will be bound to make money, and then her answer might be different. Mrs. Norton is next presented at Court by her friend, Lady Gaveston. For this function she wears some superb diamonds which have been lent her by Lord Kinross. The Society papers declare her to be the most beautiful and best-dressed woman at the presentation. The same evening Lord Kinross calls at Pont Street for a private interview, and it is during this interview that Percival Hope enters the room unannounced, and makes the startling statement that Mary Vernon has discovered the thief who stole her diamonds.

THERE was a short tense silence. Lord Kinross made no attempt to assist my cousin, but stood quite still, staring over her head with a queer expression in his eyes. Percival watched them both, a sneer on his lips. Frankie had broken down completely, and her loss of self-control at such a moment gave matters a very ugly look. It was as though this sudden indisposition, was connected with Percival's announcement that Mary had discovered the thief who stole her diamonds. The next minute the aspect of the affair had changed; with an effort my cousin pulled herself together, and moved away from Kinross. Her face was working, and she had trouble to control her voice; still it was fairly steady, and her eyes were eloquent.

"I am very glad for Mary's sake," she said to Percival, "I know what the discovery means to her, and I can't grudge Mary any happiness. But—but—Oh Hartland," she turned and grasped his arm convulsively, "you will go back to her; I cannot bear it!"

Lord Kinross caught his breath, he seemed bewildered, and looked glad and sorry both at once. As for me, I felt very grieved for Frankie. She must be terribly fond of Kinross to have been so upset at the mere thought of losing him. And yet, at one time I thought she really cared for poor Sir John.

"Dearest," stammered his lordship, "dear"—Then catching at his self-command. "Nothing can change the feeling that I have for you," he said. "Come, sit down; you quite frightened us."

He placed her gently in a chair, and stooping kissed her hand. It was prettily done—Kinross was always graceful, but I think my cousin would have preferred him to have been more definite about his feelings.

"And now, Mr. Hope," she said a few minutes later, "tell us all about this great discovery."

Percival bowed. Frankie's appeal to Kinross had not touched him, he looked if anything more stern than before.

"You were going to disclose the name of the thief, you know, when—" she paused, "I made a fool of myself, didn't I?" She smiled at Kinross who returned the greeting.

Digitized by Google

"CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA."
New Series of Stories.

"Now, Mr. Hope, out with it! Who is the guilty wretch?"

But Percival was not to be flustered.

"You must let me tell the tale in my own way, Mrs. Norton," he said quietly, "I'm a slow person, you know, old-fashioned and all that sort of thing."

Frankie shrugged her shoulders and waited.

"On the night of the card party at The Moat, Miss Vernon was unable to offer any explanation or suggestion as to how the diamonds in her earrings had been replaced by paste."

"Quite so," murmured Frankie.

"In the agitation of the moment she forgot that the ear-rings had been out of her possession for some two or three days."

Lord Kinross bent forward eagerly. "How long before that evening?" he asked.

"Some ten days previous to the card party," answered Percival. "The fastening of the earrings had got twisted and consequently it was painful to wear them. Miss Vernon sent the earrings to Howlet, the jeweller at Marlestone, the nearest town to The Moat, to be repaired."

"I know Howlet's quite well," said Kinross, "most respectable firm. It's not thinkable that they should have tampered with the jewels."

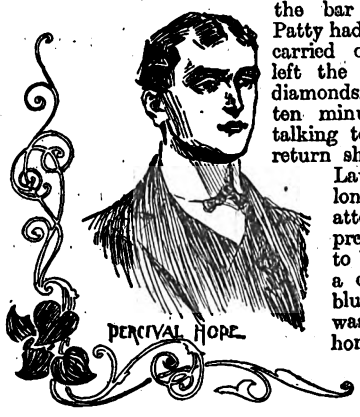
"It is not suggested that they did," replied Percival coldly. "Miss Vernon intended calling for the earrings herself but was prevented. She sent her maid for them instead, some three days later."

"Well?" Frankie leant forward, her eyes alight with excitement, "and did she——"

"You go too quickly, Mrs. Norton. Have a little patience. Patty Fraser, Miss Vernon's maid, is a bright, clever girl," resumed Percival, "but inclined at times to be giddy. She is however attached to her mistress as the sequel will show. Patty has noticed the change that worry and anxiety concerning the diamonds has brought about in Miss Vernon. In the hope that she might relieve that anxiety, the girl made the following statement."

"Tell us quickly," cried Frankie, "quickly.!"

"Patty Fraser confessed that instead of obeying orders and returning immediately to The Moat with the earrings, she stayed at Marlestone some two or three hours after leaving Howlet's. It appears that the girl met a man of the name of Lawrence, whose acquaintance she had made some few weeks previously. He induced her to go for a walk, and finally took her to tea at the Crown Inn where he was staying. They had their refreshment in the coffee room, where Lawrence met a couple of friends. The three men appeared to have pumped the girl pretty thoroughly. They learnt from her the nature of her errand to Marlestone, and with a little coaxing and some flattery induced her to let them have a look at the earrings. Lawrence was enthusiastic concerning their beauty, and declared he must show them to a friend of his connected with the trade, who was at that moment waiting for him in the bar of the inn. Before Patty had time to protest he had carried out his intention and left the coffee room with the diamonds. He was absent some ten minutes, Patty meanwhile talking to his friends. On his return she noticed a change in Lawrence; he was no longer pressing in his attentions, but seemed preoccupied and anxious to bring their meeting to a close. At length he bluntly suggested that it was time for her to go home. The girl thought his last remark a strange one.



"'Tis late,' he said, 'and diamonds are queer things. You never know what may happen to 'em. Take my advice and set off, my girl!' They parted at the door of the inn—Patty has not seen nor heard from him since."

"It is impossible to believe that Lawrence substituted paste for diamonds in that short space of time," said Lord Kinross, "where could he have got the dummies from? The cleverest rogue cannot counterfeit jewels he has never seen, and Lawrence, it is evident, saw the trinkets for the first time that afternoon. Don't you agree with me, Mrs. Norton?"

Frankie looked steadily at Percival. "Mr. Hope has not told us all," she said slowly.

Percival flushed and seemed for a moment strangely disconcerted. "The diamonds were not changed that afternoon," he said at last, "there is proof as to that. Patty, suspicious of Lawrence's manner, returned to Howlet's and begged that some one might be sent with her to The Moat, the road being lonely. One of the shop assistants was told off to take charge of the girl and the diamonds. Howlet had the earrings in his hand before Patty and her escort departed. That the stones were genuine he is prepared to swear. Lawrence had not tampered with the jewels. But—" Percival paused, "he had photographed them."

"For what possible object?" asked Kinross.

"Failing the gems themselves, a photograph is the next best thing to copy," answered Percival, "Lawrence handed over the plate to a clever craftsman, who produced in paste the facsimile of Miss Vernon's diamonds."

"Even supposing you are right, how did the paste find its way to The Moat?"

Percival rose.

"That," he said deliberately, "is what I want Mrs. Norton to explain." He looked at Frankie quite steadily as if he expected her to give some sign of surprise. My cousin smiled at him sweetly.

"My dear man," she said, "how can I? I'm not a detective."

It was easy to see her answer surprised and a little disconcerted Percival. He recovered himself quickly.

"You can give me very valuable assistance in the matter," he said earnestly.

"I will do anything in my power," she answered, "but I'm a fearful duffer at finding out things. People see through me directly."

Percival did not challenge the assertion.

"Patty Fraser says it was through Ella Martin she became acquainted with Lawrence," he continued. "Ella Martin is Mrs. Norton's maid. I want you," he turned abruptly to Frankie, "to tell me when your maid last saw Richard Lawrence."

For a moment my cousin seemed about to lose her temper, then with a smile she leant back in her chair, fanning herself slowly.

"I can't tell you," she answered languidly, "I'm not in the habit of inspecting my servants' visiting list."

"Then the girl herself must be questioned," said Percival.

"I will do so," replied Frankie.

"Pardon me, Mrs. Norton, but I must beg you to do nothing of the kind. It is important not to rouse Ella Martin's suspicions. Your inquiries would inevitably put her on the qui vive. You have just told us, you know, how entirely transparent you are; Ella, to quote your words, would see through you directly. You understand," he turned to Kinross, "we suspect collusion between Lawrence and the maid."

"I don't quite see how."

Percival took a deep breath.

"The case lies in a nutshell. We know that Lawrence photographed the diamonds, and we conclude that one of his confederates copied them in paste. We have now to discover how the paste found its way into The Moat. I suggest through the hands" he paused, "of Mrs. Norton's maid."

"And then?" said Kinross.

"At present that is as far as I can get. The next link in the chain will be, I fancy, furnished by Ella Martin herself."

"How interesting!" said Frankie, "you're so clever, Mr.

Digitized by Google

Hope. I long to hear your cross-examining the poor thing. Dearie," she turned to me, "tell Ella that I want her, or better still ring the bell. I can't have my little Cynthia suspected of collusion with the wicked Ella.

"Now, Mr. Hope," said Frankie when her maid appeared, "this is Ella Martin—ask her what questions you wish. You had better sit down," she added, turning to the girl, "Mr. Hope may keep you some time, and you look tired." Frankie smiled sympathetically and pointed to a chair. Martin, a thin-featured, sensitive young woman flushed gratefully and took the seat; no one could be more charming than my cousin when she chose—a tone of the voice, a look in the eyes—she hypnotised women as easily as men when she cared to take the trouble.

"You are, I think, a friend of a young man named Richard Lawrence?" commenced Percival abruptly.

The girl glanced timidly at Frankie, then in a low voice replied: "He is my brother, sir."

Hope stared at the answer. Frankie smiled.

"An assumed name, I suppose?" said Percival sharply.

"Professional, sir. My brother is a photographer. He thought 'Martin' sounded rather common."

"And pray, what does he photograph?"

For the first time Ella hesitated.

"All sorts of things," she said at last, "people, and places, and——"

"Diamonds?" suggested her cross-examiner.

"He may," said Ella suddenly.

"Now, my girl, this won't do. You're not telling me all you know. Believe me, the best thing for both your brother and yourself is to speak the truth without any reservations. Now, answer me, why did your brother wish to photograph Miss Vernon's diamonds?"

Still the girl hesitated, glancing round at Frankie as if for inspiration.

"Come, Ella," said my cousin, "answer Mr. Hope. I'm sure your brother has done nothing wrong."

"Thank you, ma'am," said the girl. Then turning to Percival, "Richard had an order from a paper, sir, to photograph the jewels of society ladies—Miss Vernon was particularly mentioned. Richard wrote and asked her permission some time back, but she refused. He asked me if I could help, so I introduced him to Patty Fraser and——" Ella paused.

"And Richard met Patty, took her to tea, borrowed the diamonds and photographed 'em—isn't that it?"

"Yes sir—he didn't hurt the earrings, sir."

Percival nodded.

"I'm aware of that. How many copies of the photo did he print, do you know?"

"I can't say, sir. He sent one to the paper I told you of, and one——" she stopped, in evident confusion.

"And he gave one to you, eh?" said Percival.

There was no answer.

"Did he send you a copy?" demanded Percival again. "If you won't answer, I must go to your brother, that's all."

The threat was effectual.

"Yes, he did send me one," she murmured.

"Where is it?"

"I—I—" the girl seemed positively unable to speak, she was trembling and quite pale, her eyes fixed beseechingly on Frankie. This time however my cousin did not come to Ella's assistance but continued to fan herself unmoved.

"I don't know, sir," the girl said in a faint voice, "I can't tell you at all. It disappeared one day from my box, I haven't seen it since."

"You say it disappeared. When?—After you came to town?"

"No, at Lady Winchin's, sir. Richard sent me the photograph a day or two after he met Patty. I missed it shortly before—" she glanced apologetically at Lord Kinross.

"Before Miss Vernon left The Moat, is that when you mean?"

"Yes, sir, about four days."

"Did anyone in The Moat see the photograph besides yourself?"

Ella caught her breath. We waited anxiously for her answer—the answer that surely would supply the link that Percival was seeking.

"Come," said he, "did you show it to the other servants?"

"No, none of the servants."

"Well, to any of Lady Winchin's guests?"

The girl was obviously distressed. She trembled and half rose in her chair. For a second her eyes sought Frankie's but my cousin did not look towards her.

"Well?" said Percival once more.

Ella Martin sank back in her chair.

"No," she said quietly but firmly, "nobody saw the photograph but me."

Percival started to his feet.

"I don't believe you!" he cried. "You're not telling me the truth!"

"You've no right to say that, sir," said Ella. "I have answered all your questions. Here is my brother's address if you want to know anything more." She handed him a paper, and stood with tight lips and downcast eyes before my cousin.

"Have you finished with me, ma'am?" she asked.

Frankie lowered her fan.

"I think so," she answered, "you've nothing more to say to Ella, Mr. Hope?"

"Nothing—to Ella, Mrs. Norton."

Frankie nodded.

"You may go," she said, "and you needn't wait up for me to-night, Ella."

The door closed softly behind the maid. For a few minutes nobody spoke.

"You're disappointed, Mr. Hope," said Frankie at last. "It's a dead lock, isn't it?"

Percival looked dogged.

"The girl wasn't speaking the truth," he said.

"In what particular?" asked Frankie.

"I believe she showed the photograph to somebody, who subsequently stole it. I feel sure Ella Martin knows who it was, though for some reason she pretends not to."

"The thief then, in your opinion, stole the photograph with the intention of getting the diamonds copied in paste?"

"Exactly."

"Take care, take care," cried Frankie. "Don't you see what you're doing? You are casting suspicion on the woman you are trying to prove innocent. Don't you see," she came quite close to Percival and spoke eagerly in quick low tones—"there's only one person to whom the photograph would prove of any use, only one person who would benefit by changing the diamonds for paste. In accusing Ella Martin of untruth you cast suspicion upon Mary, and that"—with an eloquent gesture of her hands—"that is unbearable! No matter what evidence you brought me, what proofs you gave me, I should declare Mary was innocent. But you cannot look for the same judgment from others. Therefore, for her sake, I warn you—take care!"

"You are too good, Mrs. Norton," said Percival, "and too sympathetic."

"Not in Mary's case—do you think so?" she asked innocently.

"I think," he said with a quiet smile, "that you are a very clever woman."

"It is seldom indeed you stoop to flattery, Mr. Hope. Will

Digitized by Google

"CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA."
New Series of Stories.

you excuse me"—she glanced from Percival to Kinross—"if I leave you for a little while; I want to write a note to Mary."

Frankie touched me as she passed, and taking it as a signal, I rose and followed her. The room was a large one; Frankie went towards the farther door.

"Don't trouble, please," she said as Kinross flew to open it, "I want to speak to Cynthia a minute." She turned as she spoke and began to scold about the arrangement of my hair.

"You look so bad," she said, "and you have not fastened the lace on your bodice properly. I'll do it for you. Don't be silly, child, they can't see," and she drew me behind a large Japanese screen, standing before the door. Frankie was a little rough in her manipulations. She caught hold of the lace, jerking the string of pearls about my neck.

"You've broken the cord," I cried, "what shall I do?" and I stared dismally at the beads scattered on the floor.

"Pick them up," said Frankie, "and take care you find them all, I value those pearls." She went out, closing the door behind her. My eyes filled with tears. It was very mortifying to be treated like a child. To my comfort however the incident appeared to have been unnoticed by Percival and Kinross, at any rate they made no offer of assistance. I gathered up the pearls nearest at hand, and sitting on the floor commenced to thread them.

"Percival," remarked his lordship, "what bogey are you hunting? Your enthusiasm is not entirely on Mary's account."

"My first object is to prove Mary innocent."

"And then?"

"We'd better leave it at that, I think, unless—" he paused. "Tell me, Hartland, are matters serious between you and Mrs. Norton?"

"Do you ask that on Mary's behalf?"

"No, on yours."

"You are hardly complimentary to Mrs. Norton. As for me——"

"Don't sneer, Hartland—you must know I only speak——"

"For my good—" interrupted Kinross, "I was sure of that."

"She's a dangerous woman," said Percival slowly.

"And I, poor innocent, may fall into her clutches? Don't worry on my account, dear Percival."

"She is an adventuress, Hartland—an unprincipled woman without scruple—heartless as they make 'em."

"She is a beautiful woman, Percival," returned Lord Kinross mildly, "without blemish—brainy as you can find 'em."

Percival sneered. "Are you going to marry this 'beauty'?"

"That is my affair," said Kinross sharply.

"Not wholly. I have some right to a voice in the matter, you must, you shall hear me."

"I will not listen to another word upon the matter. I dispute your right to question my actions, I repudiate you and your criticism. We look at things differently, you and I. It is the old, old difference between the sinner and the Pharisee. You've always been the good boy of the family, I as naturally the scapegrace. I know you helped me out of a tight place five years back, but you asked your price for it, Percival. A price I paid unflinchingly."

"You state the case unfairly. You were in a difficulty regarding what you were pleased to term 'a debt of honour.' Your father would not help you. You applied to me and I——"

"Like Providence you descended with the money and paid the debt. Remember, however, that in return I pledged my word not to touch cards until I was twenty-five. Remember also that while that promise undoubtedly saved me from ruin, it also saved the estate to which you are the heir at law."

"I did not credit you with so much meanness, Hartland I had your interests at heart when I got that promise from you. Mine are and were independent of you and the estate. When I took the name of 'Hope' I succeeded to an income far larger than I am ever likely to spend. I interfered then, as last year in Paris, and to-day in London, on your account."

"I quarrelled with you over the affair in Paris, and said I'd never speak to you again. I got over my anger and since you've been in town we've been pretty friendly. This time, however, I bar you altogether. Lift a finger to interfere with me, or what I choose to do and——"

"Well," said Percival, "what then?"

"I'll cut you for the rest of my life."

"Hartland be reasonable. You're no schoolboy to be taken in by a woman like Mrs. Norton."

"What is it you have against her? Speak it out, say something definite. I'm tired of hints and innuendos. What has she done—say?"

"At present I can give you no proofs. Wait a fortnight and I will bring you evidence of what I say. The woman is an adventuress living on her wits, a sharper existing on the credulity of fools, a swindler who profits by nefarious transactions. Her very name is probably as false as her life—how do you know the woman was ever married?"

"She—" he stopped. With quickened breath, a flame of fury in my heart and on my face I stood before him.

"How dare you, oh how dare you?" I cried fiercely. "No wonder you pretended to be friendly with me and offered to get me an engagement as governess. You wanted me to spy upon my cousin, to tell you tales about her, so that you could make up lies. I was present when my cousin married Richard Norton at the consulate in Bruges. You can go there and see the names entered in the book. You can question Lady Gaveston, you can write to the convent at Bruges where Frankie and I were brought up. A swindler, an adventuress! You know," I turned to Lord Kinross, "you know how my cousin gets her income, tell him, tell him, I say, that Frankie sold her husband's estate, and invested the proceeds."

"It's true, Percival," stammered his lordship, "quite true."

"And I, what am I? As bad as my poor cousin, I suppose, or worse."

"Cynthia," Percival implored me, "listen. You did not understand what I meant about your cousin, please God you never will. Of you I have had no thoughts but what were good, honest and sweet. I wanted to help you, I wanted——"

I stopped him with a gesture.

"Do you still say my cousin was not married to Richard Norton?"

"I believe what you have told me."

"You acknowledge she is Richard Norton's widow?"

"Yes."

"Lord Kinross has told you how my cousin's income is derived. Do you still say she is a swindler, an adventuress?"

"For your sake I would do much," said Percival, "but even for you I can't take that back. Wait for a fortnight, Cynthia, you shall then judge for yourself if I am right."

"And give you time to trump up a few more charges? No, thank you." I walked towards the door. "I am going to call my cousin and tell her before you both what you have said."

"For Heaven's sake, Cynthia"—Lord Kinross rushed after me. Percival stepped between us.

"A moment," he said quietly and looked at me firmly, almost sorrowfully. His manner had quite changed, he was grave and stern. "I must tell you," he said slowly, "that if you inform Mrs. Norton of what you overheard, I shall deny your statement in toto. Yes," he repeated, "I shall swear you have imagined the whole story."

I looked at him, his strong square face, and steady eyes, and even as I hated, I believed him. He would do as he had said—deny it all, and Kinross would back him up. What could I do? I was powerless against such a man.

"Oh, you are cruel and wicked," I exclaimed, "bad men, both of you. I—I——" The sentence was not finished. I broke into passionate sobbing. Percival looked horrified, and grief-stricken. Kinross hardly less comfortable.

"Don't," said his lordship, "my dear little girl, don't."

"Why should you care?" I asked through my tears.

Digitized by Google

"You despise Frankie and let people talk ill of her. I wish she'd never seen you. You don't really care for her. Why don't you go and never, never come back. Frankie would be happy with Sir John, he's a good man and loves her truly. But for you she'd have married him long ago. I can't think what she sees in you. Sir John is just as rich. Oh yes," Kinross made a movement of surprise, "he's making lots of money in the City, he's better looking and much, much more loveable. Why don't you leave her alone? You can't really be fond of her."

Kinross caught his breath and murmured something about feeling like a cad.

"I must go," he said, "I can't stand this."

"Yes," said Percival, "we'd better leave." He paused and touched me lightly on the shoulder.

"Just at present you think very hardly of me," he said softly. "But in time you won't feel quite so bitter. Cynthia"—he paused, "some day I shall come to you," he said, "and ask forgiveness. You won't refuse it me."

I heard the door close behind them, I heard Frankie meet and greet them in the hall, the deeper tones of Fluffy chiming in. Kinross even made an arrangement to meet her the next morning in the Park! I listened to it all and remembered that Fluffy's warning to my cousin not to see Lord Kinross that evening. Why had he warned her? Was he base and treacherous like the rest, did he mean to turn on Frankie like the others?

I could not quiet myself but sat and sobbed till the door opened once again and Frankie entered.

"Well," she asked eagerly, "what did they say? Did you hear anything about me? Make haste, Cynthia, and tell me. Fluffy will be back directly."

I paid no heed to the questions, but ran quickly to my cousin, clasping her tightly with both arms.

"Send me back to the convent, Frankie," I sobbed, "where they don't say wicked, cruel things. I can't stay here, I can't."

With a firm hand, Frankie unclasped my arms and led me upstairs to her bedroom.

"Drink this," she said and made me take some brandy. "Are you quieter?" She put her hand on my head. "Yes, you are better already. Now," she faced me, pale but with a strange light in her eyes, "what has Percival Hope been saying?"

(Next Tuesday's SHORT STORIES contains another striking instalment of "Cynthia's Confessions.")

MR. E. CONOMIE: "Did you write to that man who advertises to show people how to make puddings without milk, and have them richer?" Mrs. E. Conomie: "Yes, and sent him the shilling." "What did he reply?" "Use cream."

MISS FITZGUSH (examining photo): "What a wrinkled, old, funny-looking cat! Who is she?" Miss Clevergirl: "I make it do duty for my sweet self, love. Many men are not allowed to engage a typewriter unless their wives see the applicant's photo, so when I look for a place I send that thing (after having called at the place previously, you know); so the governor shows the photo to his better half, and the dear, deluded thing is usually quite contented."

WE were very much amused by an incident related the other day. A gentleman who had been absent for a considerable time, and who during his absence had raised a pretty luxuriant crop of whiskers, moustachios, etc., visited a relative, whose child, an artless little girl of five or six years, he was very fond of. The little girl made no demonstration towards saluting him with a kiss, as was usual. "Why, child," said the mother, "don't you give Uncle P. a kiss?" "Why, ma," returned the little girl, with the most perfect simplicity, "I don't see any place."

Your Editor Chats.

"THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA" seem to have aroused a great amount of interest amongst readers of Short Stories. One reader, who claims to be "a member of the middle-class," confesses to a mild degree of astonishment at the revelations as to the ways of polite society made in these exposures. "Formerly," he says, "London society was supposed to comprise the fine flower of European aristocracy. Now, so far as one can gather, 'rogues' and 'adventuresses' are privileged members of the inner sets. Might I respectfully surmise that the disreputable state of things revealed by the 'CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA' owes much to Cynthia's feminine powers of exaggeration?"

I am regretfully compelled to confess that such a surmise on the part of my correspondent would be wrong. Unfortunately, the state of affairs described by Cynthia is only too true, and if the revelations had not been startling—as they certainly are—then I, as editor of your little paper, would not have accepted them. The fact of their showing society in its true light struck me as making them of more than ordinary interest, and being always on the look-out for good things for my readers I accepted them. Great truths are oft-times unpalatable reading.

Again, a lady reader writes to me the following letter:

"Some three weeks back a friend handed me a number of Short Stories. I had not before seen the paper. I was immediately interested in 'THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA' and have been since, so much so that I am writing to you upon the matter. I want you to tell me, in confidence, Cynthia's real name. About two years ago I met, at a seaside boarding-house, a woman of the Frankie Norton type, with a sweet young girl as companion. The poor thing was sorely tried by her employer, who was bad-tempered as well as unscrupulous. I lost sight of the girl, and heard afterwards that she had left her situation. If, as I suspect, she and Cynthia are the same, I should be glad to hear from her. I may, perhaps, be of some assistance to the poor child."

I wrote to this correspondent to express my regrets that the conditions under which I accepted this series of articles did not permit me to reveal the true name of the young lady in question, but that, as it seemed from her letter that her reason for making inquiries was to offer assistance to Cynthia, I was in the happy position of being able to inform her that Cynthia is not in any want and is making quite a good thing out of her pen. It is quite possible that the people whom my correspondent met at the boarding-house were Mrs. Norton and Cynthia, but no good can come of pursuing inquiries further merely out of curiosity.

I am now able to announce the result of the Sub-titles Competition. The first prize of a massive solid silver pencil-case goes to Mr. S. P. Hopkins, Kew Estate Office, Kew Green, S.W., while consolation gifts of cut glass solid silver-topped scent bottles and silver bangles go to the following ten contestants: Mrs. Macdonald, 4 Amberley Grove, Leopold Street, Leeds; H. Barnes, 2 Vauxhall Walk, S.E.; H. H. Hearn, 12 Conrad Street, Hackney, N.E.; J. Berkin, 5 Great Peter Street, Westminster Abbey; J. Jones, 5 Worcester Place, Swansea; S. Keenan, 19 Balmano Street, Glasgow; Mrs. Kelly, 27 Maryfield, London Road, Edinburgh; R. Thomson, 5 West Montgomery Place, Edinburgh; E. Payne, 73 London Road, Clapton, N.E., and G. K. Stubbs, 4 Victoria Terrace, Longsight, Manchester.

For this week's competition I want you to construct a sentence using only words containing four letters. The reader who sends the longest and most sensible sentence made up of such words will receive a handsome barbaric guard, while the ten readers whose efforts come next will receive gifts of pretty rolled gold hearts and rolled gold charms. Postcards only should be sent, and these must reach us not later than first post on Tuesday morning, July 22nd. They should be marked "sentence" and addressed to the Competition Editor, SHORT STORIES, Henrietta Street, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Breaking it Gently.

IT is related that a man once had to break the news to a woman that her husband had been killed. "Do you know," he said, calling at her house, "that with your light hair and pretty complexion you would break every heart in town if you dressed as a widow?" She blushed and laughed. "And you are one," he added. "Your husband was just blown to atoms down in the boiler works. But then, black is so becoming to you!"

A Dear Girl.

"OLD fellow, I'm engaged to Miss Dashe. She's a dear girl." "She is so. She cost me about £100 the time I was engaged to her."

Necessary Elements.

"So you have written a novel?" "Yes." "Has your heroine satin skin, velvet eyelashes, and hair like threads of spun gold?" "Yes." "Is her name Gwendoline?" "It is." "Then I don't see why it shouldn't be a success."

The Very Reason.

JONES: "I'm going to bring my wife round to call on you to-night." Smith: "That's right; but do me a favour, old man. Don't let her wear her new cloak; I don't want my wife to see it just now." Jones (grimly): "Why, that's what we are coming for."

An Inducement.

WIFE: "Why did you stand and talk so long with that Turkish pedlar?" Husband: "I was trying to convert him." "Hum! Fine missionary you would be. What did you tell him?" "I told him that a Christian was not obliged to have more than one wife."

Mamma Lived Somewhere Else.

SHE: "You won't object to have my dear mamma live with us after we are married, will you?" He (a young physician): "Not at all. In fact, she'll be most welcome." "I'm so glad you feel that way." "Yes; you see she is always ailing, and I really need somebody to experiment on."

Didn't Like to Look.

SOME children were trespassing in a field, and quite happily gathering flowers. Presently a keeper came up to them saying angrily: "Now, then, what business have you to be in here? Didn't you see the notice at the gate?" "Oh, yes, please sir," answered one little girl, "we saw a notice, but it had 'private' on it, so we didn't like to look."

A Gentle Hint.

THEY had been engaged to be married fifteen years, and still he had not mustered up courage enough to ask her to name "the happy day." One evening he called in a peculiar frame of mind and asked her to sing something tender and touching, something that would "move him." She sat down at the piano and sang, "Darling, I am growing old."

The Force of Habit.

A WIDOWER is being married for the fourth time. During the ceremony one of the guests is surprised to hear violent sobs proceeding from a woman in a corner of the church. "Who is that lady who is crying so bitterly?" he asks of the bystanders. "Oh, it's only Martha, our cook," answers one of the bridegroom's children; "she always blubbers when papa gets married."

A Story Telling Picture.

HE: "Well, for my part I like a picture that tells a story." She: "Mrs. Witherby's portrait ought to suit you then. It makes her positively handsome."

Wanted His Face Washed.

LITTLE ETHEL: "Mamma, I wish you'd wash Willie Prettie's face." Mamma: "The idea! He's not my little boy. I have nothing to do with him." Little Ethel: "But I have. We's become engaged, an' I want to kiss him."

Accounted For.

BERTHA: "Sometimes you appear really manly, and sometimes you are absolutely effeminate. How do you account for it?" Harold: "I suppose it is hereditary. Half my ancestors were males and the other half females."

An Unpublished Testimonial.

FIRST QUACK: "Here is a letter it would hardly do for us to publish. A man writes: 'I have taken the first bottle of your medicine——'" Second Quack: "Well?" First Quack: "There it breaks off short, and is signed in another handwriting, 'per Executor.'"

The Last Chance.

"DID you ever notice," said Mrs. N. Peck, "that about half of the pictures in the photographers' windows are of bridal couples? I wonder why they always rush off to a photographer as soon as the knot is tied?" "I fancy the husband is responsible for it," said Mr. Peck. "He realises that it is about his last chance to ever look pleasant."

Didn't Even Crack.

CLARE was perched upon the fence-post, swinging her chubby legs and singing at the top of her sound little lungs. "Be careful, Clare," said her mother; "you might fall and break your bones. I'm afraid you'll get hurt." "Oh, don't be 'fraid," she answered reassuringly; "I did fall yesterday, and I never even cracked."

A Time to be Firm.

MISS OLDGIRL (coyly): "I had a strange dream the other night, Mr. Jones. I dreamed—only think!—that you and I were married and on our wedding tour. You don't know how real it seemed. Did you ever dream such a thing?" Mr. Jones (firmly): "No, Miss Oldgirl, I did not. In fact, I haven't had the nightmare for a good many years."

Animal Intelligence.

THE common opinion is that animals do not know enough to be superstitious. Here is a possible exception:

"I tell you what," said Mr. Watts, "I saw a remarkable exhibition of animal intelligence to-day!" "What was that?" said Mr. Potts. "Why, a bridal party started from the house across the street from where I live, and one of the horses threw a shoe."

She Got a New One.

THEY were going out, and she sat down while her husband got into his overcoat. "I don't believe you love me any more," she said with a sigh. "I am convinced of it," and her voice trembled a little. "Not love you, my dear? Why, how absurd! Must I tell you every moment that I love you—love you with all my soul?" "Oh, that will do to say, but I know you care for me no longer. How can you love me in this old hat?"

Not Quite What He Meant.

WIFE (who has just returned from the dentist's): "I shall be awfully stupid now." Husband: "Why so, my dear?" Wife: "I have had all my wisdom teeth pulled out." Husband (with the best intention in the world): "Of course, my love, you know it's nothing but a superstition the idea that wisdom teeth have anything to do with wisdom. If you were to have every tooth in your head drawn it couldn't make you any stupider, you know." He succeeded in smoothing matters over, but it was a narrow escape.

Digitized by Google

Another Woman's Child.

(A Story in Two Parts.—conclusion.)

THE FIRST HALF OF THE STORY.

ALECK BAYNES has jilted the girl who loves him for his cousin, Hilda Baynes, a beautiful and a wealthy girl. Joyce, his former sweetheart, is broken-hearted when she hears of it, and, feeling very bitter against Hilda, whom she declares has stolen Aleck from her, resolves to have her revenge when opportunity offers.

Later on Joyce marries a man who had loved her for years, and by a curious coincidence, Hilda Baynes, now a widow, comes to their home in search of rooms for herself and her unborn child. Full of sympathy for a sister in distress, Joyce takes her in and nurses her. This kindness Hilda rewards by running away as soon as she is well enough, leaving her baby for Joyce to look after, with a little money, and a sarcastic note in which she explains that she has left her child to be a companion to Joyce's own baby.

The next we hear of Hilda Baynes is that she is married to Sir Alfred Trevor, and is one of the most beautiful and most wealthy ladies in London.

But Joyce discovers her and sends her a note. The note reads: "You must come to me or I will come to you.—JOYCE CARNEGIE."

IN a tiny garret far east of the Trevor's great mansion, a woman sat sewing for her life. She was young, and might once have been pretty, but want and sorrow, and the marks of a mortal disease, had carved lines upon her face which told their own sad tale. Her clothes, though neat, were worn and patched, the room in which she sat told of the poverty of its occupant. The furniture was of the barest—a table, two chairs, and a bed constituted the whole, with the exception of a cradle at the feet of the woman, whose eyes glanced lovingly now and then at its occupant. The window, high up in the wall, showed many broken panes, a few sickly plants struggled for life on the sill.

The woman sighed as she sewed. Life was a weary fight for her now.

"Will she come, I wonder?" so her thoughts ran. "Will my long patience be rewarded at last? Is my revenge at hand? And is the woman who stole my lover to be delivered up to me at last?" A smile of triumph stole over the wasted features upon which disease and misery had set their marks so plainly. "If I had gone to her husband—to this great Sir Alfred, with the story, he would never have believed me. If she comes here, I shall be able to make my own terms—my own terms." She laughed softly, then she sighed, a bitter sigh, as the past came flooding back upon her memory. She saw again, as if it had been yesterday, her parting with Aleck in the orchard. She heard his low pleading voice saying: "Ah! Joyce, keep my secret, forgive me, and keep my secret!" Well! she had kept the secret whilst he lived; she had done more, she had tended his widow in her trouble—and how had Hilda repaid her? In the flash of recollection Joyce saw herself standing in that empty room in her house, from which Hilda had fled, leaving behind her a helpless babe! At the remembrance Joyce set her teeth hard.

"She left the child to me," she muttered, "her delicate child to me—a young mother myself. Hard, selfish, cruel—it is time she was taught a sharp lesson. She will come here to-day in deadly terror, lest I should make her secret marriage known to the world. Ah! my lady, you will see now that you cannot sin with impunity, my revenge is close at hand!"

There was a step upon the stair, and Joyce lifted her head, the smile about her mouth grew, as someone knocked at the door, and she said softly: "Come in."

The door opened slowly and cautiously, the woman inside the room rose to her feet.

"Is it you?" she said, when her visitor had entered the room, "you—at last?" And her glance never left the face of the other woman who looked round the garret with a look that held in it something of fear.

"Why did you write to me?" was the answer, in a low, hoarse voice. "How did you know that I——"

"How did I know that the Hilda Trevor of to-day was the Hilda Baynes of a year ago? Oh! I found out that little fact by the common process of putting two and two together. So! You hid from your husband all knowledge of the past. You never hinted at the weeks you passed in my lodgings, when I tended you as though you were my own kin? What will he say when I tell him that his wife——"

"You must never tell him," cried Hilda. "I—I have come to you to-day to say to you that he must never be told. I—I thought it best to keep the past from him. It was not necessary that he should know——"

Before the scornful glance in the other's eyes, her voice trailed into silence.

"What a pleasant little surprise for him when he learns the truth," Joyce said calmly.

"You must never tell him!" Hilda made a quick step forward and laid a hand on the arm of the little sempstress. "Joyce Carnegie, listen to me. I have acted for the best. My husband would never have forgiven me had he known my secret. I could not tell him—I cannot tell him. But—I have come to offer you anything you like to ask me, if only you will be silent."

"To bribe me?" Joyce answered slowly. "You guess, and you guess rightly, that money is precious to me. I have come down in the world since you knew me. My husband died, and I—I sank and sank to this," she waved her arm towards her dreary room, "I am dying of consumption—I am deadly poor, money is a temptation to me, but—revenge is sweeter."

"Revenge?" Lady Trevor looked at her with terror in her eyes.

"Yes, revenge! Do you know that it was I—I—I from whom you stole your first husband, Aleck Baynes?" Lady Trevor uttered a cry of horror, and shrank back towards the door. "Ah! Now you are beginning to understand! I have never forgiven you for that. I was good to you a year ago, because you were ill and in trouble. Then you repaid my kindness by leaving your child upon my hands? Oh! the reasons for revenge are growing apace, are they not?" And she smiled into the other's white terrified face. "You thought you would cut the knot of all your difficulties by running away from my house, and leaving no clue. You married a rich man, you are courted, honoured, made much of, your plan seems to have worked well! But it is only seeming, because—I—have found you out at last!"

Digitized by Google

"Listen!" Hilda cried. "I—I am very, very sorry for what has passed. I see you are poor. I see you have a great burden of care, I will help you. I will give you money—any amount in reason that you like to name, if you will promise silence about my past. Let me do what I can for you, and I beseech you give me your pledge of silence."

Joyce broke into soft laughter once more.

"No! I will not touch your money! Your husband shall know—and you shall tell him!"

Lady Trevor was desperate. She walked slowly to the door, gathering her rich robes about her, lest they might touch the dust-flecked walls. At the door she paused and turned her head to the woman in tattered garments.

"I defy you!" she said, her lip curling in scorn. "I defy you to come near my house!"

Joyce sank to her knees beside the cradle. She would win yet!

"Your child is asleep," she said quietly, after a moment's silence.

Lady Trevor reeled under the blow.

"My child!" Her voice rose to a scream. "Are you mad? That child cannot be mine! That is your baby, not mine—you are mad. My baby, I thought that my baby——"

Joyce looked up at Lady Trevor with flashing eyes.

"Ah! Yes, I guess what you would say. You thought—you mean you hoped—that your baby was dead. Poor mite, little wonder if it had died. But when you deserted it, I cared for it. This is your child. My baby died—yours lived. The child is yours!"

"Woman, you lie—you lie—it is impossible." Lady Trevor's voice rose in a storm of anger.

"It is yours," Joyce repeated firmly. "Pity! for your child's sake!"

"My child! No, your child!"

"Hear me! It is not money that I want from you, but for your child's sake do what I ask. I am dying, you can see it for yourself. The doctor has told me so. I beseech you acknowledge the child, take it to your own home, give it its rights. I am willing to die in poverty, but grant me this prayer I make you for the sake of your child!"

With a dramatic gesture Joyce swept the baby from its cradle and held it out towards Hilda, "for the sake of your child!" she said once more.

"Whose child?" A man's voice said the words, a voice so sharp, so stern, so unexpected, that both women turned with a gasp towards the door. In their conflict they had not heard this step upon the stair, and both Lady Trevor and Joyce Carnegie stood spell-bound, whilst the newcomer looked from one to the other in speechless amazement.

"It is my husband," Hilda murmured, every trace of colour leaving her face. "Good God, he has found me—here."

"What does this mean?" Sir Alfred spoke at last after a long and pregnant silence. His words came slowly, his face had blanched when he saw the fear in his wife's eyes. "What does it all mean?"

By a great effort Lady Trevor recovered her self-assurance.

"It means," she said, "that this woman is attempting to blackmail me, by pretending, pretending, that the child yonder is—mine."

"Yours! Hilda, are you mad?"

"It is this woman who makes mad assertions—not I!" Hilda spoke more confidently, the incredulity in her husband's voice gave her new courage. Sir Alfred strode across to Joyce's side.

"Who are you who dare make such statements about my wife?" he said. "And whose is the child you hold in your arms?" Joyce stood motionless, and the child lay looking from one to the other of those about it with big frightened eyes.

"My name is Joyce Carnegie," Joyce replied, "the child is your wife's. It was born in my house, where I cared for her and for it. I——"

All at once, in sight of the terrible dismay that overspread her husband's face, Hilda's self-control gave way. With a low cry, she flung herself upon Sir Alfred.

"Alfred—Alfred," she cried, "I will tell you—I will tell you——"

"Tell me the truth," he said hoarsely, pushing her away from him, and holding her at arms' length, "this is no time for lies, tell me the truth. I shall believe every word you say." For a moment the eyes of husband and wife met, then Hilda's fell. Her self-control had utterly deserted her. She laughed, a low mirthless laugh, that made him shiver. She was too terrified and blinded by emotion to realise that even now the game lay in her own hands—her husband would believe whatever she chose to say—now! Five minutes later it would be too late.

No realisation of all this crossed her mind. Goaded by fear, she spoke with reckless haste and bitterness.

"I suppose it is my child," she said. Sir Alfred cried out in dismay, "it is useless to deny it if that woman swears to its identity. I did not tell you before because, because, I knew how you hated deceit."

"And so you deceived me?" he replied, in a tone of intense anguish. "I can forgive anything but deceit."

"I deceived you for your good and my own," Hilda said sullenly. "I was married before I married you. I married my cousin, Aleck Baynes. I was miserable as his wife. I was glad when he died. We were both miserable, he and I. The child was born after his death. It was born in Mrs. Carnegie's house. I—I hated it. It was a burden, a clog upon all my hopes, all my ambitions. Do not look at me as if I were a monstrosity! All women are not child lovers—I was not. The baby was delicate too. the doctor did not think it would live long. I thought—I thought it must have died long ago."

For the first time her voice shook, and Sir Alfred asked sternly:

"Are you going to tell me you deserted your child—your own child?"

"What could I do?" she cried impetuously. "Could I begin life again, hampered by a child? I tell you my marriage with Aleck was a secret, no one knew of it. I had not even told my mother. Could I have gone back to my parents, who imagined me to be staying with a school friend, and told them all my story, taking a baby with me? No! a thousand times no. They would have turned me out of their house. I tell you, I thought the child would die. I was sure it would die in early infancy. One day I sent Mrs. Carnegie and her husband out. Then—I went away. I left some money and a letter for Mrs. Carnegie. She loved children, she had told me so scores of times. She had a baby only a little older than mine. I was not fit for the care of a child. I went away, and left the child behind. I have never heard of it again until to-day."

The cool cynicism with which she spoke—the indifference of her voice—the icy calmness of her manner, roused Sir Alfred to a white heat of fury.

"Are you a woman at all?" he said. "And can you speak in this way of your own child? I believed I loved you—but—it was a woman that I thought I loved! Are you dead to all sense of womanly feeling and goodness?"

She shrugged her shoulders, and again her reckless laugh rang through the room.

"The game is up," she said dramatically, with a little hysterical laugh. "I need dissemble no longer. Why pretend to be what I am not, what I never was? You will never forgive me for having deceived you! You have found out the truth now, and henceforth——"

"Henceforth," he said sternly, "justice shall be done to this poor child, whom you have foresworn. Of forgiveness towards you, I cannot even think, much less speak. I do not know—I cannot imagine what the future may have in store for you and me." His voice trembled—if ever heart-

(Concluded at foot of next page.)

Digitized by Google

The Great "PASS-IT-ALONG" Scheme.

FIRST AWARD £10.

SECOND AWARD £5.

THIRD AWARD £2.

Six awards of 10s. each.

AN ENTIRELY NEW FORM OF MONEY MAKING.

This novel and clever scheme will be continued in next Tuesday's SHORT STORIES. For the benefit of those who have not seen our previous announcements, we give below a rough idea of the scheme, so that they may be prepared for next Tuesday's offer.

Every person who buys a copy of "SHORT STORIES" will have the opportunity of entering for this scheme by first of all writing his or her name and address on a space which will be found at the foot of one of the pages, and then sending the copy of the paper to a friend whom the competitor thinks will be likely to sign his or her name in a space provided. This friend of yours will then post the copy to a friend of his or hers, and so your copy will go from one person to another for fourteen days, when you will find it returned to you. Then you simply send the copy to us, under the conditions which you will find next week, and if it contains more names than that sent by anyone else

You will get £10, and every person who has signed your papers will get £1 each.

Your whole expenses will be one stamp for sending a copy of Short Stories to your friend. Your friend, and his or her friends and friends pay the other postage. If, however, you don't want to send your own copy away, and you can't get a friend to give you his or her copy (readers, you will find, don't like parting with their copy of dear little S. S.), then why not get an extra copy of the next number, as thousands of other readers will do?

The copy will cost you one penny, and may bring you £10.

But don't leave it till Tuesday before you ask for your extra copy, or you will find your newsagent is sold out. Just ask him to keep it by for you till you call on Tuesday for it. . .

Next Week's Number, we may add, will be a splendid one. The cover depicts a beautiful young girl being escorted out of church by the churchwarden. Why? Well, that will be explained in the paper in a powerful and thrilling story which the picture illustrates.

Altogether, next week's number will be worth twopence in itself. But there's no need to pay twopence for it—only one penny. You get two copies for twopence—one to keep for reading, and one to make £10. . . . . .

break looked out of a man's eyes, it looked out of his then. "Your child shall not stay a day longer in this miserable home. The truth shall be told to all the world. I will allow no further deceit." Lady Trevor tried to speak, but he silenced her by a gesture. Turning to Joyce, he said gently:

"Words are poor things with which to thank you for your goodness to another woman's child. My thanks will be shown by deeds. I will make arrangements at once for bringing you and the child to my house." Hilda uttered a suppressed cry, but again her husband silenced her. "Every thing that we can do, Mrs. Carnegie, to make amends to you for all that you have suffered, shall be done. And now, Hilda, come"—he looked coldly at his wife, who shrank away from him with a shiver—"come home, and God grant that in time your heart may be softened. Come."

Standing back to allow her to pass out, he threw open the door for her ceremoniously, then followed her slowly down the stairs, the sound of their footsteps gradually dying away in the ears of the woman in the garret, who stood silently where they had left her, the child held close and warm against her heart, a smile of triumph upon her face—

For—the child she held in her arms was not Hilda's, but her own! Joyce's triumph was complete—she had made Hilda confess—her revenge was revenge indeed.

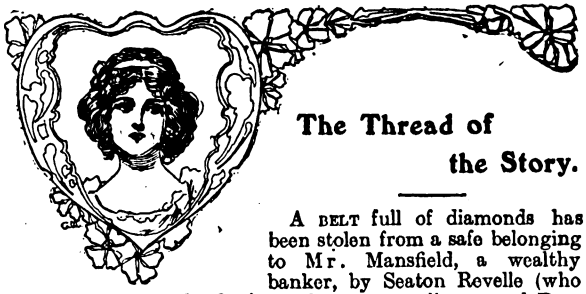
L. G. Moberley.

Digitized by Google

OUR THRILLING NEW SERIAL.

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

By HENRY FARMER.



The Thread of the Story.

A BELT full of diamonds has been stolen from a safe belonging to Mr. Mansfield, a wealthy banker, by Seaton Revelle (who is a friend of the banker's) and an accomplice named Benjamin Beard. Revelle accuses Alec Scarsdale, who is in love with Esther, Mr. Mansfield's daughter, of the crime, and he is sentenced to sixteen years' penal servitude.

Mr. Crump, late Chief-Inspector at Scotland Yard, feeling sure Scarsdale is innocent and Revelle is guilty, determines to prove the latter's guilt.

Mr. Mansfield as fully believes in Scarsdale's guilt as does Esther in his innocence, and his friendship for Revelle increases. Revelle constantly visits the banker's house in an endeavour to win Esther's love, but so far has not prospered at all. While talking with the girl one day, Mr. Mansfield's new maid, Vance, enters the room with a tray bearing cups of coffee. No sooner does she catch sight of Revelle than she drops the tray, and, pointing to Revelle, screams: "That—that man is my husband!" But Revelle, by sheer force of will, compels her to acknowledge her mistake.

At about this time Esther and Mr. Crump are walking together when they observe Vance about to throw herself into the reservoir. Crump stops her just in time—he and Esther taking her back to The Woodlands. Later on she is placed in the county asylum.

In the meanwhile Scarsdale manages to pass through several letters to Esther to which she receives replies full of hope and affection. On account of an assault upon a brutal warder, however, he is to be removed to Wrackham Convict Prison, an establishment famous for its hard discipline.

A charity concert is now announced, in which both Esther and Benny are billed to take part. Revelle, of course, is present; so also is Mr. Crump. It is while returning from this concert that Revelle proposes to Esther but is refused.

The great balloon incident now approaches. There is to be a grand fête in Lord Normanhurst's grounds, the chief and closing event being a balloon ascent by Mr. Seaton Revelle. Everything goes well till two horsemen arrive with the news that Vance has escaped from the asylum.

Acting upon Crump's advice they go straight to the reservoir, but fail to find the missing girl. The search is given up at nightfall. Shortly before nightfall Revelle makes his ascent. A storm, however, compels him to come down, the anchor touching ground on a neighbouring common just where Vance is waiting for him. The girl clings on to the anchor, and Revelle, quickly making a terrible resolve, throws out a number of sandbags, and the balloon again rises and continues its flight till Warham reservoir is reached. Just as the balloon is passing over the water Revelle cuts the anchor rope.

Vance's dead body is found next morning, Mr. Crump being informed of the discovery while walking with Esther.

FOUND DROWNED!

"IN the reservoir!"

The man jerked his thumb over his shoulder.

"In the far end. They were cutting the weeds. I'm going for the police!"

The man hurried away. Esther had already reached the house.

"That idiot of an inspector!" rasped out Crump fiercely. "If watch had been kept through the night, this might have been prevented! Now it's too late, and a life's been sacrificed, just for the want of a little thought!"

But, though the little man's indignation was righteous, he was mistaken. The tragedy would have taken place all the same; but, had watch been kept by the reservoir, some clue might have been furnished as to how the poor creature found her way into the water. The look of anger on Crump's face gave place to one of deep sorrow.

"I can't do any good!" he muttered, "and yet——"

He passed out into the road, and set out towards the reservoir. Few men had seen more of the grim side of life than Crump; but it had not made him callous, nor was it the morbid spirit of curiosity that was taking him to the reservoir. It was the detective instinct which was as strong within him now as it had been in the days of active service. He believed that the poor creature had taken her own life; but he had jumped at the conclusion that, though she had denied herself, there was foundation for those words, "That man is my husband!" and even in death something might be revealed. It was his duty to investigate.

Not far from the sluices that controlled the outflow of the water stood a shed, used for keeping tools and housing a boat. Three or four men stood outside talking in whispers. "Mr. Penworthy" was known to them.

"Too late to save her, this time!" said one of the men in a low voice.

"Poor woman!" said Crump very softly, and with a dimming of his bright, little eyes. "The All-merciful will, I dare to think, has granted her the rest she sought!"

He was visibly affected. To him the woman with dull, spiritless eyes, and a face from which a former prettiness had been washed out, had been full of pathos.

Removing his hat, and with his grey head bowed a little he passed into the shed. The others did not follow him. He came to a standstill close to where they had laid her, and for a few moments did not stir, his lips moving a little, his hands pressing his hat to his chest. Then he raised up the tarpaulin that covered her.

He emerged some ten minutes later, a curious expression on his face.

"Where," he asked in a whisper of one of the men, "was she found?"

"Yonder!"

The man pointed away to where some weeds rose up out of the water, some distance from the bank.

"How deep is it there?" questioned Crump.

"Not more than four feet!"

The little man's expression was exceedingly thoughtful.

"Were the sluice-gates closed?"

"Yes."

"Then the water was absolutely still. When the sluice-gates are closed, I presume that there is no current?"

Digitized by Google

"No."

The little man, looking in the direction of the distant weeds, seemed to be making a calculation.

"H'm!"

The intonation of the monosyllable told that something was puzzling him. The weeds were some distance from the bank. And also, while in the shed, he had made a discovery of an extraordinary nature—something that had evidently escaped the notice of those who had found the body.

"Is it deep between the bank and the weeds?"

"Yes, there's a regular dip."

"It was a long way from the bank for her to have been found!"

"Ah," said the man, "but I daresay, when she found herself in the water, and it was too late, she may have made a fight for life, struck out blindly in the dark, and kept afloat till she reached the shallower water, only to sink under from exhaustion. It must have been so. What else could have happened?"

Crump did not answer. His lips were pursed up. He was looking more puzzled than ever. He intended to make further investigations; but he preferred to wait. He did not wish to call attention to himself.

"Hullo," cried one of the men suddenly, "here comes the police, and Doctor Felton—not that he can do any good!"

Crump did not wait, but moved away slowly and thoughtfully. He was obviously perplexed.

"How was it," he muttered to himself, "that she came to be found so far away from the bank? And, granted that the theory that she had managed to struggle so far is correct, how is that broken leg to be accounted for?"

One of the poor creature's legs was broken! The fact had escaped the notice of the men who had taken her from the water; but not Crump's!

"I certainly must be present at the inquest. I am altogether mystified. Later in the day I must have another look round; but I do not wish to call attention to myself; and earn the reputation of being a poke-nose. But I am absolutely puzzled. If her leg was broken before she jumped into the water, it seems to me impossible for her to have struggled through the deep water into the shallow. At the same time, it does not seem possible that, jumping into deep water, she could have broken her leg in doing so. I may be wrong; but I feel that I am face to face with a most extraordinary mystery. I am very much puzzled. I feel very, very much tempted to jump to the conclusion that this is not a case of suicide."

"Yes," he said to himself, when presently he emerged from the wood. "I'm glad that Miss Mansfield is going away. There is a gloom gathering over this place. I hope, sincerely hope, that she will get away at once, before the inquest!"

Then he lapsed again into a brown study.

"Ah!" he ejaculated suddenly, then brought his teeth together with a sharp snap.

He had jumped at a conclusion, and the next moment had told himself that he was mad for having done so.

"I think that I am suffering from Jim, balloons, and parachutes on the brain! I really must watch myself most carefully!"

He drew out a letter, and, having torn off the half-sheet, proceeded to scribble down some jottings in pencil as he walked along—grim jottings that referred to the dead woman's dress and personal appearance.

He was looking very sad and depressed when he reached The Woodlands.

* * * * *

"I am glad to see you back safely, sir. I have passed an anxious night thinking of you. Mr. Faversham has been equally anxious on your behalf. Allow me, sir!"

The silent Railton took from Revelle his hat and heavy overcoat.

"Yes, it was a nasty night, and so dark that I lost my bearings, Railton. I landed at a Heaven-forsaken hole called Ocklington. Only one inn in the place, and it took me nearly an hour to wake 'em up!"

Seaton Revelle was looking a trifle grey and haggard, as he made his way into the billiard-room where Benny was idly knocking the balls about, and speculating as to how it had fared with the Marquis.

"You hit your ball a little too full!"

Benny, who had just failed to run in off the red, turned sharply to see the Marquis standing on the threshold, a faint smile playing round his lips.

"Back!" he cried. "Thank goodness! I was beginning to get into a dickens of a funk about you! You haven't been careering about the sky all night, have you?"

"No. Landed at Ocklington shortly after midnight. Got them to put me up at the inn there."

"What have you done with the balloon? You haven't brought it back with you in your pocket, have you?"

"No; but it's packed up, and I've left it at Ocklington to wait there till called for!"

"Well!" said Benny, with a genuine sigh of relief, "I'm jolly glad to see you back. And if I hadn't known that you always have the devil's own luck, I should have been still more anxious. But you always come down on to your feet!"

He glanced at Revelle's face.

"But, I say, you don't look any the better for your trip!"

Revelle carefully selected a cue from the rack, and, having placed the billiard balls into approximately the same position that they had occupied when he had entered the room, neatly pocketed his ball off the red. Then he rang the bell and ordered brandy and soda-water.

"I say," said Benny, dropping his voice a little, and watching the effect of his words, "nothing's been heard of that poor woman who's escaped from the asylum!"

"Oh, is that so? They are bound to get her, unless——"

"Unless what?"

"Well," said Revelle, as he helped himself to a cigarette from his case, "you see she was suffering from suicidal mania, and when a man or woman suffers from that, they generally succeed sooner or later!"

His cigarette lighted, he strolled towards the door.

"I'm just going to have a tub to freshen me up; then I shall take the cob out for a spin. You'd better come too."

"No, thank you!" said Benny, very promptly. "That cob gets on my nerves too much. Some other time, perhaps, later, very much later. But don't you worry about me. If I do anything, I shall go out for a spin on my bike. I prefer it. It hasn't a will of its own, nor hind legs to rise up upon and do a promiscuous sort of dance from one side of the road to the other!"

Revelle laughed, then went to his dressing-room. The mask fell from his face. His jaw dropped a little. his head sank forward; and suddenly, as if a cry had reached him, he drove his fingers into his ears. But he could not keep out that cry.

"Jim!"

The reaction had come now. Then he caught a glimpse of his own reflection in a mirror. The sight seemed to recall him. He steadied himself.

"Oh, when I was single, oh, then,
Oh, when I was single, oh, then,
Oh, when I was single, my pockets did jingle,
I long to be single again!"

It was Benny going to his room, and singing as he went the refrain of the song which had been such a success at the village concert.

"Single again!"

Mechanically Revelle repeated the words; then, through the open window, from which the road was visible, came the slow, rhythmic tramp of footsteps, heavy footsteps as of men carrying a burden. As though drawn by a magnet, Revelle approached the window, and, gripping the sill with a shaking hand, stared out.

Four men, carrying a hurdle on which lay something covered over with a piece of tarpaulin, passed into sight. A silent little crowd followed.

Digitized by Google

OUR NEW SERIAL. YOU CAN BEGIN TO-DAY.

"Single again!"

Benny had reached his room and closed the door; but the words rang out audibly.

They were out of sight again, the bearers and the burden, the little crowd following.

Revelle reeled away from the window.

"Single again!"

BENNY COMES A "CROPPER."

"Yes, my father has wired to say that we are coming. We shall leave to-morrow for Gurlston Bay. After what has happened to-day"—Esther shivered—"I am more thankful than ever to think that I am going to get away from here for a little while; but—but do you think me a coward, Mr.—Mr. Penworthy?"

It was twilight, the close of the day that had witnessed the tragic discovery in Warham reservoir. Esther had left the house and had joined Crump. They were walking along a secluded garden path.

"My dear young lady," said the little man, "I, too, I am very thankful! No, no! I don't think you a coward, believe me. In your absence we shall be watching over your interests, doing our best for you—such as it is. I am glad!"

On the morrow the inquest was to be held on the poor woman found in the reservoir, and Crump was thankful to think that Esther would be away, right away from the place.

"Gurlston Bay," he went on, "a very pleasant place indeed; but perhaps you have been there before?"

"No!"

The little man was making conversation purposely with a view to distract Esther's thoughts.

"I was there some years ago. The cliffs are very fine and imposing. And there are caves that well repay a visit—quite a romantic history connected with these caves. They are, most of them, artificial, originally quarries; then, when quarry work was discontinued, they served as the head-quarters for smugglers. But, of course, the days of the bold, bad smuggler are long since things of the past—except in a certain form of fiction that caters for credulous youth!"

The little man's eyes twinkled.

"I took my young nephew Fred and his sister there. It's a good many years back now; but I can even now remember the look of disappointment on the little lad's face when reference to the guide-book showed that no smuggler had been seen or heard of in the neighbourhood for more than sixty years!"

The little man chuckled.

"I remember that we spent a very happy day in those caves, playing, most of the time, at being smugglers. At least Freddie and Katie were the bold, bad smugglers, and I had to content myself with the more virtuous, but less interesting part of their prisoner. I hope you won't find the journey wearisome; but you know the pace of some of these South Coast trains is not excessive, nor are they famous for their punctuality. Let me see, if I remember rightly, you will travel via Roxeter Junction!"

Roxeter Junction was the changing-place, not only for Gurlston Bay, but also for Wrackam—Wrackam, where the big convict prison was.

"What time are you starting, Miss Mansfield?"

"In the early morning. I think we shall have to leave here at about half-past nine!"

"Ah, well, though I shall be seeing you to-morrow, perhaps I had better be saying my real good-bye now—at least, good-bye for the present. You will, I trust, write to me. I shall take the liberty of writing to you. My letters will deal with other matters besides the progress that I am making with the front garden. I do hope, my dear young lady, that you will come back ever so much refreshed by your change. You will try not to brood—it is very easy for me to advise, I know—but you will try, won't you?"

The little man held out his hand.

"God bless you!" he said quietly and unaffectedly.

Esther went with him round to the front gates. They had reached them when the rattle of wheels sounded out, and, a moment later, a dog-cart came into sight.

Revelle reined up—he was alone—at the gates.

"Single again!"

Crump raised his hat, and retired into the background.

"Miss Mansfield," said Revelle, in a low, strained voice, "I'm supremely shocked at what has happened. Awful! I saw your father to-day. He tells me that you are going away to-morrow. I can quite understand that you will be glad to get away. There's a gloom over the place. Gurlston Bay you're going to, aren't you? It's a charming place. I know it well. I suppose I shan't be seeing you before you go. I hope the change will do you a world of good!"

"You infernal blackguard, sir!" said Crump to himself fiercely.

Revelle raised his hat. The dog-cart rattled away.

"Single again!"

"Oh, how I loathe you!"

The words had been whispered out from Esther's quivering lips. Crump was beside her again.

"We must be very patient," he said in a low voice, "very patient!"

Then, after some further whispered conversation, the little man again wrung her hand, and gave her his blessing.

It was a climb up to Woodbine cottage. Crump recognised the bicyclist who coasted down past him, his feet on the rests. It was Mr. Faversham.

"You're a blackguard, too!" said the little man to himself. "But you amuse me, in spite of myself!"

Esther still stood by the gates, staring wistfully into the deepening shadows.

A snapping sound, a sharp cry, then a thud and a metallic crash awakened her from her reverie.

She darted out into the road. A little distance away, a man lay stretched on the ground, not far from him a bicycle smashed almost beyond recognition.

Some women would have returned to the house for assistance. Esther promptly hurried towards the motionless figure on the ground. To go back and summon help meant loss of time. The man lay on his face, a thin stream of blood trickling from his forehead. Esther, trembling from head to foot, but retaining her presence of mind, knelt down, and, exerting all her strength, turned him over on to his back.

She started when her eyes rested on the white, motionless face of Mr. Faversham, Seaton Revelle's friend.

Benny Beard was a good rider, but even a good rider cannot hold up against the calamity of a broken brake. He had been badly thrown at the foot of the hill.

He was quite unconscious. Esther's womanly instinct was uppermost. She did not pause to think who or what he was. Whipping out her handkerchief, she staunched the flow of blood; then bound it round his head.

And when Benny opened his eyes it was to find Esther kneeling beside him and supporting him in her arms.

"You!" he muttered in dazed fashion. "You! Oh, yes, I remember now. Brake broke—somersault through space—smack on the head—forgetfulness."

"I hope you're not hurt badly, Mr. Faversham; you had better come into the house. We can send for the doctor."

Benny slowly rose to his feet. Beside being cut about the head, he had been severely bruised and shaken, but he was not a coward so far as physical pain was concerned.

"Thank you, Miss Mansfield. I wouldn't mind resting for a few moments. There's no need for a doctor; I'm all right, or shall be in a few minutes. It's very good of you, Miss Mansfield"—he raised his hand to his head, and for the first time realised that it was bandaged—"Hullo, and you've been and bandaged me up, too. I don't know how to thank you!"

Once within the house, Benny did not say "No" to a brandy-and-soda. It was the first time that he had been in John Mansfield's house since the night of the burglary. Esther had led the way into her father's study—the room containing the safe that had been robbed. The surroundings, the presence of Esther, made Benny, now that he had recovered his senses, feel decidedly uncomfortable. He gave a sigh of relief when Esther asked him to excuse her for a few moments. Left to himself, he stared at the safe.

Digitized by Google

"By Jove!" he muttered, "it's scarcely a year ago. I was standing here; the Marquis over there. I can almost fancy I hear the sound of those approaching footsteps. It makes my heart beat quicker to think of that moment."

He shivered.

"Confound it all, I wish I'd never had a hand in that wretched job! I wish I'd never met Esther Mansfield. Every time I see her face my conscience pricks me. And she looks at me sometimes as if she could see through me. Those great piteous eyes of hers, too! I haven't many virtues, but I can't bear the sight of a woman suffering. Confound the Marquis! He put up the job; he dragged me into it. It was the worst night's work I ever did!"

When Esther returned she was carrying bandages, and insisted on bandaging Benny's head afresh before he left the house. Never had he felt so uncomfortable. The woman whom he had helped to wrong so cruelly was, with the sweet tenderness of her sex, ministering to him. When he prepared to leave, he stammered and seemed strangely embarrassed as he again thanked her. He was conscious of her dark eyes bent searchingly upon his face.

He only breathed more freely when he had left the house, and was wheeling his wreck of a bicycle towards The Firs.

"If I saw much more of her, if I were constantly in her society," he muttered uneasily, "I should make an ass of myself. I'd blurt something out; she'd draw it out of me, in spite of myself. I'll have a chat with the Marquis to-night about getting away from this place. What the dickens is coming over me? I'm not sure of myself!"

"TILL DEATH!"

JOHN MANSFIELD and Esther, her arm linked in his, were pacing up and down the platform of Roxeter Junction.

"Dear me," said John Mansfield, impatiently, "that's the worst of these South Coast railways—trains are always late, and one never knows into which platform they are going to run. Porter, is this our train coming?"

"No, sir; yours is the next after this."

A long train had run into the platform, a third-class saloon attached to the rear.

Esther and her father were strolling along, watching the passengers disembark, when their attention was attracted by a crowd that was gathering round the last carriage. On reaching the outer edge of the little crowd, they saw two military-looking men in uniform, and wearing cutlasses, alight, and one of them called out—

"Now then, look sharp, tumble out, all of you. We've got to change here for Wrackham!"

"A batch of convicts," said someone close to Esther, "bound for Wrackham prison!"

The blood rushed from her cheeks. Convicts! Was not the man she loved a convict!

"Come away, Esther," said her father hurriedly, "it's a shame to stare at the poor fellows!"

But a paralysis held her motionless. White to her very lips she stared with dilated eyes at the carriage-door.

A clanking of chains fell on her ears. Three men linked together, in drab and arrow-stamped clothes, their hair close-cropped, the ugly prison cap perched on their heads, filed out of the carriage and moved across the platform to where another train was waiting.

She scarcely seemed to breathe. Her eyes scanned every face.

There was a moment's pause. Then another gang—a gang of four—filed out, a warder in front, a warder behind.

Again she scanned each face. The last man was differently dressed to the others—in a hideous parti-coloured dress of black and drab—and his legs as well as his hands were fettered.

Ten Thousand Women Victims.

Over ten thousand women died last year, victims to that dread scourge, anæmia. The chief source of this ailment is constipation and liver disorder. Bile Beans are an unfailing cure for these ailments; and where they are used anæmia can no more occur than darkness at some source of light. Mrs. Matthewson, wife of a well-known farmer of Elwick, near Berwick, describing her daughter's case, said:—"Mary suffered for months from anæmia. She became weak, emaciated, lost appetite, lost weight, and lost all interest in life. She never wanted food, and what she did take caused her pain, so enfeebled were her digestive organs. A doctor who attended her said she seemed to have no blood at all. Doctor's medicine failing, we tried Bile Beans, and there was very soon a marked improvement.

From that time she never looked back; and to-day she is as healthy and as strong a young woman as any I know." Such is one instance of the saving of anæmia's victim by Bile Beans. Thousands of others could be produced. Wherever used, Bile Beans cure anæmia, debility, headache, constipation, piles, all female ailments, loss of appetite, pimples, ulcers, and all blood impurities. Leading chemists everywhere will supply Bile Beans at one and three-halfpence or two and nine per box. The Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., of 119 London Wall, E.C., will send a box post free on receipt of price.

"ALKAN" CURES IN ONE MINUTE

by inhalation, HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, FACIAL NEURALGIA, NEURALGIA OF THE EAR.

PRICES 2/9 AND 4/6 PER BOTTLE.

Of all Chemists and Stores, or of the Proprietors,

The "ALKAN" Ltd.,

General Depot, 150 STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

PAPER PATTERN of this

SILK OR MUSLIN BLOUSE

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

OUR NEW SERIAL. YOU CAN BEGIN TO-DAY.

His face was haggard; the hair about his temples streaked with grey.

Esther reeled back. Her great brown eyes seemed to start from their very sockets.

"Alec!"

It was more of a scream than a cry.

Convict 35 stopped short. The chain tightened as the other convicts still moved mechanically forward. The sound of his name, the accompanying cry, had rooted him to the ground. His eyes had been bent down to avoid the staring looks of those gathered round. They were raised now! Was it only a phantom voice—a mocking echo of imagination? A choking, stifled gasp burst from his lips.

Then a mist seemed to obscure his vision; he saw the crowd, shadowy and indistinct, open out; he heard a voice hoarsely cry—"Esther, are you mad?" He was dimly conscious of a warder trying to interpose himself between him and a woman's figure that swiftly moved towards him. But the man had sprang forward too late.

Too late, thank God!

Too late to come between two hungering souls! Too late to mar the ecstasy of that impassioned embrace.

It was a scene that those present would never forget. Many of them witnessed it through a blur of blinding tears.

Surroundings—everything but the fact that they were together again—had been forgotten by the manacled convict and the beautiful woman who, her arms twined round his neck, had buried her face on the hideous, arrow-marked coat. They were as much alone as when they had watched the setting sun over the waters of Rushton Wood. The weary past, the doubtful future, were lost sight of and merged in that present moment. But it was a cruelly brief moment.

Shocked beyond measure and angered at what had occurred, John Mansfield, simultaneously with two of the warders, had sprung forward. He was almost beside himself. That unexpected meeting seemed likely to undo everything. He had hoped that Esther had forgotten Scarsdale. That meeting showed that it was not so. It must mean the re-opening of the wound that he had believed to be healed.

"Esther, come away, come away—this is disgraceful!"

Roughly he gripped her by the arm and tried to drag her away. He was a man of the old-fashioned school. His sense of propriety was outraged. The sight of his own daughter clinging to a prison-clad felon before a score or so of onlookers, filled him with shame. Never in his life had he felt so humiliated.

The two warders had seized Scarsdale by the shoulders, and roughly wrenched him back. John Mansfield had dragged Esther away, but, with an almost fierce movement she broke away from his grasp, and once more flung her arms round the convict. She raised her face, white as death now, to his, he bent down and kissed her!

"My love!—my love!" those who pressed round heard him whisper.

"Till death!" said the woman with a great choking sob.

The words had been spoken; the kiss had been given! The warders might strike him, they might tear them asunder now, but the words had been spoken, the kiss had been given!

"Shame, shame!"

The words had burst from the lips of more than one of the onlookers.

The warders had torn the convict away. In doing so one of them had deliberately struck him a blow with his clenched fist. They saw the convict, hampered as he was with handcuffs and chain, fiercely raise his manacled hands above his head; but the warders had closed with him before they could descend, and held him powerless. Other warders rushed to their assistance. For a moment it was impossible, owing to the confusion and hubbub, to notice what was happening. Then orders were shouted out, there was a clanking of chains, and the little convict gang, the last man held on either side by the warders, was hustled across the platform.

And Esther? Esther had fainted away in her father's arms. Scarsdale's last glimpse of her was as she was borne into the waiting-room. The warders who held him felt the muscles of his arms twitch as the mad desire to break from them, to rush to her side, surged through his brain, and they tightened their hold accordingly. His conduct had cast discredit upon them as warders, and they were furious. He was fettered hand and foot, and there was but little danger of retaliation. They did not spare him in that short transit across the platform to the train. One of them, who gripped the collar of his coat, found brutal satisfaction in jamming his knuckles into his neck. Another—the man against whom in that moment of passion he had raised his hands—twice contrived to strike him in the ribs with his elbow.

"You beauty," he muttered with a coarse oath. "You beauty, you ought to be strung up to the triangles and get six dozen for to-day's doings. I'll give you a character when we get to Wrackham. Go on, don't stare at me like that. Get into the carriage!"

And he emphasised his speech with another blow in the ribs. Worked up by all that had gone before, a prey to a hundred conflicting emotions, Scarsdale gnashed his teeth, and the light that shone from his eyes was fierce and merciless.

"You brute," he hissed, "if only I were free!"

"Go on. None of your lip. Into the carriage."

A few minutes later the engine snorted out a hoarse whistle and the train moved slowly out of the station. The whistle penetrated into the waiting-room, where Esther, surrounded by a little group of sympathetic women, was just opening her eyes. John Mansfield was there, kneeling beside her; his anger had given way to grief. He loved his child and would have given half his possessions that she might have been spared that meeting.

"Esther, my Esther, are you better?"

She did not answer him; but the look in her tearless, staring eyes was more than he could bear. He turned his head aside. One of the ladies present—a sweet-faced woman, whose hair was streaked with silver—whispered something to him; then led him away. Returning, she sat down beside Esther, and, placing an arm round her waist, took one of her hands in her own. Esther had never known her mother, who had died when she was but a baby. She had often been vaguely conscious of a void that only a mother's love can fill—and longing for someone to whom she could pour out the secrets of her heart, without fear, without reserve.

She was still numbed and dazed; still wondered whether she had dreamt it all—the convict gang, the uniformed officials, the hurried whispered words, that one impassioned kiss. The gentle touch of the woman at her side seemed to awaken her more fully. She glanced at the sweet face that was not without signs of a secret sorrow, and the light of womanly, motherly sympathy that shone from her eyes fell comfortingly on Esther's bruised heart. Then the flood-gates of her grief were opened. With a catching gasp, she burst into tears, and convulsively buried her face on the woman's bosom. Tears often bring relief; they brought relief to her.

The others, now that they were assured of her recovery, quietly melted away, only her father, standing by the mantelpiece, his head upon his hands, remained.

The woman, gently stroking Esther's hair, suffered her to weep awhile in silence. Then, bending down, kissed her forehead, and whispered a few simple words of encouragement and consolation—words, precious as jewels, and falling like dew from Heaven, they helped to soothe the burning heart. And as Esther listened, something told her that the woman who was speaking had also suffered.

The gathering roar of the approaching train sounded out. A porter thrust his head into the waiting-room, and, with a glance at John Mansfield, shouted out: "Your train, sir!"

"Esther, this is our train; but, if you like, if you don't feel well enough——"

"No, father, I—I want to get away, to get away!"

She was still weak, and her limbs were trembling. Assisted by the woman, she rose, and, taking her father's arm, passed out and entered the train. She could scarcely find words to thank the woman for her kindness; but the look from her eyes supplied the want of words.

Digitized by Google

ALFOSCO REGD

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co.

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

BUY DIRECT BY PARCEL POST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Design No. 601 10/6

Skirt alone, 6/6 Carriage 5d. extra.

DESIGN No. 601. 10/6.—The fashionable Eton Costume for Spring and Summer wear. Coat trimmed with three rows of cording and two rows of narrow braid and six small fancy buttons, very smart. Produced in all the new shades of the world-renowned Specialite Serge or Vicuna Cloth. Price only 10/6; carriage 6d. Skirt only 6/6; carriage 5d. A marvellous costume for the money. The best value in the Trade. This Costume may be ordered in the new "Coronate" Cloth, price only 21/-, in all the latest Pastel shades.

Design No. 1055. 8/6.

Ladies' Silk Shirt, trimmed narrow tucks. A leading line for 8/6; carriage, 3d. Colours:—Helio, Sky, Pink and Black

8/6

3/11½

Design No. 877 3/11½.

MOREEN UNDERSKIRT, special value for 3/11½; carriage 3d. Colours: Blue, Helio, Red, Pink and Black. Other leading lines at 2/11½ and 4/11. Send for one.

Design No. 613. 10/6.

Stylish Costume, made with the fashionable Russian coat, produced in Allen Foster & Co.'s Specialite Serge or Vicuna Cloth, in all shades. The coat is trimmed braid and the skirt is cut in the new fashionable Bell shape.

Costume complete 10/6, carriage paid 6d.

Skirt alone 5/6, carriage paid 5d. extra.

Call or Write.

ALFOSCO REGD

Design No. 613, 10/6

Carriage 6d. extra.

Write for our Summer Sketch Book and Catalogue of Bargains containing Hundreds of Illustrations of the Latest Novelties for Present Season. Sent with Patterns post free.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,
47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.

SAFE SPEEDY

KAPUTINE cures NEURALGIA equally as well as HEADACHE. NEVER FAILS.

KAPUTINE is USED as well as recommended by MEDICAL MEN!

NOTHING LIKE IT OR AS GOOD

PACKETS OF 18 1/- FOR

KAPUTINE

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

HEADACHE

CURES IN 10 MINUTES.

Packets of 18 doses 1/-. Samples 1d. of all Chemists and Stores, or post free from KAPUTINE Ltd., HUDDERSFIELD, for 12 stamps. Refuse dangerous substitutes. DEMAND KAPUTINE the SAFE Remedy.

BORAX

Extract of Soap.

Ask your charwoman

what soap powder she prefers to use. Unhesitatingly she will answer: BORAX Extract of Soap—not alone because she knows it to be the best possible help she could have in her work, but also because it never has that dreaded galling and chapping effect on the hands which the use of soap powders manufactured from caustic chemicals always has.

BORAX Extract of Soap cannot injure the most delicate fabric.

For washing clothes, washing up, household scouring, and for all cleansing purposes.

Sold in ½lb. packets at all Grocers—same price as the other kinds—but there is only one BORAX Extract of Soap.

Write to-day for Free Sample.

Name S.S. Facsimile Packet.

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT MAKERS TO THE KING.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY, and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers, Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money, and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £7-12-6

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment.

EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

Good! it's Mason's

MASON'S EXTRACT of HERBS

THE BEST BEVERAGE TO TAKE WITH YOUR MEALS, AND AT ALL TIMES.
THE MOST SUITABLE FOR CHILDREN DURING WARM WEATHER.

A Physician states: "It assuages thirst, it is refreshing, and grateful to weak stomachs."

A 6d. Bottle of Extract makes 8 gallons. Bottle, post free, 9 stamps.

Manufacturers:
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

THE END OF ECZEMA IN SIGHT

If you wish to get rid of Eczema or any form of skin trouble, as easily as you can be cured of an ordinary cold, all you have to do is to write, naming this paper, to the Antexema Co., 83 Castle Road, London, N.W. You will have posted to you per return an interesting treatise on the skin, and a free trial sample of "ANTEXEMA." These will be sent to you in a plain envelope wrapper, absolutely gratis and post free.

You will then see for yourself how wonderfully "ANTEXEMA" acts, how immediate is the relief from itching and burning, and how, if you obtain a bottle from your local chemist or store (Price 1/1½), post free from us for 1/3), you will be able to complete the cure which the trial bottle has so auspiciously begun. FREE

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

From 1s. weekly. Special Offer. £12 15s 0d. Sample for £6 6s. Carriage paid. PLATED RIMS, FREE WHEELS, RIM BRAKE FITTED FREE. Agents wanted.—DERBHAM ROAD CYCLE CO., NORWICH.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

"TATCHO"

Gets the hair back,
Puts the hair right,
Keeps the hair right.

WHO SAY SO.

COMMANDER T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair."—Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902.

MAJOR-GENERAL KEATE.

"High Croft, Winchester.

"I find the Renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time."

COLONEL PERRY.

"Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin.

"My dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have."

LADY SYKES.

"Mayfair, W.

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has really entirely renovated my hair."

"I USE ONLY 'TATCHO,'" says Mrs. BROWN-POTTER.

"LOOK AT MY HAIR NOW," said the eminent discoverer to the Editor of the Daily Mail. "Isn't that convincing evidence? In 'Tatcho' I have discovered a remedy capable of working wonders."

THE "TATCHO" TRIAL BOTTLE.

The introduction of the large 4/6 Trial Bottle at the nominal price of 1/10 (obtainable of all chemists, stores, and hairdressers, or direct, carriage paid from the "Tatcho" Depot, Lincoln's Inn, London), has been of enormous value to the public, and has proved a means of allowing users to verify for themselves the revelation "Tatcho" works on the hair.

"TATCHO" is a brilliant, spirituous tonic, the colour of whisky, free from all grease.
"TATCHO" is not a dye, and contains no colouring matter or any harmful ingredient.
"TATCHO" is sold by all chemists and stores throughout the world, in bottles at 1/-, 2/9, and /-, in addition to the special trial size referred to above.

Digitized by Google

"If," said John Mansfield, when he, in his turn, had endeavoured to express his thanks, "you should ever be in the neighbourhood of Warham, I hope you will come to see us."

The grey-haired lady took the card he handed her, and gave him one of her own from her case. Then the guard's flag was waved, and the carriage doors were slammed to. She pressed Esther's hands and kissed her.

It was only when the train had gathered motion that John Mansfield glanced at the card. It bore the words: "Mrs. Cecil Crofton, 35 Warwick Square, London, S.W."

No wonder if Esther had noticed signs of suffering endured on the sweet face. The woman who had been so good to her was Gentleman Jack's mother!

And if Esther's agony was great, hers had been and was greater. The days passed, but nothing had been heard of the escaped convict. Every day she dreaded to hear the news of his capture. She did not even know whether her son was alive. It may be imagined how the sight of the convicts at Roxeter station and the pathetic scene that ensued had affected one whose own son had worn the felon's dress and badge.

Fate works strangely, weaving a wonderful web in which the threads of many lives are interwoven, crossing and re-crossing one another.

A FAMILIAR FACE.

The journey from Roxeter Junction to Wrackam Dock—the station where convicts alight and are transferred from there to Wrackam Convict Prison—left but a blurred, confused recollection in Alec Scarsdale's mind. He scarcely heard the remarks that were passed among the convicts. The gentleman of the coining persuasion contrived to make one or two brutal jests on the subject of his "gal." The grey-haired old man and the little Cockney ventured upon a few whispered words of sympathy. But jest and sympathy fell upon unheeding ears.

The darkness that follows is more black than the darkness that precedes the flash of light. He had seen her; had heard her whisper "Till death!" had kissed her. Blackness before; a brief flash of light; blackness again, but more intense, more cruel!

His chin resting on his chest, every facial line and furrow deepened, his handcuffed hands clasped together and hanging down between his legs, he looked a picture of grim despair. He was in a state of mental collapse. Then, gradually the darkness seemed to be illumined by a faint glimmering of light. Youth was not yet crushed out of him; hope was not yet dead. Hope—the will-o'-the-wisp that beckons us from point to point; that, when we sink exhausted and fainting on the weary road, drags us on to our feet again, and plunges a spur into our sides; hope that whispers in the ear of the dying man a lying promise of life.

"Till death!" It was hope that whispered the words again and again in Scarsdale's ears, and seemed to point with outstretched hand to the distant light that now shone out like a guiding star—a woman's lasting love; a love that had held its own, impregnable against calumny, doubt, and time.

It was hope that raised up the drooping chin, and brought back a flash of the old fire to the grey eyes.

Darkness had set in when the train had reached Wrackham Dock, and those convicts who were new to the place gleaned but little knowledge of the surroundings. An omnibus was awaiting them, and the driver, a warder, exchanged greetings with the warders in charge of the party.

"I hope you've brought a nice, respectable little lot?" he cried.

"Oh, very," answered one of them, "especially Number 35; he started to spoon a girl on the platform at Roxeter, and then when we interfered, was going to bash my head with his bracelets. Yes, I think 35 is the pick of the basket, and I wish you joy over him. We were getting a little bit tired of him at our place."

The words were spoken loudly, and some of the convicts burst out laughing at the specimen of warder-humour.

Wrackam Convict Prison—a great barrack-like building, the work of convict labour—stood some distance away from the town of Wrackam, a large naval and military depot. The country around, though undulating, was low-lying, and here and there split up by the many little streams that flowed into the Reedway, the broad river on the edge of which stood Wrackam with its vast docks and basins.

On arrival at the prison, the convicts were conducted into the presence of the deputy-governor and a number of warders. The principal warder in charge handed over the official papers; and names and registered numbers were called over.

When Scarsdale's name and number had been called out, the deputy-governor paused, stared hard at him, and then, drawing aside the principal warder, conversed with him for some little time. The principal warder gave a full account of the episode at Roxeter Station. Scarsdale's reputation as being a dangerous character had already preceded him, and had prejudiced the prison officials against him. What the principal warder told the deputy-governor did not serve to lessen that prejudice.

When handcuffs and connecting chains had been removed, the convicts were conducted to their different cells. Special preparations had been made for Scarsdale's reception. He was placed in the strongest part of the prison. The convicts occupying the cells on either side of him were men whose sentences were nearing expiration, who, in consequence, would not be likely to endeavour to communicate with him by tappings on the wall, and other secret methods of communication known to prisoners.

Scarsdale was still under the ban of Special Orders, and the remainder of his sentence had yet to be completed.

It so happened that he had arrived on the night of the weekly search, and scarcely had the officials who had conducted him to his cell departed, than the door was flung open with a crash, and two warders entered. Without glancing at them, and, almost mechanically, Scarsdale unrolled the bedding for inspection, and then began to strip off his clothing. He was quite unconscious of the fact that one of the warders had fixed his eyes upon him, and was staring at him as if trying to recall something. An exclamation, bursting from the man's lips, made him look up.

The warder's face was familiar to him; but for a moment—only a brief moment—he could not recall when and where he had seen him. Then, like a flash of light, it dawned upon him; and his mind went back to Warham police-station, and the night—that terrible night—of his arrest. It was the warder he had struck.

(A further long instalment of this story appears in next Tuesday's SHORT STORIES.)

"A book worth reading and keeping."
—Bradford Observer.

CROWNING THE KING.

An account of the Coronation of English Kings and Queens up to the Present Time, and a Description of what will take place at the Forthcoming Coronation of King Edward VII.

By Arthur H. Beavan.

Author of "Marlborough House and its Occupants," etc., etc. With 10 illustrations. Crown 8vo.

Price 2s. 6d., post free 2s. 9d.

PEARSON'S GOSSIPY GUIDE TO LONDON.

The Best. The Cheapest. The Most Attractive.

£500 FREE INSURANCE.

Price 1s., post free 1s. 3d.

Digitized by Google

By MADGE MORRIS.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

Is it Love?

How is one to know when a boy is in love? "Mater" propounds this question. Her young son, a youth of nineteen, has of late become very strange in his manner. He seems abstracted, and is very reserved. He goes out constantly, and keeps very late hours. Do I read these as symptoms of heart affection?

Ask him straight out, "Mater," and judge from his manner what is the nature of his abstractedness. If he is not in love, he will tell you so in terms probably of contempt. If he gives an evasive or suspicious answer, I think you may assume there is something in the love theory. How does he dress when he goes out at night? Does he brush his hair very carefully, and look particularly neat, and have you noticed a distinct improvement lately in his manner and general deportment? If so, then be assured someone has stolen his affections.

Mother v. Daughter.

"Fifty Three" is a widower, and perplexed as to the rival claims on his affections of two ladies, a mother and her daughter. While he admires immensely the daughter, the mother (a widow) has great mature charm and would, he should think, make an admirable wife. He is anxious to marry again. Which do I think would make him the better wife, the mother or the daughter?

I think the mother would. It is too much of "Fifty Three" to expect that his admiration for the girl is likely to be returned, save in very exceptional circumstances. If he married her he must do so under a sense of entering into a one-sided attachment. The mother, on the other hand, for whom he appears to have an admiration, might be the very woman to make him comfortable and to administer to his home needs. If he is mentally able to make a selection on judicial grounds, the chances are distinctly in favour of the mother.

The Unknown Suitor.

"Perplexed" is very much worried over a certain man who continuously writes asking her to meet him. He app ars to be very fond of her. She does not know much about him, but she has an idea that he is quite a desirable acquaintance; but at the same time has not the courage to accept his invitations. How should she act? He may really be quite a nice man, and, on the other hand, might be an adventurer.

Next time "Perplexed" hears from this man, let her make a note of his whereabouts, and call in the services of her brother or some male friend she can trust. Let this gentleman be present at the appointed time and place instead of her, and explain his identity, adding that he would be very pleased to do anything on "Perplexed's" behalf. The man might on the one hand be very much abashed, apologise and disappear, in which case he is clearly an undesirable, or, on the other, he might candidly explain his reason for writing to her, adding details about himself and his position. If these details were satisfactory, and the man seemed a "desirable," "Perplexed's" friend might think it worth while to accept an acquaintanceship, and in course of time introduce him.

Probably a Flirt.

"Jim" is engaged to be married to a young lady who says she loves him but not with all her heart. She says that her love is growing, but while she does not at present love "Jim" passionately, she thinks it will come after marriage. Meanwhile she is very fond of other men's society, though very jealous of "Jim."

Well, "Jim," I don't quite like the story you tell me. Her liking for other men's society rather suggests that she is the familiar type of flirt, anxious to keep a bird in hand while she inspects the possibilities of those in the bush. Her jealousy of you may, as you suggest in your letter, be merely to "keep you round her." While I cannot attempt to influence your decision if you really love her yourself, I should not advise a too close engagement unless she gives you proof that she really does love you, at any rate with as much heart as she has in her.

The Familiar Question.

Few problems recur more frequently than that of the girl who is attached to the impecunious young man. "Nita" is my client this week for advice in similar circumstances. Her sweetheart is a clerk earning thirty shillings a week in a City office as a typist. Of course "Nita's" parents have the usual objection to any engagement, and "Nita" is, as usual, in despair to know what to do.

Well, "Nita," let me tell you what I have told many others. Let matters stand over for a time, without becoming definitely engaged. If time proves that you are really devoted to each other, and that nothing can possibly sever you, your parents must see that to stand in your way would be foolish. Time would also enable you to judge as to your sweetheart's chances of promotion. Few young men of ordinary ability, and experienced in office work, need remain more than a year or so on such a salary as thirty shillings a week, and if your friend is energetic and capable he must make more within a year or two, when you could safely become engaged. However, you should wait for the present and see what time brings forth.

A Doubtful Lover.

"Mitcham" writes "Twenty-Five" has given her heart to a man of twenty-eight, who has gone abroad for five years. He apparently does not reciprocate her love. In the meantime another man has appeared who pays marked attention to her. If the absent man did not reciprocate your love at twenty-five, he is scarcely likely to do so at thirty. And who knows but that during his stay in India he may not meet someone else whom he does love? I think the girl would be unwise to continue this forlorn hope, and, if she cares for the second suitor, I think she should at least consider him as a lover, leaving the rest to time.

An Offer of Marriage.

Jessie B. writes to tell me that she has just received an offer of marriage from a gentleman whom she likes but does not really love. He is particularly well endowed with this world's goods, and she thinks she could learn to love him in time. Should she accept so good an offer?

I do not think Jessie B. should at once consent to an engagement which might end disastrously in the near future. No, she should tell him exactly the state of her feelings towards him, and if he really loves her he will be quite willing to wait till he has reason to believe the time has arrived for him to renew his offer.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa.

"Strongest and Best."—Health.

Not a stimulant merely for the moment; but a Permanent and Agreeable Form of Nourishment

Digitized by Google

To Keep in Health

YOU NEED A HEALTH-GIVING BEVERAGE,
which must be pure and unadulterated.

Cadbury's cocoa

is universally admitted to be a health-giving drink—most refreshing, invigorating, and sustaining. It is beneficial to everybody: Men, Women, Boys, and Girls.

CADBURY'S Cocoa is Absolutely Pure, the Lancet pronouncing it "the standard of highest purity." It is Cocoa, and the best Cocoa only.

CAUTION.—How to test the Purity of Cocoas.—If treated with alkali and chemicals such cocoas will have a medicinal scent when the tin is opened, and will be a darker colour when in liquor. Cadbury's Cocoa has no addition of any kind, and is guaranteed absolutely pure.

ROBIN

The New

Starch

Makes
LINEN GLOSSY, STIFF & FLEXIBLE
Does not Stick to the Iron.
Made by the Manufacturers of the celebrated Reckitt's Paris Blue.

A DAILY LUXURY.

BIRD'S CUSTARD POWDER

BIRD'S CUSTARD is Pure, Creamy, Nutritious, and easily digested. It is a wholesome, delicious article of diet for daily use. Eggs often disagree; BIRD'S CUSTARD never.

Strawberry Time.

A most delicious combination is Strawberries and Bird's Custard.
"TRULY A DELIGHTFUL DISH."

NO EGGS! NO RISK! NO TROUBLE!

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories.

No. 708.) Week Ending July 26th, 1902. (Price One Penny.

"Still protesting, she was led from the church!"

(A Pathetic Incident from our Powerful Story, "Saved from Herself." See Inside.)

Digitized by Google

KAPUTINE cures NEURALGIA equally as well as HEADACHE. NEVER FAILS. KAPUTINE is USED as well as recommended by MEDICAL MEN!

NOTHING LIKE IT OR AS GOOD AS

KAPUTINE THE SAFE REMEDY FOR HEADACHE CURES IN TO MINUTES.

PACKETS OF 18 1/-

Packets of 18 doses 1/-. Samples 1d. of all Chemists and Stores, or post free from KAPUTINE Ltd., HUDDERSFIELD, for 12 stamps. Refuse dangerous substitutes. DEMAND KAPUTINE the SAFE Remedy.

"Let's Talk of Graves"

THE "ELEGANT" PARCEL,

Lady's Complete Outfit.

36/-

Elegant Design.

Style and Fit.

CONTAINS:

Pretty Black Sateen Cloth Sailor Blouse, with detachable front, Black Costume Skirt with deep fashionable flounce and 9 rows of cording, Pair Model Corsets, Underskirt with check or stripe in different colours, Pair Black Cashmere Hose, Cream Lace Scarf, and Black Velvet Belt with Fancy Clasp.

TERMS.

Send only 6s. with order, and if the parcel meets with entire approval, complete the purchase in five more monthly payments of 6s. each. If you are not perfectly satisfied, return the goods and your deposit will be promptly refunded in full.

IMPORTANT.

When ordering please state Length of Dress Skirt in front from below waist band, also size of corsets worn, or waist measurement over dress.

Please send a Post Card for our No. 5 Catalogue Costumes, sent to your address Post Free.

Good Agents Wanted in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN.

£7-15-0 or 14/2 Monthly.

Free Wheels. Carriage paid to all parts. CASH or 12 monthly payments.

£7 15s. ... 14/2
£8 8s. ... 15/0
£9 10s. ... 17/1
£9 15s ... 17/6
£11 0s. ... 20/0
£12 0s. ... 21/8

Corsair Plated Lamp, 2/9; A1 Rim Brake, 6/6; Scorcher Brake, 1/-. Celluloid Mudguards, 3/9. Write at once for New Season's List of over 100 pages and over 500 illustrations of JUNO CYCLES and latest cycling accessories at lower prices than any other house. Sent Post Free. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd., S.Y. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street, Without, London, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

KEATING'S POWDER KILLS BUGS FLEAS FLIES BEETLES

TINS 3d. 6d. 1s-BELLOWS 9d.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1¼ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 31lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

FREE TO ALL

MR. H. STANSFIELD (from a photo).

A trial of an entirely new method of curing

RUPTURE,

the same method that cured Mr. H. Stansfield. No cumbersome steel truss, and no loss of time from work. Write to-day for free trial and for interesting literature, including a book containing many testimonials.

DR. W. S. RICE,

57 Stonecutter Street, London, E.C.

Every Lady her own Dyer.

New Style Old Style

MAYPOLE SOAP

Solves the Whole Riddle.

THE MAYPOLE DYES in the form of Soaps that wash as they Dye, enable Dyeing to be done at home rapidly, cleanly, and economically, and give which never fade, but endure to the last thread.

THE MOST BRILLIANT COLOURS

Send for Free Pamphlet on Home Dyeing to the MAYPOLE CO., Ltd., 17, Cumming Street, London, N.

SHORT STORIES

No. 708.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending July 26th, 1902.

SAVED FROM HERSELF.

A Story of Some Strangely Crossed Destinies.

By R. NORMAN SILVER, Author of "Hate, the Destroyer," "The Golden Dwarf," etc.

FIRST CHAPTER.
"I will Prevent this Marriage."

"Do not weep so, Rene, dear, after all, it may not be true."

The ruffled, golden head, buried despairingly upon a pair of girlish arms, was lifted suddenly. A gleam of hope came into the lustrous violet eyes, whose tears had overflowed their long lashes and wetted the soft, almost childish cheeks.

"Gwen," was the answer, "do you really think that, or are you trying to comfort me for a little while, only to make it worse for me afterwards?"

Gwendoline Bellasis bent over the large bare table at which she was working. She was as dark as her sister was fair, and her grave lips and clearly-cut features suggested a strength of character lacking in the dimpled, delicately-moulded countenance of Irene Bellasis.

"I don't see why you should take it for granted," she said, mixing a fresh tint from the rows of water-colour tablets beside her porcelain palette, "that a rumour is correct just because we happen to hear it. But there, if I were you and I did believe it, I wouldn't waste a single tear on the——"

Irene Bellasis started from her chair to put a protesting hand over her sister's mouth. "Please, Gwen, dear," she begged, "he is my husband, you know, whatever the Law may say."

Gwendoline kissed her. "I am sorry, darling," she replied, deepening the crimson petals of a rose in the flower-study before her, "but facts are facts, and when a man lays a diabolical plot to lure an unsuspecting girl into an invalid marriage, and then casts her adrift upon the world, he shows himself to be a scoundrel of the first order. And when he adds to that piece of villainy the contemplation of another, and this time, a real marriage with a woman in his own station—well, if I had been tricked and abandoned by him, I should feel more like shooting Victor Ashford than crying over him!"

Her sister sighed. "I can't look at it as you do, Gwen," she objected; "perhaps he never meant that the marriage should be invalid, his fine friends and relations may only have found afterwards that it was, and forced him into disowning me, and then into this—this engagement with Miss Dacre. She is his cousin, and the Dacre and Ashford estates join. He told me once that the marriage had always been urged upon him!"

All rights reserved.]

The artist threw down her brush. "Rene," was her response, "you are hopeless. But you are a child and I don't blame you. Yet when Victor Ashford married you in the back-parlour of an unfrocked curate who is at present serving a term of penal servitude for forgery, he knew what he was doing. When he was tired of you, and especially when he had inherited his uncle's fortune, he flung you off. Now it is reported that he is about to marry again. But even this crowning wrong—supposing, as you do, the report to be true—does not seem to convince you of his utter worthlessness."

Irene sank into her seat and hid her face, her shoulders heaving with convulsive sobs. "You don't understand, Gwen," she faltered, "he is my husband in the sight of God, mine alone, and I can't—I can't give him up!"

Gwen pushed away her work, got up from her painting-stool—a tall, handsome figure—and stooped to fold the weeping girl to her.

"My poor child," she said, "I think I do understand, in proof of which I will endeavour to find out for you whether there be any truth in this rumour. If there is, well, we shall be able to consider what we ought to do. There, don't cry, I won't breathe another word against Victor Ashford. If I could, I would bring him back to you that I might see my darling smile once more."

Her sister's arms stole round her neck. "You are good to me, Gwen," murmured Irene Bellasis, "and I am shockingly selfish—I do nothing but worry you and stop your painting. But I do wish—I—I——" A sob choked her; Gwendoline smoothed the golden head.

"Wish what, darling?" she whispered. Irene held up her left hand, and the tears blinded her great violet eyes.

"That I could put on my wedding-ring again," she said, "and have the right to wear it."

Gwen clasped her pitifully and the two were very silent. The light faded steadily from the narrow windows of the old Bloomsbury house, the August days were shortening fast. At length the elder sister rose.

"I must go out for an hour, Rene," she observed; "I—I have some materials to get. I won't be longer, though. Promise you will read a nice book and not mope."

Irene brushed the drops from her wet lashes, gave the required pledge, and sealed it with a kiss. There is often a bond curiously passionate in its affection between women, such as Irene and Gwendoline Bellasis. Orphaned in childhood, both unquestionably beautiful, one weak but sensitive, the other strong while tender, nothing had come between them till Irene's hasty flight and secret—and invalid—marriage had separated them for a brief interval to re-unite them even more closely under the shadow of its tragedy.

Hastily donning her hat and a loose walking-jacket, Gwendoline picked up her latch-key—with a brave attempt at a jest—and descended flight after flight of dusky stairs to the street, itself shadowed by the huge Greek pile of the British Museum. She turned southward and westward into the broad roadway of Oxford Street. Here she hailed a cab and gave an address in the aristocratic quarter of St. James's. A vivid sunset glowed at the end of the famous shopping thoroughfare down which she was driven, its glow fell upon her face as she sat in the hansom, emphasising her air of quiet, almost lofty, pride and cool resolution.

The cab halted at the entrance to a block of flats whose rents were as high as its occupants were fashionable. Gwen paid the driver, walked up to the second floor, and rang at a small, heavy door with a gilt number on it. A male servant in a plain livery acknowledged her summons.

"I wish to see Mr. Ashford," she told him, "you may say Miss Bellasis—Miss Gwendoline Bellasis."

The servant's expression became wooden in its stolidity. "I am sorry, ma'am," he rejoined, "but my master is not at home."

Gwendoline surveyed him disdainfully.

"Then I will wait till he is," she intimated meaningly. The man bowed, her demeanour had convinced him that she was in earnest.

"If you will step in, ma'am," he answered respectfully, "I will ascertain when Mr. Ashford is likely to return."

Gwendoline entered the small, square hall, and passed into a bachelor apartment, heavy with the odour of tobacco smoke. The servant placed a chair for her and moved to go.

"You realise that I am determined to see Mr. Ashford," remarked Gwen significantly.

"Yes, ma'am," she was answered. And Gwendoline heard the sound of the other's departing tread. Everything in the room was indicative of wealth, the gold ink-stand on the writing-table by her, the silver-topped spirit-bottles and ash-trays, the Turkish carpet, the exquisitely-framed proof-etchings on the walls, betokened a luxurious taste, endowed with the power to gratify its predilections. Gwendoline frowned, it was here that poor Rene had spent her deceitful and all-too-short honeymoon.

Idly Gwen picked up a paper, to escape her own thoughts. She did not wish to lose her nerve. Her decision to interview Victor Ashford—without her sister's permission—had been a sudden one, veiled by a quite excusable fib. Hitherto her communications with him had been carried on through the medium of her solicitor; it was that gentleman who, some hours earlier, had conveyed to them the rumour of Victor Ashford's intended marriage.

Gwendoline started, and the paper she had been contemplating dropped from her grasp. Her gaze had fallen upon a paragraph. It read:

"According to the immemorial custom of the Ashford family, the banns of the forthcoming marriage between Mr. Victor Ashford and Miss Audrey Dacre were called yesterday in the Church of St. Bennet, at Liversedge, Somersetshire, where the ceremony will take place. The Ashfords have always followed this method of conferring to the marriage laws. It is believed that an Ashford has never been married by license or elsewhere than at St. Bennet's. By the way, Miss Dacre is now at Dacre Park near Liversedge, the bride and bridegroom's families being neighbours. Mr. Ashford himself will shortly go to Ashford Court, Liversedge, in readiness for the wedding."

So it was true! Victor Ashford, depending upon the reluctance of Irene to cause and face a public scandal, and confident in the invalidity of his marriage with her, was about to place it out of his own power to go through a second and binding ceremony with her. Gwendoline knew that upon the cherished hope of this, her sister had been brooding for months. Would she survive the discovery that its fulfilment would soon be impossible?

A shudder ran through Gwendoline Bellasis—she remembered Irene's pathetic cry: "If I could only put on my wedding-ring again!" She thought of the ring itself, laid away in tissue-paper, its wrappings moistened with bitter tears.

"He shall not do it," she exclaimed aloud; "I will not let him do it!"

"Who shall not do what, Miss Bellasis?" asked a mocking voice; "am I correct in concluding that the threat applies to your humble servant, Victor Ashford?"

Gwen sprang to her feet, a square-shouldered, clean-shaven personage, of medium height and dressed in irreproachable evening garments, stood before her. His small grey eyes, his florid complexion, his deep jaw and low forehead showed him to be all that she had imagined. She wondered how love could ever have blinded Irene to his obvious selfishness and brutality.

"You are Mr. Ashford," she said, "so your servant had been instructed to lie to me or to my sister if we should call? I guessed as much. Yes, I did mean you, Mr. Ashford; I know that you are going to be married again. It is a crime, you are my sister's husband!"

Victor Ashford smiled. "Fortunately," he rejoined, "the chain which bound me to that folly had a weak link. Who can blame me for snapping it?"

"That is false," declared Gwen; "you knew the marriage laws well enough, too well. You planned deliberately the whole fiendish piece of wickedness."

A gesture of indifference was Victor Ashford's response. "I have offered to provide amply for your sister," he said.

Gwen flashed out into passion.

"Never!" she cried; "never while I live—unless you will repair the treachery you have practised upon her."

Ashford snapped his fingers. "Impossible!" he replied; "but, as I informed you through my lawyers, any reasonable allowance——"

Gwendoline drew a deep breath. "I came here, Mr. Ashford," she said, "to humble my pride, and to beg you, for Rene's sake, to make her happy, to give her back her self respect. I hate you, I always shall hate you, but I would have hidden my hatred lest it should harm her. You not only refuse to do her justice, however, you insult us. Well, I will punish you. You shall not do as you intend. I will prevent this marriage."

Ashford's florid countenance grew purple, but he tried to sneer.

"You cannot," he retorted, "I defy you to do that. And if you did, it would not help your sister. All the scandal in the world would not get me to legalise our marriage—you would only torture her unavailingly. Be sensible, persuade her to accept five hundred a year, and to cry quits."

"You shall see what I will do," answered Gwendoline, contemptuously; "good day, Mr. Ashford." She turned her back upon him, went through the hall, and let herself out, her heart beating with anger and despair. A quick step sounded at her side. It was that of Victor Ashford—he had put on his hat and followed her.

"Listen to reason, you mad thing!" he exclaimed; "will eight hundred, a thousand a year do?"

"Not a million," said Gwendoline, and kept on her way in the increasing dusk of the quiet Court quarter. Ashford caught at her wrist.

"What am I to do with you?" he hissed; "you will ruin your sister's peace of mind and make a gazing-stock of her to no purpose. Curse you, I didn't count on your going blindly for revenge. Will nothing shut your mouth?"

Digitized by Google

"Repair the flaw in your marriage," she told him, "and I will be as silent as the grave."

"Never!" snarled Ashford; "I will see you and her——!" And he finished his sentence with an oath. Gwendoline shook off his hold, and would have hurried on, but he seized her hand again. "Be sensible, you fool!" he gasped; "you must, you shall strike a bargain with me."

There was an abrupt intervention. A powerful arm slipped between her and her persecutor, a grasp of iron was laid upon Ashford's shoulder, and he was thrown violently aside.

"Drop that, you blackguard!" said the new-comer, drawing himself up to the height of a good six feet, increased by a tall opera hat and a long dust-coat; "if this were Australia instead of England, I'd treat you to a good thrashing. But I don't suppose this lady wants a police-court subpœna from an officious bobby."

Victor Ashford bit his lip, muttered another oath, and slipped off under cover of the night. Gwendoline's rescuer raised his hat.

"Pray let me see you on your way a little," he added, lightly; "who knows, the scoundrel might molest you again. Some people seem to think—begging your pardon—that a pretty face is a sufficient excuse for thrusting their attentions upon its owner."

They walked on together as far as Piccadilly Circus, Gwendoline's companion chatting genially about the weather and the density of the traffic. She could not help noticing, in shy feminine glances, that he was a bronzed, well set-up fellow with a gallant bearing, and a free stride. In the Circus she stopped.

"I can get a 'bus here," she said; "thank you very, very much."

"Not at all," was the answer; "you'll repay me extravagantly if you will permit me to give you my card—I'm from down under, Australia, that is." And he produced his pocket-book, without waiting for her permission.

Gwen accepted the slip of paste-board, but did not look at it, and, to the Colonial's obvious disappointment, made no offer to disclose her own identity.

When she was safely seated inside the 'bus, she glanced at the card. It bore the name "Philip Ross," and the Colonial had found time to scrawl upon it the address of a London hotel.

SECOND CHAPTER.

"I Should Like to be Your Friend."

"How far is this place from Dacre Park? I suppose you could drive me over?"

Gwendoline Bellasis asked the question. She was sitting in the corner of a wide, low-ceiled room, at a round table with a snowy cloth upon it. Old sporting pictures, stuffed birds, and preserved fresh-water fish in glass cases decorated the walls about her, and the scented breeze blew in through the open latticed window, where the slant rays of the afternoon sunbeams crept between flowering creepers and trails of ivy.

Her attendant—a fresh-cheeked, country damsel, with short skirts and a white apron, curtsied.

"Yes, miss," she said, in the quaint accent of the Somersetshire dialect, "if you wanted us. But it is hardly worth while charging you for putting the horse to, Dacre Park gates is only about three miutes from here, past St. Bennet's Church on the other side of the road, and the avenue goes straight up to the house."

"Thank you," answered Gwen, gravely, setting down her cup and pushing away her plate, "then I think I will walk." And she looked at her watch.

"Dear me, miss!" exclaimed the waitress, "you've eaten scarcely a mouthful! Be you stopping here overnight, miss?" she inquired, standing with her hands on her hips in a friendly attitude; "because there's only one good train out of Liversedge this evening, and that's in half an hour. But perhaps you will be staying at the Park, miss, begging your pardon."

Gwen knitted her brows. "I shall not do that under any circumstances," she replied, "and it is plainly quite impossible for me to catch that train. Indeed, I did not count on doing so. You had better see about a room for me, and take my portmanteau upstairs. I rather anticipated having to remain in Liversedge this evening."

"Yes, miss," rejoined the attendant, and went away to execute her instructions. Gwendoline leant her head on her palm and pondered.

"Almost six o'clock," she said, "I have just time to get there before dinner, it would not do to leave it till afterwards. I wonder what Sir John Dacre will say to me. Will he hear me out, will he be sympathetic, will he be insolent, will he—oh, what is the use of wondering? I must go and put my fate—and Irene's—to the test."

She unfastened a small bag that swung at her wrist and spread its contents out on the table.

"So much for the proofs," she murmured; "his letters to her, his photograph, the false marriage certificate, her poor little wedding ring. They will—they must believe me."

Thus assuring herself, she restored the pathetic series of evidences to her bag. The short-skirted country girl had re-entered the apartment.

"I have kept a room for you, miss," she said, "and this is the visitor's book, if you will write your name in it."

She proffered the soiled volume and a pen. Gwendoline hesitated a moment, then took the latter and signed—a bold "Gwendoline Bellasis."

The waitress spelt it over admiringly and carried off the volume.

Gwen began to put on her gloves at the window. As she stood there, gazing out at the scene in front of the inn—it was a Saturday afternoon, and the benches before the door were crowded with stolid agricultural labourers chatting over their ale—a motor-car shot by down the road. In the driver's seat was Victor Ashford. Gwen drew a sharp aspiration.

"So the papers were right," she muttered; "well, what will be will be, I half hoped——"

She checked herself, buttoned her gloves, took up her parasol, and went out of the inn into the late sunshine. The drinkers on the benches stared at her amazingly as she passed them. Whatever her mission to Liversedge might be, she had been wise enough to lend it the support of a careful, even smart costume, and her graceful figure and fine dark features gave her an air of breeding, even of rank.

The waitress was evidently an excellent judge of distances, for exactly three minutes walking brought Gwendoline Bellasis to the gates of Dacre Park. She gained the head of the avenue, and rang at the great entrance under the pillared portico.

"Take Sir John Dacre my card," she desired the footman who appeared. The servant bowed to the ground. He imagined the hard-working young artist a chance caller of distinction.

"Yes, madam," he said, and escorted her with stiff gravity to a huge, old-fashioned reception room close by. Gwen sat down, for her knees were quaking under her, despite her calm exterior. A lapse of some moments allowed her to regain her equanimity.

A door opened and closed behind her, she rose and turned to perceive a tall, lean, frock-coated person, at once pompous and severe.

"Miss Bellasis," he observed politely, "I understand that you wished to see me, a request that I willingly grant, though I cannot recollect that I have had the —pleasure——"

"We—we meet for the first time, it is true," said Gwen, bravely, "but I have ventured to believe, Sir John, that you will hear me none the less patiently. I come on a serious, even a tragic errand."

"Indeed, indeed!" responded Sir John Dacre, conventionally; "pray be seated."

Gwen acted on the suggestion, and her host followed her example, crossing his legs in a formal, dignified pose. "Your daughter, Sir John," she began, "Miss Dacre is to marry Mr. Victor Ashford."

Sir John Dacre inclined his head.

"I—I— scarcely know how to tell you what I have to tell," she pursued, "but it amounts to this, that, by nine-tenths of the law, and every dictate of honour and justice, Mr. Ashford is already married—to my sister."

Sir John Dacre rubbed his chin thoughtfully, and the hard, cold caution expressed in his spare countenance, grew more pronounced. Gwendoline produced the contents of the bag at her wrist.

"I do not speak without proofs," she added, "here are his letters to her, here is his portrait, signed by him 'Your own true husband,' here is their marriage certificate—the certificate of an invalid marriage, I own, but a marriage in the eyes of God and society. My sister, Sir John, is a girl of eighteen, as delicate as she is lovely. Mr. Ashford's repudiation of her is breaking her heart; his marriage with your daughter will kill her. You are a father, and, no doubt, a magistrate—will you allow this match to go on?"

The other coughed. "Miss Bellasis," he said, "I gather that I speak to a very able woman, and I may admit that, with the exception of actual names, Ashford did confess to me something of a mock marriage into which he was inveigled, and I consulted my solicitor about the matter. Young men are proverbially fools, but that is no reason why they should ruin, by their folly, the plans of older and wiser folk. This marriage between my daughter and Victor Ashford is inevitable—it joins two estates and two fortunes that have been rivals for three hundred years. However, I recommended Ashford to make a reasonable, even lavish compensation; I understood he had done so."

"We refused it!" cried Gwen passionately, "we always will refuse it, till he does justice to her. Our lawyer advised us that, cleverly as Ashford worked through others, he may have rendered himself liable to criminal prosecution, and that, in any case, Rene could demand crushing damages on a breach of promise action. We will not bring it. I will not sell my sister, or see her sold. In time Victor Ashford's heart may soften towards his deceived girl-wife, he may, he must legalise their marriage. But he cannot if he marries your daughter. In Heaven's name, Sir John, for the sake of your own manhood and your own innocent child, break off this match."

Sir John Dacre thrust back his chair with a warning exclamation. A woman had just entered the room—a young woman, yet matured with a dazzling maturity. She was above the middle height, with a wealth of brown locks and a complexion of alabaster. She was dressed for dinner, and her neck and arms shone whitely in the late sunshine.

"One moment, Audrey," said Sir John, "I—I am engaged."

At the words Gwen started from her chair, flung herself at the newcomer's feet, and clasped her knees.

"You are Miss Dacre," she cried; "it is to you I must appeal then, as a woman to a woman on behalf of a woman. Miss Dacre, my sister is Victor Ashford's wife, not legally, because of the fraud he caused to be practised upon her, but his wife in your sight and the sight of all good and honest people."

Audrey Dacre released herself violently. "Oh, the little red-headed girl," she said. "Victor told me of her. What more does she want? He has done something handsome for her, I suppose."

Gwendoline staggered up. "You are a wicked, wicked woman, Audrey Dacre," she gasped, "and I could almost pray that you and your father may live to suffer as you are making Rene suffer. But I will not, I will leave you to your fate. As for Victor Ashford, I have not finished with him yet. Let me get out of here—I am suffocating; I know—I knew you would not do right by my darling, something told me! You are not human, you are fiends—let me go!"

She darted out of the tall French window on to the lawn, hurried like a wild thing through the long avenue, out at the gates, and down the road. Then her limbs failed her. She dropped and sank upon a gnarled stump on the grassy edge of a plantation whose shadows the setting sun threw far across the road and the meadows beyond.

Crouching on the felled tree-stump in the golden evening, Gwendoline covered her face and wept.

Unexpectedly she felt a hand on her shoulder, and glancing up, saw, to her utter amazement, the young Colonial who, a few days before, had delivered her from the clutches of Victor Ashford.

"Pardon me," he began, then stopped, staring at her. "The—the lady of St. James's, by Jupiter," he said, "I am glad to see you again, that is, I should be glad if I knew that you weren't in trouble, or unwell. Can't I do anything?—it would be a real pleasure and an honour—you never gave me your card the other night, in the hurry of catching your 'bus."

Gwen tottered to her feet indignantly. "You didn't—you haven't dared to follow me!" she exclaimed.

"Not for worlds," answered Philip Ross; "I have business in these parts, business that brought me all the way from Australia. But do take my arm, you look positively faint, and, to be honest, I've done nothing but think about you ever since we parted that night. I should awfully like to be your friend."

Gwendoline Bellasis recoiled. "Please," she begged, "leave me to myself, I shall be better soon. I have had rather a shock, that is all."

"Won't you let me see you again?" pleaded the Australian, almost boyishly. Gwen laughed hysterically.

"Yes," she said, "I shall go to church in the morning, at St. Bennet's, the parish church up the road there. If you go to church we shall meet. I must be there without fail."

"Thank you," answered Philip Ross, and lifted his hat. "Then I shall also be at St. Bennet's."

He walked off up the road, sauntered towards the inn, and ascended to his room. Here he threw open the casement, found a paper-backed novel, lighted a cigarette and puffed drowsily. He was thinking of his curious double encounter with the dark beauty.

So long did he puff and dream that at last he dropped asleep. When he woke it was twilight. He stretched himself and descended, his thoughts turning towards supper.

As he lounged down the passage he found himself fronting the partially open door of a bed chamber. Within, in the glow of a lighted candle, stood a woman—the woman he had met so strangely in St. James's and in the lane outside. She was bending over something and he saw her hands move. The light glinted on something bright—she was loading a tiny revolver.

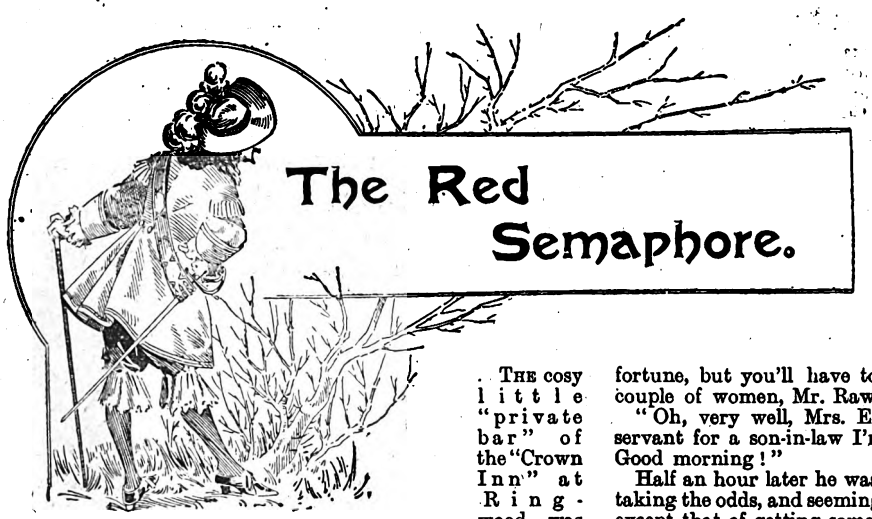
(The conclusion of this tale appears in next Tuesday's "Short Stories.")

Ethel (who thinks her country cousin nervous): "Can't you find anything better to squeeze than a felt hat?" Country Cousin: "Wait a bit; I'm only reducing my energy for fear I might hurt you."

"Gil Tedge showed me his new book last night, and asked what I thought of it." "Is it good?" "No. The only attractive thing about it is the design on the cover." "What did you tell him?" "I said I thought it was bound to succeed."

He was a pretty little youngster, with little fat legs that stuck out beneath clean, stiff-starched clothes. "What are you going to do when you grow to be a man?" asked a visitor. The little fellow's face assumed an expression of earnest gravity as he responded with a voice which was evidently shaken by sad memories of the past: "Whip papa."

Digitized by Google



The Red Semaphore.

THE cosy little "private bar" of the "Crown Inn" at Ringwood was crowded.

Bookmakers, and representatives of the betting fraternity from London and from the neighbouring county town of Dunchester, elbowed one another, and made the almost primitive atmosphere of the place reek with "horsey" talk, and with worse than "horsey" expletive.

It was the first day of Ringwood races, the course being about half a mile from the village on the road from Dunchester.

Of all the crowd who were taxing to the full the energy and patience of pretty Madge Ellerton, one there was who, leaning with his elbow on the pewter-covered counter, with an air of semi-appropriateness, had apparently eyes and ears only for the handmaid daughter of the house. Living at Dunchester, five miles away, scarcely a day passed without his coming over to Ringwood, where he not only made hot love to Madge, but sorely disturbed the maternal peace of the buxom hostess of the "Crown."

Dick Rawson's occupation, or, rather, the lack of it, was a mystery to most people, for well, if somewhat flashily dressed, well fed, and well provided with ready money, he seemed to be ever idle, to be always the man of means.

To the observant eye, he looked what he was, a dabbler in "prices;" a dependent upon his own wits. Mrs. Ellerton detested, because she distrusted him, and lost no opportunity of plainly hinting to him her candid opinion.

His personal appearance was not prepossessing. Of middle height, lean of feature as of figure, his light, lashless eyes had that shifty uneasiness which always creates suspicion in straightforward minds. He looked forty, and was probably ten years younger.

"Madge," he was whispering on this particular morning, "I shall want an answer from you to-day. I hear that signalman chap from the railway is making up to you."

"Will Varge? And supposing he is, Mr. Rawson, that would be his business, not yours!" she answered with spirit.

"I deny that! His love is nothing to mine; while I can give you ten times more, in comfort, in money, in everything. Will Varge!"

The tone of contempt in which he spoke his rival's name fairly roused the little beauty's anger.

"Mr. Rawson!" she said, almost loud enough for the others to hear, "I've known Will all my life. Of you I know nothing, beyond that which you choose to tell me. Well, since you have heard so much, I will tell you that Will Varge has asked me to marry him, and—and I haven't said no! That will serve for any answer you may want of me. Good morning, sir!"

By this time the crowd of racing men had melted away, Dick Rawson being the only one left.

He was about to reply to the girl; and, if his flushed face might be taken as a true index of his intention, none too politely, but was stopped by a voice at his elbow.

"Look here, Mr. Rawson! my girl's words are mine! We don't want you—nor your custom for that matter! We're only poor folk, and my husband has been fortune-hunting on the other side of the world for these last ten years. But see here! (and the excited dame flourished a letter before him) my George has landed in England again, and, please God! will be home to-day! I don't suppose he's brought a fortune, but you'll have to do with him now! not with a couple of women, Mr. Rawson!"

"Oh, very well, Mrs. Ellerton! If you prefer a railway servant for a son-in-law I'm sorry for your taste, that's all. Good morning!"

Half an hour later he was seen upon the course, laying and taking the odds, and seemingly oblivious to every other interest except that of getting something for practically nothing.

But in the midst of all the whirl and clamour, the cheating and the confusion, one dominant idea possessed him—to be even with the man who had come between him and the woman he wanted.

Love Madge, as a good man loves, he did not, for—he could not; it was outside his nature. To such a man, revenge—unreasoning revenge—comes easily, and grows without effort.

He did not go near the "Crown" again, but watched for some chance which should give him the points of the game.

About four o'clock he fancied that he saw Madge passing along a lane to the left of him, in the direction of the railway cutting.

It was in this cutting that the signal-box, in relief charge of Will Varge, was situated, a good mile the Ringwood side of Dunchester Junction.

The signal post, with its green semaphore at "caution," was clearly in view from where he was, but even as he looked the figure he was following with his eyes suddenly disappeared.

"I must have been mistaken! It couldn't have been her," he muttered to himself.

Then a boyish laugh immediately behind him made him turn sharply round. It was a youngster of thirteen or so on some bird-nesting or similar expedition bent.

"Hullo, Jim!" cried Rawson. "Anybody at home?"

"Only mother! Sis has gone to see Will Varge at the home signal-box."

"Then it was her I saw just now in front of me," said Rawson, carefully concealing his exultation.

"Of course it was!" said the lad. "She's gone to tell him about dad's coming home. The letter came after he went on duty. Five o'clock express he's coming by into Dunchester. The train passes Will's box at two minutes to."

Rawson had always made a friend of the boy, who was too young to see the wolf through the sheep's clothing. Jim was, therefore, quite ready to impart this wonderful bit of family news to the gentleman, who was always so over liberal in the matter of seasonable "tips."

He got one now—a brand new half-crown.

"My! You are a brick!" he cried. "I think I'll get back. There's a circus in Tarrant's field, and it begins at six!"

Rawson for a moment watched the boy as he ran at full speed back towards the village.

"I've got you now—both of you!" he said, smiting his clenched right hand into his open left. "By the company's rules no one is allowed in the box. No signalman, also, is allowed to leave his box. She's made him break one rule, I'll make him break the other. Then we'll see who'll win the odd trick and the pool! It won't be Mr. Will Varge, I'm thinking!"

* * * * * * * *

The intermittent ticking of the telegraph receiving in strument in signal-box No. 52 afforded a sleepy sort of accompaniment to Will Varge's thoughts as he looked at his watch at twenty minutes to five.

Digitized by Google

He was a smart, good-looking young fellow, six feet in his stockings, and with the limbs of a Hercules.

"I'll go straight up to the 'Crown,'" he was saying, "when I go off at six. I hope that Rawson chap won't be hanging around. He's a bad 'un, I'll swear! He never looks you square in the face. I've got an idea he and I are going to have words afore long. Well," and Will drew a mighty breath and threw his shoulders back, "hard words break no bones, they say. I don't know, p'raps mine may, if I fling 'em straight from the shoulder!"

The line would be clear now till seven minutes to the hour, when the ordinary passenger train from London would pass the box, to be followed in five minutes by the express. Consequently Will had a few spare moments for musing purposes.

"As soon as ever Madge and I are married I'll take her away from Ringwood, and out o' sight of that wretched business. I hate a public for any girl—encouraging loafing blackguards like Dick Rawson, as only lives by swindling silly fools, with more money than wit."

Leaning lazily against the rear side of the box, he failed to see a dainty, sun-bonneted little figure making its way down the rough wood steps let in flush with the bank.

The front and two sides of the box were from breast-high upward, of glass, including the door. When, therefore, he heard a rapping at the door, but could see no one, he was, for a moment, puzzled.

Then, striding to the door, he threw it wide open.

"Why, Madgie!" he cried. "Who'd have thought of seeing you?"

Stooping down on the top step of the little flight leading up to the box from the ground was Madge, her eyes full of mischief, and her cheeks as blushingly red as any rose or peony in her mother's garden.

"May I come in, Will?" she said, getting up, and putting one pretty little foot over the sill.

"I'm afraid not, dearie," he answered her, hesitatingly. "It's the company's rule that no one's allowed inside. I'd get the sack if I broke it."

"Well, Will, you shan't break it, for I will," and before he could make further protest she was standing by his side at the lever rack.

He was too happy in her presence to chide her, and, seeing that she was overflowing with something to tell him, he just let her say on.

"Will! read that!" she went on, holding a letter right under his nose.

"Who's it from?" he asked.

"Father!"

"Your father! Why it's from Southampton!"

"Yes! yes! yes! he's come back, Will! And, though he doesn't say so, he may have brought a fortune with him! Read, you dear old silly! He's coming from Southampton by the express!"

The last word roused him to his duty.

"Stand back, Madge! The four fifty-three ordinary will pass in two minutes, and I must stand by," he said, catching hold of the "white" lever.

"Oh, do let me see how you work them, Will! I've always longed to know!"

"Sweetheart! if you do remain—which is a risk, for the inspector or anybody might come along. Keep quite quiet—don't speak a word, till I've got these two trains through."

He resolutely stamped his foot, and resisted the temptation to turn round and look at her.

Rattle! rattle! rattle!—p—r-r-r-r-r!

Just inclining his head to the left, he could see the "ordinary," overdue two minutes, sweeping along the two miles of "dead straight."

Back went the lever, and, with a grinding thud, the "white" semaphore dropped to "go on." Half-a-dozen seconds later the "ordinary" whizzed by, to gradually slow up into Dunchester.

Will Varge was in the act then of moving to close the door when a man sprang up the steps and put the weight of his body against it to keep it open.

It was Dick Rawson!

"I suppose," he said, with a cool sneer, "that I could get you into trouble for entertaining young ladies in your box while on duty?"

Two more minutes and the express would pass, and would need stopping; he could not bandy words with the other till the "red semaphore" was up.

"Miss Madge!" continued Rawson, "your mother has sent me for you; has asked me to take you home without delay."

"Will! it isn't true! Mother would not ask him to come even near me."

"That is very nice and polite of you," said Rawson, making a step forward into the box, "but——"

Will Varge never exactly knew how things came about after that.

To let go the "red" lever, and, with a cry of "liar!" to clutch Rawson by the throat was, however, the work of a second.

The impact was terrific.

In close embrace the two men rolled heavily down the steps on to the permanent way.

Rawson, though hurt by his backward fall, and struggling with all his might to loose Will's grip of his throat, was alive to a warning sound, every second becoming more and more distinct.

It was the express! The white cloud of steam just appearing as the train entered upon the two miles of straight.

Then Will heard it.

"Madge!" he shrieked, "pull the 'red' lever! Pull hard, for God's sake!"

The girl was paralysed with fear. Will's voice seemed to come through miles of space.

Only a mile away now.

"Madge! Pull the 'red' lever—now!"

The last word, shot out with all the remaining force of despair, reached her. She woke to a realisation of the truth.

Will—her Will!—in deadly struggle right in the path of the oncoming express; the passenger train waiting still in Dunchester Station—her father's life, too, in peril!

She could almost feel the hot damp steam of the express engine on her cheek.

Staying no more to dream or think, she seized the "red" lever, and pulling it back with all the strength of her little arms, she heard the semaphore "lock-up" into its place.

Then she fainted.

The express pulled up within a score of feet of the two men, Will uppermost, his fingers still on Rawson's throat.

One of the passengers by the express, a big, bearded, elderly man, accompanied the guard to see what was the matter.

"Why it's Will Varge!" said the passenger.

Will heard him, and pointing to the signal-box, said—"You had better go to Madge, if you are Mr. Ellerton!"

The father found his daughter unconscious in a heap on the floor of the box, by the lever handles.

It did not take him long to rouse her, and on the journey home she told him the whole tale, and how that she was to blame for tempting Will from his duty.

However, nobody blamed her much; not even Will, who, as he had prophesied, was discharged from the company's service.

It is satisfactory to know that Dick Rawson left Dunchester for London soon after his encounter with his rival; the latter place offering him a wider field for the shady operations in which his soul delighted.

As Mr. Ellerton returned with even a more than fair "pile," the order soon went forth for an evacuation of the "Crown Inn," and for the building of a comfortable house on the site of the cottage where he himself had been born.

Madge and Will were to be married on the day the house was finished. The happy pair were then to sail for the place in Queensland, which Mr. Ellerton had left for his native land.

Ralph Enderby.

Digitized by Google

A Frustrated Elopement.

Told by a Britisher who Lives in Texas.

NELLY WARDEN was the belle of James County; there could be no doubt of that. Some said in the whole of Texas, but that was more problematical.

No one denied, however, that she was one of the prettiest little maids that ever stepped,—laughing blue eyes, roguish red lips, and a skin with just the least touch of brown where the fiery Texas sun had kissed it. And there wasn't a boy in the section that wouldn't have given his right hand for that same privilege. But she would have none of us, though goodness knows we hung round the Warden ranch in a most disgustingly obvious manner. Her three big brothers never wanted for chums, and her poor old father positively couldn't move without having some of Nelly's suitors buzzing round him. For, you see, we were all so keen on getting her, that we couldn't afford to let the other fellows steal a march on us by making friends at court. But in spite of all our efforts Solomon himself couldn't have told which one of us she favoured—if she favoured any one at all.

She had a laugh and a smile for every one of us—but as to a preference! Some of the married men, just to worry us, used to say that the right man hadn't arrived yet, and we boys would feel for our pistols and hint that if he wasn't a born and bred James County man, the stranger would find things unhealthy for him.

There were, I should say, about eight of us boys who wanted to marry Nelly Warden, and, in spite of our rivalry, we were all pretty good friends. With one exception. He was Juan Sola, a Mexican from over the border—a regular fiery Spanish "greaser" of the old style. He was a magnificent horseman, and to see him come thundering up to the Warden ranch—big silver spurs, silver-worked saddle and bridle, and jaunty hat—made us fellows green with jealousy when we thought of our sorry steeds and string and leather equipment. Still, Juan didn't get on any better than the rest of us. He was always welcome; so were we. He stopped to dinner or tea; so did we. And he went away no forr'arder.

But as time went on we began to notice that the Mexican was not exactly contented with the progress he was making in his wooing. His was one of those impetuous natures which brook no obstacles, and it galled him to think that he, Juan Sola, owner of a big ranch, the handsomest man in the border, who could have had any dark-eyed Mexican señorita he chose for his wife, could not make headway with the little blue-eyed Nelly Warden. And we saw that he scowled blackly at times as he rode home over the border.

And so the days passed away, until one night Jim Warden—that was Nelly's eldest brother—came to my shanty in a high state of excitement.

"Dick," said he, dropping into a chair and mopping the perspiration from his face. "I've got a most extraordinary bit of news for you. Juan Sola is going to elope with Nell!"

"Elope with Nell!" I roared. "You mean she's going to marry him? Has she——"

"Steady, old man," said Jim, with a smile. "Perhaps I didn't ought to have put it that way. But now listen—I'm serious. I was down at San Roca about some horses to-day, and who should I meet there but Pete, one of Sola's servants. You remember him? The man I dragged away from that mad bull last year."

I nodded.

"Well, the old chap seemed confused at seeing me, and it seemed to me somehow that he's got something on his mind. At first, when I asked him what was amiss, he tried to pass it off, but then he suddenly turned to me and told me that he wouldn't have it on his conscience to deceive a man who had saved his life. Of course I asked him what on earth he meant about deceiving me. Then out came his whole budget. I promised him I'd see he didn't suffer, and came straight on to see you about the business. To put it in a nutshell, what he told me was this: His master has got tired of hanging round Nelly without result, and he has resolved to kidnap her, take her across the border to one of his estancias in the mountains, and there get a priest to marry them, while we're hunting around for our poor girl."

"Good heavens!" I cried, for although wild doings took place on the border, I had never dreamt of anything quite so comprehensive as this. "And when does this game come off?"

Jim leant forward.

"To-morrow night, my boy," he said impressively. "Juan Sola and two servants are to wait for Nelly as she rides across to Mellor's for her music lesson. She always goes alone, as the villain knows, and the job can be done as easy as winking."

"She mustn't stir out, that's all," I said hastily. "Great Scott! what can we do to the fellow?"

"My dear chap," said Jim, "if we simply content ourselves with keeping Nelly safe under lock and key we can do nothing to him, because we lack proof. But I've got a scheme."

He broke off and chuckled.

"Out with it, man!" I cried, for his merriment nettled me.

"We must go through with the kidnapping business, that's all!" he said, becoming suddenly sober.

"What! Let Nelly get taken!" I cried.

"Yes, and no!" said Jim, his eyes dancing with merriment at my bewilderment. "Juan shall kidnap somebody, if he can—but it won't be Nelly. See?"

"I'm hanged if I do!" I said. "Who should he take, if not Nelly?"

"We'll provide someone," said Jimmy. "You blockhead! Don't you understand? Somebody must play Nelly, for this occasion only. Then when our gay Mexican rides up to start his girl-lifting lay, we chime in and trot out our part of the play. And, by Jove!" he added grimly, "I've got some mighty pretty lines in my act!"

Dawn was now breaking in upon me.

"But who is going to pretend to be Nell?" I asked. "It's going to be a mighty unhealthy part. Sola's not a man to stand any monkey tricks, and he's very handy with his guns."

Digitized by Google

"I know," said Jim. "He's a dead shot, and he's more than likely to get mad when he realises he's been fooled and won't be able to show his nose this side of the border again. It can't be a girl, Dick, it's too risky. She'd be just as likely to stop a bullet as one of us, if I know anything of the greaser."

"Yes," said I. "That rather beats us, doesn't it?"

"Not a bit of it," replied Jim. Then he looked at me critically. "I've got it!" he cried. "You shall play Nelly, Dick!"

"Me!" I said, and my voice was so strange that Jim roared again.

"Yes—you," he continued. "You've got a slight, girlish figure, my boy—don't hit me!—your face is innocent of hair, and you'll make an A 1 girl when we've done with you. We'll borrow one of Nell's gowns and her big flop hat, and a wig out of the box we had for the theatricals last spring, and your own mother wouldn't know you."

"Don't talk rubbish, Jim!" I said, hotly. "Do you think I am a fool? What sort of freak should I look got up like that?"

"We're playing for a big stake!" said Jim, becoming grave again; "and if we come out all right you ought to stand in for something. I like you, Dick, and I should like to see you get our Nell. Don't you think if you and I pull this through it'll send you up in her estimation? You do as I tell you, my boy, and I'll be your best man yet."

From that moment I was as wax in his hands.

* * * * *

The time had come. Miss Nelly Warden, otherwise Dick Travers, attired in her pretty blue print gown, and her big flop hat, which effectually concealed her face, set out on her black mare to ride to the house of old Ma'am Morrell, who gave music-lessons. Miss Nelly rode side-saddle—but between you and me I found it confoundedly uncomfortable, and my gown wouldn't set right somehow round about where I had got my two trusty six-shooters tucked.

I didn't feel happy. I knew that away down the trail somewhere Jim and Tom Warden was waiting, their pistols on the cock. The old servant had told Jim pretty exactly the spot where the ambush would be laid, and Jim and Tom had arranged so as to be on hand when wanted. Still, things might go wrong, and if so I stood to get a couple of leaden pellets through my head instead of leading little Nelly Warden to the altar. For Juan Sola had a way of shooting on sight when he got mad, and then his vicinity became distinctly unhealthy.

Hark! What was that? A scurry in the underbrush, a rush of men and horses, and a cloak had been thrown over my

"I threw off his grasp and sprang to my feet, drawing my revolver as I did so."

Digitized by Google

head and I was dragged backwards off my horse to the ground. Some very unladylike exclamations which I let drop as I struggled to escape were fortunately lost in the confusion.

Then came the thud of hoofs, and I heard Jim's voice demanding what was amiss. For answer came an oath in Sola's voice, and a rough command to stand out of the way.

"What's that behind you?" cried Jim. "Great heavens, you villain, is that my sister?"

Apparently he made one step towards the Mexican, who threw out his arm and fired at him, and with a groan poor Jim dropped. Quick as lightning Tom Warden fired on Sola, but missed, and I began to think it was time I assisted in the fighting. I was lying on the ground entangled in the horse-cloak, and as I struggled to rise Sola suddenly seized me by the arm with the intention of pulling me to my feet. In the darkness he had not yet discovered the deception.

I threw off his grasp, and sprang to my feet, drawing my revolver as I did so. A strange figure I must have looked standing there in my blue skirt. My big "flop hat" hung round my neck by its ribbon, and my wig had fallen off.

One searching glance the Mexican threw at me, then he realised the truth.

"Fooled!" he shrieked, and let drive a bullet at me. I had ducked at the flash, but a hot, tearing pain in my left arm told me that his aim was good. I fired at him, but missed him badly, and in a second he had mounted and turned to fly, his two servants riding beside him.

"Mount and after then," roared Tom, who was fat and heavy. "I must look after my brother."

I needed no further incentive. I leapt on to my horse—Nelly's horse—and in a moment I was after them. My mare was fresher than theirs, and I gained rapidly on them. Suddenly, in obedience from an order from Sola, one of the servants turned back and rode at me, but a bullet from my Colt took him in the shoulder, and he rode off howling in a direction at right angles to that in which we were galloping.

The second servant was apparently in a terrible panic, and at last he swerved off and left his master alone. Sola, seeing this, turned in his saddle and fired after him, making the silent woods ring with oaths. And all the time I was gaining on him. I knew that if he once got behind a rock there he could pick me off at his leisure, and so I strove my hardest to come up with him, paying no heed to my burning wound. Just as he turned to the corner, and stood outlined for a second against the blue night sky, he turned and fired on me, and our bullets crossed. He took me just above the knee, but mine hit him somewhere under the breastbone, and he pitched out of his saddle heavily. I rode cautiously up, but when I saw his face I knew that the danger was past. Juan Sola was dead!

* * * * *

Quite how I got back to the town I do not know. I must have fainted from pain and loss of blood many times, but the good old horse pulled me through, and carried me safely to the Warden ranch, where Tom, carrying his badly wounded brother, had arrived long before. By the time I arrived the whole story of the frustrated elopement was public property, and great was the rejoicing when I turned up alive, though damaged, the general consensus of opinion having been that when I set out to pursue the Mexican and his two servants I had gone on my last ride.

So poor little Nelly had her hands full, with two great invalids to look after. Jim got better sooner than I did, having only a bullet-track across his ribs, but that was to my advantage, seeing that when he got better she was free to devote more time to me. She made me tell her all about my chase, and how I felt in her gown and hat. I told her a good deal more, too, a good deal that wouldn't interest you, perhaps, But when we told Jim the result of our conversation, of course the silly idiot must slap me on the back, and roar out—"I told you so, Dick! I told you you stood to get something good out of the business!"

As I often tell little Nelly, I did.

Victor Pitt-Kethley.

WHEN IS YOUR BIRTHDAY?

(See Editor's Chat.)

July 22.—A fortunate birthday; good for health and progress in domestic affairs. Benefit will be derived from friends.

Those born in the early morning and from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. will derive the most benefit, but will have some anxiety over love affairs.

A child born to-day will be fortunate, will possess original ideas and good judgment; will be ambitious, fond of change and the uncommon.

July 23.—The indications for a birthday to-day are good for money and business. Much activity; health favourable, and speculations should go well.

To the young courtship and marriage will soon come, especially if born before noon. Girls born after then will have some peculiar experiences in love affairs.

The day is good for marriage, pleasure, and visiting.

A child born to-day will be active, cheerful, and a pleasant companion. Fond of fun, pleasure, and the opposite sex. Very artistic if born in the morning.

July 24.—Not a fortunate year for those whose birthdays come on this day. Sickness and an unsettled time are approaching.

Favourable for those born between 7 and 11 a.m., especially clerks, teachers, and professional persons. Bad for landlords and farmers.

A child born to-day will be of a peculiar disposition and hard to understand. Fond of change. Better for a male than a female.

July 25.—A year bringing many ups and downs and little progress for those who celebrate their birthdays to-day. Don't risk much. Guard against loss and damage to premises.

Rather fortunate for farmers; and persons in employ may be promoted. Lovers will have cause to grieve, many crosses and much deceit.

To-day is evil for dealing with young people, and ladies generally. Ask favours about 7 p.m. Beware of mishaps near 10 p.m.

A child born to-day will be ambitious and proud. Free with money and not very fond of work. Should keep in the employ of others.

July 26.—Clerks and literary persons born on this date will have anxiety, and young girls will need care in love affairs. Those in business will do well with care.

The day is good for dealing with professional persons, seeking work, and buying, especially from 4 to 5 p.m. Evil for signing papers after then.

A child born to-day will be rather fortunate in business, will be quick and clever, though a bit abrupt and crafty, possess a quick wit.

July 27.—Indifferent health is probable this year to those born on this date. The day is unfavourable to business and domestic affairs. Mind unsettled and inclined to change.

Farmers, dealers, builders, and aged persons will have an anxious time. Girls will meet many obstacles in love affairs.

A child born to-day should keep in employ. It will be clever and inventive, but suspicious, reserved, and lack self-confidence.

July 28.—This day brings anxiety in business; go carefully to avoid loss. Don't speculate or lend money. Give extra attention to the health.

The day is evil to speculate or ask favours. Good to do with military men, doctors, and engineers near 6 p.m. Guard against chills.

A child born to-day will be active, generous, and affectionate. Rather fortunate and enterprising. Apt to be too free with money.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.

Mrs. Norton. Adventuress.

Cynthia: Her companion.

THE CLIMAX DRAWS NEAR.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF NEW READERS.

CYNTHIA tells in the opening chapter of her arrival at her cousin's in the capacity of companion, and of her discovery that Mrs. Norton is taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money are being lost and won. The climax is reached one night when Mary Vernon stakes her diamond ear-rings (a gift from Lord Kinross) and one of the onlookers finds them to be paste. Mary Vernon declares that they are exactly as given to her by Lord Kinross, whereupon Kinross breaks off the engagement. The diamonds subsequently appear as a gift from Fluffy to Mrs. Norton, set in a pair of hat-pins. A few weeks later the notorious Mrs. Norton, with Fluffy's help, succeeds in stealing a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew at the Café Regal, by substituting for the millionaire's pocket-book one exactly like it. Later on Cynthia discovers the original pocket-book, empty of course, in one of her boxes. Not knowing what to do, she confides in Fluffy, who is very kind, but makes her promise to say nothing at all to anyone else on the subject. He takes charge of the duplicate pocket-book. Mrs. Norton now moves into her new house in Pont Street, and it is while here that Sir John Strickland, a poor baronet, proposes to her. She refuses, but hints to him that if he will consent to allow his name to appear on the directorate of certain companies he will be bound to make money, and then her answer might be different. Mrs. Norton is next presented at Court by her friend, Lady Gaveston. For this function she wears some superb diamonds which have been lent her by Lord Kinross. The Society papers declare her to be the most beautiful and best-dressed woman at the presentation. The same evening Lord Kinross calls at Pont Street for a private interview, and it is during this interview that Percival Hope enters the room unannounced, and makes the startling statement that Mary Vernon has discovered the thief who stole her diamonds. Shortly afterwards Mrs. Norton leaves the room, Cynthia however stays, unknown to Kinross and Percival Hope. While there she overhears Hope, who turns out to be Kinross' cousin, tell Kinross that in a fortnight's time he will prove to Kinross that Mrs. Norton is an adventuress living upon the proceeds of the robbery of her friends. Cynthia tells Mrs. Norton what she has overheard.

FRANKIE listened to me unmoved, until I mentioned that Kinross had alluded to Percival as his heir-at-law.

"Kinross said Hope was his cousin, and his heir? Are you sure, Cynthia?"

"Quite."

"But the difference in name, what of that?"

"Percival told Kinross that when he took the name of 'Hope' he had succeeded to a good deal of money, more than he was likely to spend. I suppose he was adopted by some rich relation."

"I remember hearing some talk that a connection of Kinross had changed his name. To think it should be Percival Hope—Pettigrew's secretary. Tell me, Cynthia," she cried eagerly, "did they mention him at all—the American, I mean?"

"Not a word. They spoke chiefly of you. Hope declared that within a fortnight he would prove you were——" I paused. I simply couldn't repeat the conversation in cold blood.

"Don't be squeamish, Cynthia. If I don't mind, you needn't. I suppose Hope said I was an adventuress?"

"Yes."

"Anything else?" she glanced at me keenly. "For Heaven's sake don't keep me in suspense," she cried, "speak."

"He said you were a swindler existing on the proceeds of nefarious transactions, and that you duped people. He declared you were leading a false life, under a false name, that you had never married Richard Norton at all."

"And then——" panted Frankie. "Did Kinross strike him, did he sit still and listen to such lies?"

"I didn't wait for Kinross, Frankie. I told Percival Hope what I thought of him myself."

"You? Why, Cynthia, what made you do it?"

Digitized by Google

"It wasn't very likely I could sit and hear you abused without defending you, Frankie. I think I made him feel ashamed. I said I had been present at your wedding, and suggested he should write to the Consulate at Bruges, or question Lady Gaveston if he didn't believe me. I went for him like anything, Frankie, and at last he acknowledged you were really Mrs. Norton."

"What of his other accusations? Did he retract them?"

"No. I told him about your estate in Jamaica and Lord Kinross backed me up. But he would not retract a word. He even dared to say he would prove his assertions if I would wait a fortnight. Of course I wouldn't listen to that, but started to fetch you."

"Who stopped you, Cynthia?"

"Hope. Oh, Frankie, imagine what he said, he declared that if I told you what he had been saying, he would deny it all, and accuse me of making it up."

"Was Kinross sorry?"

"I don't know. I said some nasty things to him as well as Percival. I told him I wished he'd go away and not come back. I said I couldn't understand what you found to like in him."

"Why Cynthia, you must have been a perfect termagant. Tell me," she looked curiously into my eyes, "you used to like Percival Hope a little?"

I nodded, the subject was a sore one.

"He cared for you, didn't he, Cynthia?"

"I think so."

"And yet you treat him like this! Simply rave at the poor man. At the very moment too, that you've learnt he has an income too large for him to spend—alone. Why on earth did you do it, child? Don't you see you've spoilt your chance?"

"I don't understand you, Frankie. It seems to me I never do. I used to like Percival Hope, I—I can't help liking him a little even now, but neither he nor anyone else shall say bad things of you in my presence."

"But why, child?" she asked again. "How does it affect you, if they speak ill of me?"

"You are all I have in the world, Frankie. The only person there is for me to love. Shouldn't I be mean, base, and disloyal to let anybody speak against you?"

"I haven't been particularly kind to you, Cynthia. I really don't see why you should care for me. Still——" with a sudden movement she put her arms round me.

"You are a little fool," she said softly. "It doesn't pay to be fond of anybody, but oneself. It certainly won't pay you to be fond of me." Then, with a sigh, "I might have been nicer to you, Cynthia. I wish——" she broke off and kissed my face and hands with a strange tenderness. "I am sorry," she said, "oh, I am sorry——"

"Are you going back to Bruges," she asked presently.

"Not if you want me, Frankie."

"If you do, Percival Hope will follow; you'll forgive him and——"

"I don't mind about Percival or anybody else, Frankie. I am quite content to be with you if——" I paused.

"What is it, Cynthia?"

"Be fond of me sometimes, that's all."

"I always said you were sentimental, Cynthia," she laughed. "You want to make me as bad. Now," she rose, "you must go to bed, it's late."

"Shall you speak to Hope, Frankie, and make him apologise?"

"What's the use? You say he would deny everything. I shall just ignore him and all his works. Kinross is quite right, Hope speaks against me for his own ends. He doesn't want his cousin to marry. He desires to remain the heir-at-law."

"Frankie, you don't really care for Lord Kinross?"

"That's the person I care for, Cynthia," she answered, pointing to her reflection in the glass. "Lord Kinross can look after himself, my dear, there's no need for you to worry."

"And Sir John?"

Frankie looked grave. "I think you can trust me with Sir John," she answered.

And with that I was forced to be content.

Lord Kinross looked in for a little while the next day. His relations with my cousin seemed unchanged, his attentions were marked but indefinite. He contrived to get a few words with me before he went.

"Please forgive me, Cynthia," he said softly.

"For what?"

"Let us say for existing. I know you grudge me the right to live. Won't you be friends?" He smiled and put out his hand.

"Like your lordship, I'll make up my mind when Mr. Hope returns, in a fortnight," I replied.

Lord Kinross had the grace to blush.

The next afternoon was our "At Home,"—our first in Pont Street. By this time our visiting list had grown, men used to crowd round Frankie when she drove in the Park, and smart women dropped into lunch.

Lady Gaveston had routed out all her acquaintances, pious people most of them, of good family, with plain daughters and dull sons. To all these Frankie had dispatched "At Home" cards. Some of the folk we had met at Lady Winchin's were requisitioned; also Mrs. Curtis-Blount, and my old friend the pink youth. The men invited certainly outnumbered the women, but if the latter were few, they were, as Frankie said, well chosen, and the rest would follow. Lord Kinross had promised to bring his sister Paula, and Mary Vernon was sure to come. She had answered Frankie's letter with a pretty little note of thanks, but had not yet been to see her.

The rooms looked lovely, Frankie and I decorated them with lilac, laburnum and white narcissus, and Sir John—frightfully busy of late—sent us a sheaf of lilies and a whole lot of roses.

I got dressed early and went downstairs to watch for first arrivals.

Lady Gaveston was seated in the drawing-room, cased in a gown of satin spiked with jet. She was worrying some soft white wool with a pair of hungry-looking needles—knitting she called it.

She stared at me through her glasses. "That's a pretty frock, my dear," she said at last.

"I'm glad you like it, Lady Gaveston. I think it's sweet myself. Frankie has beautiful taste."

My lady clicked her needles and slightly sniffed. My dress was of pale yellow silk falling in pleats from the waist. The bodice was cut without a collar band, and showed my neck above a berthe of soft lace, caught into place by a knot of roses, deepest, darkest crimson.

Frankie was gowned in one of her most triumphant toilettes. She wore a canvas of a pale shade of brown—biscuit colour best describes it, with a silk underskirt of eau de nil. The dainty fabric caught the shimmer of the silk and gave it a wonderful green effect. The skirt cut very long, was embroidered in motifs of blue cloth and silver. The bodice was a confection of silk and lace, with a suggestion of a zouave in blue and silver. A delicious belt of turquoise completed the costume.

Mrs. Curtis-Blount was the first to arrive. She wore mauve with a picture hat of orchids, and looked very smart. Her cher ami, the man in glasses, followed in her wake.

"Here I am, dear," she said, "and I've brought Douglas Seton with me. Every little helps, doesn't it? Your rooms are large dear, and at first you'll find them difficult to fill."

Digitized by Google

"You are always thoughtful, Vi," said Frankie, and promptly turned her over to milady, who sternly controlled Vi's frivolity for the remainder of the afternoon.

People came thick and fast after this. Society men introduced by Lord Kinross, military men friends of Sir John, grave and reverend gentlemen invited by the Gavestons. All well-dressed, immaculate in frock coat, patent boots, and the latest thing in buttonholes, all pleased with themselves and not displeased with Frankie. The women dropped in by ones and twos, and seemed astonished to find how many men they knew! Lord Kinross and his sister arrived about half-past four.

Lady Paula was about seventeen, tall and fair with a bright sunny face and a bonny pair of dark blue eyes. I took a fancy to her at once, and she confided to me that she hoped we should be friends.

"My cousin Percival has told me all about you," she said frankly, "though he didn't say you were so pretty as you are. I shall tease him when he comes back."

"What about, Lady Paula?"

"What innocence! You must know he's awfully keen on you. I like your name—Cynthia. I shall call you so if you don't mind. That is, if you will remember that I am Paula. It saves trouble, and it is much more friendly."

We talked together for some time, the efforts of the pianist whom Frankie had engaged made a nice cover for our conversation. That, and the chink of the cups and saucers, drowned our voices, which was a good thing as we talked rather loud. By this time the rooms were crammed, I didn't know half the people and kept asking Lady Paula who they were. "A pretty woman your cousin," she observed. "Any amount of go. She'll be the rage this season, I expect. Half the smart set are here to-day and the other half will come to-morrow. It's quite a success, eh, Hartland?"

"Very much so," he returned, "Mrs. Norton is a charming hostess."

Paula nodded, and helped herself to cake.

"I don't see that funny little man you told me about, Hartland. What do you say he's called—'Fluffy'?"

"You must ask Miss Hamilton about him, Paula, he's a great friend of hers."

"Fluffy is very nice, not a bit like his name," I said laughing. "He'll be here later, with Sir John. They are both in the city at a board meeting."

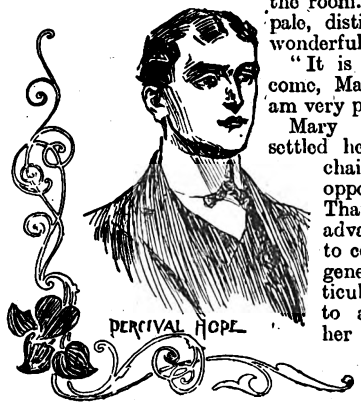
"It's surprising to think of Fluffy and Strickland as co-directors or co-anything. The sleek-headed one used to set the poor old Colonel's nerves on edge," remarked Kinross.

"They are better friends, now," I answered coldly. "Mr. Thomson is a very sincere person."

Kinross grinned.

"And Sir John a very wise one," he remarked. "Sincerity and wisdom should do well together—in the City."

At this moment a tall, elegant girl, dressed in black, entered the room. I recognised her face, pale, distinguished-looking, with wonderful dark eyes.



"It is very sweet of you to come, Mary," said Frankie, "I am very pleased to see you."

Mary Vernon smiled and settled herself in a comfortable chair near the piano, and opposite Mrs. Curtis-Blount. That volatile lady took the advantage of a violin solo to comment upon things in general and Mary in particular. The solo coming to an untimely end, left her unaccompanied in the middle of a sentence. She, oblivious, continued:

"Of course she took them, isn't it proved by the fact that Kinross won't speak to her? Absolutely cuts her, his own cousin, in public."

"CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA."
New Series of Stories.

All ears were turned to Mrs. Curtis-Blount all eyes towards Mary and Lord Kinross. The latter with considerable address saved the situation.

"Come and see Mrs. Norton's china," he said smiling, "she's some awfully nice Chelsea in the other room."

Mary Vernon flushed, hesitated, and consented. They went together from the room. I wondered what would happen before the two returned.

Lord Kinross sauntered back some half hour later smiling and self confident as ever.

"Miss Vernon's gone home," he said presently. "She's more amiable than you," he added, "not half so hard hearted."

"She knows you better perhaps, and can make allowances for your—weakness."

"Possibly. You consider curiosity a weakness, Cynthia."

"Are you suffering from it?"

"Intensely. So are you. You want to know what Mary said to me, I desire to learn what Frankie is saying to Sir John. Shall we exchange confidences?"

I glanced up eagerly. I had not noticed Strickland's arrival and felt vexed that I had overlooked him. He was standing by the window, talking eagerly with Frankie. He was pale and seemed to stoop a little. It may have been the bright sunshine was trying, but he struck me as looking old and very worn. Frankie listened to him for a while, then moved towards the window into the shade of the curtains. She spoke quickly, impatiently, with an irritated little movement of her hand. She left him abruptly, and returned smiling to her guests. Sir John sighed and dropped wearily into a chair beside Lady Gaveston.

"Well," said Lord Kinross lightly, "and what do you think of it, Cynthia?"

I made no answer, I did not feel inclined to jest. I liked Sir John and was sorry for him.

"Has he received his congé, Cynthia?"

"What then?" I asked quickly, "how will it affect you?"

He shrugged his shoulders. "Not at all. Your cousin a great deal. She's a beautiful woman, Cynthia, and I——" he paused.

"Well?"

"I admire beauty. So does Percival."

"He certainly contrives to keep your admiration within bounds."

"Perhaps. He'll be back soon, you know. And then," Lord Kinross bent towards me, "he'll admire you without any bounds at all."

I made no answer but endeavoured to look dignified.

"Now Paula, it's time we went. You've eaten all the cake, and Cynthia is quite cross. Coming to see you next week, is she? That's right, I want you two to be great friends."

Shortly after Lord Kinross and his sister left the rooms began to thin. By the time Fluffy arrived, they were all but empty. He flung himself into a chair and asked for tea; when the rest of the people had gone, he turned to Frankie.

"Pleasant afternoon?" he said.

"Splendid. It's been a complete success."

"I'm glad. I've had a very tiresome meeting in the City. We've had an unfavourable report from the Carnegie gold mine. The engineer has cabled that the ore is yielding less and less gold. The shares are going down like the deuce, and the shareholders are off their heads."

"How are the directors?"

Fluffy shrugged his shoulders. "We play the game," he said. "None of us stand to lose much except Sir John. He's very hard hit indeed. I told him not to venture more than £500 in the Carnegie, but he was enthusiastic and insisted on planking down ten thou.—his entire capital I'm thinking. He talked quite wildly this afternoon, declared he'd give up every farthing to save the company from ruin, and mouthed about his responsibility towards the shareholders. Just as if he'd anything to do with them. I tell you Frankie he's no more fit for a board of directors, than I am for the bench of bishops."

Digitized by Google

"And will the mine go wrong, do you think?"

"May do. We shall know better next week, The thing will settle itself one way or the other under a fortnight."

"And—" Frankie glanced towards Lady Gaveston, but her ladyship far from taking the hint sat firmly on her chair and knitted for dear life.

"Sir John won't get burnt unless he's a fool," said Fluffy. "If he does as he's told, we shall all come out on top, with thousands to the good. If not—" he grinned and passed his cup for tea.

"If Mr. Thomson has finished discussing business, there is something I should like to say to you, Frances," said Lady Gaveston coldly. "Don't go, Mr. Thomson, I wish you to remain. You are, I understand, an old friend of Mrs. Norton's husband, and as such I am sure you take a deep interest in her future. You also can remain, Cynthia, your cousin will not object."

Frankie glanced round quickly. She wanted, I could see, to defer the discussion, but there was a warlike air about Lady Gaveston, her spiky jet, her gleaming needles, that defied opposition. She was in no mood to brook defiance. My cousin therefore took a chair and waited for the fray.

"It is now some six weeks since I came to you, Frances, to act as your chaperone," commenced her ladyship. "You may remember that I reserved to myself the right of expressing disapproval of some, or any of your actions should the occasion arise. I now feel called upon to do so, and in the strongest terms. In fact, if you do not see your way to alter your conduct in this matter, I shall leave you and return to Scotland."

Frankie breathed hard. It was an unexpected blow and came at a critical moment. On the eve of social success—it would be fatal to be left without a chaperone.

"In what way do you find fault with me, Lady Gaveston?"

"In many ways, Frances. I shall however only specify one. I have a great regard for Sir John Strickland, and I strongly reprobate your treatment of him. Are you, or are you not, his future wife?"

"That," said Frankie, "I am not at liberty to say."

Lady Gaveston glowered. "It's a dishonest answer," she said, "and one that should shame you. You can play with laddies like Kinross to your heart's content. I despise such goings on, but they don't trouble me. But when I see a man like John Strickland suffering from the bad treatment you are giving him, I am moved to speak. Not a word has he said, I have seen and heard for myself. I'll see and hear no more of that sort. Yes, or no, are you going to marry him? If it's 'no,' give him his answer, he'll take it. If it's 'yes,' down on your knees, and thank the Lord that he has sent you such a man to love and tend. Which is it to be, Frances?"

"Are you going to leave me, if I say no, Lady Gaveston?"

"I don't believe in compulsion, Francis. I wouldn't force any woman against her will. One way or the other, it doesn't matter which to me, but one way or the other it must be settled. Sir John shall not be made a fool of any longer, if I'm to stay in the house."

"Sir John is poor," said Frankie, "Mr. Thomson says within a fortnight he may be even poorer; or he may be very rich. I'll be candid with you, Lady Gaveston; if John Strickland were wealthy I'd be his wife rather than any other man's, but I cannot, will not, be the wife of a beggar. As things are now it would jeopardise my future and his to promise marriage. In a fortnight the issue will be clear. The Carnegie will prove a gold mine or the reverse. Strickland will make or lose his fortune. In a fortnight I will either promise Sir John to be his wife, or——" she paused, "I will not see him any more. Will you wait?"

Lady Gaveston stared hard at her. "It's borne in upon me," she said, "that you ought to decide here and now. But there's that about you which makes it difficult for me to refuse. I'll wait a fortnight, Frances, but not a moment more." She gathered up her knitting and departed grimly from the room.

Fluffy, much relieved, lit a cigarette, and read the paper. Frankie sat gazing at the floor deep in thought. As for me I was tired and rather sad.

What a lot of things were going to happen in a fortnight! Percival Hope was coming back to town, Kinross would, I suppose, decide as to his future course with Frankie, the Carnegie mine would prove a failure or a triumph, Sir John — somehow I could not bear to think about Sir John. My mind went back to the time he had come up with us to town from Lady Winchin's. I pictured him as he stood bare headed on the pavement, straining to catch the last glimpse of Frankie's face.

How would it all end? Would Frankie dismiss Strickland and marry Kinross, or would she flout his lordship and be true to Sir John? It might be—the thought was strange—that having played with the one, and amused herself with the other, both at the same time, she would at the last moment lose the two together.

Well I should know, and so would she—in a fortnight.

(Next Tuesday's SHORT STORIES contains another striking instalment of "Cynthia's Confessions.")

AN Irish servant girl being sent for a bottle of capers, asked the astounded shopman for a "bottle of them 'jumps'!"

"YOU should never take anything that doesn't agree with you," the physician told him. "If I'd always followed that rule, Maria," he remarked to his wife, "where would you be?"

"YOU shouldn't find fault with my temper," said she. "When we were married, you know, you took me for better or for worse." "I know it," was the reply, "but I had a hope of striking something like a general average."

"PA, what sort of a house is that?" "That, my son, is the blind asylum. Blind people live in there." "They can't see, can they?" "No, my boy." "Then what has the house got windows for, if they can't see?"

MUTUAL FRIEND: "It really is shocking, dear, the way in which you and your husband quarrel and carry on. I wonder you don't separate from him." Injured Wife: "What, go away, and leave him alone to do just as he likes? Not me."

"How can I leave thee, oh, my love?" warbled Adolphus, under the window of Eliza, one shimmering moonlight night, when up spoke the policeman on that beat, and harshly said: "Come now, young man, just move on. The family what lived here moved two weeks ago."

A LITTLE boy was taking a walk one day with his father when they came upon a hen proudly marching out a brood of ducklings. Looking at them with great seriousness, the little fellow remarked: "Father, I wonder what a hen thinks when it finds it has laid duck's eggs?"

Digitized by Google

Murder by Speaking Tube.

A Powerful Story in Two Parts. Conclusion.

The First Part of the Story in Brief.

DR. FEATHERSTONE, a country surgeon with a dwindling practice and an extravagant wife, is in a serious financial position. His only hope is centred in an old lady, Mrs. Peake, who is living with him as paying guest. She is extremely wealthy, has no heir, her only son having been killed in South Africa, and is very fond of her host, the "dear doctor." Her infatuation goes to such a length that she leaves the whole of her fortune—something over forty thousand pounds—to the doctor in her will, and informs him of the fact through her lawyers. He refuses to take the money for form's sake, but is over-ruled. Then suddenly the son, who was reported dead, is seen by Mrs. Featherstone, and the doctor realises that unless Mrs. Peake dies before she has time to alter the will, the fortune will never be his.

It so happens that Mrs. Peake has been boasting to a friend that she is accustomed to help the doctor in his dispensing, and, anxious to support her boast by demonstration when next her visitor calls, she intreats the doctor to allow her to make up an harmless dose all by herself. He refuses, but while thinking the matter over an awful temptation assails him. Here is the chance of securing to himself the fortune by means of a terrible deed.

IN DISPENSARY AND SURGERY.

DOCTOR FEATHERSTONE watched the little snowy puffs of thin hair bobbing up and down with the old lady's sobs. "I sympathise with you, my dear Mrs. Peake," he said, "in not wishing that spiteful cat—pardon the name, I never liked the woman!—to be able to laugh at you."

"I could not—could not live under ridicule," wept she.

"But if my hand in this harmless little deception were suspected—it is a very little thing, but it would mean ruin to me. You might be in a playful mood one day and let out the joke, without thinking how it would hurt me——"

"You can swear me to secrecy!" said the old lady eagerly. "I can see it is more serious than I thought, dear Freddie, for you are so pale and frightened about it. I wish I had not been so foolish. But forgive me, and do but help me in this, and I will never boast again."

"Here is Mrs. Featherstone," he said suddenly. "She must never know. I will think it over. I should dearly like to oblige you. Minnie, take dear Mrs. Peake and be cross with her for a minute. She has been allowing herself to be silly enough to cry. She has been studying those big books a little too hard."

Alone once more he took the chances in his hands and studied them.

"I believe," he thought, "it is intended that I should take the opportunity and use it. My career—my home, my wife, my two little ones at school—all this in the balance against a little remnant of this old, worn out creature's life and, and the means of being idle to the son of her old age, a young man without cares and the whole world before him. What does he want with money? Against this—all that it means to me! There's a higher justice——"

Meaning that the mad instinct of self-preservation cried out within him and would not be denied.

A whole scheme crystallised before his mind's eye while the old woman had gazed up in his face. It was sharp, symmetrical, without a flaw. Many a man might have been hanged on circumstantial evidence—this was a plan to prepare circumstantial evidence to clear him.

Censure there would be. He must bear that. Suspicion there might be, but it would be idle. The verdict would certainly be "death by misadventure."

He brooded long over his solitary pipe.

"Minnie must be kept in the dark all through, and I must assure her of my entire innocence even if she suspects. I cannot have her turn from me, for a million pounds, no!"

"I shall be censured for allowing the old woman at any time to monkey about in the dispensary, but I can explain that I never permitted her to do more than hand a bottle down for me after I had indicated the exact one. The boasting of the old woman to Miss Fryar I can easily prove to be lies, prompted by silly vanity. Why, everybody knows it—the coachman, Martha, Ellen, my wife, Richards!" (He named his brother practitioner who took his connection and stayed at the house while he was away). "Richards has often laughed at the joke. I'm safe in that particular.

"Miss Fryar shall see her make up her own dose, that is the main thing, and she can swear to the foolish victim's crazy claim to a knowledge of drugs. How simple it all is!

"The will is sure to turn suspicion on me. It looks nasty. If young Peake turns up, he may contest it, too, and I may have to ease my strained nerves a bit by turning generous and coming to a compromise. Any sacrifice even to one-half the legacy to end the worry. I may not go so far, but we can leave that. I am secure on the point of the will. The lawyers and others—and the old lady's diary, too, can testify to it that I opposed the idea; that I urged the looking-up of next-of-kin and the claims of hospitals and that I urged Mrs. Peake to reside elsewhere. Hylton begged me at last, for her health's sake, to let her stay. My disinterestedness has been cracked up all round. I knew her so well, too; the more I urged her to take back her money the more determined she was to let the will stand."

He was not without a twinge of shame as he ran over the list of his acts of duplicity, and he actually admired himself for his feelings of self-disgust and squirmed beforehand with the pain of undergoing the suspicion that was inevitable.

"But after all," he said, wiping a wreath of cold sweat from his brow, "I shall have the money. There can be no serious hitch. Nasty remarks, that's all!"

Mrs. Peake found the dear doctor won over to the idea, and prepared now to enter into the spirit of the "joke."

"This is my idea," he said, "I shall be in the surgery, and will whisper instructions to you through the speaking-tube. The end in the dispensary can be hidden by bottles and things, and you can easily stand near the open mouthpiece.

Digitized by Google

The least inclination of your head will bring your ear near it. You have a dear little way of your own of putting your head on one side when you are thinking. 'Let me see,' you will say, 'what else will improve the mixture?' That will be my signal, or, in fact, any sound you like to make near the mouthpiece, and I will tell you a few harmless things to swell the prescription a little. In between you can say what you like about some of the poisons which are on a shelf all to themselves."

Mrs. Peake pressed his hand in gratitude.

"Go down now," he said hurriedly, "and we will rehearse it. That woman shall not have a laugh at your expense if I can prevent it."

Mrs. Peake set her mouth firmly.

"Trust me," she said. "I will go down now."

"And, by the way, to test your knowledge of the measuring glass you shall bring me the dose complete and I will see if you under or overdo it."

He laughed as he spoke. The measures were to be uniform and finally filled up to a given figure, and there was no room for error.

The rehearsal was a great success. Mrs. Peake was exact to a drop. As the understood total was to be exactly one fluid ounce the careful old lady corrected all mistakes with the last item, i.e., pure water, making it reach the large figure "1" without troubling about the others to a drop or two.

The doctor emptied the dose away laughingly, and the rehearsal was renewed several times until it seemed desirable to stop the repeated journeys backward and forward lest they should attract attention. It could be carried through easily enough now, and would take up so little time that Featherstone had not a fear as to the result, though half-a-dozen patients were shown in while he should be occupied with his whispering.

* * * * *

Mary Havers, wearing colours for the first time since her lover's supposed death, had gone to the side entrance of Featherstone's house, where she caught sight of Matilda, Mrs. Peake's one faithful retainer.

"Close the door, Matilda," she said, in a whisper, "I don't want any one inside to know just yet."

Matilda, without a sign of astonishment at Miss Havers' odd behaviour, did as she was bid, and the two were now entirely concealed from view by the irregular growth of shrubs growing right up to the wall and edging the winding path. Mary beckoned someone forward from the concealment of a turn in the path, and a moment afterwards Matilda was face to face with one before whom she might excusably have screamed "A ghost!"

"Do you know who this is? Don't make a noise."

The young woman did not cry out or indeed make any fuss at all, though tears of joy started into her widely rounded eyes.

"Oh, it's Master George! I should say Mr. Peake, I s'pose, now he've got a moustache," she said. "Then you're not dead? Well, I'm proud to say I never could nor would believe but what you'd turn up again. Well, there, I would like to kiss him a welcome home, I would. Do you mind, miss?"

"Oh, Matilda, you'll be the death of me yet!" gasped Mary, pushing George forward.

The smiling young man gave her a hearty smack, and received one in return, when, in a level tone of voice, as if a return from the grave was a daily event she said, eyeing him up and down—

"And in khaki, too! Aren't you glad the war's over, sir?"

"Tilly," said the young man, without waiting to reply, "I have a long story to tell you some other time. I was wounded badly and lost my memory for a long time, I certainly was not killed, anyhow. I haven't long come out of Netley hospital with my noddle in working order again, and I find there's been a blunder in naming me. I knew how you'd take the news, but how do you think your mistress will? We were afraid of giving her a shock while she was so ill and weak, and Miss Havers has been coming every day since Sunday to make sure that she was well enough to bear it. Miss Havers suggests going in first now and preparing her with some roundabout talk. What do you think about it?"

"I know what you mean," said the woman, "but my opinion is it's all nonsense about good news being dangerous to anybody. It may upset 'em like, but it makes 'em clear and happy, all the same, like a fresh breeze a-blowin' through a house——"

"And knocking the pictures down, eh, Tilly? Well, you truly think your mistress would be none the worse?"

"Not a ha'porth, sir. It would be just as well, though, not to give the poor dear too much of a startlerizer. Suppose I let you in by this door to save you showing yourselves at the front. I'll tell Ellen and Martha and shut their screechin' mouths up before I let you in; then I'll take you through to the surgery. There's nobody there. Your mother's got a lady friend with her, and the doctor he's in the droring-room, I think. You can tell him yourselves if he comes in accidental. Then you can speak to the mistress first, Miss Havers, and Master George he can come from behind the curtains when you think she's prepared, or you can take Mrs. Peake to another room and say you'll bring the master to her

This arrangement commended itself at once, and presently the three conspirators were safely slipped into the surgery without being seen except by the other two gasping servants, who were athrill with the romance involved in the plan.

A small curtained alcove containing a chair for occasional dentistry suggested a good hiding place, and here George and Mary secreted themselves. Though their taking seats in quite an ordinary manner suggested nothing at all mysterious.

A swish of silk was heard before Matilda could leave them, and the woman whispered: "That's the mistress!" and stepped out of the alcove.

A moment later she returned with her finger on her lips.

"She've gone into the dispensary, and Ellen's been told to bring tea there for her and Miss Fryar.

"Could I have a peep at her?" said George, yearning to see the dear white-haired, apple-cheeked old lady moving about in all unconsciousness of what was in store for her.

"Easy." And conveyed by his mother's stolid maid, George made soft-footed for the hall, leaving Mary in the recess. A look to see that all was clear, and Matilda had placed him in a dark corner where he could watch the two antiquated heads bobbing in friendly converse between him and the glowing garden.

Hardly a second seemed to have passed before a hurried step sounded in the surgery, and Mary looked out, prepared to speak to whomsoever it might be.

It was Dr. Featherstone, and he had passed from view before she could speak and without seeing her.

He was only on the other side of the curtain within two yards of her, but Mary did not make a sound.

There was something in the pale face of Featherstone that seemed to have chilled her blood. Fear, horror? She knew not what it was; but such a look as that she had never seen on mortal face before, and for a moment or two she held her breath and trembled. The feeling was gone very soon, for this beautiful athletic specimen of perfect womanhood was the wrong one to suffer any great time under an attack of "nerves." Her not having declared her presence at once was a trifle awkward. She would step out and apologise for absent-mindedness.

Digitized by Google

As she moved over the thick carpet there came a faint "Ting!" of a bell and an answering gasp from the doctor.

Mary was clear of the alcove, but the doctor did not see her. His back was towards her, and he was whispering into a speaking-tube, unslung from a corner of the many angled room.

She waited irresolute and heard certain slow careful instructions being given to someone at the other end of the pipe. And then there was nothing to do but wait. His preoccupation would appear to have covered her entrance.

It was nothing—only directions to somebody to put together certain ingredients of a mixture.

Mary had some knowledge of drugs. The uncle who had left her and her orphan sister the little property they now enjoyed, had been a doctor, and she had often helped him with his medicines. For the matter of that she had lent her assistance to Featherstone, and it was doubtless envy of her accomplishment in this direction which had started poor Mrs. Peake in her course of absurd imitation. She now followed the instructions in a listless half-interested way.

It was a harmless sort of dose for somebody, and the instructions were certainly to a novice; for, after mention of the name, the drug was further specified by location. "Second on the third row from the left—from the left, not to the left—a green bottle with a gilt glass stopper"—and so on. There were long pauses between the items, and Doctor Featherstone's tongue often grew dry in a parched mouth—the sound of his voice suggested that. And as his mouth grew parched his brow grew moist, for he repeatedly wiped his damp forehead, and a dull red burnt visibly behind his ears.

Mary's listlessness became strained interest. She was watching him, she could not imagine why, and leaning forward quite close. Had he turned round she would have bluntly asked for an explanation, though a severe snub should be her portion for her pains.

Amazing! The man was now prompting as for a lecture.—mentioning poisons and their properties in between his instructions, and speaking with great slowness and repetition of pronunciation. "That is enough," he said at last. "One more ingredient; then fill to the one ounce with water."

He now, with tense deliberation, specified that one ingredient, giving its abbreviated name and indicating its position on one of the shelves.

Mary was wondering—wondering—when the man whispered sharply:

"Now, you never shrink at the most nauseous draught remember—take it at a gulp!"

A cry of fright burst from him the instant after, for the mouthpiece was snatched from his hand and a strong grasp on his coat-collar swung him aside at the same time.

"Stop!" cried a clear, ringing voice. "Do not drink that—it's poison!"

Three times the word was reiterated—"Poison! Poison! Poison!" while shrieks and shouts came from the region of the dispensary—then Mary was struck to the ground with a chair, swung round first in a sweep that smashed vases, pictures, and the globes of a gasolier.

George had been watching with great amusement, through tears standing in his eyes, the whole antic performance of his dear little mother.

"Dear soul!" he had murmured. "Isn't she showing off! She knows a bit about dispensing evidently, fearing a trade in her old age! What a lot of toxicological erudition to be sure! She could be a Lucrezia Borgia if she wasn't such an old angel. Oh, you conceited little girl!"

Mrs. Peake had turned and raised the dose high like a glass of wine.

"Confusion to the headache!" she said affectedly.

Then came that terrible cry from the speaking-tube.

George, who heard it, shouted and ran forward; and his mother, who could not lose her pride in her feat of dispensing even in the shock of seeing her son, carefully laid down the dose before she screamed.

"It is my son!" she cried, and clasped him tightly round the neck; then screamed again and again.

It was all screaming. The maids outside, hearing the screams and shouts in the dispensary and sounds of cries and smashes in the surgery, added to the uproar all it was in the power of their own lungs to do; but rushed with one accord to the help of Miss Havers.

None was needed. Mary, after receiving the first coward blow, had turned on Featherstone, seized and flung him—a feat not difficult to a girl of her strength, in dealing with a man so slight and weak—and was found kneeling on the man, who was now almost raging mad.

* * * * *

The examination of Dr. Featherstone before the magistrate had an unexpected result. The draught that seemed so miraculously prevented from going down Mrs. Peake's throat, proved on analysis to contain no poisonous ingredient!

Mary Havers was clear in her testimony; Mrs. Peake had the name of the deadly drug off by heart, and was sure she had added it just before the water, following the instructions of the "dear doctor," as she still quaintly called the scoundrel; and in his first frenzy of terror Featherstone had made admissions which pointed conclusively to his murderous intent, and justified Mary's accusation to the full. Yet the fact remained that the draught as compounded was not poisonous. There could only be one explanation, poor Mrs. Peake had added one more blunder to the list, and taken down the wrong bottle at the critical moment.

In the circumstances the accused man was admitted to bail, and cut the knot of the difficulty by himself swallowing the poison which Mrs. Peake had failed to take.

One person was glad, or at least relieved in mind, at this tragic end—Featherstone's wife. She wept sore and oft, for she loved the man; but when she remembered the terrible moment when their two souls had stood nakedly before each other in their eyes, and when hers had been the lips to first give form of words to their mutual horrid thought of murder, she knew that had he lived there would have been a cold ghost between them evermore. The ghost of a murder which had failed.

Her share in the ugly thing was not suspected, but she did not go without punishment. It was Mrs. Peake's generous hand which, by deed of gift, placed herself and family beyond danger of want, and it never failed to give a bitter flavour to her bread to know that it was undeserved when eaten.

THE END.

DAUGHTER: "I love him. He is the light of my life." Father: "Well, that's all right, but I object to having my house lit up by him after midnight."

ADA: "You are a flat, Freddie—nothing more!" Freddie: "What else could you expect? You sit on me at every possible opportunity."

SHE: "Postpone our wedding till October? Impossible. If I don't marry you in August I can't marry you at all." He: "Why not?" She: "Oh—er—Mr. Simmons asked me to marry him in September and I promised to."

FATHER: "Sarah, I don't like that fellow that comes here to see you." Sarah: "I don't see why not, pa. I'm sure he bears the impress of a gentleman." Father (wriggling his foot): "If he comes again he'll bear the impress of another gentleman."

TEACHER: "If you face the north, directly behind you will be south, on your right hand will be east, and on your left west." Seeing a lack of attention on the part of Bobby and wishing to catch him: "What is on your left hand, Bobby?" Bobby (in deep confusion): "Please, ma-a-m—it's some tar, an' it winna come off."

Digitized by Google

An Innocent Pretence.

Telling of a Sham Engagement which Ended in Reality.

Susan Miller was decidedly perplexed and a trifle worried by the behaviour of the young artist, whose name she had discovered to be Ralph Overend. For nearly a week he had been keeping a watch on her movements; she had arrived at this conclusion from the fact that she met him whenever she went out. It would have been bad enough to meet him at every turn, even although he did not attempt to speak to her, but he had endeavoured to make a rapid sketch of her on several occasions with his pencil and note-book.

It is highly probable that, if the man had been a loafer or some impudent "gentleman" who fancied that he might permit his eyes to take liberties which his mouth dared not utter, Susan Miller would have boldly requested him to discontinue his silent persecution, or, at least, would have taken steps to put an end to it. This man, however, was neither of those; she was abashed as well as vexed by his conduct, and felt afraid to do or say anything. She was satisfied that he did not mean to be offensive, that he was perfectly honourable; yet it was extremely provoking.

The thought occurred to her that he might be in love with her, but she laughed at the idea. Had it been so, he would have sought an interview through the good offices of some artist known to both; that would not have been a difficult task. "And then," mused Susan with a quiet smile, "the affair would have come to an abrupt termination, for I am not at all in love with him and he would soon find it out!"

Nevertheless, that state of things could not go on indefinitely, and she would have to put an end to it in some way or other. But how?

"Susan, dear," said her mother tenderly, during the evening of one of the days when Ralph Overend had attempted to sketch her: "I wish you were—married and settled!"

"Don't talk like that, mamma!" said Susan reproachfully. "You don't wish me to leave you, do you?"

"No, Susie," was the reply, "but I have often wondered what would happen if—if you were left. Perhaps I ought to have removed from this neighbourhood; I fancy you are not so much in love with art as your poor father. I stayed here, among artists, to gratify my own feelings and to retain the memory of the old days. I thought you might fall in love with an artist."

"I am fond of art, I believe, mamma, but I have no inclination to marry anyone, artist or otherwise. So let us forget the subject."

Mrs. Miller said nothing aloud, but to herself she said: "I thought there might be something in it. I know he has followed her two or three times, and he comes of a good family, so I understand. Can I? Well, no; it is not fair to force them together. Well, well!"

On the very next morning, as Susan Miller was returning from a shopping expedition, she found the artist walking by her side as she turned into the street in which she lived. He must have been waiting at the corner for her. She felt indignant, gave him a haughty stare, and hurried towards her own door. She heard his hurrying steps behind her and thought that she heard his voice as he began to say something, but her anger prevented her from understanding. She quickened her pace and reached the house.

The door was open and she hastened up the steps and into the hall. She was conscious that he was following her, and was about to call for her mother when that lady appeared. Her daughter's breathless condition and flushed cheeks suggested that she had been subjected to unwelcome attentions, and she turned with a severe countenance to the young man who had intruded.

"May I ask what you are doing here, sir, and why you are annoying my daughter?" she demanded sternly.

Ralph Overend was more confused than Susan herself; he appeared to recognise that he had placed himself in an awkward and ridiculous position. His eyes wandered from the severe face of Mrs. Miller to the pretty, flushed countenance of her daughter.

"I wish to know the meaning of this, sir!" demanded Mrs. Miller more sternly, as the young man did not answer her first inquiry.

"'Pon my honour, madam, I'm very sorry!" he began confusedly. "I admit that it is an abrupt way to ask anything so delicate, but I—well, I wish to propose to your daughter—I mean——"

His confusion redoubled; he appeared to have made a muddle of what he intended to say, but before he could set matters right Mrs. Miller interrupted with just the ghost of a smile.

"Well, it is rather an abrupt way of putting it, but I suppose that it is not always arranged in one set fashion. But I think that it is not quite decorous to discuss such questions in the hall! Come this way!"

She liked the artist; his frankness and his boldness pleased her. If a man wanted a woman, why should he hesitate to take the shortest cut to an introduction and victory? The poor fellow was deeply in love, of course, and had been unable to procure an invitation. And Susan? Mrs. Miller flattered herself that all would go as she wished if she took matters in hand. Her daughter would follow her lead.

Mrs. Miller led the way, while Susan looked after her in amazement. Ralph allowed Mrs. Miller to walk a few steps in advance, so as to be out of ear-shot, and then whispered to the astonished girl:

"I'm awfully sorry, I am, really! I was confused and out of breath, and I muddled it. I—I really didn't ask for your hand! I can see you don't want me, and I am wedded to my art! I want a few sittings for a picture that I have longed to paint for three years, but I could not find the exact model. I shall call it 'An English Maiden.' You are the exact counterpart of my dreams, and I have tried to sketch you at the risk of being rude, but in vain. So I determined to ask you to give me a sitting or two. Your father was an artist, and there is a kind of freemasonry among artists. I thought at last that I might venture——"

"We must go in! Mother has gone!" exclaimed Susan. "I really don't know what to say. Oh, dear! She thinks—and I don't believe she will consent if she knows that she is mistaken. And I don't care about giving the sittings, either!"

Mrs. Miller was waiting in the room with a complacent smile; it would all work out well, although the manner of it was a little unconventional! They were having a few words quietly in the hall!

Digitized by Google

Susan walked slowly towards the room, but not before she had noted the look of intense disappointment on Ralph's visage. After all, there was nothing wrong in giving him a sitting or two. "An English Maiden." Yes, an English maiden likes a little fun, and it would certainly be amusing to go through this piece of acting. More than anything else, it would cure her mother of match-making, for Mrs. Miller would have time to realise how the marriage of her daughter would affect her! The thought of losing her daughter would be a trial to Mrs. Miller as it is to any mother.

"I'll do it," she whispered to Overend, on the spur of the moment. "But mind, say as little as possible to my mother, so that we do not give ourselves away!"

"Good!" returned Ralph. His heart smote him on account of his duplicity, but he smothered his conscience with the assurance that it was nothing.

"I am afraid that I have been somewhat too forward, Mrs. Miller," he said frankly, as he entered the room. "May I ask you to allow me to arrange the matter with your daughter? Miss Miller has consented to give me sittings for a picture."

"Oh, yes, mamma!" cried Susan vivaciously, partly in an effort to hide her real feelings, which were mingled with a little shame at the thought of hoaxing her mother. "I thought that we could have father's old easel down here, and Mr. Overend could come and I would sit for him, and——"

"Yes, I understand," interrupted Mrs. Miller significantly. "Certainly, you can have your dear father's easel. And what is the picture to be and where do you intend to try and exhibit it, Mr. Overend?"

He explained the title, and added that he intended it for the Paris Salon. "They will forget to laugh at our girls when they see that picture, I think," he cried enthusiastically.

So it was settled, and the sittings began. Both Susan and Ralph quite understood the position, while Mrs. Miller thought that she understood it, which was almost the same thing, only different, as the children say. Mrs. Miller played propriety for the first few sittings, and watched with pride the growth of the picture, which was really her daughter's portrait. Susan was dressed very simply, with a plain gown and a rose in her hair, and Mrs. Miller was obliged to confess that the plainness of the costume set off to perfection the grace of her daughter's figure and the charm of her face. It was a picture; that word, so often misused, was the only one that described the girl as she sat patiently as a model for her artist acquaintance.

But the painting of Susan's counterfeit presentment was a longer process than Mrs. Miller imagined it would be, so she decided that she might leave the young people to themselves. Mr. Overend was determined to make the picture a success, and became thoroughly engrossed in his work. That was what puzzled Mrs. Miller; she was pleased that he should prove so devoted to his art, yet she would have preferred to see him somewhat less attentive on this occasion and more devoted to his model. However, that would come when they were alone!

When she left them to themselves, however, the position did not change in the least; they chatted on a variety of subjects, just as mere acquaintances, but there was nothing that bore even the most remote resemblance to a love passage. Susan Miller began to repent having gone so far into this deception, but afterwards she took a real interest in the painting, and was anxious that it should turn out well.

One day the everyday topics of conversation failed, and the subject turned on marriage without either of them being conscious of the manner in which the turn had been given to it.

"I really think that artists ought not to get married," said Ralph decidedly. "It seems to me that a man cannot devote himself to his art if he has a wife who requires his attention! And a wife usually requires too much of his attention to permit him to give proper time to his vocation in life."

"Men are tyrants, and that is what you mean to say of women, Mr. Overend," observed Susan, with a laugh. "As soon as a man is married, he imagines that he has a slave to order about. I have always displeased my mother by my inclination to remain free, as I call it. I prefer liberty to slavery. One of our modern writers has said that marriage is the hardest profession that a woman can enter, and I agree with her."

"I should never give up my art for a woman!" he said, with an air of determination. "Oh, yes, I know that others have made that assertion and have conveniently forgotten it when it suited them to do so! But I fail to see what inducement there is for a man to marry when he has a profession such as mine. If he be merely engaged, now, in a commercial calling, why, he wants some other attraction, but an artist! You, however, will alter your opinions on the subject before many years have passed. You will think of yourself as an older woman, when Nature has followed its usual course with those you hold dear, and you are left alone."

"Oh, I shall not be alone!" cried Susan lightly. "Of course I shall have my occupations, and I shall have pets, and——"

"I beg pardon!" interrupted Ralph, with assumed gravity. "I forgot the cat!"

Then they both laughed merrily. Mrs. Miller would have been much disturbed in her ideas regarding the progress of the courtship had she been present then; there was nothing more free from the cares of love-making than that laugh.

Another week passed, during which the picture assumed a more and more completed appearance until completion was actually reached. The sittings were over; and Mrs. Miller would soon have to be told that they had come to nothing from a matrimonial point of view.

"It was rather too bad!" murmured Susan, "and I would not have kept up the farce so long if I hadn't promised to sit till the picture was completed. I couldn't go back on my word! That wouldn't be like an 'English Maiden.' By the way, I think he ought to call it 'A British Maiden.' But I suppose he cannot, since the type varies in each country."

Mrs. Miller was loud in her praises of the painting.

"It isn't quite a portrait. I admit that you have improved somewhat on the original," she remarked impartially. "It ought to gain a prize!"

"I demur to the statement that I have made any improvement," said Overend. "If it is only a faithful reproduction, then it must gain a prize!"

"You must say good-bye to the painting, Miss Miller," said Overend on the following day. "I must take it away to-day in order to have it packed in my studio, under my own care, for transmission to Paris."

Susan Miller turned with a light heart to the picture and took a last long gaze at it. Somehow, it seemed different. What was it that sent a throb through her frame and caused that strange look to appear in her lovely eyes. She dropped the cloth over it and turned away.

"I hope you will be rewarded for your preseverance and talent, Mr. Overend. Pack it securely, please! It would be too dreadful if it were to be injured in transit!"

"Dreadful!" exclaimed Overend alarmed. "I'll see that every care is taken, Miss Miller."

Any one who had heard him tell Susan that he had left the painting in her possession till the last minute would have been surprised to see him sitting in front of it and making no preparation for packing. He was gazing at it, yet away from it. His eyes were upon the picture, but his thoughts were round the corner. The sittings were over and the pleasant hours spent with Susie Miller were gone, never to return. Never! He shuddered at the word. He realised now that he had grown to love her; all his talk about art being sufficient was vain. He was no different from others, and he owned it manfully, at the same time calling himself an idiot for having said so. Art is not sufficient; a woman does not spoil a man's career, his chance of developing the talent within him; she helps him if she is a true woman. She brings out all the good that is in him and ennobles his ideas. How could he get off without a true wife? It seemed an impossibility now!

Digitized by Google

"But there is no hope of winning her!" he groaned. "A woman is more impressionable than a man, and she would have shown her feelings in some slight way if she had been in love with me, or even if she had merely thought she might like me. I don't believe she could have helped showing it, somehow! And I really think that a woman sticks to her opinions faster than a man!"

For another half-hour he stared at the picture.

"I can't part with that!" he decided. "So that settles it. I am not going to run the risk of having that damaged in transit if I can't have the original. I simply can't part with it, putting aside the question of damage. What am I to do when I sit down to work if I haven't that picture to look at now and then to encourage me? It isn't going to the Salon, no matter what I lose by it!"

He rammed some tobacco fiercely into the bowl of his pipe, but stopped in the act of lighting it.

"What on earth am I to tell her when she asks about it? That's awkward. Shall I see her again, to speak to? H'm, perhaps not, after her mother finds out that it was a put-up job. So I shall not speak to her again, eh?"

He laid down his pipe and thrust his hands deep into the pockets of his jacket. He strode up and down the room in deep thought for several minutes.

"I can't stand it! I'll see about it at once!" he cried aloud, and he clapped his hat on his head and went round the corner.

"Has the picture gone, Mr. Overend?" asked Susan.

"No, it hasn't."

"But you will be too late!" exclaimed Susan in dismay. "You have hardly time to get it off. What have you been doing?"

"Thinking!" returned Overend lucidly. "And I've decided that I won't let that picture go out of my studio unless I can have the original in its place! There!"

"But you can't put me on an easel, you know!" said Susan, with an attempt at playfulness which was spoilt by the quiver in her voice and the extreme pallor that overspread her face.

"I want you for my wife! I love you, Susie, I love you! Will you come to me?"

"You said that you were wedded to your art!" protested Susan, her cheeks glowing like burning coals now, and her eyes sparkling with a strange light.

"And you spoke of men being tyrants!" he retorted. "Come, own up, just as I do. I was wrong—and you?"

"I think I'll chance the tyranny!" she replied, with a laugh that was nearly a cry. Her heart was full of happiness. Like him, she had learnt the true state of her feelings when she realised that the sittings were over.

Mrs. Miller smiled meaningly when she was informed of the engagement.

"It began rather unconventionally," she remarked, in blissful ignorance of the real facts, "and you have been rather longer than I anticipated in arriving at a result, but all's well that ends well, and I am very glad."

"So are we!" exclaimed Ralph joyously, while Susie blushed.

G. E. Lingen.

TO THOSE WHO WRITE.

A Prize of One Guinea will be paid every week by the Editor for the best short story sent in by any of his readers. Contributions should not be less than 1,500 words in length, and not more than 3,000. The Editor reserves to himself the right to publish any contribution submitted. Stamped addressed envelopes must be enclosed for the return of the stories, but, while every care will be taken, the Editor cannot hold himself responsible for possible loss of MSS.

Your Editor Chats.

This week readers will notice that I have introduced a new feature into Short Stories. It is one which I feel sure will commend itself to everybody, and will prove useful as well as interesting. The column is conducted by an expert, whose services have been secured at great expense. This expense, however, will have been well laid out if every reader of Short Stories will call the attention of his or her friends to the information contained under the date of their birthday.

Surely, for example, you know some friend whose birthday occurs between July 22nd and July 28th? If so, just send them this copy of Short Stories and mark the information contained under the date. This column will appear every week in future.

On page 117 you will notice that I have renewed the great "Pass-It-Along" offer. It is early yet, of course, to tell how the scheme has been taken up by my readers, but I trust that all who entered the first competition will enter the lists again this week, for there is not the slightest reason why you should not win one of the handsome prizes twice running, and indeed, as many times as this unique offer is renewed. Your friends, too, by now probably will have entered into the spirit of the scheme, and will be only too willing to help you again, this time with more speed, so that both you and they stand a better chance of success.

And now I have another big surprise for you. At great expense and not a little trouble I have secured for subsequent covers of Short Stories several artistic designs, embodying the tartan plaids of the principal clans of Scotland.

These will be reproduced in their correct colours, and besides forming an excellent cover for the current issue of your little paper, will be well worth keeping. A correspondent who told me some few weeks back that she was preserving her covers and pasting them on to a large screen for decorative purposes, will find these tartan covers a distinctly advantageous addition to her collection. I hope to be able to use the first of these covers with next Tuesday's issue. As I am having a handsome poster of this design circulated all over the country, and as the "Pass-It-Along" scheme will be bringing in many new subscribers, it will be well for my regular readers to order their copies a few days beforehand.

For This Week's Competition I want you to construct a sentence containing only words of three letters. The reader who sends me in the longest and most sensible sentence under these conditions will be presented with a handsome and massive silver pencil-case. Ten consolation prizes of rolled gold hearts and rolled gold charms will be given to those readers whose efforts come next. As before, postcards only should be used, and they should be marked "Three Letters," and addressed to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C. Competition closes on July 29th.

Below I give the result of the "Word" competition. The first prize of a solid silver pencil-case goes to P. C. Leggett, 69 North Street, Sudbury, while the ten consolation prizes go to the following competitors:—A. G. Seaward, 22 Daniels Road, Nunhead; T. Allison, 18 Fleet Street, Gorton, Manchester; E. Bulleid, 60 Sherrard Road, Forest Gate; Violet Robinson, 60 Sherrard Road, Forest Gate; Mrs. Faid, Town Hall, Sunderland; A. G. Boll, 18 Double Row, Bate's Cottages, Seaton Delaval; W. Shackleton, Victoria Road, Cowling, Yorks; H. S. Parsley, 20 Grosvenor Road, Canton, Cardiff; Annie L. Nicoll, 39 Strathmartine Road, Dundee; J. Taylor, 127 Revidge Road, Blackburn.

Digitized by Google

THOUGH, perhaps, it isn't altogether fair to tell the story, yet it is really quite too good to keep.

Besides, its recital at this time is particularly à propos.

She came from Devonshire—just where, I did not learn. Two things attracted my attention to her. In the first place, she was extremely lovely, and the man who cannot appreciate a woman's attractiveness is not much of a man.

Her hair wasn't like "spun gold," but it was a beautiful burnished brown and when the sun caught its wavelets the effect was all the more alluring.

Her eyes were big, brown and bright. They beamed with intelligence and goodness. They reminded me of Whittier's couplet:

How brilliant and mirthful the light of her eye,
Like a star glancing out from the blue of the sky.

He was rather an indifferent young man so far as good looks went, but I suppose what he lacked in that respect he made up in brains.

They stood on the pavement of a crowded London thoroughfare, waiting for a 'bus.

"Oh, Henry, here comes our 'bus now," she said in tremulous, but very sweet tones.

Henry knew it. He wasn't blind to that fact. Yet he was blind to the fact that several interested people lounged by and too eagerly drank in the conversation of the couple.

"Let it come; there are others," he replied somewhat recklessly.

"Why, Henry, you are using slang," she murmured, turning a pair of mildly shocked eyes upon him.

"By no means," he hastened to reply. "Intone the last clause of the sentence in the sense that I meant it, and you will see that you have erred."

Her lips moved; she was repeating the sentence. Then she smiled brightly.

"You are quite right," said she.

"I thought you would think so," he smiled back. "Do you know that I have something to say to you, Helen?"

The rich, warm colour that had suffused her velvety cheeks fled for an instant and then rushed back again.

"Indeed?"

There was a little pathetic quaver in her voice.

"Yes. Can't you guess?"

She shook her head negatively.

"No," she faltered.

"I—I——"

"Paper, sir?"

"Yes, yes; give me half a dozen."

"Henry," she said a moment later, somewhat reproachfully, "we really must take this 'bus. Papa and mamma are waiting for us."

"We'll take the next one," he answered desperately. "On an omnibus I should have no opportunity to—to—and besides, when we get home your father and mother, for the time being, will effectually exclude every possibility of——"

"Oh, Henry," she cried agitatedly.

"It's true," he said, in a tense voice. "You know, Helen," he went on hurriedly, "that ever since I can remember I have at all times expressed a most fervent——"

"Henry, if we don't take this 'bus now, mamma will never forgive me. You know that I promised to be with her at 4.30."

"Fervent—fervent. Ah, yes, Helen, a most fervent fervency. No, I don't mean that, dear. I meant I have expressed at all times a most intense love for you. Your beauty, goodness, grace—yourself in its entirety—all have buoyed me up with constant hope. My love for you has been the one bright guiding star of my life. Helen, without you——"

"Oh, Henry," she murmured, undecided whether to cry or smile and half doing both, "how can—can—we miss that 'bus. Just think—"

"Yes, just think," he said excitedly, "just think how overpowering my love for you is! Without you I wouldn't care to live."

"Jove, he's got it bad," said one of the loungers sotto voce to his companion.

"He's having a struggle with himself," said the other. But Henry heard them not.

"I have tried in vain to tell you how much I loved you ever since we came to London," Henry continued.

The ordeal was having a disastrous effect upon him. He was getting warmer and warmer every minute, and the starch in his collar was disappearing like ice under the rays of a hot sun.

Helen evidently began to pity him. A tender look crept into her eyes.

"Poor boy!" she murmured. "And do you love me so much?"

"I couldn't tell you in a thousand years how much I love you, dear Helen," he vowed.

"If your love for me is not a passing fancy——"

"Passing fancy! My stars, it's cast iron reality. I can't forget you. Will you be my wife, Helen? Tell me now or never, Helen."

He was very much agitated now, and he looked it.

"If I give you an answer, will you promise me to take the next 'bus?"

"Yes, a million of them."

"Well, my answer is——"

She leant forward and whispered something into his ear. I did not learn what it was, but it made Henry the happiest man in all London at that particular moment.

He almost broke into a cheer.

No doubt he wanted to hug and kiss her then and there.

A moment later he helped her on to the 'bus, and they were whisked away.

A. J. Meister.

If a burnt child dreads the fire, why does a person who has been singed by Cupid's torch so often have a lingering regard for the old flame?

She: "Why, I'm not ready to marry, Mr. Freshman." He: "Will you let me know when you are?" "Certainly, sir. I'll send you a wedding-card."

She (sternly): "What was that noise I heard in the hall early this morning when you came in?" He (hastily): "It must have been the day breaking, my darling."

". . . I'm so happy," she said. . . . "Ever since my engagement to Charlie the whole world seems different. I do not seem to be in dull, prosaic London, but in——" "Lapland," suggested the small brother.

She: "Papa says that when coming to see me you must not come in a 'bus any more." He: "Really! Does he expect me to walk all this distance?" She: "Of course not. He says all he asks is that you will come in a carriage, hired by the hour."

Digitized by Google

START TO-DAY.

The Great "Pass-It-Along" Scheme.

FIRST AWARD, £10. SECOND AWARD, £5. THIRD AWARD, £2.

SIX AWARDS OF 10/- EACH.

(A)

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE COMPETITOR WHO SENDS THIS COPY.

When you have carefully read these rules, put an ink line round the instructions in the next column, write your name and address in the space at the foot of this page*, and in the next column; wrap up this copy of SHORT STORIES in a wrapper, fix a penny stamp on it, and post it to a friend of yours whom you think will help you. Then wait until the copy is returned to you.

All you need do is to send out your copy or copies of SHORT STORIES and wait until they come back to you with the names filled in.

The first prize will be awarded to the person whose copies of SHORT STORIES contain the greatest number of names of people to whom the copies have been sent, provided that the wrappers which carried the copies of SHORT STORIES through the post to each person accompany the list.

It is not necessary for you to know the people whose names you will find on your list when your copy comes back; they will, of course, be the friends of your friends.

There is no absolute necessity to write a letter to your friend explaining the scheme, but if you did so it would carry more weight.

HOW TO SEND IN.

Keep the wrappers as they are sent to you, and when this copy comes back send all the wrappers, together with this copy, to the Editor of "Short Stories," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., in an envelope marked "PASS-IT-ALONG," to arrive not later than Thursday, August 7th.

NOTE.—Competitors may send out at the same time any number of copies of this issue.

The Editor's decision is final, and readers may enter only on this understanding.

(B)

INSTRUCTIONS TO THOSE WHO RECEIVE THIS COPY BY POST.

This copy of SHORT STORIES has been sent to you by a friend who is interested in this competition and who wants to win one of the prizes offered. When you have read this announcement write your name down in the space provided, and then forward this copy at once in a penny wrapper to a friend of yours. If you have no friend to whom you can send it, return the copy of the paper, together with the wrapper in which you received it, to the original sender.

If the original sender of this paper (whose name and address is written at the foot of this page) wins the first prize, you will receive £1; if second prize, you will get 10s. The paper must be returned to the original sender on or before Saturday, August 2nd.

You must at once return the wrapper in which this copy reaches you to _____

_____

(Competitor must insert here his or her name and address.)

IMPORTANT.

Fill in your name at once and post it on the day this is received. If you keep it longer it will lessen the chance of the original sender securing the first prize, as the paper will not be able to get into so many hands within the time limit.

If you receive this copy on Saturday, August 2nd, fill up your name and post it at once to the sender, whose name appears at the foot of this page.

Why Not Try Yourself?

If you want to enter for this competition yourself, and win one of the prizes, get a copy of SHORT STORIES from your newsagent at once, and follow the instructions marked "A."

This offer will be repeated in SHORT STORIES for August 9th. (the next number but one), when another £20 will be offered in awards.

Those to whom this copy is sent sign here.

	NAME.	ADDRESS.
1.
2.
3.
4.
5.
6.
7.
8.
9.
10.
11.
12.

Those who sign here will get £1 each if this wins first award.

*Name and Address of Competitor.....

Digitized by Google

Brothers in Misfortune.

"Yes," boasted an Englishman in the West, "I have Tudor blood in my veins from my mother's side of the family, and Plantagenet blood from my father's." "Is that so?" said a citizen. "My blood is a little mixed too. My grandfather was a Jersey tenderfoot, an' my grandmother a Digger Indian squaw. We're both half-breeds, stranger. Shake!"

Her Transient Glory.

Jack: "What colour would you call Miss Flitt's hair?" Jess: "Now, really, I haven't seen her for a week or two."

A Distinct Advantage.

She (haughtily): "I beg your pardon, sir; you have the advantage of me." He (jauntily): "I should say I had. I am the fellow you jilted ten years ago."

Too Quiet.

Lady Visitor: "That new girl of yours seems very nice and quiet." Mistress of the House: "Yes, she's very quiet. She doesn't even disturb the dust when she's cleaning the room."

Laid up for Repairs.

His Mother: "What are you moping about the house for, Tommy? Why don't you go over and play with Charley Pinafore?" Tommy: "'Cause I played with Charley Pinafore yesterday, and I don't s'pose he's well enough yet."

The Terrors of Pride.

Mrs. Vokes: "Mrs. Crummer has a terrible cold just now." Mrs. Gilleland: "How did she get it?" Mrs. Vokes: "By wearing a fur-lined jacket." Mrs. Gilleland: "Impossible!" Mrs. Vokes: "Not at all. She had to wear it open so that people could see the lining."

Always Early Now.

A woman cured her husband of staying out late at night by going to the door when he came home, and whispering through the keyhole: "Is that you, Willie?" Her husband's name is John, and he stays at home every night now, and sleeps with one eye open, and a revolver under his pillow.

Extremes.

Agent: "What was the matter with your last place?" Domestic: "The couple had only been married a month, and I couldn't stand the love-making." Agent: "Well, here's a chance in a house where the couple have been married ten years." Domestic: "That's too long; I like quiet and peace."

She Soon Learnt French.

Lady (to a French governess): "I am shocked to find that my daughter has been receiving letters in French from a young man." Governess: "Pardon, madame, it is only my little ruse to cheat mam'selle into study. When she would reply to an unknown lover—a Frenchman—how quickly she will learn my language!"

A Sufficient Testimonial.

Cook (just leaving): "I should like to ask you for a written character." "Why, what am I to write, you idle, good-for-nothing creature? You surely don't expect me to say you gave satisfaction?" Cook: "You need do nothing of the kind. Just say that I stayed with you three months; that would be the best character you could give me. Every missus in the place knows you."

Know what it Means.

Inquiring Child: "Papa, why do people cry at weddings?" Papa (abstractedly): "Most of 'em have been married themselves."

A True Aim.

Mistress: "How is it I saw a soldier hugging you in the kitchen last night?" Maid: "I don't know, ma'am, unless you were peeping through the keyhole."

More Convenient.

Harry: "When I get to be a man I'm going to let my whiskers grow." Mamma: "Why so, my boy?" Harry: "Then I won't have only a little bit of my face to wash."

Spoilt.

Loving Wife: "You do love me, don't you, Frank?" Fond Husband: "Love you? Why, I believe that I would be ass enough to marry you a second time if I had the chance."

Wherein it Lies.

A man never realises the superiority of woman so much as when he is sewing on a button without a thimble, pushing the needle through one half of the way, and pulling it through the other half by hanging on to it with his teeth.

Quite Safe.

Friend (after dinner): "Your little wife is a brilliantly handsome woman. I should think you'd be jealous of her." Host (confidently): "To tell the truth, Simpkins, I am. I never invite anybody here that any sane woman would take a fancy to."

Thrice Spoken.

Florence: "That Miss Howard must be very popular. She said she had three proposals in one evening." Bertha: "That's just one of her tricks. I'll bet that it was that stuttering Tom Burton, and he always says everything over three times."

Art Realism.

Little Visitor (pointing to a large oil-painting): "Whose picture is that?" Little Hostess: "She was my mamma's great aunt. I never heard much about her, but I think she was a school-teacher." "Why?" "See how her eyes follow us about."

A Complexion Improver.

Mrs. Earlybird: "This is a pretty state of things. Here I have to get up at three o'clock in the morning to let you in." Mr. Earlybird: "All on your account, my dear. I read in a paper the other day that nothing improves a woman's complexion so much as early rising."

Wouldn't Harmonise.

"My dear, don't you intend to invite Mr. and Mrs. Green to your party?" asked Mr. Biller. "Certainly not." "Why not, my dear? They are good friends of ours." "What if they are? I am going to invite Mr. and Mrs. Brown." "Well, can't you invite the Greens as well?" "Why, John Biller, you shock me with your taste. Brown and Green in my parlour together! Why, next you'll be asking me to wear blue and yellow. I declare you men have no idea whatever of harmony."

Preparations.

Petted Daughter: "Papa, what has come over you? I never had a wish you were not anxious to gratify, and you even anticipated my wants, and handed me money for all sorts of things I hadn't even thought of. But now I have to ask you for every penny I need, and you growl and grumble, and ask if I think you are made of money, and you rail at women's extravagance and invariably ask me what on earth I did with the last cheque, or sovereign, or half-crown you gave me. Don't you love me any more?" Papa: "My darling. I love you as much as ever, but you are soon to be married, and I am trying to gradually prepare you for the change."

Digitized by Google

OUR THRILLING NEW SERIAL.

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

By HENRY FARMER.

The Thread of the Story.

A BELT full of diamonds has been stolen from a safe belonging to Mr. Mansfield, a wealthy banker, by Seaton Revelle (who is a friend of the banker's) and an accomplice named Benjamin Beard. Revelle accuses Alec Scarsdale, who is in love with Esther, Mr. Mansfield's daughter, of the crime, and he is sentenced to sixteen years' penal servitude.

Mr. Crump, late Chief-Inspector at Scotland Yard, feeling sure Scarsdale is innocent and Revelle is guilty, determines to prove the latter's guilt.

Mr. Mansfield as fully believes in Scarsdale's guilt as does Esther in his innocence, and his friendship for Revelle increases. Revelle constantly visits the banker's house in an endeavour to win Esther's love, but so far has not prospered at all. While talking with the girl one day, Mr. Mansfield's new maid, Vance, enters the room with a tray bearing cups of coffee. No sooner does she catch sight of Revelle than she drops the tray, and, pointing to Revelle, screams: "That—that man is my husband!" But Revelle, by sheer force of will, compels her to acknowledge her mistake.

At about this time Esther and Mr. Crump are walking together when they observe Vance about to throw herself into the reservoir. Crump stops her just in time—he and Esther taking her back to The Woodlands. Later on she is placed in the county asylum.

In the meanwhile Scarsdale manages to pass through several letters to Esther to which he receives replies full of hope and affection. On account of an assault upon a brutal warder, however, he is to be removed to Wrackam Convict Prison, an establishment famous for its hard discipline.

A charity concert is now announced, in which both Esther and Benny are billed to take part. Revelle, of course, is present; so also is Mr. Crump. It is while returning from this concert that Revelle proposes to Esther but is refused.

The great balloon incident now approaches. There is to be a grand fête in Lord Normanhurst's grounds, the chief and closing event being a balloon ascent by Mr. Seaton Revelle. Everything goes well till two horsemen arrive with the news that Vance has escaped from the asylum.

Acting upon Crump's advice they go straight to the reservoir, but fail to find the missing girl. The search is given up at nightfall. Shortly before nightfall Revelle makes his ascent. A storm, however, compels him to come down, the anchor touching ground on a neighbouring common just where Vance is waiting for him. The girl clings on to the anchor, and Revelle, quickly making a terrible resolve, throws out a number of sandbags, and the balloon again rises and continues its flight till Warham reservoir is reached. Just as the balloon is passing over the water Revelle cuts the anchor rope.

Vance's dead body is found next morning, Mr. Crump being informed of the discovery while walking with Esther.

Mr. Crump examines the body and finds that a leg is broken, evidently by a fall. The coroner's jury return a verdict of "Found drowned."

Mr. Mansfield thinks it best that Esther shall leave Warham for a little holiday. It is while changing at Roxeter Junction en route for Gurlston Bay that Fate brings about a meeting between Esther and Alec, who is on his way to Wrackam. An impassioned scene takes place on the platform. Arrived at Wrackam Prison, Scarsdale suddenly recognises one of the warders.

A FAMILIAR FACE.

FOR a second, warder and convict stared at one another without speaking. The recognition was mutual. The last time Alec Scarsdale had seen the man he was wearing the uniform, not of an assistant warder, but of a police-constable—he was one of the two men who had arrested him on that fatal night when John Mansfield's house had been robbed.

The warder was the first to break the silence. With a jarring laugh he turned to the other warder, and pointed at Scarsdale.

"An old acquaintance," he said; "before I left the force I had the honour of running him in. Well, I'm blessed! Who'd have thought that Number 35 should turn out to be Mr. Scarsdale—that was!"

Unfortunately for Scarsdale, the man, like the late assistant-warder Pettigrew, was a bully, and he had it in his power to inflict misery on him, in that he was familiar with the details of his past life.

The hot blood rushed to Scarsdale's face. The sight of the man had recalled the past with a merciless vividness—that horrible night when that nightmare of an accusation had been hurled in his teeth.

"I often get news from Warham," went on assistant-warder Belton, "I've one or two friends there who keep me well supplied with information. Out of sight, they say, out of mind!"

Scarsdale understood the insinuation, but he did not stir, did not speak. He had made up his mind, however great the provocation might be, to endure in silence. He was dominated by one thought—to pass through the remaining period of Special Orders without a breach of prison discipline. A breach of discipline, however slight, might mean the imposition of another six months of Special Orders. He felt that such another period would be more than he could bear; that it would break him, bodily and mentally. Even under ordinary circumstances he knew how slender were the chances of escape. Under Special Orders there were none!

The days that followed were little less than a continuous duel between warder and convict. Assistant-warder Belton seldom entered the cell without making some reference to the past. It was during this time that the real heroism of Scarsdale's nature shone out, for there is more heroism in restraint than in aggression. But the strain was terrible. Again and again he prayed for strength to endure. He kept a reckoning on his prison slate of the days that yet remained to be spent under Special Orders. Every evening, just before the lights went out, he ticked off a day, and thanked God that he had passed through it clear of report, then prayed that the future day might be as the last. The strain showed itself in a newly-developed nervousness. Sometimes he would wake in the silent watches of the night, bathed in a cold sweat, and feverishly tick off on his fingers the days that yet remained!

Digitized by Google

OUR THRILLING SERIAL. YOU CAN BEGIN TO-DAY.

One morning, when Belton entered his cell, there was a peculiar look of triumph on his coarse features. Scarsdale stood erect at attention, his hands by his sides, the correct attitude of a prisoner in the presence of a warder. Belton glanced round the cell in the hope of being able to find fault. But everything was in perfect order—tins and utensils polished and shining like silver, the bedding carefully and neatly rolled up. Belton advanced a step, and stood immediately in front of Scarsdale.

"I've heard a bit of news to-day, 35," he said slowly, "that ought to interest you. It's come from a part of the world that used to be well acquainted with you!"

He paused for a moment as if expecting Scarsdale to speak, but he remained motionless, though his lips and fingers were twitching. Only those who have experienced the isolation of convict life can realise how a prisoner craves for news of the outside world.

"It's from a friend of mine that lives at Warham. It's a piece of news that will be sure to interest you!"

Warham! Instinctively Scarsdale thought of Esther. Was it something about her?

He knew that the man who stood before him, a malicious grin on his features, was capable of doing anything to torture him. He took a backward step, then steadied himself. The sickening thought that perhaps Esther was ill, or something had happened to her, had flashed across his mind. The thought loosened his tongue.

"What is it?" he gasped. "Bad news?"

"Oh, dear no! Good news. It's about Miss Mansfield!"

The man's coarse, jeering tones maddened him. The old light flashed from his eyes; then, with an effort, he steadied himself.

"Is she well?" he gasped, almost inaudibly.

"Well, yes, of course she's well, and so she ought to be, seeing that she's gone and got engaged to be married!"

Belton's face lit up with a cruel grin of triumph. He had got home at last.

Scarsdale reeled back like a man who had been dealt a stunning blow, and leant against the wall, staring wildly before him.

Esther, the woman whom he loved with all his heart and soul; the woman in whom his belief was infinite, Esther who, but a brief while ago, had whispered to him as he held her in his arms, "Till death!" No, no! It was all a lie; a cruel, torturing lie. He would stake his soul upon that. And yet——

"Yes," went on Belton remorselessly, "and the happy man's Mr. Seaton Revelle. The engagement's the talk of Warham!"

A mist had formed in front of Scarsdale's eyes. The cell seemed to be whirling round him. Seaton Revelle—the hound who had marred his life! The very mention of his name with Esther's seemed to contaminate it!

Belton was fairly satisfied, but Scarsdale was not thinking of him now; he was thinking, in a confused sort of way, of Esther, imagining Revelle beside her, whispering in her ear, perhaps persecuting her. He did not hear the cell door slam to. He covered his face with his hands. At that moment, had the Prince of Darkness been at his elbow to barter with him, he would have sold his soul for freedom!

"Till death!"

The whispered words were ringing in his ears again! If it were true, if so soon Esther had forgotten him, then the world was a lie; life was a lie; Heaven was a lie! Calumny, rumour might assail his belief in the woman he loved, they could not shake it! The belief that had helped him to endure the tortures of imprisonment, of the punishment-cell, was strong within him still.

But—oh, to be free now! Like a caged animal he paced the cell. His belief in Esther was untouched, unscarred by doubt, but to think of that hound beside her, perhaps persecuting her, a man of vice, capable of robbing a man of his freedom, a woman of her honour—to be beside her too, to protect her! That was why he clamoured for freedom!

The thought of escape literally predominated him. If only he could see Esther for a day, for an hour, they might take him back then.

Escape! Again as he'd done so often before, he clambered up to the barred window.

Never had the yearning for freedom been so great, so terribly intense as it was at that moment!

WHAT CRUMP FOUND ON THE COMMON.

"Found drowned!"

The inquest on Alice Vance, formerly parlour maid in the service of John Mansfield, Esquire, and a late inmate of the county lunatic asylum, was over. An open verdict had been returned on the same day that Esther Mansfield left Warham with her father for Gurlston Bay—the day of her meeting with Alec Scarsdale at Roxeter Junction. It had been unnecessary to summon the banker as a witness.

Groups of whispering men and women clustered outside the Crown and Cushion, where the inquest had been held. To some it was as clear as a pikestaff. Though there was nothing to show how the poor woman found her way into the water, she had evidently taken her own life. Others shook their heads. There was an element of mystery about the sad business. The doctor, in giving his evidence, had made the rather startling statement that one of the woman's legs was broken. Had she fallen in the dark, and broken it as she made her way to the water? Had she, despite the injury, managed to reach the edge? Yet, even if this were the case, how was it that she was found so far from the bank? Some said that the craving to live must have seized her after she had reached the water; that, for all the broken limb, she must have made a desperate bid for life in the dark! The coroner himself had advised an open verdict. There was no direct evidence of foul play; but it was mysterious, very mysterious!

Crump had ultimately decided not to attend the inquest; but he was represented by Tom Jackson and Fred Wilton. It was always the little man's policy to keep himself in the background as much as possible. It was at the Crown and Cushion, close upon a year ago, that his real identity had been betrayed, and though since then he had made a considerable alteration in his personal appearance, he deemed it advisable to be on the safe side. Moreover, it was quite likely that Railton, otherwise Tomlinson, might be present. He felt that he could rely on his representatives to bring him a very accurate account of the proceedings. On the previous afternoon he had paid a visit to the reservoir. The place was deserted, and he had spent some time there. He had made a very careful examination of the bank from which it was supposed that Vance must have entered the water, and had jotted down one or two notes on the back of an envelope.

"I shall miss her very much," the little man said to himself, thinking of Esther, as smoking his pipe he leant over the rails outside Woodbine Cottage, "but I'm very glad to think that the dear young lady is well out of the place!"

He was staring in front of him very thoughtfully when Pollie issued out of the cottage, and, creeping up behind him, plucked his coat tails.

He turned, and a kindly smile chased away the shadow that was on the homely face.

"Well, Pollie, what is it?"

"Oh, Mr. Penworthy, are you very busy to-day? 'Cos if you wasn't, I should like to take you for a walk on the common!"

The little man chuckled, amused at the child's old-fashioned manner.

"That's very nice of you, Pollie. Nothing that I should enjoy more; but I'm afraid that I couldn't come just now, as I'm expecting someone; but—well, I ought to be working this afternoon; but suppose I don't! Suppose we get grand.

Digitized by Google

mother to pack one or two things in a basket for us, and you and I, Pollie, will have a quiet little picnic on the common—just our two selves, eh? How does that strike you?"

Pollie clapped her hands with glee.

"Oh, lovely! And I'll go and ask grandmother at once!"

The child scampered back to the cottage.

"It'll do me good!" said the little man. "I'm feeling altogether depressed. This poor woman's death has upset me very much. It is extraordinarily mysterious. Of course, even if proof were to hand that Mr. Seaton Revelle was Jim—and I have very little doubt in my own mind on that matter—he would be able to prove an alibi. He was either actually up in the balloon at the time that the poor woman met her death, or at Ocklington, where he came to ground, and stayed at the inn there. That is what he would say! But does it follow that because he ascended from the Tower grounds and descended at Ocklington that he was in the air the whole of the intervening time? Might he not have descended somewhere under cover of darkness? There was a general impression among the people in the grounds that he intended, if possible, to descend on the common. Of course, the aeronaut is largely at the mercy of the currents. It is frequently a case of a man proposing and the wind disposing. Unfortunately I know about as much as Pollie does about balloons; but, provided he was well supplied with ballast, I take it that by getting rid of ballast, he could atone, as it were, for the loss of gas entailed in coming to ground, and rise again. Therefore—I don't say that it happened—there is nothing impossible in the theory that he might have descended somewhere!"

The little man shifted his pipe from one corner of his mouth to the other. The puzzled expression, that, since the grim discovery of the previous morning, had frequently shown itself, was again upon his features.

"You may call it absurd, my dear fellow," he said, mentally addressing an imaginary person, "but to me, bearing in mind the poor creature's broken limb, her distance from the bank, and the fact that there was a stretch of deep water in between her and the shallow water in which she was found, to me it looks almost as if she might have been dropped into the water from a great height. Perhaps it is the height of absurdity to allow myself to entertain the idea for one moment; but I am at present suffering from balloons on the brain!"

At that moment Tom Jackson, in mufti, hove in sight. The little man's eyes brightened.

"Ah, Tom, my lad, is it all over?"

"Yes. A verdict of 'Found drowned!'"

Crump's keen little eyes were resting on a decided swelling on the young constable's forehead; then they noted that the knuckles of his left hand were cut.

"Fred couldn't come along with me," went on Jackson, "and I ought to have been here sooner."

"Tom, my lad," said Crump, "were the swelling on your forehead, and those cut knuckles obtained in the execution of your official duties?"

Jackson coloured up a little.

"Well, no! It was a little bit of private business. Do you know what they're saying in the village?"

"No."

"That Miss Esther's engaged to Seaton Revelle!"

Crump's mouth tightened up.

"And you, Tom, I take it, have been punching someone's head for making that statement!"

"No, not exactly; but the fellow who told me that, made a disrespectful remark about—about Miss Esther, and I asked him to come somewhere where it wasn't quite so public, and repeat the remark. And he did!"

"And I do hope, my lad," said Crump quickly, "that you gave him a downright good hiding?"

"Fairish!" said the young constable modestly, as he glanced down at his cut knuckles.

Crump beamed.

"I don't believe in excessive pugnacity, Tom; but there are times when a man is called upon either to give, or take, a good hiding. And I'm very glad to think that you did the giving, not the taking!" he patted him on the back. "Now tell me about the inquest!"

The little man listened most attentively to the account, and asked a number of questions.

"Mind you," said Jackson, "if it hadn't been for the coroner, I believe the jury would have brought it in suicide. There was some shaking of heads; but that's the opinion of most folk. And I suppose, now that it's all over, we shall hear no more about the matter!"

Crump did not answer. But he was not at all sure in his mind on that point.

"Any other news?" he questioned presently.

"I met Railton on my way up here. He again repeated his invitation to drop in and see him one evening at The Firs. He said that he could offer me a good cigar, and a really good drop of whisky! They generally can, these valets. Mr. Faversham, it seems, came a spill yesterday off his bicycle, and is altogether queer to-day. And Revelle told Railton that possibly he might be going away shortly."

"He didn't say where, did he, Tom?" questioned Crump sharply.

"No. Railton suggested that, if his master did go away, perhaps Fred and I might drop in one evening for a little supper, and a game of cards after!"

Tom Jackson winked.

"Both of us would only be too delighted, said I!"

"Revelle may be going away!" said Crump, half to himself, shaking his head. "I hope that he is not going to Gurlston Bay!"

"So as to be near Miss Mansfield?" said Tom quickly, and with a little tightening of his strong hands.

"I shouldn't be a bit surprised, Tom!"

"And she can't abide him!"

"But she is playing her part very bravely, and cleverly, and she is fighting for the man she loves. I hope sincerely that he is not going to Gurlston Bay, Tom. I have been congratulating myself that for a brief time at least she would be right away from everything calculated to recall painful memories."

"Jove!" whispered Jackson fiercely. "When I think of Mr. Alec, and of what's she's suffering, it makes me feel I'd like to have my fingers round the throat of that scoundrel at The Firs!"

"I should infinitely prefer——"

Crump stopped short.

"What?"

The little man shook his head. He had almost said—"I should infinitely prefer to put a rope round his neck!"

"Tom, I quite understand your feelings; but we must both of us take great care not to allow our personal bias to get the better of us. When we feel inclined to wring anybody's neck, let us think of Miss Mansfield, and the splendid example she is setting us. I regret to say that in my days of active service I came more than one most lamentable cropper through being mastered by my own personal feelings!"

The little man shook his head sorrowfully. His expression was suggestive of a man who had failed in his career. Tom Jackson smiled to himself; then, after some further conversation, returned to the village.

After meditating for some time, Crump returned to the cottage, and interviewed Mrs. Cobb on the subject of taking Pollie on to the common that afternoon. It was about three o'clock when they set out, Crump carrying a basket, and Pollie clinging on to his hand and chattering away happily. They made their way to the common through fields and by-paths.

"Enjoying yourself, Pollie?" asked Crump.

"Aren't I just!"

The little man stopped for a moment, and surveyed the wide stretch of common.

"Now where shall we camp? What about yonder?"

He pointed to a green hollow surrounded by gorse bushes.

"That'll do beautiful! And after we've had tea, you'll tell us all about the handsome prince and the beautiful princess, all over again, won't you?"

"Certainly I will!"

Reaching the spot, Pollie helped Crump to unpack the basket.

Digitized by Google

OUR THRILLING SERIAL. YOU CAN BEGIN TO-DAY.

Soon a small kettle was humming on a spirit lamp. A serviette outspread was the tablecloth.

"Now, Pollie," said the little man chuckling to himself, "you must be the hostess!"

There is no game dearer to the heart of a child than the game of "Pretend!" So Pollie pretended that she was a grand lady, and that Mr. Penworthy was a visitor who had called upon her, and whom she had invited to stay for afternoon tea.

"Only one lump of sugar, please, Lady Mary, I never take more! What a refreshing thing a cup of tea is, to be sure! And what a glorious place you have here!"

Crump had thoroughly entered into the spirit of the thing. He had assumed a perfect society manner, and was playing his part with an earnestness that gave a reality to the "Pretend." Pollie was in the seventh heaven of delight.

Tea over, he gravely asked Lady Mary's premission to smoke. And then Lady Mary, suddenly lapsing into Pollie again, suggested a game of hide-and-seek.

Crump having promised on his word of honour not to look, Pollie darted off to hide. It was quite remarkable what a long time it took the late Chief Inspector of Scotland Yard to find her.

But when he did find her, he found also something else.

A small torn fragment of dark material clinging on to a bramble. It was part of Crump's detective creed never to neglect trifles. Almost mechanically, with no particular object in view, he unhooked the stuff and examined the material.

His small, keen eyes brightened. It was a piece of coarse, dark blue serge.

When, on the previous morning, he had been alone in the shed where they had laid Alice Vance, he had taken note of the material of the poor creature's dress. It was a coarse, dark blue serge—the material of which the regulation asylum dress was made.

"Your turn to hide now," said Pollie, a little impatiently.

"One minute, Pollie dear," said the little man.

He gave a comprehensive glance round; then, taking out a pocket case, carefully folded up the piece of serge and put it away.

So Vance, at one time or another, had been on the common. The inmates of the asylum were not allowed beyond the grounds. It was not likely, therefore, that any other inmate but Vance had been there. The point could be conclusively settled by comparing the fragment with the dress worn by the poor woman. The fact that, at one time or another, she had been on the common, might not be of the slightest importance; yet, on the other hand, it might.

"Now, Pollie, it's my turn. Promise not to look!"

"I promise. I'll go behind that bush."

Pollie scampered off to a bush that was some little distance away.

"Now, no cheating," cried Crump.

"Wait a minute, Mr. Penworthy! Come and see what I've found! It's a bag of something. It's too heavy for me to lift!"

Crump hurried to the bush behind which Pollie was crouching.

On the ground lay a long, thinnish bag. Some sand lay sprinkled round on the turf.

Crump's eyes were twinkling like stars.

"Ballast!" he said to himself. "Balloon ballast, if I'm not very much mistaken! This is indeed interesting. The balloon carrying Mr. Seaton Revelle was at some time or another over this spot, quite close to where I have found a fragment that I firmly believe to have been torn from the dress of Alice Vance; but, of course, at present there's nothing to prove coincidence of time. Yet it is curious, very curious indeed!"

"But what is it?" questioned Pollie.

"A sand-bag, Pollie dear!"

"But," went on Pollie, with inquisitiveness so characteristic of children, "how did it come here, and what's it for?"

"I shouldn't be surprised if it hadn't dropped from the skies, Pollie."

"You're making fun of me," said Pollie, pouting her lips a little.

It was characteristic of Crump that, though at that moment the presence of Pollie hampered him somewhat, he showed no signs of impatience. His manner was kindliness itself. At the same time Pollie was a child, observant, and liable to prattle. He glanced at his watch. He would take Pollie back to the cottage, and return. He wished to investigate the neighbouring ground very thoroughly.

"Well, Pollie, if it didn't drop from the clouds, perhaps it fell from a cart or something. And now, my dear, I think perhaps we ought to be getting back."

He picked up the sand-bag and dropped it among the gorse, where it was hidden from view.

Pollie's lower lip fell.

"But you haven't hidden yet, and you've never told me the story of the Prince and the Princess."

Crump patted her cheek consolingly.

"Very well. I'll go and hide, and I'll tell you the story as we go home, how will that suit?"

The lower lip was braced up again, and the suspicion of tears vanished from the child's eyes.

So Crump concealed himself, and was ultimately found by Pollie, and on the way home told her, in his delightful way, the fairy tale.

And when they reached the cottage, Pollie said:

"Stoop down!"

He obeyed. Pollie put her arms round his neck, and gave him a great hug and a smacking kiss.

"'Cos it's been such a happy afternoon, and I've enjoyed myself so much!"

"Bless her dear little heart!" said Crump to himself as he made his way back to the common. "But I don't think she can have enjoyed the afternoon more than I have. Children always give me happiness. I love 'em!"

He gave a little sigh as he recalled a past memory—a memory of what might have been. He was not without his moments of loneliness. Then the lips tightened, and the wrinkles deepened round the small eyes. He was the detective again.

Reaching the spot where he had concealed the bag of ballast in the gorse, he took paper and pencil from his pocket, and, having consulted a small compass attached to his watch-chain, sketched with considerable accuracy a map of surroundings; then marked in two crosses, one where he had found the sand-bag, the other where he had found the fragment of dress. He jotted down the date. Then he proceeded to wander round in the near vicinity, his keen eyes glancing to right and left.

"Hullo," he said to himself presently, "who or what pulled up that bit of gorse by the roots?"

Quite a large bush lay at his feet.

"Might it not have been an anchor or such a grappling iron that is carried by a balloon. But be very careful, my good fellow! You've got an idea in your head. Beware of trying to shape your facts to fit the idea!"

He pulled out the pencilled map, and added another cross. He was moving on again.

"Hullo! Another sand-bag!"

Out came the map again. Another cross was made.

It was quite dark when Mr. Penworthy returned to Woodbine Cottage. Pollie was in bed, but Mrs. Cobb, hearing her lodger enter, stepped out of the kitchen.

"I just wanted to thank you, Mr. Penworthy, for the treat that you gave Pollie this afternoon. She's gone to bed over such a happy little girl. But I'm afraid you're spoiling her with kindness!"

"We're only children once in our lives, Mrs. Cobb," said the little man.

He was carrying two bags over his shoulders, evidently of considerable weight, for the perspiration was rolling down his face

Digitized by Google

"But, good gracious, Mr. Penworthy, what have you got there, to be sure?"

In private life Crump was the most truthful of men, but Crump, the detective, searching to find the truth, was frequently compelled to lie.

"Seeds, Mrs. Cobb, seeds! I'm so hot, not because they are extraordinarily heavy, but because I have carried them a longish way!"

And Crump carried his "seeds" into his sitting-room, and locked them away in a cupboard.

Presently he lighted his pipe and lapsed into a brown study.

"I can prove nothing at present," he said half aloud, "but it's beginning to look to me very much like——"

He pursed up his lips and stopped.

The word "murder" remained unspoken!

* * * * *

"Found drowned!" said Benny Beard as, looking very much out of sorts, and his head bandaged, he sat in the cosy little smoking-room at The Firs. "That was the verdict, Marquis!"

His voice was a little hushed, and his eyes watched Revelle rather uneasily.

The Marquis was leaning back in an easy-chair, watching the smoke ascend from his cigar.

"It should have been 'suicide'!" he said. "But, well, you know there's a prejudice about bringing in that verdict, and they avoid doing so whenever it's possible."

"Curious, though, that the poor creature's leg should have been broken."

Revelle fastened his eyes on his partner's face.

"Look here," he said, "suppose we drop the subject. It's not a pleasant, or a particularly cheering one!"

"Certainly, certainly!"

A silence followed. It was broken at last by Benny. He did not appear at all at his ease.

"I say, Marquis, this sort of life doesn't altogether suit me. Hobnobbing with dukes and duchesses is all very well for you, but it's a cut above me. And I tell you straight, I feel more of a cur than ever since Esther Mansfield behaved like a brick to me yesterday, after I had come that cropper. She's getting on my nerves more and more. It's no use you trying to kid me that she's forgotten him. She hasn't, in the least. Thank Heaven, she's gone away for a bit, and I shan't be meeting her, and feeling those dark eyes of hers on me. I believe she suspects us, I do, 'pon my soul. And—well, the long and short of it is that, if you've no objection, I shall be getting back to London shortly!"

"And what," said Revelle slowly, "about the Normanhurst business?"

"I'll stand out, if you don't mind. You're a host in yourself, Marquis; besides, you've got that inestimable jewel, Railton!"

There was rather a spiteful ring in the last words. Benny was decidedly jealous of Railton.

"Don't talk rot!" said Revelle sharply. "You're each invaluable in your respective ways. Your spill's shaken you. If you want a change, go to London by all means for a fortnight, but I shall expect you back. I'm off myself in a few days. This place is relaxing. I want a breath of sea air. The Normanhurst business can stand over till I get back, though funds are beginning to run precious low. There's going to be no standing out on your part, my dear Benny. Great Scott! You're not going to show the white feather at your time of life! Railton, yes! His nerve's gone—hasn't got the pluck of a mouse. But I didn't think it of you, Benny!"

Seaton Revelle had played the right card. Benny shuffled rather uncomfortably in his chair. He was a moral coward. He possessed a much weaker will than the man who sat opposite him, and at the same time he was hampered by his conscience.

"Come, Benny, we've gone too far along the road together to part company now."

"Very well, Marquis, but after we've brought off the

A Stylish Hat.

WHAT was considered to be a very stylish hat was worn at a recent wedding. It was a burnt straw trimmed with black velvet ribbon and clusters of white lilac. This happy combination always looks very becoming with a rosy, healthy complexion. Bile Beans for Biliousness provide the latter by removing all digestive troubles, and keeping the liver and kidneys in proper order. At the present season constipation, headache, lassitude, a desire to do nothing, and an all-round sense of depression and misery trouble many girls and women. This is the sign which the system gives of its requirements. It needs toning up and preparing for the coming summer. This work is done by Bile Beans more satisfactorily, speedily, and economically than by any other means; and in home remedies, as well as in dress, ease, efficiency, and economy should be considered.

SONGS COPIED

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page.

Mrs. CONYERS,
Morchard Bishop, Devon.

Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

OUR THRILLING SERIAL. YOU CAN BEGIN TO-DAY.

Normanhurst business, I shall clear out from here. The climate doesn't suit me, and if I lived a hundred years I shouldn't feel comfortable in Esther Mansfield's presence!"

Revelle stared up at the ceiling again.

"You don't think you'd care to come away with me, instead of going to town?"

"Have you made up your mind where you're going?"

"Well, yes! Gurlston Bay!"

Gurlston Bay, where Esther Mansfield was, where the white chalk cliffs rose up sheer from the sea, where the wonderful caves were, in which, years back, Crump had played at smugglers with a little boy and girl.

"No, thank you!" said Benny. "I'd rather not, if you don't mind. Some other time, perhaps. Marquis, you're about as clever as they make 'em; but you're making a big mistake where Esther Mansfield is concerned."

"Am I? I tell you what, Benny, I'm prepared to double that bet!"

A FAMILIAR VOICE AND FRAGMENTS OF A CONVERSATION.

What Esther had suffered during the journey from Roxeter Junction to Gurlston Bay—her father sitting silent, pitying her, yet his heart filled with a consuming rage towards the man who had brought so much misery into her life, his sense of decency outraged by what had taken place, the sight of his daughter in the arms of a convicted felon—what Esther suffered, God alone knew!

A carriage awaited them at Gurlston Bay Station, and they were welcomed by their host, Mr. Walters, a genial, old-fashioned gentleman. At Gurlston Hall, a fine house, set in a wooded estate, and some half-a-mile from the white cliffs that skirted round the bay, there were more welcomings and greetings and introductions. There were several guests staying at the place. Somehow Esther managed to get through it all. But, at last, having pleaded weariness from the journey, she found herself alone in her room. Then she wept bitterly, and prayed! She seemed to see him again in the hideous dress, haggard-faced, old, with grey-streaked hair!

"Oh, God, be merciful!" she whispered in her agony. "Be merciful!"

She did not go down to dinner that night, and when her father went to see her, her hands were burning hot, and two bright spots blazed out on her cheeks.

A doctor was sent for. For a week a fever raged within her, and she kept her bed. During that time two crumbs of comfort reached her—kindly, cheering letters from Crump, preaching the gospel of hope and patience. Her host and hostess did everything in their power for her comfort. Her father was tenderness itself—but he believed in the guilt of the man she loved!

It was a warm, sunny morning, and they had moved Esther from her bed to an easy-chair near an open window from which the distant sea was visible. The morning paper lay on a table close beside. She was alone. Occasionally voices reached her from the lawn below. She was looking very wan and pale. For some time she stared out wistfully at the distant sea; then, almost mechanically, she picked up the paper, and opened it out. Her eyes wandered listlessly over the columns.

"CONVICT'S BRAVE CONDUCT.

"C 35 Saves a Warder's Life."

C 35! It was Alec's number! She had seen it on his sleeve at Roxeter Junction! The print was dancing before her eyes in a confused blurr. With a little cry, she pressed her hands to her forehead, as if to steady herself! At last the dancing letters shaped themselves into words:

> "On Tuesday last a prison warder attached to Wrackam Gaol, whilst on duty on St. Marvin's Island, where the convicts are engaged in fortress-building, fell into the water owing to the collapse of the staging on which he was standing. The unfortunate man could not swim, and must have been drowned but for the prompt and heroic conduct of Convict 35 who, in spite of the fact that his legs were chained, plunged in to his rescue, and contrived to keep the man afloat till assistance could be rendered. Both men were taken from the water in an exhausted condition. Convict 35 proves to be the Alexander Scarsdale who, as most of our readers will probably remember, was sentenced to a long term of penal servitude for the robbery of his employer, Mr. John Mansfield, the well-known banker. According to all accounts, he has proved a most refractory prisoner, and was wearing leg-chains in consequence of a steel implement having been found in his cell, evidently smuggled in with a view to attempting escape. He was also undergoing punishment for a violent assault on a warder. But it is to be hoped that this undoubted act of heroism will be rewarded with a remission of a portion of his sentence."

The paper fell from Esther's hand. Her heart was throbbing fiercely, proudly. He had proved himself a hero! Oh, if it would only come true! If only the cruel time of imprisonment were shortened. She dared not hope for more than this. Dare she even hope for as much?

On the lawn below, Mr. Walters and some of his male guests, comfortably esconced in deck-chairs, were smoking their cigars and chatting. Now and again stray sentences floated into the room; but Esther did not hear.

"A very charming fellow . . . staying with my friend, Winter . . . turns out to be quite an intimate friend of Mansfield's. I asked Winter to bring him over here some time!"

Mr. Walters was speaking. The broken sentences floated into the room.

"Esther, my dear child, do you think you will be feeling strong enough to get out into the open air for a little while to-day?"

Esther started at the sound of her father's voice. She had not heard him enter the room. Her thoughts had been far away.

"Yes, father. I'm afraid that I am spoiling your holiday. I'm feeling ever so much better. I shall be able to get as far as the garden quite easily this afternoon!"

"Hullo, here is Winter . . . has brought him with him!"

It was Mr. Walters' voice again.

"How are you, Winter . . . how you you do, sir! Very pleased to meet you . . . old friends of yours staying with us . . . Mansfields . . . nothing else to do . . . dine with us . . . sorry, exceedingly sorry to say . . . far from well . . . most anxious about her; but better to-day . . . thankful to say!"

There was a moment's pause; then another voice, singularly clear and distinct:

"Indeed! I'm most awfully grieved to hear that!"

This time Esther heard. She gave a sudden shiver.

"Father!" she whispered. "Is — is Mr. Revelle here?"

"Yes, Esther, I've only just heard. He's staying with a friend of Walters'. Quite a delightful surprise!"

Was there no getting away from this man whom she loathed? Instinct told her why he had come to Gurlston Bay. She shivered again, for a feeling of indefinable fear, as well as of loathing, had come over her.

"Esther, my dear," said her father, "you're cold, you're shivering. Let me shut the window!"

As he moved towards the window, their host's voice again penetrated in.

Digitized by Google

SECRETS OF PERSONAL MAGNETISM LAID BARE.

Thousands of Dollars' Worth of Books on Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism to be Given Away By a Noted Philadelphia College.

Hon. James R. Kenney of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee on Distribution.

Everyone May Now Learn All the Secrets of these Mysterious Sciences at his own Home.

Ex-Mayor of Reading, Pa., noted orator, author and scientist.

"I can honestly and conscientiously say from my long experience in dealing with people and from my personal acquaintance with many of the most prominent men in this country that there is no other one thing will help me so much in life as a thorough knowledge of Personal Magnetism," says Hon. James R. Kenney, "and for this reason I accepted the chairmanship of the Committee on Distribution of Works on Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism for the American College of Sciences of Philadelphia.

Hon. James R. Kenney, of Pennsylvania.

"The real secrets of Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism have always been jealously guarded by the few who knew them and kept them from the masses of the people. One who understands these sciences has an inestimable advantage in the race of life. I want to put this information in the hands of every ambitious man and woman in this country.

"The American College of Sciences has just appropriated $10,000 to be used in printing books for free distribution, and if this does not supply the demand it will appropriate $10,000 more. The books are absolutely free. They do not cost you a single cent.

"Tell me what kind of work you are engaged in; or, if sick, the disease from which you suffer, and I will send you the book which will put you on the road to success, health and strength. It matters not how successful you are, I will guarantee to help you achieve greater success. The work which I will send you is from the pens of the most eminent specialists of the country; it is richly illustrated with the finest half-tone engravings, and is intensely interesting from start to finish. It has been the means of changing the whole current in the lives of hundreds of persons who were ready to give up in despair. You can learn home in a few days and use personal magnetism in your daily work, without the knowledge of your most intimate friends. You can use it to influence others; you can use it to keep others from influencing you. You can positively cure the most obstinate chronic diseases and banish all bad habits.

"If you have not met with the business or social success which you desire; if you are not successful in winning and holding friends; if you are sick and tired of taking drugs that do not cure; if you care to develop your memory or any other mental faculty to a higher state of perfection; or, lastly, if you wish to possess that subtle, invisible, intangible power that sways and rules the minds of men, you should write me to-day and let me send you a free copy of our new book. It will prove a revelation to you." Address penny post-card JAMES R. KENNEY, WL 21 Commercial Union Building, Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A.

Digitized by Google

GIVEN AWAY
Without next Week's HOME NOTES
(No. 445)

Paper Pattern
OF THIS COTTON FROCK
for a Little Girl.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.
Price ONE PENNY

THE ONLY EFFICACIOUS SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

ABSOLUTELY PURE.
NO PRESERVATIVES USED.

(Really Genuine). In Patent Air-tight Tins.
½-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin & Postage.
Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, DEVON.

EIFFEL TOWER LEMON JELLY

We are Lemon experts—having personally visited the Messina Lemon Orchards to select the finest fruits for our celebrated Eiffel Tower Lemonade. We are now using our special knowledge to produce a most delicious Lemon Jelly, exquisitely flavoured, brilliantly transparent and delightful in appearance. It always sets. Pint packet, 3½d. Send Post-card for FREE SAMPLE to G. FOSTER CLARK & Co., Lemon Produce Importers, MAIDSTONE.

"ALKAN" CURES IN ONE MINUTE
BY INHALATION

HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, FACIAL NEURALGIA, NEURALGIA OF THE EAR

This Testimonial is selected from some thousands, and commands the attention of and a trial by the sufferer.

"1 Lamb Street, Wann Wen, Swansea.

". . . I had the severest attack I have had in my life while I was fetching your 'Alkan,' and with marvellous effect and magnetic influence it arrested the pain instantly.

"I have been a great sufferer all the days of my life from toothache and neuralgic pains; have had eighteen teeth extracted, but to no purpose, until your blessed 'Alkan' came to the rescue.

"Sincerely yours, ED. ROBERTS

B. & G. ALKAN, General Depot: 150 Strand, London, W.C.
PRICES: 2/9 and 4/6 per bottle.
Sent post paid from Depot to any part of the United Kingdom on receipt of price.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL
BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.
Prepared only by the Proprietor,
THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.
Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Save Half Your Outlay

by having the goods from the factory to your home door. You get all the value for yourself—middle profits, too. No risk or worry.

This 'Dainty Lady's Watch is sent you post free on receipt of 10/6

Solid Silver Case, beautifully engraved, elegant and strong, timed and adjusted for accuracy. Made well to wear well.

Send a post-card to-day for our Free Bargain Guide.
260 Pages, 3,000 Engravings of Watches, Clocks, Chains, Rings, Cutlery, Plate, &c.
Full of Money-saving Information.
H. SAMUEL (Dept. 25), Market St., MANCHESTER

"Smugglers, oh, dear no! . . . not for over sixty years . . . but the caves are quite complicated . . . a man might hide himself in them for days without being discovered . . . a regular rabbit-warren . . . as a matter-of-fact an escaped convict. . . . "

John Mansfield closed to the window sharply, and glanced uneasily at Esther.

Her white lips were twitching.

"Yes?" said Seaton Revelle, who had been questioning Mr. Walters on the subject of the caves.

"He escaped from Jetland Bill. He must have been in the caves some four days. Poor fellow, he was not taken alive. It is doubtful if his hiding place would have been discovered; but he must have slipped over the ledge in the dark. They found him on the rocks below dead, and in his convict's dress!"

"By the way," said one of the guests, "talking of convicts, did you read in this morning's paper about that fellow Scarsdale—we ought to have Mansfield, he could tell us something about him—saving a warder's life. Awfully plucky act. The fellow is undoubtedly an awful wrong 'un; but, 'pon my word, he deserves a free pardon. Not many of us would care about jumping into deep water, with heavy leg-chains on. I shouldn't be a bit surprised if they did give him a pardon!"

Seaton Revelle tugged rather nervously at his moustache.

"Jim feared neither God nor man!" so the poor woman who now lay in Warham churchyard had said.

Revelle was no coward; but even the remote prospect of Alec Scarsdale being liberated was not pleasant to him.

"I see," he said, changing the subject, "that there's been another fall of the cliffs!"

"Yes. They're very unsafe!" said Walters. "I'm going to have boards put up warning folk from going too near the edge. They are particularly dangerous after wet weather!"

At that moment a young gentleman, a towel thrown over his shoulder and just back from the beach, where he had been enjoying a morning swim, sauntered across the lawn.

"Do you know," he cried out, "there's a rumour in the village that that fellow Scarsdale whom we were reading about in the paper, has escaped from Wrackam prison. The report seems to have come from the police-station!"

(A further splendid instalment is published next Tuesday.)

Messrs. Pearson have just published a

SIXPENNY EDITION

of this

FAMOUS NOVEL

BECKY
BECKY
BECKY

6D.

Opinions of the Press:—

"Entertaining in a very high degree . . . undeniably amusing."—Daily Telegraph.

"One of the most entertaining and one of the most thoroughly alive stories I have met with for many a long day."—Echo.

"Helen Mathers writes charmingly; this book teems with smart things."—Birmingham Daily Post.

SIXPENNY EDITION.

BECKY.
BECKY.
BECKY.

By
HELEN MATHERS.

At all Railway Bookstalls, Booksellers, and Newsagents, or post free for 8d. from The Book Publisher, 17, Henrietta Street, W.C.

THREE TESTS.

DECEMBER 1, 11 p.m. I wonder if all rich girls are afraid of being married for their money? I know I am, and when John Everard proposed to me to-night, I was so afraid, that it was my money he was proposing to, rather than myself. I refused to give him any answer at the time, resolving to put his love to the test. If he is proof against the tests I shall apply—and I hope he will be!—I shall be perfectly happy.

I have written a letter and signed that wicked actress Marie's name to it, asking John to meet her at the stage entrance at ten-thirty to-morrow evening. John has an engagement with me. If he goes away early, pleading business or a headache, I shall know he has gone to keep the appointment he supposes she has made with him. Then I shall never, never have anything more to do with him.

December 2, 12.5 a.m.—I am so happy! It is midnight, and John has just gone—I am almost convinced that he loves me for myself alone. I watched him closely all the evening to see if he would in any way betray the fact that he had received a letter from that actress. Judge of my surprise when, about an hour before he went home, he took that letter from his pocket and handed it to me! There was a time, he confessed, when he would have kept an appointment like that. "But that was in the days I call my 'wasted yesterdays,'" he said, smiling half sadly. "Now, there is nothing in all the world that is one-half so dear as the hours I spend with you." Wasn't that splendid? I am very anxious to find out what kind of husband he would be. The next time he calls I will tell him that I think a woman is most selfish who demands that a man give up his club and his card parties. If he agrees with my views I shall know that he would cling to that part of the old life, and I should be so miserable if I were left at home alone!

December 4.—John is home. He called last night and he stood the test beautifully. He told me he thought if a man really loved a woman, he would have no desire to go to the club or anywhere else she couldn't go. As for himself, he said, if he loved a girl enough to marry her, he would love her enough to want her with him always. It seems almost wrong to test him further, but I will just once more. He has invited me to go to the theatre to-morrow evening. In the morning I shall write him a little note and tell him I am in trouble and cannot go. When he comes in the evening to find out what the trouble is, I shall tell him that my lawyers say they are afraid all the fortune left me by dear papa has been lost and that I am practically a poor girl.

Then I'll watch his face. If he loves me for myself he will not care. If it is for my money, he will show it.

December 5, 2 a.m. — I am so happy! John is absolutely true and doesn't care for my money. When he got my letter yesterday afternoon, he came at once to me. I tried to look a picture of pathetic woe, and told him what my lawyers said. In a moment after he had heard it I was held tightly in his arms and he was kissing me! We are to be married Christmas day. I told old Mr. Sharpe, my lawyer, about it yesterday, and how he laughed! He is to write me a letter stating that by strenuous efforts that fortune has all been saved, and I will show it to John. Won't he be surprised!

My maid Nannette sits over there by the fire, half-asleep It's too bad to keep her up any later, so I won't write longer but I'm so happy, I know I won't sleep a wink.

* * * * * * *

"Nannette," said Mr. John Everard, as he stood in the reception-room on Christmas day, waiting for his wife to come down from her room, "Nannette, to-night I start on my wedding tour. Here are the three letters you wrote me, and I wish you would accept this ten pound note as a little confidential Christmas gift. There—go now, your mistress is ringing for you."

And Nannette smiled and answered the bell.

F. Harvey.

Digitized by Google

By MADGE MORRIS.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Are Love-Letters Sincere?

"PAULA" is puzzled. She has recently met a very nice boy, who appears to be very fond of her. She constantly receives from him love letters worded in such a way as to suggest that she is all the world to him. But when she meets him from time to time, his manner is far from ecstatic. He is, in fact, rather cold and reserved in her presence. Do I think his professions are really sincere?

I do not always believe in the sincerity of love letters. People often use language in correspondence which is utterly at variance with their real sentiments. I think "PAULA" would do well to take her friend's letters just as nice, complimentary tokens of admiration, not as his heart's outpourings. She should judge his feelings towards her more by his manner, his attentiveness, and his general actions.

The Fidgety Husband.

"LUCIA" has married a man who is terribly erratic. He often takes her to towns where he has business, and when there, instead of making some sort of provision for her amusement, he keeps her waiting about outside offices and shops until she is weary to death, and, if anything disturbs him, attributes it to her presence. What is a wife to do under such circumstances?

As a married friend of mine put it, husbands always try and put their wives in the wrong. The only safeguard is for a wife to anticipate this, and contrive to put them in the wrong first. I think "LUCIA" should take up a very strong line when she visits with her husband. On arriving at the town, she should ask him at what definite time he will be through his business, and make an appointment for that time, arranging in the meantime to amuse herself independently of him. Before he has a chance of abusing her, as she says he does, she should start matters by charging him with neglect, and placing him on the defensive. I have known this system adopted with excellent results among my married friends, and strongly recommend it to "LUCIA."

A Case for Candour.

"LEONARD" at one time was somewhat in love with a certain young lady. After some months of courtship, she deliberately threw him over without any apparent reason. "LEONARD" believes her to be the merest flirt, who trifles with men so long as they amuse her and no longer. Now the other day "LEONARD" was surprised to meet her in the society of a very close friend of his own, who told him in a whisper that he "was very much gone" on the girl. Ought "LEONARD," with his own experience, to warn him of her character?

"LEONARD" would be doing no harm in telling his friend just what has occurred in his own case. Girls who thus trifle with men's affections are not entitled to any particularly chivalrous reserve on the part of those they have jilted. "LEONARD" would rather be doing a service to his friend to tell him his own experience.

The Presumptuous Stranger.

A FRIEND of "JESSIE" knows a certain man. This man has constantly seen "JESSIE" with her friend, but does not know her personally. The other day he met her out, and going up to her, introduced himself, claiming acquaintance with her friend as his excuse. Should "JESSIE" have accepted his conduct, or ignored it?

Had the man been a gentleman, he certainly would not have introduced himself, at any rate unless he had reason to believe "JESSIE" was agreeable to the acquaintance. "JESSIE" should under any circumstances have told him that while she had no reason for not wishing to know him, she resented his familiarity in introducing himself. If he wished to know her, their mutual friend would use her discretion about making the introduction.

But I must make some allowances for him. There are certain circumstances under which a man is justified in speaking to a strange lady without an introduction, such, for instance, as occasions on which he is able to be of assistance to her. "JESSIE" should make her own decision as to whether in the case in question the man had such justification.

Are Lovers Bores?

I AM afraid "HENRIETTA" is a very heretical young lady. She actually confesses that James, her sweetheart, bores her. When they meet, of course there is the usual affectionate hand-squeeze, followed by a kiss of adequate length and fulness, but when the conversation part of the business comes on he bores her to death.

The fact is, James is very attentive to his business, and persists in talking to her about it until she is weary to death. Of course she is interested in his business, but finds little details of his daily life quite uninteresting. Do I think that her feeling so disposed towards him indicates that she does not really care much for him?

It seems very strange to me that "HENRIETTA" should be in such doubt as to whether she really is fond of James. I should think she herself must best know that. However, I construe it as a very bad sign that she finds his conversation wearying. However much they may enjoy that hand-squeeze and kiss, things look rather black if they have not sufficient in common to be able to talk together. As a love-doctor, and not a wizard, therefore I must tell "HENRIETTA" that I don't think she does care very much for James, or she would not find him a bore.

A Case for Waiting.

"PHILIP."—Yes, you would be doing wrong in taking your sweetheart from a good home to share with you the sum of a pound a week, which you say you see little prospect of increasing. Wait until you are in a better position, unless, of course, your wife is able in any way to earn something at home to help keep the house with. Certainly it would not be wise for her to go out to work after you are married, seeing that she has not done so before. No, "PHILIP," I fear you must do what a lot of others have to, and that is wait.

Jack's Choice.

"JACK."—Evidently the girl you met subsequently was the best suited to you. It often happens that young men go on under the impression that they are fond of a certain girl, until someone else appears who "sends them crazy." It certainly is a delicate position for the latter girl, as naturally it would be extremely unpleasant for her to appear to be stealing you away from her friend. But these unfortunate things must continue to happen as long as human nature lasts. Someone must be mortified. All one can do is to see that the mortification is as gently conveyed as possible.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Good! it's Mason's

MASON'S EXTRACT of HERBS

THE BEST BEVERAGE TO TAKE WITH YOUR MEALS, AND AT ALL TIMES.
THE MOST SUITABLE FOR CHILDREN DURING WARM WEATHER.

A Physician states: "It assuages thirst, it is refreshing, and grateful to weak stomachs."

A 6d. Bottle of Extract makes 8 gallons. Bottle, post free, 9 stamps.

Manufacturers:
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

You must try
E. & T.
PINK'S
JAMS they are
Absolutely Pure

Please write for our latest illustrated cycle catalogue, with copies of SYMONDS' STAR, the most widely circulated cycling periodical in the world. Sent free to you upon application. We will make a strong, handsome, warranted cycle at our factory, to your order, in six days, at £4 19s. 9d. to £7 17s. 7d., according to your choice of models. Easy payments, no guarantors required. Address:
Symonds' London Stores,
124-128 City Rd., London, E.C.

CYCLES

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

From 1s. weekly. Special Offer. £12 12s. 6d. Sample for £6 6s. Carriage paid. PLATED RIMS, FREE WHEELS, RIM BRAKE FITTED FREE. Agents wanted. — DERBYHAM ROAD CYCLE CO., NORWICH.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%
repayable on demand.
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager

"TATCHO"

Gets the Hair Back.
Puts the Hair Right.
Keeps the Hair Right.

WHO SAY SO.

COMMANDER T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.
"Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1901.
"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair."

MAJOR-GENERAL KEATE.
"High Croft, Winchester.
"I find the Renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time."

LADY SYKES writes:
"Mayfair, W.
"I can honestly recommend 'Tatcho.' It has really entirely renovated my hair."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFORUS PALŒLOGUE writes:
"Belvedere Hotel, Kensington, W.
"I would not be without it on any account."

MRS. BROWN POTTER.
"I use only 'Tatcho.'"

A 4/6 FULL SIZE BOTTLE of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' "Tatcho" is supplied to enable you to test its value at the NOMINAL PRICE of 1/10 at all Chemists', Stores, and Hairdressers', or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, 81 Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn, London.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the world, in bottles at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/-.

Digitized by Google

MASTERS' KEYLESS SIX PRIZE MEDAL SOLID SILVER LADIES' WATCH.

30/- 30/-

A Fully Jewelled Keyless Watch Warranted for Seven Years - £1 10 0

£1 10 0

honestly worth double.

Modern improvements and up-to-date methods have reduced the cost a half in the making of this watch. Ten years ago you would have had to pay 60/- for a keyless watch as good as the one we now offer you for 30/-.

You could not have a better or more reliable watch than

MASTERS' 30/- SIX-PRIZE-MEDAL WATCH

and our popular credit system will allow you to own it and pay for it in small payments of

5/- PER MONTH.

SPECIAL CREDIT PAYMENT.

J. N. MASTERS Ltd. supply this watch on convenient monthly payments. First send 2/6 and watch will be sent you on approval. If satisfactory, send 2/6 more on receipt and 5/- each month for five months; or if you send the full amount we give you as cash discount. Your money back if watch does not satisfy you and is returned at once.

A STERLING SILVER ALBERT FREE

CATALOGUE (1,500 Illustrations) POST FREE.
AGENTS wanted. Write for particulars.

J. N. MASTERS LTD., Dept. 201, WATCHMAKERS, RYE, SUSSEX

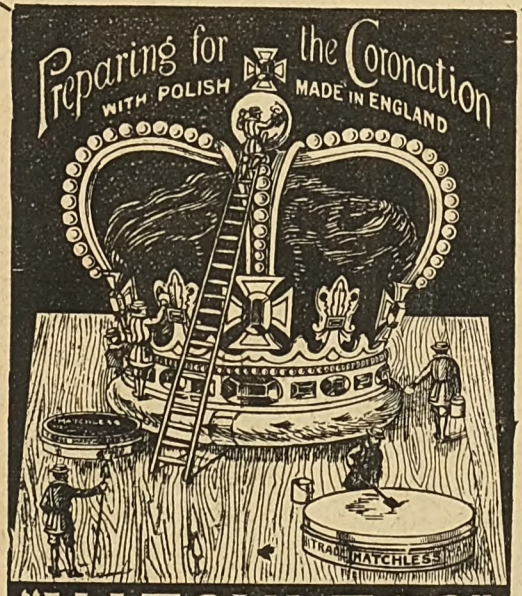
"KKOVAH"

FLAVORED ONLY WITH RIPE FRUIT JUICES.

SUTCLIFFE & BINGHAM Ltd. No 7, 'KKOVAH' WORKS MANCHESTER

JELLIES

Preparing for the Coronation WITH POLISH MADE IN ENGLAND



"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH

Should you have any difficulty in obtaining supplies, to 6½ Tins will be sent Postage Free, (with address of nearest Dealer) on receipt of P.O. or Stamps for 1/-

Manufacturers: THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO. LTD. LIVERPOOL

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

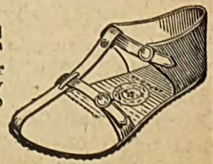
A very Large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

A Boon

FOR SEASIDE AND COUNTRY WEAR.

"AMPHIBIAN" SANDALS.



THE only Rubber Sandals. Children can wear them while paddling. The only healthy footgear. Develop and Preserve the natural beauty of the foot.

ALL CHILDREN SHOULD WEAR THEM.

SHORT STORIES

THE GREAT HOME STORY PAPER.

TARTAN COVER
No. 1.—MENZIES.

No. 709.) Week Ending August 2nd, 1902. (Price One Penny.

Digitized by Google

A KODAK for 5/-

The No. 1 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2½ by 2½ inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 BROWNIE is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK

The No. 2 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3¼ by 2½ inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Everset time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of

KODAK LTD., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, W.C.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES'

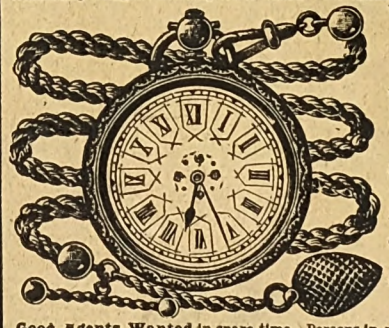
Shakespeare.

SPECIAL OFFER.

Lady's Silver Watch and Albert for 30/-

TERMS. 3/- with order, and balance by monthly payments of 8s.

DESCRIPTION. Sterling Silver Watch with horizontal movement fitted with all modern improvements and Fully Jewelled; Handsomely Finished Opal Dial Decorated and Embellished in High-class Style; Artistically Designed Sterling Silver Cases. Warranted Five Years.



Very Neat Two-row Sterling Silver Albert, with Bar and Drop Piece.

Watch and . . Albert complete in Elegant Case. 30/-

Send for our No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., etc., Post Free.

Good Agents Wanted in spare time. Persons in regular employment should apply for terms and particulars.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

KAPUTINE cures NEURALGIA equally as well as HEADACHE. KAPUTINE is USED as well as recommended by MEDICAL MEN! NEVER FAILS.

NOTHING LIKE IT OR AS GOOD

PACKETS OF 18 1/- FOR KAPUTINE THE SAFE REMEDY FOR HEADACHE CURES IN 10 MINUTES.

Packets of 18 doses 1/-. Samples 1d. of all Chemists and Stores, or post free from KAPUTINE Ltd., HUDDERSFIELD, for 12 stamps. Refuse dangerous substitutes. DEMAND KAPUTINE the SAFE Remedy.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence,

Mrs. C. H.
(Room 8),
195 OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money, and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £7-12-6

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment.

EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very Large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Short Stories

No. 709. ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending August 2nd, 1902.

THE DARK HORSE.

Cinderella's Triumph Over Her Gay Sisters.

GERALDINE, Evelyn, and Sybil Manners had begun the race of life together at the respective ages of two, one, and nought years, and as no son had come to inherit their father's estate, it passed to a cousin by entail, leaving the girls but moderately dowered.

Their mother had, however, a life interest in the house, and a handsome jointure, so that their father's death made little change in their material welfare for the time being.

Evelyn and Sybil were frivolous, fair-headed flirts, but Geraldine was cast in a different mould. Having waited for Evelyn to be eighteen before "coming out," she had only had a year of country gaiety when Sybil was declared fit also for conquest, and burning for the fray. As their mother always insisted that only two of her girls should go to any entertainment, Geraldine began gradually to give place to her younger and more selfish sisters, until after a time it came to be an accepted fact that they should represent the social side of the family, while Geraldine stayed at home uncomplainingly and amused herself reading, fishing, or riding as the seasons alternated.

And now she was thirty! That aftermath of youth where a woman's chance of matrimony wanes with each succeeding year. Geraldine had never wished to be married as her sisters had done, but what woman is there who would prefer a single life if (oh, such a great big "if" sometimes) she could meet the right man.

Looking back over her life now she acknowledged she had made a mistake. She had missed most of the fun of life and had gained a little by the sacrifice. She had begun life with ideals which were too high ever to be realised. She saw men suffered little, if anything, from the countless enslavements of a coquette and that her sisters' admirers never went and drowned themselves when displaced in favour of some fresh lover. In fact, from her observation it seemed that the men usually got tired first of the wild game with the proverbial fire.

No one realised better than the eldest Miss Manners the exact position she held in the opinion of the surrounding county. A good bit of a recluse, a little bit of an oddity, and oh, horror of horrors to all the male sex—rather a "blue stocking." Others had implied, if not actually stated, that these were the reasons which satisfactorily accounted for her absence from the gaieties of the neighbourhood, and she had not taken the trouble to remove the impression. It would have been entirely against her wishes to pose as a Cinderella, even a most willing one, as she undoubtedly was; if she could with truth be called one at all, when it was only of late it had dawned upon her that the sunshine of life was not brightest in the solitudes.

Every year, during the height of the London season, one of the girls was invited for a month's visit to the house of a rich but childless uncle and aunt, who moved in the smartest of sets. Evelyn and Sybil had always been the ones to go year by year, and it was no small annoyance to their mother's sister, that, with all her efforts, combined with their pretty faces, no eligible suitor had come forward to lead them to the altar, though dozens of men worshipped at their shrines year by year. Their uncle used slyly to hint that the young men found safety in numbers, but their aunt still fondly hoped that one would come "forth from the many," and make the longed for request.

When, however, they had reached the ages of twenty-eight and nine, and their aunt's invitation arrived as usual, a difficulty arose. It had been arranged earlier that Evelyn should be the one to accept it that year, and this being the case Sybil had chosen to retire into private life for a bit in order to do a picturesque homage to the memory of a last season's lover who had been killed in South Africa. Just before the invitation arrived Evelyn had sprained her ankle and was unable to stir off the sofa, so when Mrs. Manners read out her sister's letter with a query as to what answer she should make, silence was her response.

There is no doubt that the memory of the South African hero would have been honoured at a more convenient season by the fair Sybil had not Geraldine remarked quietly, "I should like to go, mother."

Mrs. Manners looked up in astonishment at her eldest daughter, and Sybil broke out into an unpleasant laugh, saying, "Fancy Geraldine in London!"

This seemed at once to decide her mother, who, smiling at her eldest girl, said gently, "Very well, dear, I shall write and accept for you."

But Mrs. Manners was inwardly somewhat fearful as to what her fashionable sister would say to the appearance of her quiet firstborn, and she did not mention which of her daughters was to be expected until the morning of her arrival. Thus it was that as soon as Mrs. Sutledge had opened her sister's letter, she exclaimed angrily, "Well, really I don't know what Charlotte is thinking of."

"What is the matter, my dear?" inquired her husband, looking up over The Times and his gold rimmed glasses.

"Matter, why it is Geraldine who is to arrive here this afternoon, as the other girls cannot come. It is really too bad, and a large dinner-party this evening. What am I to do with

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

a raw country girl like that? What excuse can I make to stop her coming up?"

"None, with my permission," said Mr. Sutledge. "It is the best piece of news I have heard for this long time. Egad, I shall have someone to ride with in the Park now who will not keep me in fear lest she should tumble off. She is worth a cart-load of the other misses. The best hand at tying flies I ever met, and as sensible a girl as a man need wish to talk to."

"That is just it. A man does not want sense when he talks to a woman," sighed Mrs. Sutledge.

"You mean he does not expect to find it, my dear," chuckled her husband.

"And I have Lord Beauclerc coming to-night, who wants to be taken out of himself by a woman who can show him the way," she continued, ignoring his remark. "It is really most unfortunate. Why, the last time I saw her she had her hair screwed up in a tight knot at the back."

"Ready for a canter," suggested her uncle, "I'll go surety for Gerry that she does not spoil your party," he said heartily, but his wife only mentally commented on the impossibility of making her husband realise the importance of social trivialities.

Geraldine arrived at tea-time, and her aunt was agreeably surprised to find that she passed the social ordeal of entering the room with an unostentatious dignity that bespoke her long descent, and she instinctively softened the somewhat chilly reception which she had prepared for her niece.

The girl was dressed with that excessive quietness which shows particular care and refinement of taste to the initiated, and suited her rather distinguished than pretty personality to perfection. Mr. Sutledge made his appearance in the drawing-room at tea-time, which was a most unheard of proceeding, but, fearing his wife's reception of his favourite, he had ventured into the sanctum of tea and talk. He was agreeably pleased to find his wife's brow unruffled, and his hearty welcome went a long way to make Geraldine feel that her visit was not altogether a foolish undertaking.

Mrs. Sutledge decided that she would make no change in the arrangement of her dinner party, and allow Lord Beauclerc to take his chances with her niece, and so it was that Geraldine found herself one of the dining-room procession, with her arm resting lightly upon that of a rather grave-looking man who had a sprinkling of grey hair above his temples.

"Do you know, Miss Manners?" he began with a rather sad smile, "I am afraid your aunt has intrusted you with a pupil to-night, rather than a companion. I do not know what I ought to know and talk to you about, I have been so long out of England, not to say London."

A sudden gleam of sympathy shot from Geraldine's grey eyes.

"You don't know what a relief that is to me," she said with a laugh, "I have never been in London for a season before, and it frightens me so."

"Then it was a very kind Providence that threw us together. I think it is Baden Powell who says when scouting to remember the other man is just as much afraid as you are, but I own I never expected to find the quality among the fair sex of a London drawing-room."

"But then I am even a later importation than you are, for at least you have been a few days in town, while I only can boast of a few hours."

"But how is it that you have withstood the fascinations of London while living in England, for I think your aunt said you had come up from Warwickshire?"

"Well, my younger sisters are more fond of gaiety than I am, so when my aunt asked one of us on a visit they usually came."

"It was not quite fair to leave you out of all the fun was it?"

"I think it was my own choice," she said doubtfully, "but this year I wished to see what it was all like just for once before I get too old."

It was unaffectedly said, and with a smile, but the note of underlying wistfulness was not lost upon her companion.

"You talk as if you were the age of Methuselah," he said smiling, "I thought ladies generally tried to understate rather than exaggerate their age. I always own I know little of your sex, but I am beginning to realise I know nothing at all."

They both laughed and looked into each other's eyes, and each mentally commented on what nice eyes the other had. Mrs. Sutledge from her end of the table thought that Geraldine might not be quite such a failure after all, and into her husband's eyes there crept a very bright twinkle as he read her thought.

"Our cases are very similar," said Lord Beauclerc, "for I, too, want just a peep at the gaieties before burying myself in the country, since the term of my diplomatic work in the colonies has expired. Now, supposing we compare notes at the end of your visit, since we have started exploring society with a capital 'S' at about the same time."

"Yes, willingly," said Geraldine, "but, oh, dear, it will be as bad as being a journalist! To observe for reproduction takes the charm out of life."

"That is a verywise observation; I think I was foolish to lay down my arms so quickly upon your telling me about that little white feather."

"Oh, no, please don't be afraid of me," cried Geraldine, in a voice of intreaty. "I am really not a bit clever."

"Learned, I think you mean," he corrected, bending his eyes gravely upon her.

To a person who is habitually misunderstood, to be accurately gauged is a terrifying pleasure. It was so now with Geraldine, and for a moment she was dumb, while with diplomatic instinct Lord Beauclerc addressed a remark to the lady on his other side. Turning again to her a minute later the conversation drifted into less personal channels.

"Good-night, Beauclerc," said Mr. Sutledge to his parting guest, "see you in the park to-morrow morning? Going to show my niece off. Finest horsewoman in Warwickshire. So long."

"Well, my dear," he remarked later to his wife, "you see Gerry did not disgrace you."

"No, she seemed to get on very well with our Ex-Governor, I suppose it is sometimes an advantage to a girl to be able to discuss volcanoes. Oh, I think she will do very well as her dresses are less countrified than I expected. She is a novelty too, which is something."

"Not so long in the window as her sisters, eh?"

"I am sure I have done my best for those girls," sighed Mrs. Sutledge, "I can't think why they are not married."

"Too many strings, my dear, too many strings," murmured her husband, as he wandered off to have a last cigar.

A woman either looks at her best or her worst upon horseback, and Geraldine was one of the lucky ones to whom it was an advantage, and so Lord Beauclerc thought when he greeted her and Mr. Sutledge next morning in the park.

With an almost childish delight in the novelty of the scene, and keen amusement at some of the horsewomanship displayed, she seemed as fresh and charming to the middle-aged bachelor as the still dew scented air wafted to them across the flower-beds.

"They say London without its parks would be like life without love, Miss Manners. Do you agree with the suggestion?" he asked, as Mr. Sutledge hailed an acquaintance and dropped behind.

"I think if it was possible for a life to be entirely without love of any kind its case would be far worse than a parkless city, worse, oh, far worse than the Sahara or Steppes even. But then it is like food," she said, laughing, "very much less will sustain life than people think."

Digitized by Google

"Have you tried doing on so very little that you speak with such assurance?"

"I don't think I have ever been greedy for affection," she said, smiling, "I don't like receiving what I cannot return, and I am afraid my heart is not a very large one."

With another girl such a topic would have been sure to hit upon a vein of self-conscious awkwardness, but Geraldine's transparent seriousness and directness of remark saved it from the least touch of such a thing. It only made the man at her side lapse into silence to wonder if he had had enough affection through his life even to sustain existence in a healthy and unmorbid condition, and for the first time almost, he realised how alone he was, as his late private secretary passed him too engrossed with his fiancée to recognise his chief.

Thus day after day through the bright mornings at the end of May and beginning of June Lord Beauclerc sought Geraldine and her uncle in their morning rides, and it was surprising the number of acquaintances Mr. Sutledge had, whom he wanted to consult upon one important question or another. Indeed it was a matter of some flattering wonder to these worthy folk themselves, that a man, usually careless about others' opinions, and who mostly acknowledged their presence with a passing nod, should now eagerly inquire their opinions upon the topics of the day.

At the many afternoon and evening entertainments to which Geraldine accompanied her aunt, Lord Beauclerc seldom sought her, and never singled her out from other acquaintances, but in the park he seemed to resent any trespass upon her attention.

Geraldine's introduction to Society had been neither a grand triumph nor a signal failure, but on the whole her aunt was not ill-pleased with her visit. If young men did not struggle to supply her with a cup of tea, the dowagers inquired who was the distinguished-looking girl she was chaperoning, and whoever spoke to her lingered beside her unbored, even if they did not eagerly seek her again. She pleased all, but she lacked that charm which prostrates all hearts at the conqueror's feet.

Geraldine realised all this with her usual quick perception, and she felt deeply grateful to Lord Beauclerc that even during their morning rides he seemed to seek her company. This much she readily owned to herself, but she was rather surprised to find that the day before she left town she should actually jump out of bed before she was called to see if the day promised to be fine. Yes, fortune was not going to be unkind this time.

"I wonder why I did that?" mentally queried the girl. "I suppose I am rather sorry to leave town after all. Ah, London has just the charm I lack," she laughed as she covered herself up again, "it makes people want to see more of it."

Lord Beauclerc was waiting for them at the gate, and the trio passed into the park together.

They had not proceeded far when Mr. Sutledge reined in his horse with an exclamation of annoyance.

"Well, really," he said, "I don't know what has come to my memory of late. My agent may call this morning and I forgot all about him. Geraldine's last ride too. Well, it is provoking."

"If I may offer—if you will allow me to escort your niece, I shall be only too happy," said Lord Beauclerc, just a trifle too eagerly for an ordinary civility.

"That is really most good of you, Beauclerc," said Mr. Sutledge blandly, "I am sure Gerry will be grateful," and without waiting for her murmured consent, he wheeled his horse and proceeded very leisurely towards home.

"Well, when an honest man turns thief he has wonderful opportunities," he soliloquised, "why if Susan had attempted a move like that she would have been suspected at once," and those who met him wondered what was amusing the old gentleman so mightily.

Meanwhile the two unsuspecting equestrians had also slackened their pace in the opposite direction. Lord Beauclerc drew his horse close to hers.

"I think when you first came to town we agreed to compare notes as to our impressions at the close of your visit," he said gently. "But perhaps you have forgotten?"

No, she had not forgotten.

"Are you glad to leave, and sorry that you came?"

"Oh, no, I am not sorry I came," she said quickly. "I will appreciate the peace of the country far more after the hurly-burly of town. To value anything to the full one must test what life is without it for a time."

"Then you are glad to go home?" he asked very gravely.

Glad? She looked away over the broad stretch of green bordered by flaming beds in the distance, but she saw them not. It is well for a woman when she realises her heart's surrender in the solitude of her own room and not in the presence of its captor.

"Miss Manners, you are sorry to leave?" he asked again, almost sternly.

"Yes," she replied, in a low voice, still looking away from him over the park.

"Is this the comparing of notes you promised me?" he asked more lightly.

"Oh, I cannot tell you what my impressions have been," she said, looking up at him in distress, "I will have to think them out by myself."

"Well, I can tell you mine," he said, "and then perhaps you will know if you agree with me. I have realised that not only London society, but the whole world is an intensely lonely place, unless you can claim absolute possession of one heart, and although we may do with a small portion of love and not die, to live our lives to the full we must love to our utmost and receive the same in return."

She bent her head over the reins."

"Geraldine," he whispered softly, "will you give me that love, so that neither of us shall miss the best of life."

"I think I have given it to you," she said in a low tone, "at least I am afraid you came and stole it unawares."

He gave a bright happy laugh. How much younger he looked all in a minute. Youth which has not been spent lies dormant.

"Dearest," he said, "you have made me the happiest man on earth, and although we both love the country we must come up to London sometimes just to see how well off we are with our rural peace."

When Lord Beauclerc entered Mr. Sutledge's study a few hours later, that worthy man was standing with his back to the ferns in the grate, with no agent present, and a very comical twinkle in his eye.

"Want to see me about a horse, I suppose," he commented, as his lordship entered.

"I have come to ask for your consent to my marriage with your niece," Lord Beauclerc said simply, "she has been gracious enough to consent to be my wife."

"Then you might have saved yourself the trouble," said Mr. Sutledge, laughing, "for had I not approved I should not have had that lapse of memory re the agent."

Both men looked into each other's face, laughed, and shook hands.

"Nothing could please me more," continued the old man, "I always said Gerry would prove the dark horse in the sisters' race."

Peers Hervey.

If you want to make sure your advice will be taken, have it engraved on your umbrella handle.

The eye of a little miss was attracted by the sparkle of the dew at early morning. "Mamma," she exclaimed; "it's hotter'n I thought it was." "What do you mean?" "Look here; the grass is all covered with perspiration."

Digitized by Google

SAVED FROM HERSELF.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

A Powerful Narrative in Two Parts.

FIRST PART OF THE STORY.

VICTOR ASHFORD, a member of an aristocratic family, has married Irene Bellasis secretly, and, unknown to her, in a manner unrecognised as binding by English law. Shortly after his marriage, however, he deserts his girl wife and becomes engaged to Miss Audrey Dacre, whose father's estate joins that of the Ashford family. Indignant and mortified by the wickedness of Victor Ashford's plot, Gwendoline Bellasis, Irene's sister, determines to endeavour to make the recreant legalise his first marriage. With this object she visits him but without success. Gwendoline swears she will stop the marriage, and leaves the house.

Ashford, however, follows her, and tries to force her to accept compensation in the shape of a handsome allowance. She, however, of course refuses, whereupon Ashford, becomes insulting. He is checked by the arrival of a stranger who promises to thrash him if he doesn't clear off. Ashford doesn't wait for the fulfilment of the threat.

Gwendoline next visits Sir John Dacre at his country seat, and tells her story to him without success. Leaving the house she sits down by the roadside and sobs as though her heart would break. Just then the stranger, who previously had intervened between herself and Ashford, approaches and offers further assistance if it is in his power. Gwendoline thanks him, and upon his asking to be allowed to see her again, tells her to be in the village church on the following Sunday morning.

The stranger, a Colonial, returns to the village inn where he is staying. Later on in the day, while passing the open door of one of the bedrooms, he glances in and sees Gwendoline loading a small, shining revolver.

"You May Leave Him to Me."

"MISS GWENDOLINE BELLASIS, sir, that's the name, least ways, I suppose it's 'Miss,' but Gwendoline Bellasis was what she wrote in the visitors' book when she came, and she'd no wedding-ring on."

"Gwendoline Bellasis," murmured Philip Ross; "ah, thank you." And he began thoughtfully to stir the second cup of coffee brought him by the little waitress at the Ashford Hotel. The latter surveyed him with profound interest as she removed the plate that had borne the savoury portion of the young Colonial's morning meal, and drew up the toast-rack and the old-fashioned glass butter-cooler.

"Is—is it the lady you fancied it was?" she queried, daringly. Philip Ross started—he had forgotten the subterfuge under cover of which he had sought to question his attendant with regard to the heroine of his two odd adventures.

"Y-yes," he stammered, and added, more collectedly, "I—I must get you to take her my card and ask her to grant me a few moments' interview about a rather urgent matter."

"I'll do that," responded the waitress with alacrity, for the Colonial's embarrassment suggested a romance, and romance is dear to every daughter of Eve, "as soon as Miss Bellasis gets back. She had her breakfast very early and went out at once; she may have been going to the Park, Dacre Park, that is—she was there yesterday, for she inquired the road to it. I wondered at first if she had come down for the wedding—Mr. Ashford's, sir, with Miss Dacre."

Philip Ross assented, but showed no disposition to pursue the conversation, and the waitress, with a sigh of disappointment, retreated, leaving him alone at the table by the window.

Leaning on the sill of the open lattice, he lighted one of his inevitable cigarettes. Everything about him was singularly peaceful—the bells from the neighbouring church floated to him over fields of ripening clover and the birds called drowsily to one another through the still heat of the quiet Sunday morning. But in the mind of the Colonial was anxiety and indecision.

To begin with, he had lain awake so long the previous evening, pondering uncertainly the problem that had so suddenly confronted him, that he had slept, haunted by terrifying dreams, far into the pleasant afternoon, instead of rising, as he had projected, and waylaying his mysterious acquaintance. For some hours of the night before, he had considered the wisdom of requesting to see her and begging her to confide in him. The vision that he had had through the door, unexpectedly left ajar, of Gwendoline Bellasis loading a miniature revolver, had kindled in his heart the gravest fears and suspicions.

Yet he guessed that she meant no harm to herself—in any case, no immediate harm; had she not promised that he should see her at the parish church in the morning? If, then, he kept her under observation from the time that she rose the following morning, he should be able to prevent any untoward event and perhaps, without scandal, to reason her out of any folly she might be meditating.

So he had decided, feeling instinctively that there was some tragedy behind her despair of the preceding afternoon and her subsequent preparation of the deadly weapon. The unknown persecutor from whom he had delivered her in London on their first meeting, seemed to him to be a link in some fatal chain. But he had perceived Gwendoline Bellasis to be both a lady and a good woman, and the impression she had made upon the hitherto fancy-free Australian was no transient one. Unluckily, his plan had been shattered by a trick of Morpheus, the slumber-god, and now he sat over his breakfast, wondering what he should do under the circumstances.

At length, warned by the stoppage of the pealing bells and the sharp clanging of a single clapper, that the hour for the morning service had arrived—the service at which he was again to encounter the remarkable person who formed the subject of his reverie—he rose, went for his hat, and strolled out into the High Street of the small country town.

Many a pretty Somersetshire lass, hastening to church in her holiday garments, paused to gaze at the handsome, sunburnt stranger, with his long, free stride and friendly bearing, and to compare him with the sturdy, yet slouching youths of the locality.

Digitized by Google

Stared at no less interestedly by the male than by the female members of a somewhat sparse congregation, Philip Ross walked down the simple nave of St. Bennet's. He had detected in an instant the presence of Gwendoline Bellasis, and moved unconcernedly to a position where he could observe her at his leisure.

She was grave and pale, but even more lovely in her still calm, with the yellow morning sunbeams streaming down upon her, than she had been in either of the three moods—anger, alarm, despair—in which he had previously seen her. The contrast between herself and the red-cheeked, rustic beauties about her lent to Gwen an almost ethereal delicacy and charm. The Colonial plunged deeper and deeper into love as he gazed at her. For a moment he had forgotten the problem represented by the loaded revolver.

Already the familiar English service had begun, and Philip Ross, prompted by an offered share of a prayer-book, joined in the responses, with, it must be confessed, some degree of absent-mindedness. But though his glance wandered continually to Gwen's set, white face, she did not betray, by look or gesture, that she had observed his entrance.

A startling idea sprang up in the Colonial's brain. What if Gwendoline Bellasis had come armed to St. Bennet's, with the intention of avenging, in that sacred edifice and by a sudden shot, some real or fancied injury? He scanned the congregation; but there appeared to be no one in the church, excepting possibly the rector or his assisting curate, against whom a woman of her class could have a grievance. Yet he wished that he had taken the bull by the horns and demanded boldly from Gwen an explanation of what he had seen through that partially-closed door.

An abrupt motion on Gwen's part attracted his attention. She had bent forward in her seat, clinging with her gloved hands to the back of the pew before her. The rector had begun to read various notices, the old and hallowed phrase, "I publish the banns of marriage," fell upon the ears of the worshippers. He read on—"Between Audrey Margaret Dacre, of Dacre Park, in the parish of St. Bennet the Martyr, Tiversedge, and Victor Beaumont Ashford, of Ashford Court, also of this parish. If any of you know cause or just impediment why these two persons should not be joined together in holy matrimony ye are to declare it. This is the third time of asking."

Philip Ross stirred in his seat. Gwendoline Bellasis had risen and stood, pallid yet beautiful, swaying unsteadily.

"I—I——" she faltered, and stopped, struggling for self-control. A rustle of amazement ran through the congregation. Gwen put a gloved hand to her side and the Colonial felt his own heart throb with pain and anxiety. What was she going to say? Gwendoline Bellasis grew calmer, though she still trembled pitifully.

"I—I—know of an impediment," she said, "that ought to be a just one before God and man. Victor Ashford is already married to my sister."

The rustle in the church ceased; amazement had been substituted for suspense. The rector regarded perplexedly the author of this disconcerting interruption.

"Perhaps," he said hesitatingly, "you will be good enough, at the end of the service, to see me in the vestry, when you can give me particulars—of this—this allegation."

Gwen threw up her head with a proud, desperate courage. "I will not lie, even about Victor Ashford," she said; "legally, he is not married—he contrived that the ceremony with my sister should be both secret and invalid; it was all a cruel, wicked plot. He will not consent to rectify the flaw in the marriage, nor will Sir John Dacre——"

The rector raised a protesting palm. "Really," he interjected, "this is not quite the place or the time for these details—and—assertions."

"The house of God," said Gwen bravely, "is the fittest place to protest against an outrage offered to Him and to the institution of marriage. This church is to be desecrated by the wedding of Mr. Ashford and Miss Dacre. Her father, Sir John, knows the whole of the facts, and, in common with his future and fitting son-in-law, offered us money to pay for the broken heart, the ruined life, the shattered self-respect of a girl little more than a child!"

Philip Ross' pulses thrilled with a new emotion. His interest in Gwen became in a flash not only the sentimental passion of love, but the surer one of reverence and esteem. He recognised in Gwendoline Bellasis a strong yet womanly woman, courageous, high-minded, eloquent with the rare feminine eloquence that does not unsex its possessor.

A stooping figure, aged and benevolent, was moving along the nave. It was the old verger of the church, the rector had motioned to him significantly.

"My poor lass," he said gently, and in a voice that reached Gwen only, "let me get you a chair and a drink of water in the porch. You're a bit overwrought, and I've daughters of my own. Come, come, my dear, parson is a bit hasty, and I wouldn't see a lady like you up before the magistrates for brawling in church—you would but get names published and do hurt to her you've tried to serve."

Gwen turned; her blood—the hot, fearless justice-loving blood of a good woman—was up.

"Turn me out if you will," she cried, "but I swear to you all, by everything I hold sacred, that Victor Ashford shall not marry Audrey Dacre."

She stepped slowly from her pew and suffered the verger to lead her out of the church. The Australian followed, stared at more than ever.

In the porch he found the verger alone. The old man's strength and powers of persuasion had failed to arrest Gwen's flight. Philip Ross caught a glimpse of her yellow gown at the bend of the road and hastened after her, to see that Gwen left the footpath, slipped into a little wood by the wayside, and flung herself, weeping, on the grass of a tiny glade. The Australian overtook her, quickening his pace to a run. He could not be certain what desperate purpose her wounded and defeated pride might not have in view, despite the reassuring suggestiveness of her threat concerning Victor Ashford.

Once again he stooped over her, as he had done on the preceding day in the lane hard by.

"Miss Bellasis," he said, and his tones were husky with tenderness, "I beg of you, as your sincere well-wisher, if you have with you the weapon I saw you preparing last night, that you will give it to me. Such wild justice as you may be meditating is not for a woman's hand to inflict, and I dare not suppose that you would dream of injuring yourself."

Digitized by Google

Gwen gazed at him in astonishment. "You know about that?" she sobbed; "but I—I—have not got it here. It was for to-morrow, for the wedding—if they would not hear me at the church to-day, I was going to avenge Rene somehow; this marriage will kill her."

Philip Ross raised the drooping, graceful figure; Gwen leant upon him heavily, and sought to hide her tear-stained face.

"Fate has sent me to you, Miss Bellasis," said the Colonial; "I have it in my power to amply avenge both you and your sister. Let us go back to the hotel, and either give me your revolver, or unload it and keep it yourself. As for Victor Ashford, you may leave him to me."

"Rene Must Decide."

"You're quite sure, Ashford, that it is all as you say—that there is no possible point of law by which this strong-minded creature's sister can claim you as her husband?"

Victor Ashford snipped the end of a cigar with a little gold and steel tool that hung at his watch-chain.

"Nothing short of an Act of Parliament, Sir John," he retorted, striking a vesta and holding it in the hollow of his hand, "could make us two one. I am glad you don't mind my smoking, Audrey—it is so soothing to the nerves."

Audrey Dacre looked out from under her parasol of sky-blue chiffon across the broad woodlands and goodly farms of Ashford Court. She stood by the old grey stone balustrade of the elevated terrace from which Ashford Court itself commanded three counties. Near her Victor Ashford lounged in a wicker deck-chair, and her father paced the gravel walk with restless strides.

"I've too much confidence in your astuteness, Victor," she observed coldly, "to share papa's anxiety. Trust you for not doing things by halves! But, though I'm quite willing to marry you and control the biggest rent-roll in Somersetshire, I don't fancy a record scandal which may finish up by putting you in the dock."

Ashford laughed.

"I've taken every precaution against that, my dear girl," he declared; "such a contingency attracts me even less than it does you. Not that a big breach of promise action might not be forced upon us, and, after what we are told happened this morning at St. Bennet's, we must realise that Gwendoline Bellasis is prepared to go to a pretty good length in order to avenge herself, and—ahem!—the little lady with whom I was once so absurdly fascinated."

Sir John Dacre bit his finger nails. "I would not have had the scene at the church happen for worlds," he exclaimed; "law and lawyers, newspaper reports and that sort of scandal, don't greatly affect us—it all seems, even to society and in London, very far off and dim. But here, among our own people and under the very noses of a gaping Liversedge congregation!—that is a different thing."

He stopped abruptly. A servant had glided up to them, a tall, grave, supple footman in a handsome livery, and bearing a gleaming salver.

"This gentleman to see you, sir," he said to Victor Ashford; "I was to say that Mr. Ross had only been in England a short time, and may be leaving at an early date—he would be obliged, sir, if you would give him a few moments."

"Philip Ross," read his master irritably from the offered card. "I don't know the fellow—what is he like?"

"Quite the gentleman, sir," replied the servant, with the unhesitating decision of his class upon the point in question; "there is a lady with him: they are in the terrace drawing-room, sir, the library was occupied."

The other frowned. Ashford Court held a party of wedding-guests, and it irritated its owner to be reminded of the ceremony now so imminent.

"Very well," he said; "I will see him. Pray pardon me, Sir John; forgive me, Audrey; some importunate folk from abroad—I won't be long."

He crossed the terrace and entered the indicated apartment. The Australian came towards him, measuring his involuntary host with a rapid scrutiny.

"Pleased to meet you, Mr.—er—Ross," remarked Victor Ashford, civilly enough, and waited for his visitor to introduce the feminine figure that, veiled and cloaked, sat in a shadowy corner of the room. At his pause he rose, threw back the cloak, lifted the veil, and he beheld—Gwendoline Bellasis.

"A clever trick!" he sneered; "so it is you, Miss Bellasis; and who, if you please, may be Mr. Philip Ross, the gentleman from abroad?"

The Colonial answered quickly. "A friend of Miss Bellasis," he responded; "who thinks that she needs, at this juncture, some slight masculine support. I presume that by now you will have heard of the protest Miss Bellasis felt it her duty to make at St. Bennet's this morning."

"I have," said Victor Ashford, harshly, "and my answer to it will be found in the presence here this afternoon of Sir John and Miss Dacre. With your permission, my young Don Quixote, I will call them in. They may be able to convince you that, whatever happens, Miss Dacre and I intend to be duly married to-morrow."

He gained the window, went through, and retraced his steps across the terrace. A moment later he returned. Audrey Dacre and her father accompanied him.

"Mr. Philip Ross, Audrey," he said, "Mr. Ross, Miss Dacre; Mr. Ross, Sir John Dacre—Mr. Ross, Sir John, is an amateur Quixote and squire of distressed damsels. As for Miss Bellasis, you have met before. I have been telling Miss Bellasis and Mr. Ross, Audrey, that we intend, at all costs, to be married in the morning, despite the highly indecorous disturbance of to-day. May I trouble you and Sir John to confirm that?"

Sir John Dacre bent his head assentingly, and Audrey Dacre yawned. "Why will you people not consult your solicitors?" she observed, wearily; "it would make matters so much—more decent. These vulgar arguments and recriminations are most disagreeable."

The Colonial ignored her interruption. "Mr. Ashford," he remarked, "I desire on behalf of Miss Bellasis, to address a final appeal to you. For the last time, will you repair the treachery you have been guilty of towards your young and innocent wife—for Irene Bellasis is by right Irene Ashford, and you know it. She loves you even yet, will you not play a man's part and make her happy?"

Victor Ashford turned his back. "Oh, spare me any cant," he requested; "it's bad enough on a woman's lips, on a man's it is too utterly sickening."

Philip Ross drew himself up. "Very well," he declared, "I see that you are hopeless. Reformation being out of the question, the necessity for punishment remains. Victor Ashford, you are no longer master of Ashford Court, you are not fit for the place and power it gives. I take it from you."

A sudden pallor alarmed bleached Victor Ashford's face. "Fool!" he exclaimed, "what foolery is this?"

The Australian produced a legal-looking document, with a photograph fastened to it by seals. "Here is an affidavit of identification," he explained, "sworn by the best firm of solicitors in Brisbane. I am not Philip Ross, but Philip Ashford, son of that Robert Ashford who was your uncle's unloved elder son. Under the entail, however, I claim to inherit—you are little better than a beggar."

Ashford recoiled. Gwen was gazing, astounded, at the Colonial. "So this was your secret," she said, "and I—I never dreamt of it!"

"How should you?" asked Philip Ashford, smiling, "you knew nothing of the family history of the Ashfords, or the story of a painful feud between son and father."

Digitized by Google

Audrey Dacre interrupted them with a strange, almost hysterical cry.

"Victor a beggar!" she ejaculated; "an excellent judge of a matrimonial bargain you are, papa. Let us get out of this and countermand those idiotic wedding preparations. Fancy Audrey Dacre married to a pauper—what an escape!"

Her father contemplated Victor Ashford incredulously. "Ashford," he gasped, "you—you—surely this can't be true! You would not have deceived me so shamefully."

"It is perfectly true," said the Colonial, "though in that respect you cannot reasonably blame my unlucky cousin. My father was understood to have been killed in a railway accident in New South Wales. He preferred to be thought so and took the name of the man who really perished, a certain Ross. He grew rich, very rich, and left me all he had, Ashford Court and rent roll were no temptation to me. Had the old home been in worthy hands, I should have allowed it to remain there and gone back again. I would even have permitted this scoundrel to retain it if he would but have done justice to his unhappy wife. I gave him a last chance, he flung it away. Mr. Ashford, my lawyers will communicate with you at the earliest possible moment, Sir John, Miss Dacre, I have the honour to bid you good day."

Victor Ashford had been silent, lost in unabashed reflection.

"One moment—ahem!—cousin Philip," he rejoined, "can we not come to terms? Miss Dacre has thrown me over, and I cannot but rejoice that I have escaped an alliance with so mercenary a bride. What dowry will you give with my—my—well, let us say my temporarily-disowned wife?"

Gwen sprang in between the cousins. "Mr. Ross," she cried, using the name by which she had first known him, "you shall not answer, I would rather see Rene dead than she should pass into his power. He is monstrous, inhuman; she shall not tie herself irrevocably to him."

The Australian put her hand on his arm. "Your sister must decide for herself," he declared, gravely; "Mr. Ashford, in any case, you will hear from me at an early date. For the present, farewell."

* * * * *

Gwen, after much deliberation and intreaty, had her way. Irene did not return to Victor Ashford's roof. Yet they saw one another again, and face to face, when, in a London registry office, the flaw that had been so cunningly contrived in their marriage was rectified by a second one. Nor did any one but Victor Ashford and his returned cousin know the consideration that was paid for the formal agreement that at once provided for the righting of Irene Ashford and her husband's perpetual separation from her.

It was not Ashford Court, that is certain, though there are Ashford's there still, including some little and extremely important ones, two small boys and a girl, the latter Irene, in honour of her "pretty auntie."

Two years after Gwendoline Bellasis married her Australian lover, there came news from abroad—from South America—that clothed the elder Irene in formal black and made her sister hang about her for weeks with anxious tenderness.

"Do you ever wish—you—you had gone back to him?" whispered Gwen once, clasping the golden head to her bosom.

Irene sighed. "At—at first, a little," was her murmured answer, "till I helped to nurse your babies and—and then I was glad."

Gwen kissed her. "Ah, well, dear," she said, twisting the luckless wedding-ring on her sister's hand. "Perhaps you may one day take this off and put one of better omen in its place."

"Not I," retorted Irene, blushing.

But she did, and Gwen wept tears of joy over a gay little wedding at which the sunshine was as golden as the bride's locks, and her two boys carried a white satin train down the nave of St. Bennet's after their beloved "Auntie."

Irene had insisted on St. Bennet's as the scene of her second marriage. "Here you were shamed, dear," she said when it was all over, "and here you have been vindicated."

THE END.

IS YOUR BIRTHDAY THIS WEEK?

We have just secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his prophecies for this week's birthdays.

July 29.—The year will be rather favourable for those born on this day, but many minor drawbacks may be expected. Beware of quarrels and law.

Young girls who were born in the a.m. will have anxiety in love affairs.

A child born to-day will be clever, active, and persevering. Have much pride, and a keen wit. The temper will be quick and forceful.

July 30.—For those who celebrate their birthdays to-day a successful year is promised; business and money will increase. Those in employ will have promotion. Girls born between ten and noon will become engaged and marry. Those in literary pursuits need care.

The day is good to buy and speculate in the a.m. and from 4 p.m. Ask favours of superiors and professional people. Good to marry, or for visiting.

A child born this day will be fortunate. In disposition generous, affectionate, and ambitious; perhaps a bit too cautious. Should be in business for itself.

July 31.—To-day's children will have a changeable year. Keep things well in hand if loss is to be avoided. Many unexpected and sudden events. Don't speculate.

Young girls will experience much deceit in their love affairs, and must beware of attentions from married men. Not a good year to travel or voyage.

A child born to-day will be eccentric, and of curious ideas. Not fortunate; unable to save much. Will want to go abroad and travel.

August 1.—Business will need careful attention this year from those whose birthdays fall to-day. Some quarrels and opposition may be expected.

Young people will court and marry, but experience many crosses in love affairs. An accidental year; beware of mishaps and fire.

A child born to-day will be fond of pleasure and luxury. The mind will be quick and active, but changeable and suspicious. If a girl, health not good.

August 2.—Expect sickness in the family circle of those whose birthdays fall to-day. Keep quiet, or losses in business and through property will result. Avoid speculation.

Single girls should have a care in love affairs; their health will need extra attention against chills and serious colds. The day is bad for business. Not good for negotiating with property and land. Bad for doing business with elderly people.

Care should be taken with the health of a child born to-day, if born near nine p.m. It will be fortunate.

August 3.—An active year, giving much doubt and uncertainty. Avoid speculation, and have a care with business and money.

Love affairs will bring anxiety, and young girls should place little confidence in any attentions. Have a care with letters.

A child born to-day should keep in employ. It will be clever and quick, but extravagant and proud. Fond of speculation and pleasure.

August 4.—Many little annoyances and obstacles will come this year to those whose birthdays are celebrated to-day. Will feel much inclined to travel and change residence. See that servants don't rob you.

The day is bad for visiting, pleasure, and love-making. Keep quiet and let others make the first move. Don't engage servants here.

A child born to-day will be restless and fond of change. The temper will be bitter and the wit sarcastic.

"ASTUREL."

Digitized by Google

A MISSING WORD.

The Romance of a Misdirected Envelope; Told by a Postmaster.

I BREATHED more freely after it was over. It was a temptation resisted—but I felt better after having done it. As I was sorting the letters preparatory to putting them in the mail-bag for Birmingham, one letter turned up and sent a jealous shock through me that sent my heart throbbing and my brain swimming with a sudden dizziness. I might have expected to have seen it there, but none the less did it affect me when I did see it. It was addressed to "Mr. Joseph Norris, Trent Hall."—and I knew that it was his. I had a dear little note in the same handwriting next to my heart then—a few graceful words thanking me for a book I had sent her—a little note I had read over countless times, and kissed often, wondering if it would displease her to know how fondly I cherished it. I thrust the hateful letter out of my sight, and leaning my hand on the table, lived over again the hopes, the fears, the wretchedness of the last twenty-four hours.

The day before, while distributing the mail, I came across a letter addressed to myself, and on opening it, I learnt that through the generosity of a distant relative, whose name I bore, I had been left an inheritance of twenty thousand pounds. What a change a few strokes of a pen had made—transforming Charles Maurice, postmaster of a secluded English village, into Charles Maurice, the possessor of a competence, well invested, yielding a certain income. And how before my good fortune I had thought of Annie Merrill as one separated from me by my poor circumstances, my salary barely supporting my mother and myself, and how could I ask any woman to share my poverty? Now the burden of poverty was most unexpectedly lifted from me, I felt at liberty to tell her the hopes I had never dared to entertain until now. What would her answer be? That I would learn that very night.

In the same post with my letter was one addressed to her, post-marked Birmingham. Her correspondence all passed through my hands, but I had never seen that writing before. It was large, clear, decisive, the writing of a self-possessed man. Who could the writer be? Annie's uncle, Dr. Merrill, had male correspondents in Birmingham. But this letter was the first that had come to her since she came orphaned from the city a year before, and had been received into her uncle's heart and home. But other thoughts put the question of the letter out of my mind. I sent by a messenger a few hurried lines to my mother at home, to prepare her for our good fortune, and then counted the hours which must pass before I could offer my inheritance to Annie, encumbered with its possessor.

When I reached home I found her there before me. My mother, who had taken her into her favour from the first, her sweetness and orphaned situation proving a passport to her heart, had sent for Annie to communicate the good news to her. She was strangely quiet, I thought, and there was a troubled look in her blue eyes I never saw there before.

In fact, after a while, a subdued feeling stole over us all. Annie's disquiet seemed to impart itself to us. I was thinking how I could venture to tell her all my hopes, and my mother, guessing what my thoughts were, left us together most of the evening, but my heart failed me. It was only when I was walking home with Annie to Dr. Merrill's that I found courage to speak. She helped me by saying that I must not think from her silence that she did not rejoice in the happy change in my prospects, for no one could be more sincere in her congratulations than herself. I answered that my good fortune would be valueless to me unless I could share it with the girl I loved.

"The girl you love?" she repeated questioningly.

I felt her hand tremble on my arm.

"The girl I love," I answered, in tones that she might have interpreted, but failed to do.

"She ought to be a happy woman," she continued. "May I ask if I know her?"

"If you know her!" I cried. "If you know her! Oh, who could she be but you?"

"Me?"

She drew her hand quickly away from my arm, and stood quite still before me.

"Me! Oh, did you say me?"

And then I saw the moonlight falling on her face, and it was not the face of a girl shining in happy confusion when she hears the story of his love from the man she prefers. It was pale and shocked, and then she hid it from me in her hands, and burst into tears.

I needed no other answer. I knew my suit was hopeless.

"Don't cry, dear!" said I. "I never thought to wound you."

"I thought you knew," she went on sobbingly. "I thought my uncle might have told. I am to marry Mr. Norris. I had a letter from him to-day. Oh, can you forgive me?"

She stretched out her little hands imploringly. I took them in mine, and I kissed them while my heart was breaking.

"Forgive you, my darling," I said, "I would forgive you if you killed me, I think. Don't grieve, Annie. I will try to bear it."

We parted at her uncle's without another word, and I went home to the motherly heart that I knew would suffer with me, but whose tender sympathy would uphold me in this hour of bitter trial.

The next day I sent off my resignation, for my mother and I agreed to leave the village where we had passed so many quiet years. It was in the afternoon of the same day that the letter of which I have spoken, that I now know was from my rival, attracted my attention. I took it up reluctantly—I felt I would as readily touch a poisonous snake—and was just about to put the postmark on, when I saw that the address was insufficient. The envelope simply bore the words "Mr. Joseph Norris, Trent Hall." "Birmingham" should have been added, but was omitted, and the letter must be consigned to the dead-letter office. With a thrill of savage delight I flung it into the box appropriated to the reception of such castaways, and went on with my evening's work. With that work I went on mechanically, but my thoughts were not agreeably employed.

Digitized by Google

That, then, was the answer to the missive she had received. But it should be long before he would get it—get it too late perhaps for an explanation; for misunderstandings between lovers had often arisen from a slighter cause than the non-arrival of an expected letter. I pictured him waiting and longing for the letter that would not come, and she poor girl, how her tender heart would be tortured by his imagined neglect, when no answer would be forthcoming. She, I knew, would suffer in silence, and I fondly hoped he would do the same. So I sealed the mail-bag, and waited for the messenger to carry it to the station. The express would pass in an hour and a half. And then a struggle began in my heart. The letter seemed to whisper to me that one little act of mine could send it unimpeded on its mission.

No one, I believe, unless he were in my situation, actuated by the same despairing, selfishly hopeful feelings that were overmastering him, could understand what a base impulse I conquered, when at last, after an hour's temptation, I took the letter from its resting-place, wrote in the one needful word, opened the mail-bag, and let it go. Then after it was done, some hot tears rushed to my eyes. It was my last hope, and I could not help indulging in some weakness over its grave.

Three days after I had the poor satisfaction of seeing the results of my good action in a letter in the handwriting of my rival, addressed to Annie, making its unwished-for appearance, as I knew it would, and shortly after, Dr. Merrill took it away with him as he called for his letters.

Loungers came in and out of the office and went away, finding me little disposed for conversation. Nothing yet was known in the village of my acquisition, so I was spared the pain of listening to congratulations that I was in no mood to hear. When I went home that evening I was surprised to find my mother absent, and still more surprised when, on opening a note she had left for me, I learnt that she was with Annie at Dr. Merrill's, and that I was to follow her there. Hopeless as I felt, the prospect of seeing Annie again promised me only a painful pleasure, but still the thought of being near her had a sweet and sad fascination that I could not resist. When I reached the doctor's, I found himself and my mother seated in his office, so intent on the moves of chess-men, that a mere nod on my entrance showed their consciousness of my arrival. Annie was not there; I found her in the parlour standing upon the hearth-rug, the glow of the firelight shining on her golden hair, and a look of eager, happy expectation in her glance that was new to her sweet face.

"I am glad to see you," she said, giving me her hand. "I have been impatient for your coming—and I will tell you why. There is a question I want you to answer. It perplexes me, and somehow I think I can look to you for its solution. You remember a letter I received in the early part of the week?"

She hesitated and cast down her eyes.

"I have too good reason ever to forget it," I answered bitterly.

I saw her face flush. She went on.

"I answered that letter next day. It was of vital importance to me that it should go then. I was troubled when I wrote it, and addressed it at my uncle's desk while the messenger was waiting to take it to the post. I was called away for a minute while doing so, and when I returned simply gave it to the boy, forgetting that the address was unfinished. Getting no answer for two days I wondered what had happened and suddenly remembered my mistake. I knew too well what the fate of my letter must have been. Judge, then, how relieved I felt when my uncle brought me this," taking from the mantelpiece the letter that had come that morning.

Her eyes searched my face. I took her hands in my own.

"Annie," said I, "I believe I could make no one understand what it cost my jealous heart to rectify that mistake, but I did it. I knew it must be an answer to that letter you spoke of a few nights ago. It ought to prove to you how unselfishly I love you, my darling, when I addressed it and sent it on its way to him. I never thought you would find it out. I did it to spare you a moment's uneasiness. If the man you love cares for you as much as I do, he will make your life a happy one."

"How can I repay your generosity?" she said, in a voice tremulous with feeling. "You could not have acted better if you had had a peep at the contents of that letter. But your reward may be claimed when you read this."

She handed me the missive, and glided out of the room. I took it over to the shaded lamp, and read the following:

"Dear Annie,—When beside your father's bed we entered into an engagement of marriage, I felt, as he did, that the interest of the firm in which he and I were partners would be best sustained by our union.

"I wrote to you notifying you of my readiness to fulfil my part of the agreement, and requesting you to be ready to return with me on Sunday as my wife. You say to me that I must not come. There is but one explanation in this refusal, and that is that you have seen someone who pleases you better than your humble servant. It is but natural, child; I cannot blame you. The young should mate with the young, and I am too much your senior to expect to awake in your youthful heart feelings that have long been lifeless in my own.

"I release you from a promise that I am now aware was made by you under the pressure of the sad circumstances. But this fact can never affect the fatherly regard I have ever entertained for the only child of my dear old friend."

I read no farther. Here was my reward. And how nearly I had lost it by the desire of gratifying an ungenerous impulse. Annie has since assured me that had Joseph Norris arrived on the day designated, so great was her awe of her father's old partner, that she never would have had the courage to contend against her destiny. Indeed, the circumstances of having made the mistake she did in addressing the letter seemed to her troubled mind significant of a deep meaning, and that even beyond the grave her father sought to control her actions.

Annie did not return to the parlour. I found her seated in the doctor's office, apparently interested in the game which just at the moment of my entrance he brought to a victorious conclusion.

"Check——"

"Mate," I cried, finishing the word for him, and catching Annie in my arms, heedless of the astonishment of the elderly pair, I demanded my reward.

Well, John Norris, grey-haired, common-place, and undemonstrative, came to Greenwell to other nuptials than his own. He gave away my dear one with the best of grace, and after the marriage congratulated me on my admission into the firm. My ignorance of his meaning was so apparent, that with a grim smile he enlightened me. With my bride I acquired the half interest in a huge business concern in Birmingham. If Annie had chosen to appear as an orphan, dependent on the bounty of her uncle, she had the after-satisfaction of knowing that the love she won was offered to herself alone, and not to the golden store that attracts so many suitors.

"My dearest," I sometimes say to her, "who would think that in a great measure we owe our happiness to one little missing word?"

G. Parkyn.

TO THOSE WHO WRITE.

A Prize of One Guinea will be paid every week by the Editor for the best short story sent in by any of his readers. Contributions should not be less than 1,500 words in length, and not more than 3,000. The Editor reserves to himself the right to publish any contribution submitted. Stamped addressed envelopes must be inclosed for the return of the stories, but, while every care will be taken, the Editor cannot hold himself responsible for possible loss of MSS.

Digitized by Google

The Romance of Pleasant Alley.

Telling of a Strange Discovery with a Happy Denouement.

THE person responsible for the christening of Pleasant Alley must have performed his duty in a spirit of unconscious irony; for never was spot more inaptly described. The houses which formed the court were high and squalid, and by some mysterious law of architecture gradually leant more and more towards each other from the first floor upwards, as though mutually determined that not one ray of the sun should strike upon the paving stones beneath, or their own windows; although I am bound to say that even had this peculiarity not existed the rooms would not have reaped much benefit. There was apparently a rooted objection to glass amongst the inhabitants, for on a modest computation there were not more than six entire panes in the whole four hundred originally put in by the builders; and the holes were covered by a variety of opaque substances which varied from an old stocking to a piece of paper. A sheet of glass represented the price of a meal sufficient for a family reckoned by Pleasant Alley finances, and meals were not so easily come by as to be lightly exchanged for an entire window.

Once in seven days the court received a corporation cleansing, which was really the only bit of pleasure it ever had. This was an innovation of only a few months' standing, and at first had not met with the cordiality it deserved; but gradually Pleasant Alley-ites began to look upon it in the light of a rich joke.

No doubt the authorities' action was dictated by somebody on the board realising that the inhabitants had not much time for cleansing operations—the staple industries of the court being the making of match-boxes at twopence threefarthings a gross, and the sewing of shirts at a few pence per dozen, and to obtain a really comfortable income—say, one shilling and sixpence a day—one wanted to work fourteen out of the twenty-four hours.

Pleasant Alley was undergoing one of these parochial wash and brush-ups, when a young man, dressed in clerical attire, accosted the official who was manipulating the hose, with an inquiry as to where the court led to.

The man having first directed the stream of water at a particularly dirty corner, placed the metal nozzle on the ground, and opined that "It led nowheres as he knew on." He might have added, with perfect truth, that the same remark could be applied to the lives of its residents, but not being given to the utterance of unpleasant truths, didn't.

Undeterred by the information, the clergyman turned up his trousers legs and threaded his way between the pools of water, intent on pushing forward investigations on his own account.

Now we have intimated that the cleansing operations were looked upon as innocent recreation in the alley, and consequently shirts and match-boxes were put aside and the doors and fragmentary windows filled with faces.

Blank amazement was the predominant feeling evoked by the reverend gentleman's sudden appearance.

Nobody ever came down Pleasant Alley unless absolutely forced by duty or the fact of residence, and popular opinion was divided between the visitor being the "school-board" or the rent-collector in disguise—Pleasant Alley was always in a chronic state of backwardness regarding its rent, and held strong personal objections to sending its young to school. Consequently it was given to locking its doors and feigning absence from home when attempts were made to bring it to a proper frame of mind concerning these matters.

Imbued with these doubts concerning the clergyman's bona-fides, there was a general exodus of faces from the windows and a general bolting and barring of doors. No single family aspired to more than two rooms in the court, and the majority had to be content with one. For the general convenience the outer portals of the houses were always kept open, and the visitor passed in and gently rapped at the first door. Receiving no response he tried the handle, with no effect, and then passed to the next with a similar result. The first, second, and third floor of that particular house shared the apparent emptiness of the ground one. So he wended his way to No. 2. Here his efforts at last met with success, for the door of the first room he approached was actually ajar. An invitation to enter, came in answer to his tap and he did so.

A young girl rose from the table where she had been sitting sewing blouses, and stood gazing at him.

"I have just lately been appointed one of the curates at St. Peter's, and am paying a round of visits to the parishioners," he said, in explanation of his presence.

There was a pleasant unassuming tone in the way he spoke which appealed to the girl.

"And you look upon we of Pleasant Alley as part of your congregation?" she queried, whilst a smile of half-pathos, half-amusement, parted her lips.

"Certainly, are you not?" he asked, also smiling.

"As much yours as anybody's I suppose—and you expect us to come to church perhaps?"

"We should like you to."

"Then I am afraid you will be sadly disappointed. In the first place, we have little or no time; and as a second reason, there is little or no inclination—I don't mean to be rude, although it may sound so. I simply state the facts," she said apologetically, and then burst out with another question. "Do you know what it is to be poor?"

"I am not overburdened with riches," he responded simply.

"I am not referring to genteel poverty, the poverty which just manages to make both ends meet," she remarked quietly, "although that is no doubt hard enough for a proud man or woman to bear; but the never ceaseless struggle to earn the bare necessities of life, the constant suspense as to where the next meal is coming from. The kind of poverty which forces one to sew a dozen of these"—she picked up the blouse she was working on—"at tenpence a dozen. It takes twelve hours a day hard work to earn ten shillings a week. Think of it, ten shillings a week for rent, food, and clothes. Can you wonder that when the seventh day comes round we have no desire for church, we simply want to sit down and rest our weary fingers, and gather up what strength we may for the labours of the coming week?"

What could he say? What can any minister of the gospel

Digitized by Google

say when he is brought face to face with such weary misery as this? The Reverend Arthur Wilson was a very young man, but many a one his senior has been nonplussed in a similar position. He might have offered platitudes concerning the consolation religion can bring even to such toil-worn creatures as the girl before him, but under the circumstances they would have fallen little short of insults. Intuition told him that the best course to pursue would be to put into words the fact that although he had not experienced the life she spoke of, yet he sympathised with the people who had to endure it from the bottom of his heart, and he did so.

"I am sure you do," she answered, and the bitterness melted from her voice. "Yet you are powerless to help us. I suppose we are beyond all assistance. Sometimes I wonder if the money which is spent in carrying Christianity to savages beyond the sea, might not be better spent at home. There is, I believe, an enormous building, with a large staff of clerks and missionaries, which issues I don't know how many tons of tract literature each year for the benefit of people in foreign lands, who must first be taught to read it. I would not decry for one moment the noble men and women who often give their lives for the furtherance of that work, but does it not sometimes strike them that there is labour here in Christian England for them to do.

"Do the charitable people who subscribe the thousands of pounds for this, never realise that at their very doors there are immortal souls to be saved, souls which are groping in the dark because the bodies in which they are enclosed are slowly withering away for the want of a little sustenance. To me it seems that not a penny of that money should leave the land whilst such places as Pleasant Alley and its counterparts exist."

"Hush!" interrupted the clergyman, "our religion demands that we should spread the Word of God abroad. There are religious workers in England, remember. I can quite understand how hard it appears, but I must remind you that the vast majority of the people you speak of are benighted beings worshipping fictitious gods through sheer ignorance of there being any brighter, better religion. Surely you would not be so unjust as to condemn them to remain in darkness from which they cannot hope to emerge unless we send Christian men and women out to teach them the path which leads to the light. There are places of worship here open to all, and it rests with ourselves whether we avail ourselves of the teaching their ministers are ready to impart; there would be no such facilities in the countries you speak of unless we made them."

"Maybe you are right," she answered wearily. "Yet there are so many savages who badly need Christianising here in London—the men who grow rich by doling out the merest pittance to girls and women for work such as this" again her toil-worn fingers touched the blouse—"aye, and even worse-paid for labour which you will find in some of the other rooms of this house. The draper who gives his assistants inferior food as a part of their wages; the landlords who exact exorbitant rents for such hovels as these; the thousand and one harpies who prey on unskilled labour. All would be the better for clerical ministrations. Do not misunderstand me, we would not accept charity. All we ask is a fair rate of pay for our labour, enough to allow us to have perhaps two hours out of the twenty-four for rest and recreation."

"It is not my province to speak harshly of any man," he said sadly, "but I am afraid those you speak of are solely given over to the worship of Mammon, and are irreclaimable. Is there no other way in which we can fight the evil they bring about; for instance, would it not be possible to make some arrangements of a co-operative nature, whereby the worker could be brought into direct communication with the buyer and thus get the full value of his or her work?"

"I have often thought of that," she replied, looking at him with curious eyes, "but you know that would require capital."

"But it might be obtained," he said eagerly.

"Yes, that would be the solution of the problem," she agreed quietly.

The Reverend Arthur remained talking a few more minutes and then bade her good-bye, promising to call again. He visited several other people in Pleasant Alley, for his long stay in their neighbour's room had convinced the remainder that he could not be the rent-collector or school-board.

The same wretched struggle for existence was the predominating feature of all. He learnt that the name of the girl he had just seen was Daisy Lawson, and that she had lived in the Alley for a year. She appeared to have been a stranger to all previous to that, but she was universally loved and respected. Many a kindness had she shown to her fellow strugglers; each had something to tell which added to the interest he took in her.

"Can you tell me where this court leads to?" inquired the clergyman.

His thoughts were very busy with her, as he walked away. There was an air of refinement about her which was strangely out of keeping with the sordid surroundings. Her mode of speech was that of an educated woman, and he had noticed that her hands were white and well-shaped in spite of the finger-tips being disfigured by the needle she so ceaselessly plied. Then she was beautiful, not perhaps judged on severely classical lines, but beautified with high resolve and steadfast courage. What could such a woman be doing in Pleasant Alley? Surely there must be more congenial work for such as her?

They met very often in the few weeks that followed. For, after consulting her, he had taken a large room in the Alley wherein they held a short, bright service on Sunday afternoons; then, too, he made a rule of spending whatever time he could spare from his many duties with them at their labour. Six or eight would bring their work to one apartment and he would read aloud something they were interested in, or chatted on subjects which appealed to them. He found much to admire in these people. Truly, there is no charity which surpasses that of the poor to the poor, and amongst them all there were none who showed more kindness to her fellows than Daisy Lawson, done, moreover, in a quiet, unostentatious way.

Digitized by Google

He never heard another word of complaint from her after the little outbreak when they first met, and knew now, although she had never told him, that her object on that occasion had been to point out the way in which he might be of use to Pleasant Alley.

He had been working very hard to raise funds to make arrangements which would redeem the actual workers from the grip of the middle-man, but the church to which Arthur Wilson belonged was not a rich one, and he had no influence in financial circles which could be exerted. He often lamented to Daisy his inability to do more for the people, but although plainly sympathising with the object she did not seem much perturbed or surprised at its non-success. The Reverend Arthur rather wondered at this, knowing how near the plan was to her heart. Truth to tell, it was rather disappointing. He did not like to feel that she was uninterested in his undertakings.

Perhaps the dismay this brought caused him to rigidly examine his feelings towards her. "Why should I mind? What is she to me?" he asked himself. And even as the thought was formed the answer came: "Because she is all the world to you, because you love her."

Yes, ever since the day they had first met, the affection had been steadily growing, unsuspected by him, and now he knew she was the only woman he could ever wish to make his wife.

With the timidity of the genus lover he one day put his fate to the test.

She heard him to the finish in silence, but the soft light which came to her eye gave hope.

"And in spite of my only being a work-girl—a woman of the people, you love me?" she asked, all aglow with tenderness.

"That is but another reason why you should consent. Think of the assistance your knowledge of the workers will be to me in my ministration," he pleaded ardently.

"If only for that I suppose I should have to consent," she said, with a happy smile.

He gathered her in his arms, pressing his lips to hers, as he asked jealously:

"And for no other reason, sweetheart?"

"Yes," she murmured shyly. "Because I love you dearly."

There were many other sweet things they said to one another, but it is not within our province to record them. There is one item of the conversation that must be referred to, however.

He had been speaking hopefully of some day getting enough money to bring their pet project into being.

"But suppose we needn't wait," she asked. "Suppose, after all, I should turn out to a rich woman masquerading as a poor one."

"You?" he gasped.

"Yes," she said solemnly. "For that is what I really am. I trust you will not like me the less on that account."

He gave her osculatory proof to the contrary.

Then Daisy told him that it was quite true. How she also had been struck with the idea of bettering the people's lot on the same lines as those he had laid down, and had determined to live their life for a year so that she might learn the best mode of putting it into execution.

"So now you can start as soon as you like, sir," she finished.

And they did, with most happy results. Would that there were more like them.

Martin H. Potter.

Woman and her Watch.

Perhaps a woman can't sharpen pencils and throw stones in just the orthodox way, but she can take care of a watch. Her ministrations begin with winding the watch, which she never thinks of doing unless she is going shopping or on a journey.

Then, if she doesn't break the mainspring, she tucks the watch inside her dress, where the multitudinous hooks and buttons scrape and scratch the case, and where it requires a half-hour's investigation when she wants to see what time it is.

At night, when she takes off her dress, she forgets all about it, of course, and sends it whizzing under the bed as she throws back her bodice preparatory to wrestling her way out of it.

If it stops she isn't at all disconcerted. With a serenity born of long experience she picks it up and shakes it until it ticks again.

After all it is only the unusually careful woman who wears her watch inside her dress, for the intricate fastenings of the fashionable bodices render it well nigh impossible. She has the happy fashion of tucking it into the pocket of her cloak, or dumping it into the bottom of the bag she carries about with her, and which usually contains everything, from cough lozenges to her marriage certificate, or tucking it away, along with half a hundred samples, her latch keys, and small change, in her purse.

Jewellers have wise instincts, notice quickly, and cater well to sweet woman's whims. They understand that there is no earthly use in remonstrating with women, and explaining that it is their own fault that their watches never keep accurate time, and are constantly in need of repair.

No; they philosophically set about making little purses and card-cases, with a separate apartment for the watch, and an aperture in the outside, through which the hands may be seen; they set them in bracelets to be clasped about their wrist; they introduce them into the handles of umbrellas; they bury them in the heart of flower petals with a pin at the back; and, last of all, they have produced the woman's delight—the chatelaine.

This octopus arrangement of silver and gold pins on the one side, or slides over the belt, or winds girdlewise about her waist, but in any event it keeps the watch swaying and banging against all the other knives and smelling-bottles and shears and things with which she burdens herself in a perfectly delightful way that is warranted to thwart the purpose of the best-disposed timepiece ever manufactured.

There is only one other way in which she shows her ingenuity to better advantage than in the matter of watch management. She can think of a few more things to do with a cross baby than she can with a watch, but not many.

F. P. W.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.

Mrs. Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia: Her companion.

FRANKIE WINS A DRESS, AND I LOSE EIGHT HUNDRED POUNDS.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF NEW READERS.

CYNTHIA tells in the opening chapter of her arrival at her cousin's in the capacity of companion, and of her discovery that Mrs. Norton is taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money are being lost and won. The climax is reached one night when Mary Vernon stakes her diamond ear-rings (a gift from Lord Kinross) and one of the onlookers finds them to be paste. Mary Vernon declares that they are exactly as given to her by Lord Kinross, whereupon Kinross breaks off the engagement. The diamonds subsequently appear as a gift from Fluffy to Mrs. Norton, set in a pair of hat-pins. A few weeks later the notorious Mrs. Norton, with Fluffy's help, succeeds in stealing a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew at the Café Regal, by substituting for the millionaire's pocket-book one exactly like it. Later on Cynthia discovers the original pocket-book, empty of course, in one of her boxes. Not knowing what to do, she confides in Fluffy, who is very kind, but makes her promise to say nothing at all to anyone else on the subject. He takes charge of the duplicate pocket-book. Mrs. Norton now moves into her new house in Pont Street, and it is while here that Sir John Strickland, a poor baronet, proposes to her. She refuses, but hints to him that if he will consent to allow his name to appear on the directorate of certain companies he will be bound to make money, and then her answer might be different. Mrs. Norton is next presented at Court by her friend, Lady Gaveston. For this function she wears some superb diamonds which have been lent her by Lord Kinross. The Society papers declare her to be the most beautiful and best-dressed woman at the presentation. The same evening Lord Kinross calls at Pont Street for a private interview, and it is during this interview that Percival Hope enters the room unannounced, and makes the startling statement that Mary Vernon has discovered the thief who stole her diamonds. Shortly afterwards Mrs. Norton leaves the room, Cynthia however stays, unknown to Kinross and Percival Hope. While there she overhears Hope, who turns out to be Kinross' cousin, tell Kinross that in a fortnight's time he will prove to Kinross that Mrs. Norton is an adventuress living upon the proceeds of the robbery of her friends. Cynthia tells Mrs. Norton what she has overheard. On the evening of the next day Lady Gaveston tells Mrs. Norton that she doesn't approve of her behaviour towards Sir John Strickland, and that unless she decides at once either to marry or refuse him, she will return to Scotland. Mrs. Norton asks for and obtains a fortnight's grace in which to make up her mind.

WHATEVER future unpleasantness Fate—or Percival Hope—might have in store for her, at present Frankie had things all her own way. She was Society's latest fad, and, to quote the pink youth—"ran Society for all it was worth." Smart women besieged her with invitations, and a call at Pont Street was an indispensable part of the day's programme for a man about town.

Each morning, perfectly turned out, Frankie went for a canter in the Park, varied by an excursion in a celebrity's car, or a drive on a somebody's coach.

Mrs. Norton's admirers increased and multiplied in those days; among a certain set our house was called the "Barracks," because it was always full of Army men.

The table at luncheon every day was crammed. All sorts of people used to drop in. Notorieties who ate a lot and said little, geniuses who talked a great deal and drank more. Millionaires who bored themselves, Members of Parliament who bored their neighbours, actors who bored everyone impartially, and a few nice commonplace persons with good manners. The food was always lovely at Pont Street, and the wine, thanks to Sir John, excellent.

After luncheon and a half-hour's gossip over cigarettes and coffee, Frankie would change her frock and drive to a swagger "At Home," a smart bazaar, or some important function.

Her frocks were things to dream of. "What Mrs. Norton wore" was one of the principal items in the report of any fashionable gathering. Occasionally I accompanied her, more often I spent the afternoon with Lady Paula, sometimes with Toby Ffolliott, a friend of Lord Kinross and devoted to my cousin.

It was Toby who told me that Lord Chesterton was driving Frankie down to Epsom for the Derby.

Digitized by Google

"Chesterton always drives fast nags and pretty women!" observed young Ffolliott. "His turn-out is sure to be the smartest on the road. You are coming, of course?"

I intimated that, as yet, I had not been asked.

"Chesterton told me he'd done so; he's not usually forgetful. He's very keen about having you, Miss Hamilton."

That evening Frankie came to my room.

"Lord Chesterton is going to drive me down to Epsom," she said in a casual way. "Would you care to come? I don't suppose he'd mind."

It wasn't a nice way of conveying an invitation. I felt hurt and showed my annoyance.

"If Lord Chesterton wants me to go he can ask me himself," I replied. "I don't care for second-hand invitations."

Frankie stared.

"Oh, if you are going to put on frills," she laughed, "I've nothing more to say. Good-night, Cynthia."

The next day I got a letter from Lord Chesterton inviting me in due form.

"Shall I go, Frankie?" I asked.

She looked at me steadily for a moment, then shrugged her shoulders. "I suppose so," she said, and the matter dropped.

All the same, I knew Frankie did not want me at the Derby—with Lord Chesterton, at any rate.

Derby day fell in May that year—a beautiful morning, fresh and sweet with a summer sky and a soft west breeze.

Frankie came down to an early breakfast looking radiant. She used to put in an occasional appearance at the meal to appease Lady Gaveston, who stigmatised breakfast in bed as ungodly.

Just as we were finishing Frankie was summoned to see Madame Clairette, her dressmaker.

"Come with me, Cynthia," she said, "I am afraid Clairette is going to be unpleasant about her bill."

Frankie's forebodings were fully realised. Clairette was most unpleasant, not to say rude. She announced that after repeated applications demanding her account she had called for it in person.

"I'm tired of waiting for my bill, Mrs. Norton, and weary of your broken promises to pay it; I have come to tell you that I must and will have my money. For nine months I have supplied your costumes, in many cases your hats and underskirts as well. I won't do it any longer. There is my account, £2,000; now, are you going to pay me?"

"Not this morning, my good Clairette," said my cousin imperturbably, "I can't spare the money. It's Derby day, you know, and I've made a heavy book."

"Then I give you no more clothes. Not even the dress for the Duchess of Warminster's ball," The little woman—she was very small and very dowdy—fairly bristled with indignation.

"So much the worse for you, Clairette; every one of your clients shall hear of your insolence before the day is out. I'm not the only woman who runs a long bill, remember. You'll find that no credit will mean no customers in your case."

The dressmaker flushed, her retort came quickly.

"My other clients are different," she said spitefully. "I would give them six months or six years' credit. I should be sure of my money at the end. But"—she paused—"I can't afford to run any risks, Mrs. Norton; £2,000 is a large sum."

"You are extremely insolent!" said Frankie.

"I'm sorry, ma'am. I want my money."

"I can let you have £500 on account," said my cousin at last. "That will suit you, I suppose?"

Clairette paused; then, looking straight at Frankie, answered decidedly: "No! I won't supply any more clothes until the whole is paid, Mrs. Norton, and that's the truth!" She snapped her teeth, and shook her head with emphasis.

For the first time Frankie looked anxious; I had felt terribly uncomfortable throughout the interview. I was sorry for Clairette, but even more sorry for my cousin. I happened to know that she was very short of money at the moment; her dividends were as usual overdue, the account at the Bank overdrawn.

Consider the situation! She had been asked to the Duchess of Warminster's ball—the "event of the season!" She had anticipated creating a sensation, climbing another step up the social ladder. It had needed no little skill on Frankie's part to win an invitation from the Duchess; she valued the recognition it implied and was determined to make the most of it. And now at the last moment was her triumph to be jeopardised, her efforts nullified by a dressmaker? Without £2,000 Clairette would not give up the gown specially designed for the great occasion. Without the gown the ball for Frankie was impossible. And the date was fixed for to-morrow night!

How in the world could poor Frankie find £2,000—and by to-morrow night? A difficult problem, but my cousin solved it.

"Very well," she said curtly, "you shall have the money. I want my dress otherwise I should not entertain your demand for a moment." She sat down and rapidly wrote out a cheque for the amount. "As you are here you may as well see the gown on me, Clairette. It may want a little alteration, and I sha'n't have time to-morrow. Cynthia," she turned to me, "take a hansom, will you, and drive to Clairette's place in Bond Street? I want you to bring back my dress while madame waits."

For a second the dressmaker hesitated. It was on the cards for her to veto my cousin's proposition, to decline to give up either her time or the frock. She glanced quickly, half suspiciously from the cheque to my cousin's face. What she read there seemed to give her reassurance. She pocketed the pink slip of paper, and consented to remain.

Frankie followed me into the hall. "Don't you come away without the gown, Cynthia, you understand?" she whispered.

"Yes; but, Frankie, what will you do? You're overdrawn at the bank, you know. Clairette will find that out as soon as she presents the cheque, and then——" I stopped, troubled at the thought of what might happen.

Frankie smiled.

"Don't worry," she said lightly. "I'm not quite a fool. The cheque is crossed, Cynthia, and therefore won't be presented at my bank for two days at least. By that time I shall have got the money somehow."

Somehow! Long afterwards I understood what the expression meant.

I drove to Bond Street, captured the frock, and returned in triumph. Clairette put the finishing touches required and departed in peace.

"She's an atrocious woman!" said Frankie, as the door shut behind her. "But, thank goodness, whatever happens I have got my frock."

Atrocious or not, Clairette was undoubtedly an artist. Frankie was wearing one of her chefs d'œuvres that very day. The gown was of dead white cloth embroidered in gold. The coat bodice fitting like a glove opened over a full vest of point d'Alençon caught across the bust by an Indian clasp of fine gold beautifully jewelled. The waist belt and coat buttons matched the clasp. The long, closely-cut gown clung to her supple figure—a figure crowned with a picture hat framing the golden glory of her hair.

"The Norton" was a notable success that day. Everybody turned to look at the fair woman in the white and gold.

Digitized by Google

My own frock was biscuit-coloured cloth, with a lovely little Eton jacket in tucked silk of the same shade, with turquoise buttons. When I was ready I went to show myself to Frankie.

I found my cousin poring over a letter. Frankie had the post-bag brought to her room every morning, and sorted the contents herself.

"Do you know this writing, Cynthia?" she asked, handing me the letter in question.

"Why it's Percival Hope's!" I replied. "Has he been writing to you, Frankie?"

"No, not to me," she said scornfully, "to my maid," and she showed me an envelope addressed to Ella Martin.

"You may as well read the letter," she continued. "See what he says for yourself."

Considerably astonished, I read as follows:

"I am sorry to hear of your trouble. I may be able to help you if you give me fuller details. Meet me South Kensington Station this afternoon at five, and I will see what can be done. "PERCIVAL HOPE."

Ella Martin and Percival Hope, the conjunction of names was ominous!

"Wherever did you find the letter, Frankie?" I cried; "and what on earth does it mean?"

"Never mind where I found it, Cynthia, I have it and that is enough. As for the meaning, that's plain. Hope swore he would bring Kinross proofs that I was an adventuress; he wants Ella to help him get 'em. Briefly, he's going to pump her, ascertain what she knows, and all she imagines about me. It is easy enough to see that; what puzzles me is how he opened up communications with her without my knowing," and she glanced towards the post-bag. "He'll bribe her heavily to speak; the question is if I can't bribe her more heavily and keep her silent."

"But, Frankie——"

"I know what you're going to say, child," my cousin cried impatiently, "that Ella knows nothing about me—nothing to my disadvantage, at all events. That is so, of course. All the same, I don't want her and Percival to meet; what is more, they shall not. Ring the bell, will you—I'll have Ella in and speak to her."

"Wait till-to-morrow, Frankie," I urged. "Lord Chesterton will be here directly; we shall be late if you speak now."

"Don't be ridiculous, Cynthia. I must see her at once,—at once, I tell you—there's not a moment to be lost!"

She leant back, her lips compressed, her eyes hard; there was a look of tense anxiety about her—anxiety I could not understand.

"I want you to match this silk for me, Ella," she said smiling, herself once more as the girl entered. "I'm afraid it will take you some time, the colour is so uncommon. Still, it is a bright morning and the walk will do you good. You are not looking very well," she went on kindly, "what's the matter with you?"

"A little tired, ma'am, that's all, thank you."

"A little worried also, I think, Ella. What is troubling you—anything money will help?"

"You're very kind, but it's not money, thank you."

She hesitated for a moment, then went on quickly: "If you remember, ma'am, I told you about a week ago I was in great distress about a young man who had enlisted for a soldier. I wanted to know if there was any hope of getting his discharge—his regiment's ordered to the Front!"

"I remember something about it now, Ella. But I've been so busy lately it went out of my head."

The girl looked sullen. She answered with a touch of resentment.

"It doesn't matter now, thank you. I have found friends who will help me in the matter. I shouldn't have mentioned it again, ma'am, only you asked what was troubling me."

Frankie smiled sweetly.

"I am glad you have found some friends," she said. "Who is the young man, Ella—your brother?"

"No, ma'am."

"Then it's your sweetheart."

The girl flushed. My cousin touched her lightly on the shoulder. "Come," she said in a low caressing voice, "tell me all about it."

Ella caught her breath.

"Oh, ma'am," she cried, then, with a burst of sobs: "We were to have been married next year, and now he's gone for a soldier, and perhaps he'll get shot."

"He had a tiff with you, I suppose, and like a foolish fellow enlisted?"

Ella nodded, trying to control her sobs.

"Jim's an engraver by trade," she continued, "and earning good money. But I told you all about him once before, ma'am." Resentment was creeping back into her voice. "There's no occasion for me to trouble you again."

"I am so sorry, Ella, that I didn't pay more attention at the time. However, it is not too late. Where is your sweetheart stationed?"

"At Chelsea. But I don't want you to trouble, thank you, ma'am. I have found friends whom I am sure will help me."

She tightened her lips and gazed defiantly at Frankie.

"You can't have too many friends," returned my cousin, "and I'm willing to be one of them." She looked at the girl with a bright smile. "Would you like to see your sweetheart to-day, Ella—this very afternoon?"

"Ma'am!" Ella turned crimson. "If I only could!" She looked wistfully and clasped her hands.

"Well, then you shall. I think I can manage it for you. I'll give you a note to Captain Bartlett—he's at Chelsea just now, and he will get a few hours' leave for Jim to go out with you. Dry your tears and look cheerful, Ella, or your sweetheart won't be pleased to see you. Nothing bores a man like a woman in the dumps, and men never forgive being bored. They'll look over everything but that. Here is a note for Captain Bartlett; get off at once and have a good time. I'll talk to you to-morrow about Jim's discharge. I won't forget this time, I promise you. Good-bye."

The door closed on the comforted Ella. My cousin took a quick, hard breath, and began to pace the room muttering to herself the while:

"Hope won't meet her this afternoon or to-morrow—I'll take care of that. The next day he may contrive to see her—call here when I'm out perhaps. By that time I must have my plans ready. Somehow or other this Jim must get his discharge through me, that will insure Ella's silence and checkmate Hope. Yes, I shall pull through yet. A little luck and then—— If only she doesn't tell about the photograph, if only——" My cousin stopped abruptly and stared at me hard.

"I've a bad habit of talking to myself," she said, "but what I say is always nonsense. Do you hear, nonsense!" She caught me by the arm.

But I made no reply, a vague suspicion silenced me—suspicion of Frankie. I turned my face away.

The next moment she was kneeling on the floor beside me, her hands clasping mine.

"What is it?" she said quickly; "there's a strange look, a new look on your face. It's as though you don't trust me, as though you suspected me of something wrong. What does it mean, Cynthia? What have I done?"

"Nothing, nothing!" I protested, ashamed already of my doubt.

Digitized by Google

"CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA."
New Series of Stories.

"I never thought you would turn against me," she went on. "Oh, I know there's a lot in my life you cannot understand. How should you. You don't realise how I have to fight my way. Every woman I meet has her knife in me. Because they smile do you think they like me in their hearts? I tell you they hate me, fear me, envy me. Why? Because I'm stronger than they are, and they know it. They grudge me success, and plot and plan to bring me failure. And you—you that I thought so different—are as bad as the rest!" She rose impetuously and turned away from me.

"No, no, Frankie; don't say such things!"

"Go!" she said, "at once, if you prefer. I would not have you stay with me a moment against your will. You can return to Bruges, go back to the convent to-day, if you wish!"

The convent! High white walls upon a green hillside, steeped in the sunshine of a summer afternoon, rose before me. I heard the hum of the children's voices, the chime of the convent bell. The sisters with their meek smiles and gentle eyes stood beside me. The wind brought me the fragrance of the lilies, full of the peace of that life, so very far from this.

For a moment I was drawn towards it—but only for a moment. Already I repented and reproached myself for doubting Frankie. I was very fond of her, and of the life, and—well, of somebody else who played a not unimportant part in it.

"I don't want to leave you, Frankie dear!" I said. "And I think nothing but what's kind about you."

For a moment she hesitated, then turned and kissed me several times. The crisis was over; we were reconciled.

"Come," she said brightly, "we're friends now, let's enjoy ourselves."

She seized my hand, together we raced downstairs, to the consternation of the butler, not to mention Lady Gaveston.

The rest of the party were waiting for us. Lord Chesterton, Toby Ffolliott, one or two Army men, and a sporting Baronet named Fulke—this last was accompanied by his sister, a sweet thing, with pink cheeks and golden hair that did not match. Mrs. Curtis Blount was also with us, but the faithful Algy for once did not accompany her. She looked very handsome in pale grey with pink roses, but did not seem in the best of tempers, and snapped me up quite sharply.

Lord Chesterton looked distinguished in his Newmarket coat. Well set up, with square shoulders, and a deep chest, his keen blue eyes looked out from a face tanned by the sun; a quiet face with reserves of power, a massive chin, and firmly-modelled mouth. A silent, and one felt a strong man.

"I'm very glad you are coming, Miss Hamilton," he said kindly. "Toby declared you wouldn't trust yourself to me. I was awfully down in the mouth about it. I want you on the box-seat, don't you know."

I felt immensely flattered, but, before I could reply, Frankie answered for me.

"It's quite nice of you, Lord Chesterton, but Cynthia's got a tiresome headache, poor child. I am afraid she'd feel the glare too much in front. What do you think yourself, dearie?" She smiled, but all the same I didn't like it.

"I'd better take a back seat please, Lord Chesterton." I said spitefully. He smiled but made no further protest. Frankie was placed in the seat of honour, Toby made room for me beside him at the very back.

"I'm sorry," that young man observed, glancing at Chesterton,

"Why?" I asked sharply.

"Partly for Chesterton. He wanted you beside him. Mostly for myself—I wanted Frankie."

"I do hope you are not going to be silly about my cousin," I said crossly, I was getting tired of Frankie's lovers.

"I'm silly already," he returned. "I'd give my life for her," he added with a sudden fierce energy.

"You are really very foolish, Toby. What is the good of caring for a woman who never thinks of you, barely knows you are alive?"

"That's what you say," returned Toby with unruffled good humour. "As for the good of it, I don't know, but it seems to me, it must be good for a fellow to care for a woman like her. It makes him hate anything low down, you know, or mean. Anyway, I can't help myself. I shall go on caring all my life. There's nothing I wouldn't do for her, nothing," he added under his breath.

He amused me at the time with his boyish fervour. Later on I remembered what he had said, and I felt sorry.

"It's not very likely that she'll ever want me to do anything, worse luck," he continued. "Does she ever speak of me, Cynthia?"

His honest, boyish face was terribly wistful, there was a look in his brown eyes one hated to see. I felt sorry for him, but it was no good to encourage him in being silly. The sooner he was cured the better. So with a hard heart and clear conscience I said "Never!"

"It's utterly hopeless," I continued. "You are a nice boy, Toby, not too clever and quite good-tempered. But you've no money, and you're no match, for Frankie, at all events."

He nodded gloomily, and muttered something about "prospects." But I thought it wiser not to hear, and commenced to talk about Lady Paula.

"She's gone down to Cromer with Lord Kinross. It isn't often he misses a Derby, is it, Toby?"

"First one for years. When is he coming back to town?"

"The end of next week," I said, and the words brought a touch of apprehension. The end of next week—the end also of the fortnight in which so much was going to happen.

Once arrived at Epsom, I saw little of Frankie, she went straight to see the favourites in the paddock. A lot of women went with her, but I preferred to remain where I was. People made a great fuss over my cousin that day. Everyone seemed talking about her, and a certain great personage desired an introduction, and invited, or perhaps I ought to say, "commanded" her to lunch.

It was one of the most brilliant Derbys there had been for years. The scene was dazzling. The grand stand gay with smart people perfectly dressed, the drags with their glossy horses, the crowd of pretty girls in summer frocks against the background of green trees, through which one caught a glimpse of the Downs, cool, refreshing, stretching away into the distance.

Lord Chesterton bought a bouquet of violets and mauve heartsease, which he asked me to wear.

"Violet and mauve are my colours," he explained. "I've entered Nestor for the Derby, you know."

"I hope he'll win. I think I'd like to back him, if you please, Lord Chesterton."

"In gloves?" he said, laughing. "Very well, Miss Cynthia, I'll let you know my size."

"Surely you're not going to bet against your own horse?" I asked.

"I'd do more than that," he answered, "to win a pair of gloves from you."

He looked at me quite strangely as he spoke. I turned red, and felt uncomfortable.

Mrs. Curtis Blount gave a horrid little laugh as he moved away.

"Are you going to pin your faith on the horse or his owner?" she said.

"Lord Chesterton is not going to ride, is he?" I asked.

She stared hard at me.

"No," she said, sneering, "not in this race." Then, "Why don't you put some money on Nestor. I will lend you a pony if you want it. You're sure to win, you know, and it would please Lord Chesterton. Perhaps you think it wrong to bet? Poor little innocent," she smiled in a horrid superior fashion, that made me feel very young and altogether inexperienced.

Digitized by Google

"I don't think it is wrong at all," I said bluntly, not having any very clear ideas upon the matter.

"Afraid to lose the money perhaps?" she grinned maliciously, opened her purse, and held out a note.

"I'm not a bit afraid, thank you," I returned, boiling with indignation.

She leant towards me and dropped the note into my lap. I ought of course to have refused it, but I was horribly afraid of being laughed at. Besides, Nestor was sure to win—Mrs. Curtis Blount herself had said so, and I could repay the money within an hour or two.

My fingers closed over the piece of paper. Mrs. Blount patted my hand encouragingly.

"That's right," she said. "Give it to Toby, he'll fix it up for you, and"—she paused—"if you like I'll book you a bet or two upon the nod. I know Bell the bookie quite well. You'll rake in a nice little sum this journey, if you'll leave it to me."

Flustered and annoyed both with her and myself, I gave a half-mechanical consent, which the next instant I longed to recall. I turned to do so quickly, but Mrs. Blount had vanished. Presently I saw her confabulating with a burly man, apparently the bookie.

Much of what she had said was Greek to me. I had no idea as to the extent of the transactions she was entering into on my behalf, and was foolishly ashamed to ask for an explanation. I realised I had made a bet of £25, which Toby had duly fixed up for me, but that, I thought, was the extent of my liability.

It came upon me like a thunderclap when Mrs. Blount returned and in a loud tone of voice explained that I stood to win £500, or lose £800 on Nestor.

Lord Chesterton heard what she said; he gave a little shrug and looked quite coldly at me.

"I hate to see a young girl bet to such an extent," he said to Ffolliott. He turned away and took no further notice of me.

Mrs. Curtis Blount smiled maliciously, and I hated her worse than ever.

I shall never forget that Derby. I could not follow the horses with the glasses, my hands trembled so. My heart thumped, and my head throbbed. The words "eight hundred pounds" beat in my brain.

The roar of the people on the course made me shake. I was sick with fear. Suppose I lost, what should I do, where could I hope to get eight hundred pounds?

How I wished that wretched Curtis Blount woman had not interfered with me. It was as though she had entrapped me into making the bets for some purpose of her own. And yet why should she do so? What grudge could she have against me?

I was to find an answer to both those questions—but not then.

I felt I could not bear the strain much longer. If only the race were over, decided one way or the other. I shut my eyes and waited in horrible suspense.

Of a sudden there came a lull, as though everyone had caught their breath, and then a great shout filled the air.

The Derby was over.

Nestor was beaten.

I owed eight hundred pounds!

(Another splendid instalment is published on Friday.)

Wife: "A penny for your thoughts, my dear." Husband: "I was thinking of one of Shakespeare's sayings, 'What fools we mortals be.'" Wife: "I suppose that does come home to you rather hard at times, but what particular recollection brought about this train of thought?" Husband: "The recollection of our courtship, dear, when I used to call you 'Birdie.'"

Your Editor Chats.

This week, as you will have seen, I begin my series of tartan covers with the Menzies plaid. As I think I mentioned last week I intend to reproduce, from time to time, on the covers of this little paper, coloured representations, correct in every detail, of the tartans of all the principal clans of Scotland, and I am hoping to use the next one on the cover of the number dated August 16th.

MORE ABOUT CYNTHIA.

The letter which I published a week or so ago from a correspondent who was under the impression that she met Mrs. Norton and Cynthia at a seaside boarding house, some few years back, and wanted me to give her Cynthia's real name, in order that she might be of financial help to her, has been followed by communications from several other readers, all of whom are most anxious that I should disclose Cynthia's real identity. But this I really cannot do, at present, at all events.

MY HOLIDAY NUMBER.

I should like to say here that next week's number is to be a particularly good one. It is our holiday number, and will contain a splendid selection of excellent stories, besides most thrilling instalments of the serial and the famous Confessions. The first story, the illustration of a thrilling incident in which will be found on page 154, is one of the most powerful stories which have yet appeared, and it would be well to send in your orders early or you will be unable to obtain copies, as there is sure to be an extra demand for the number. In the same issue will also be found the third offer of £20 in prizes in connection with the now well-known Pass-It-Along scheme.

CAN YOU DRAW A CAT?

For this week's competition I want to test the artistic skill of my readers. I therefore offer a handsome solid silver pencil-case to the reader who sends in the cleverest sketch of a cat, drawn solely with straight lines of which there must not be more than twenty. Drawings must be made on the back of postcards only, and should be addressed to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, W.C. There will be ten consolation prizes given to those whose efforts come next in order of merit and these will consist of rolled gold hearts and charms. In this case, the Editor's decision, of course, must be final. The competition will close after the first post on Tuesday morning, August 5th.

RESULT OF "WORD" COMPETITION.

I am now able to give you the result of the "Word" competition. The first award of a solid silver pencil-case goes to Mr. A. J. Lawford Jones, of 110 Westbourne Grove, W. His effort is as follows: Safeguard, Heaven, Our Royal Throne; Sadness Threatens Our Realm If Edward Sleep—thus using, as the initial letter of each word, the letters S, H, O, R, T, S, T, O, R, I, E, S. The ten Consolation prizes of rolled gold hearts and rolled gold charms go to the following: J. W. Henderson, 253 Stanton Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne; Winifred James, Castle View, St. Aubins, Jersey; R. G. Jones, 5 Afton Crescent, Paisley Road, Glasgow; Jenny Osborn, 15 Seaside Road, St Leonards; A. G. Seaward, 22 Daniel's Road, Nunhead; Miss D. Ryan, 21 Abbotts Road, East Ham; Lieutenant H. James, care of Captain Pritchard, Les Vaux, St. Heliers, Jersey; T. Tatlow, 136 Main Street, Bullwell, Nottingham; T. Allison, 18 Fleet Street, Gorton, Manchester; John F. Dell, 45 Brecknock Road, N.

Digitized by Google

Another One.

The Heiress: "Yes, when I don't wish to accept certain men's attentions, and they ask where I live, I say in the suburbs." Mr. Selfsure: "Ha! ha! An excellent plan." (After a pause) "But where do you live, Miss Brown?" The Heiress: "In the suburbs, Mr. Selfsure."

Through Bitter Experience.

Little Girl (to her mamma): "What is a dead letter?" Mamma: "One that has been given to your father to post."

The Tramp Left.

Tramp: "Please, ma'am, I haven't a friend or relation in the world." Housekeeper: "Well, I'm glad there's no one to worry over you if you get bitten. Here, Carlo!"

An Unkind Remark.

Traveller: "You needn't make any extra preparations for my wife. The plainer the things are the better she likes them." Hotel-keeper: "Your wife seems passionately fond of you, sir!"

Very much Gone.

"You told me a falsehood last night, Ethel," said Ethel's father. "I asked you if Charlie Hicks had gone, and you said yes." "No, you didn't. You asked, 'Is that young man gone yet?' He was—awfully gone."

Future Warfare.

General (when bullet-proof uniforms become common): "What have you learnt?" Aide-de-Camp: "Victory will soon perch upon our banners. We have filled the enemy's clothes so full of lead that they can't move another step without undressing."

L'Enfant Terrible Again.

"These fish, my dear Mrs. Hendricks," remarked the minister, who was discussing a Sunday dinner with the family, "are deliciously fresh. I am enjoying them very much." "They ought to be fresh," volunteered Bobby, also enjoying them. "Pa caught 'em only this morning."

Compulsory Cleanliness.

Teacher: "Now I want all the children to look at Tommy's hands and observe how clean they are, and see if all of you cannot come to school with cleaner hands. Tommy, perhaps, will tell us how he keeps them so nice." Tommy: "Yes'm; ma makes me wash the breakfast things every morning."

Explained.

Struggling Dramatist: "I can't see how Littlewitt managed to get such a big price for that trashy play of his. They say that Miss Footlights paid him £2,000." First Nighter: "I presume you know that she is in love with her leading man?" "Yes." "Well, Littlewitt's play has twenty-five kisses in it."

An Unexpected Concession.

Stern Father: "What did Mr. Softly say when you informed him that I said he should kiss you just once each time he called? Angry, wasn't he?" Shy Daughter: "No; he seemed to be pleasantly surprised. You see, he had never offered to kiss me before, but he says your wishes shall be respected in the future."

His Definition.

Small Boy: "Uncle, what is a wiseacre?" Uncle (who is suffering from toothache): "A wiseacher? A wisdom tooth, my boy."

A Desirable Circle.

Quickson: "What exclusive and brilliant circle would you most like to enter?" May (demurely): "An engagement ring just now."

A Kind-hearted Little Girl.

"What are you going to do with your dolls, Sallie?" "I'm going to give them to a poor little girl I know, so's papa will buy me some new ones."

The Old Trouble.

Wife: "Dear me, you can never find a thing without asking me where it is. How did you get along before you were married?" "Things stayed where they were put then."

The Proper Way.

In a recent issue of a contemporary appeared a question entitled: "How should a trunk be packed?" The proper way to pack a trunk is to sit down in an easy chair and watch your wife do it.

Hoped He Might Improve.

Husband (vituperatively): "I was an idiot when I married you, Mary." Wife (quietly): "Yes, Tom, I knew you were. But what could I do? You seemed my only chance, and I thought then that you might improve a little with time."

Proof Positive.

Maudie's papa is night editor on a newspaper, a fact which Maudie apparently hasn't learnt; for when someone asked her a few days ago what her father did for a living, she replied: "I div it up. I fink he's a burglar, 'tause he's out all night."

An Unprofitable Task.

Mrs. Gadd: "You look tired, Mrs. Gabb. What is the matter?" Mrs. Gabb: "Tired! I'm nearly dead. I've sat at my bath-room window seven weeks on end, listening to the sounds in the parsonage next door, and I haven't heard a cross word yet."

Force of Habit.

Mrs. Cawker: "Don't you think it is very strange that Mrs. Stivetts hasn't returned or paid any attention to my call yet?" Mr. Cawker: "Not at all. It is merely the result of force of habit." Mrs. Cawker: "How is that?" Mr. Cawker: "She was a telephone girl before her marriage."

It Didn't Work.

Whiffers: "See here, Bliffers! You told me the way to win a girl was to devote myself to her mother." Bliffers: "Yes, sirree, that will do it every——" Whiffers: "Huh! I wanted to win Miss Beauti, and I took your advice, and devoted myself to Mrs. Beauti, and now the old lady, who is a widow, wants to marry me herself."

How She Felt.

Here is a story of a little girl who is very fond of walking with her father. One day he went further than usual, and she began to grow tired. She did her utmost to conceal the fact, lest it should make her father indisposed to take her with him on future occasions. At last her lagging steps betrayed her to her father's eye. Even then, however, she parried his questions, and could not be brought to admit her weariness, till he drew her into a trap. "Well, Lillie, if you don't feel tired, tell me just how you do feel." "Oh, I'm not much tired, papa," answered the diplomatic little girl; "but I feel as if I should like to take my legs off and carry 'em for a little while."

Digitized by Google

THE SOMERSET SAPPHIRES.

A Tale of Some Stolen Gems.

Being the story of a strange claim made by the reigning Maharajah of Jutpore; Ghuzni Singh—now temporarily residing in this country—in connection with a certain celebrated and unique heirloom; for over five centuries in the possession of the family of the Somersets of Witmore Court, Bucks, and Cadogan Square, London, W. The tale is told by one Barte Yohe, Barrister-at-law, of the Middle Temple; the affianced husband of Esther Somerset, the present representative owner of the gems.

"Sir!" said the Maharajah, with Orientally regal emphasis; his naturally swarthy features darkening with visibly suppressed irritation. "I know my sapphires when I see them!—and—these are my sapphires!"

"But," said I, for at least the twentieth time during the interview. "Your Highness appears to altogether ignore the very pregnant fact, that the jewels in question, which you saw two nights since at Mrs. Somerset's house, have never once, except for cleaning purposes, been out of the actual possession of the family, any time during the past five hundred years."

The semi-Europeanised potentate merely shrugged his shoulders, ever so slightly, at this; a polite smile, exposing his really fine teeth, testifying to his utter incredulity with regard to my statement.

"You are," he at length said, taking up my card, and laboriously spelling out my name and dignities; which latter I had added in ink of set purpose, "You are a man of law—a Moulvie—a Pundit. You come to me, you say, on behalf of Mrs. Somerset—or her daughter; which is it? (here he smiled again, so provokingly, that I longed to personally teach him better manners) you come to me, I say, and seek to persuade me—me, a descendant of the great Rungeet!—that I claim as my own, the property of your friends. A lawyer, you!—and do this!—your law is not worth that!" and the now excited princelet snapped his fingers viciously.

Courtesy is, most of my friends admit, my particularly strong point, and this man—Indian Prince—a personal friend of royalty—was, I well knew, entitled to all deference and consideration at my hands. For once, however, I am afraid that in my zeal for those who had sent me on this errand, I so far forgot myself, as to put plain truth in the plainest possible way.

"My legal knowledge," I said, rising, "or the lack of it, is a matter which concerns myself only. With reference to that which has brought me here to-day, I simply have, in the first place, to repeat, that the Somerset sapphires, are known, as such, the world over; and, secondly, to declare that the present claim suggesting that they were—to put it bluntly—stolen; some time during the past six months, from the Royal Treasury in Jutpore; to mysteriously reappear to-day in the quasi possession of one of the first of English private families, is at once so palpably absurd and slanderous, that it hardly merits the being taken seriously.

"As, however, it has been seen fit to set the law in motion, I, as the friend and legal representative of the Somerset family, hereby give notice that I shall fight this preposterous claim at every point, and to the full issue, and——" here I fired my last, and, it must be confessed, absolutely random shot, "without scruple as to persons or consequences. I have the honour to wish your Highness a very good morning."

The inscrutable Oriental in attendance at the door, threw it wide; the while grinning till the whites of his eyes gleamed again; and I passed down the pile-carpeted staircase of the Alexandra Hotel, in as pretty a fighting temper, as it was possible for any decorous member of the British Bar to be.

When, a quarter-of-an-hour later I stood, with Esther, in the big bay of the drawing-room in Cadogan Square, relating my recent conversation with His Highness the Maharajah Ghuzni Singh of Jutpore, the whole thing seemed to me to be even more outrageously ridiculous than ever.

"The man must be mad!" I cried. "Why!—I can't understand any respectable lawyer taking the case up for him, big Indian pot though he is!"

"Doesn't it strike you as very strange, Barte," said my darling, as I finished my chronicle of the interview, "that the Maharajah should have instituted proceedings of this kind without word or warning at the moment of his fancied recognition of the gems? He at least might have done us that poor honour."

"Esther!—the whole affair is a puzzle! However, I have warned him, as your mother's representative, that I shall stick at nothing in order to demolish his idiotic claim, and to establish the Somerset right to the sapphires."

"But surely it is easy for us to show that we are the true and sole owners."

"There will not be the slightest difficulty in proving the Somerset ownership. The objectionable part of the whole thing is, that it means publicity (which, I think, your mother detests more than anything else in the world) a lot of trouble and worry, and a general upset just as you are all deep in the worries of the season."

"Yes, it is tiresome!" Esther said, "but if I could only bring myself to tell you something which, though it is but hazy in my mind as yet, is insensibly forcing itself upon me as the one feasible solution of the mystery, I have an idea that you would deem me to be as mad as is the Maharajah himself."

"Tell me!" I urged her. "What do you imagine is at the bottom of it all? Tell me!"

But she would not, and I had to be content with her promise to take me into her confidence later on.

A fortnight before, it should be here explained, the Maharajah of Jutpore, with a retinue of more than twenty-five persons landed in England, taking up his temporary abode at the Alexandra Hotel, Hyde Park Corner, the one place in London where the Oriental of high degree, finds himself truly at home.

The Maharajah himself was a fine specimen, physically, of our Indian dependent rulers—with the exceptional peculiarity too, of speaking English perfectly. His wardrobe, and jewels were alike magnificent; so that he bid fair to take the heart of Society by storm.

Balls, banquets, garden-parties; none of these functions were judged by their providers to be complete, without the presence of the handsome ruler of Jutpore.

I don't, as a rule, care much about the breed, myself. and declined to enthuse when my prospective mother-in-law exultantly informed me that she had secured the dusky visitor for her reception on May 10th.

All through the evening, I had noticed with disgust, the Maharajah's undisguised admiration for my Esther; admiration, however, I subsequently found, not so much for her, as for the family jewels she was wearing.

These consisted entirely of sapphires—the Somerset sapphires—and were valued at, I believe, one hundred-and-fifty thousand pounds.

A semi-tiara; an eight-rope necklet of stones, each the size of a hazel nut; wristlets, and armlets; and a corsage ornament that literally emitted fire at every movement of the wearer, made one almost to really realise King Solomon's glory; while it would certainly appeal to the barbaric side of the Maharajah's nature.

Digitized by Google

Then, on the next morning the bolt fell!

His Highness's English secretary called upon Mrs. Somerset, soon after mid-day, and, in the name of his master, laid formal claim to the wonderful sapphires.

The story he told was this.

For a hundred-and-fifty years or more, the glory of the Palace Treasury at Jutpore had been a large number of loose sapphires, of almost inestimable value.

Two years ago, the then Maharanee prevailed upon her husband—the father of the present ruler of Jutpore—to have the jewels re-cut and set, in European fashion, as tiara, necklet, bracelets and breast ornaments for her own use on State occasions.

This was done, the stones were sent to London in charge of a member of the Maharajah's household, and the ornaments were worn by the lady at more than one dhurbah or other Court function.

In December of last year, the Maharajah's Keeper of the Jewels reported the famous sapphires to be missing. Consternation reigned everywhere throughout the palace, from the throne itself, down to the humblest member of the royal household.

Life and death are, happily, not now in the power of the regenerate Indian Princes, or, possibly, heads would have fallen to satisfy the tiger-like craving for vengeance of Ghunzi Singh. The next best thing to be done was to employ English detective skill. Half-a-dozen of Scotland Yard's most capable men were retained, at fabulous fees, to proceed to Jutpore, and investigate.

They might just as well have remained at home, for, up to the eve of the Maharajah's departure for England, nothing in the shape of a clue to the whereabouts of the missing stones, or to the identity of the thief, or thieves was obtainable.

Matters remained in this state until the night of Mrs. Somerset's reception, when the Maharajah's attention being irresistibly drawn to the "Somerset Sapphires," as displayed on the fair form of Esther, he then and there determined in his own mind, that the jewels worn by the English girl, were his, and his only; and that he was perfectly justified in seeking to establish a claim for their restitution into his hands.

I did not, of course, anticipate that the legal proceedings would be of any length, as I was prepared with overwhelming evidence, to prove the possessive right of the Somerset family to the jewels.

Still it would be many months before the case of the Maharajah of Jutpore v. Somerset could, in the ordinary course of things legal, be reached; and, as the Indian prince had succeeded in obtaining of the High Court, an interim injunction, by virtue of which the jewels in dispute were placed in the temporary custody of an official trustee, my friend's disappointment and chagrin at the prospect of being unable to show forth the glory of the Somerset heirlooms during the remaining Society functions of the season, may be readily imagined.

Early on the morning of the fourth day after my interview with the Maharajah at the Alexandra Hotel, business, connected with the alteration of some trinket for Esther, took me to Bond Street. As it was this particular firm of jewellers there, who two years before, had cleaned and re-set the "Somerset sapphires," it was only natural that the manager, knowing me as a friend of the family, should touch me upon the topic of the Maharajah's claim.

"Of course we have heard, Mr. Yohe," he said, "of this absurd business, and, although I am not supposed to mention the matter, Mr. Walker, the senior partner, has already written to Mrs. Somerset, asking for an appointment, as he has something of importance to communicate respecting the jewels. This was late last night. Within the last half hour a reply has been received from Mrs. Somerset referring the firm to you."

"To me!—then I will see Mr. Walker at once!"

The old gentleman struck me as being nervously apprehensive of somebody, or something.

"I hardly know how to come to the point, Mr. Yohe," he said. "And yet, sooner or later, Mrs. Somerset must know the truth."

"The truth!—about this sapphire business?"

"Yes, sir!" replied the jeweller, with the air of a man about to make a plunge into icy-cold water, "the sapphire business; and it was only because we feared (both my partner and I) Mrs. Somerset's wrath, when she should come to know the rights of it, that we did not explain matters as soon as we heard of the Maharajah's claim."

"Yes—yes!" I said, excitedly, "go on!"

"Well, then, you know that two years ago, we had the Somerset sapphires for re-setting. But you do not know, that, coincidently, we had, as a commission from the then Maharajah of Jutpore, who died last summer, an order to cut, and set in European fashion some magnificent sapphires, which were at the same time consigned to us for that purpose.

Thinking no harm, as the jewels were to go out of the country, and because the arrangement would save valuable time, we persuaded ourselves to allow the stones to be set in replica of the Somerset sapphires; although we had no real peace until the Indian gems were safely on their way back to Jutpore."

"But," I interrupted him, "this puts a very different complexion upon matters; for, apart from His Highness's lack of good taste in making so peremptory a demand upon an English lady of wealth and position, and at such a time as the present, it accounts for much which otherwise would be inexplicable. But proceed, Mr. Walker."

"There is little else to say, sir, beyond that we look to you to make our peace with Mrs. Somerset."

"I think you may trust me to be able to effect that much," I said, "anyway——"

"Good gracious!" cried the jeweller, rushing from my side (we had by this strolled into the shop) to the street door and gazing wildly in the direction of Piccadilly.

Then he turned to the manager and myself. "Did you see a man—an Oriental, looking in at the window?"

We both declared we had not.

"It was Bhopi Lal, the late Maharajah's treasurer!—the man who brought me the loose stones; who remained here in London while they were being set; and who took them back again to Jutpore."

"Evidently," I said, "he is in the suite of the present Maharajah. I will find out; and if he is, I will ask you, Mr. Walker, to join me in a little scheme, which, if it be successful, will advantage both His Highness and my own friends."

"Anything we can do we shall be happy to do," replied the senior partner eagerly.

"Very good! Then you may expect to see me about this time to-morrow," I said. "In the meantime, not a word!"

As fast as a hansom could carry me, I flew to Cadogan Square.

"Esther, dear!" said I to her, when she came in answer to my imperative appeal, scribbled on a visiting card. "Esther!—what will you give me, if I bring this matter to a favourable conclusion in twenty-four hours?"

"Give you, Barte!—why, I'll—I'll marry you in a fortnight!"

"You will?—then I am already as good as a married man! for as sure, dear, as you and I are standing talking here, I am on the track of the Maharajah's sapphires!"

She didn't seem so greatly surprised as I considered she ought to be, so I ventured to emphasise that which I had already said, by adding that, as soon as I had left her, I should go to see the Maharajah again.

"Do you remember, Barte, my telling you a day or two ago, that I had an idea about this business? It was hazy then; it is perfectly clear now. I am quite ignorant as to what you know; but I greatly err if you do not put your finger on the thief of the Indian gems inside of two hours; and on a spot not a hundred miles from this house."

(Concluded at foot of next page.)

Digitized by Google

The Great "PASS-IT-ALONG" Scheme.

FIRST AWARD £10.

SECOND AWARD £5.

THIRD AWARD £2.

Six awards of 10s. each.

AN ENTIRELY NEW FORM OF MONEY MAKING.

This novel and clever scheme will be continued in the next issue of SHORT STORIES. For the benefit of those who have not seen our previous announcements, we give below a rough idea of the scheme, so that they may be prepared for next week's offer.

Every person who buys a copy of "SHORT STORIES" will have the opportunity of entering for this scheme by first of all writing his or her name and address in a space which will be found at the foot of one of the pages, and then sending the copy of the paper to a friend whom the competitor thinks will be likely to sign his or her name in a space provided. This friend of yours will then post the copy to a friend of his or hers, and so your copy will go from one person to another for fourteen days, when you will find it returned to you. Then you simply send the copy to us, under the conditions which you will find next week, and if it contains more names than that sent by anyone else

You will get £10, and every person who has signed your papers will get £1 each.

Your whole expenses will be one stamp for sending a copy of Short Stories to your friend. Your friend, and his or her friends and friends pay the other postage. If, however, you don't want to send your own copy away, and you can't get a friend to give you his or her copy (readers, you will find, don't like parting with their copy of dear little S. S.), then why not get an extra copy of the next number, as thousands of other readers will do?

The copy will cost you one penny, and may bring you £10.

But don't leave it till Friday, when the next number is published, or you will find your newsagent is sold out. Just ask him to keep it by for you till you call on Friday for it.

Next week's issue, we may add, is to be our Holiday Number. A reproduction of the cover will be found on page 154, illustrating a thrilling incident in a story which will be found in that number.

"Esther!" I said, looking at her between the eyes with mock solemnity, "have you been reading 'Sherlock Holmes,' lately, with an eye to this?"

"No!" she answered me, laughing merrily, "I have just been putting two and two together, in the old-fashioned way, and I very much fancy that it is going to make four."

"I think so, too. But about this wedding-day of ours—is that to be my reward?"

She did not reply, but breaking away from me, ran out of the room, smiling back at me, however, as she tripped through the doorway.

* * * * *

"Mr. Yohe," said the Maharajah, "if what you say be correct, I certainly owe Mrs. and Miss Somerset, the humblest of apologies. You, too, for I fear that I was rude in my insistence of my claim, and belief."

"For myself," I said, "I remember nothing; while as for my friends, they will be too happy in the undisturbed possession of their property, to do anything but forgive anybody."

The Maharajah smiled, and rang for his treasurer.

Bhopi Lal, was, he was informed, out upon private business of his own.

"Send him to me, the moment he returns," was the order.

The door was scarcely shut when it was opened again by the same attendant, who announced that Bhopi Lal was at that moment ascending the stairs.

"Send him in here!" was the stern command

Silently, and with his head bowed upon his bosom, Bhopi Lal glided into the room, standing by the door, which closed behind him.

In his hand was a brown cow-hide hand-bag. At this the Maharajah glanced curiously.

The end came very quickly. A sharp demand from the prince for the bag to be handed to him; a pressure of the royal fingers on the spring fastening, and before us lay the missing sapphires, boxless; in splendid confusion.

The man made no defence. Calmly accepting the inevitable with Asiatic stoicism, in reply to his master's questions, he simply described how he had stolen the jewels; keeping them by him in a place of concealment until the expedition to England.

Once in London he hoped to be able to dispose of them, having been absent that very morning on a quest for a possible purchaser.

At my solicitation, the Maharajah consented to limit his treasurer's punishment to an immediate return to Jutpore, there to await his master's return. Of his ultimate fate, I am altogether ignorant.

* * * * *

Esther and I are to be married in a fortnight; the Maharajah not only consenting to grace the ceremony with his royal presence, but also to give the bride away.

His wedding-present has just arrived. It is a set of the finest diamonds in the Jutpore treasury. Ralph Enderby.

Digitized by Google

The Thirty-first Day.

Telling of a Self-denial and a Recompense.

As he marked off another day on his calendar Wilfred Pearson smiled with a stoic satisfaction.

For three weeks now he had denied himself the exhilarating influence of Eleanor Duncan's society. He was indeed holding firmly to his promise—the promise he had given to his highest self on the day that Roy Hadley, all unconscious of the wound he was inflicting, impulsively confided to him his love for Eleanor.

Even while he marvelled at Hadley's blindness, Pearson had resolutely determined to be loyal to the friendship which, begun at college, had strengthened into a sturdy bond seemingly impossible of dissolution.

Roy Hadley should be given a fair chance, so far as Pearson's absence from the field was concerned. Thus the latter had resolved. Thus he had acted, even to the present day—the twenty-first day since he had made this promise.

Twenty-one days without a glimpse of her! They were twenty-one months—nay, years—instead of days.

Pearson began to wonder at his superb self-control and to congratulate himself upon the heroic strength of his invincible will. The fact that his unruly thoughts revelled in sweet imaginings did not as yet impress him as being inconsistent. So he steeped his soul in dreams of her and let delicious memories have their sway.

It was not until the twenty-fifth day that this spiritual indulgence of his love impressed him with a sense of its disloyalty. The startling accusation of an aggressive conscience awakened within him a fire of rebellion.

"I may chain my body," he protested, "but not my thoughts, my longings, the very impulses of my being! They belong to Eleanor. They will always belong to her—to crush them would be to crush life itself."

The twenty-sixth day, nevertheless, found him struggling against the dear imaginings which heretofore had fed his love and compensated in some degree for the sacrifice he was making. Unconsciously at first, then with direct intent, he strove to curb even the tender secret thoughts which, following the lead of his longing, winged their flight towards Eleanor by day and night.

Meanwhile he avoided too frequent meetings with Hadley, nor did he encourage further confidences. He at least need not force himself to endure another ordeal of that nature.

Then came the thirty-first day, when Pearson, looking heavily about him, wondered at the blank desolation that had settled upon the earth. For four entire days he had succeeded in keeping Eleanor out of his thoughts. But where now was the motive for living? Ambition, incentive, inspiration—all had left him. His heart was of lead, his soul of stone.

Again rebellion shook him. "It is because I have shut her out of my life! It is wrong—wrong! I love her—love her!"

The old influence swept upon him once more, magnetising his thoughts, thrilling his world with colour.

It was in the early afternoon that he strolled through the park in the vicinity of Eleanor's home. Of course he would not for the world break that sacred promise of his by venturing near her residence. He merely wished to breathe the pure air and witness the beautiful miracle of awakening Spring.

By no effort of will could he resist the onslaught of dear memories that attacked him as he paced the pebbly paths and let the magic of that exquisite day thrill through him. Eleanor, Eleanor! The image of her shone everywhere. Radiant blue sky, delicious air, budding green things, vast sweeps of velvety turfs, fragrance, sunshine—and Eleanor! It was all Eleanor!

He walked on and on, in a tumult of happiness. At a turn in the path a sudden glorious premonition throbbed through him. He looked up. The image of his brain resolved itself into the real image. Coming down the path towards him was the flesh and blood Eleanor, radiantly sweet in her dainty Spring attire.

There was no mistaking the fact that her eyes grew luminous at sight of him.

"You!" she cried. "Where have you been all this time? One whole month!"

Pearson murmured some unintelligible apology. He was aware of but one thing now—the intoxication of her actual presence.

"For shame, sir! I fear, after all, you are at heart a selfish recluse."

There was a bench near by and they unconsciously moved towards it and seated themselves. Pearson looked at her and tried to think of a fitting reply to her accusation. A soft haze hung palpitating before his eyes. Out of this haze her face smiled upon him.

"You have, of course, seen Hadley?" he questioned at length.

"Oh, yes—he comes very often. But you—you have not treated me as he has. You have forgotten me. Confess!"

Pearson looked sternly at the ground.

"Roy is a good fellow," he said; "a splendid fellow! You have no idea——"

He paused vaguely. There was a long silence.

"Why don't you speak for yourself, John?"

He started violently. Had his memory become vocal, or was it indeed Eleanor herself who had given utterance to the familiar quotation?

His gaze met hers and clung. In a flash he knew—knew without doubt!

"Dearest—dearest!"

* * * * * * *

After a while she tried to release her hand.

"Do you realise," she said demurely, "that we are sitting here on a bench in the park, making love in the most plebeian fashion, right in sight of everybody?"

"But no one is looking!" he protested. "No one is looking and—" he leant his head forward imploringly, "quick, Eleanor—just one!"

"Aren't you ashamed?" she panted, rosy and smiling, as she tried to readjust her hat.

"No, I am not!" he declared. "I should have some reward for thirty-one days of blank wretchedness. Oh, those awful days—each one a wilderness!"

"Each one?" she repeated. "Surely there is one exception!"

"Yes—just one," he replied, seizing her hand again, "and that is the thirty-first day."

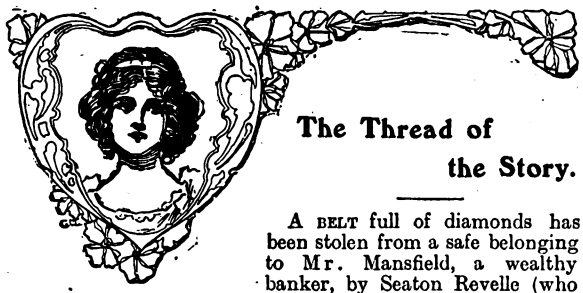
Angela Morgan.

Digitized by Google

OUR THRILLING NEW SERIAL.

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

By HENRY FARMER.



The Thread of the Story.

A BELT full of diamonds has been stolen from a safe belonging to Mr. Mansfield, a wealthy banker, by Seaton Revelle (who is a friend of the banker's) and an accomplice named Benjamin Beard. Revelle accuses Alec Scarsdale, who is in love with Esther, Mr. Mansfield's daughter, of the crime, and he is sentenced to sixteen years' penal servitude.

Mr. Crump, late Chief-Inspector at Scotland Yard, feeling sure Scarsdale is innocent and Revelle is guilty, determines to prove the latter's guilt.

Mr. Mansfield as fully believes in Scarsdale's guilt as does Esther in his innocence, and his friendship for Revelle increases. Revelle constantly visits the banker's house in an endeavour to win Esther's love, but so far has not prospered at all. While talking with the girl one day, Mr. Mansfield's new maid, Vance, enters the room with a tray bearing cups of coffee. No sooner does she catch sight of Revelle than she drops the tray, and, pointing to Revelle, screams: "That—that man is my husband!" But Revelle, by sheer force of will, compels her to acknowledge her mistake.

At about this time Esther and Mr. Crump are walking together when they observe Vance about to throw herself into the reservoir. Crump stops her just in time—he and Esther taking her back to The Woodlands. Later on she is placed in the county asylum.

In the meanwhile Scarsdale manages to pass through several letters to Esther to which he receives replies full of hope and affection. On account of an assault upon a brutal warder, however, he is to be removed to Wrackam Convict Prison, an establishment famous for its hard discipline.

A charity concert is now announced, in which both Esther and Benny are billed to take part. Revelle, of course, is present; so also is Mr. Crump. It is while returning from this concert that Revelle proposes to Esther but is refused.

The great balloon incident now approaches. There is to be a grand fête in Lord Normanhurst's grounds, the chief and closing event being a balloon ascent by Mr. Seaton Revelle. Everything goes well till two horsemen arrive with the news that Vance has escaped from the asylum.

Acting upon Crump's advice they go straight to the reservoir, but fail to find the missing girl. The search is given up at nightfall. Shortly before nightfall Revelle makes his ascent. A storm, however, compels him to come down, the anchor touching ground on a neighbouring common just where Vance is waiting for him. The girl clings on to the anchor, and Revelle, quickly making a terrible resolve, throws out a number of sandbags, and the balloon again rises and continues its flight till Warham reservoir is reached. Just as the balloon is passing over the water Revelle cuts the anchor rope.

Vance's dead body is found next morning, Mr. Crump being informed of the discovery while walking with Esther

Mr. Crump examines the body and finds that a leg is broken, evidently by a fall. The coroner's jury return a verdict of "Found drowned." Mr. Crump next takes a walk on the common, and discovers some sand-bags.

Mr. Mansfield thinks it best that Esther shall leave Warham for a little holiday. It is while changing at Roxeter Junction en route for Gurlston Bay that Fate brings about a meeting between Esther and Alec, who is on his way to Wrackam. An impassioned scene takes place on the platform. Before many days are passed Seaton Revelle also journeys to Gurlston Bay, and it is while there that they hear of the plucky rescue from drowning of a warder at Wrackam Prison by Alec Scarsdale, and, subsequently of his rumoured escape from prison.

ALEC HAS ESCAPED.

"WHAT?" exclaimed Seaton Revelle sharply.

"That's what they're saying in the village, right enough; but I suppose we shall have to wait for the evening papers before we shall know whether it's true or not. 'Pon my word, after that plucky act of his, he deserves his freedom, though I don't suppose he will keep it for long!"

Revelle was biting his lips. The prospect of the man whom he had foully wronged being at large was not pleasant contemplation; but even if he had escaped, the chances were a hundred to one against his keeping his freedom. He was thinking rather of Esther, and the effect the news would have upon her. He knew nothing of her meeting with Scarsdale at Roxeter Junction. But the news would awaken memories and call her attention to the man whom he firmly believed she was beginning to forget.

A look of distress crossed Mr. Walters' face. He glanced back at the house, and up at a certain window that was closed. The little party gathered on the lawn was composed of men only.

"I hope," said the host in a low voice, "that you will all avoid making mention of this matter in the presence of Miss Mansfield. I trust that she will be well enough to come down some time to-day. Of course, you all know, and any reference to Scarsdale must only cause her pain. For her sake, I hope that this rumour is unfounded, and that there will be nothing about it in the evening paper. By the way, Mr. Revelle, it was you, of course, who caught him in the act!"

"Yes," answered Revelle slowly, "I caught him red-handed, and had the supreme satisfaction of bowling him over. But it was a horribly painful business. It shook my belief in mankind badly. After that, I felt almost as if no one was to be trusted. But it's a matter that I don't even care to talk about now. It's—it's too painful!"

The hint was taken. Conversation changed into another channel. When Revelle prepared to take his leave with his friend, Winter, Mr. Walters gave him a cordial invitation to come whenever it pleased him, and specifically invited him to dinner that evening.

"And," he added, "as soon as Miss Mansfield is herself again, we're going for two or three days' coasting cruise in the yacht. I should be delighted to see you and Winter on board."

"It's awfully good of you," said Revelle, "I shall be delighted!"

He was turning away when John Mansfield emerged from

Digitized by Google

OUR THRILLING SERIAL. YOU CAN BEGIN TO-DAY.

the house. The banker greeted him with delight. He had heard of his arrival in the neighbourhood.

"Could I have a word with you privately?" said Revelle, after a few remarks had been interchanged.

"Certainly," said the banker, taking his arm.

They strolled away from the others.

"It's about that fellow, Scarsdale," said Revelle in a low voice. "I hope you won't think that I'm taking too much upon myself, Mr. Mansfield; but I've known you for some time now, and—er—well, don't you know, I think most awfully highly of Miss Mansfield, and can't bear the thought of her being pained, and—or—all that sort of thing, don't you know."

He was hesitating, and seemed obviously embarrassed. The banker had not been blind to the attention that Revelle had been paying his daughter. He was a charming fellow, evidently possessed of considerable means, and undoubtedly of good social position. John Mansfield would have been only too thankful to have welcomed him as his son-in-law. He would have given worlds to have known that the memory of Alec Scarsdale had been obliterated, and that the place that he had filled in Esther's heart had been taken by someone else.

"My dear fellow," he said, "don't hesitate to speak for one moment. What is it?"

"There's a rumour down in the village that Scarsdale's escaped—it hasn't been actually confirmed yet; but there'll probably be something about it in the evening paper. I thought that if you were forewarned, it might be possible to keep the news from Miss Mansfield!"

The banker's face darkened.

"The scoundrel!" he said harshly. "He is always coming back into her life, in some way or another! Thank you, Revelle, thank you. I shall do my best to keep this from her!"

They had strolled out of sight of the others. Both men were silent for a few moments. What followed did not take the banker by surprise. He was expecting it.

"It's awful presumption on my part, I know," said Revelle, speaking at last, with admirably assumed hesitation, "and I daresay that you can pretty well guess what I'm going to tell you—perhaps really I ought to have spoken before; but I had a sort of feeling that it would look as if I were trying to step into another fellow's shoes; but I—er—love your daughter. I learnt to love her when I thought that there was absolutely no chance for me. Then that wretched business happened at your place, and it put me in a false position. Perhaps even now I ought to have waited longer before speaking to you!"

John Mansfield held out his hand abruptly.

"My dear Revelle," he said with considerable emotion, "nothing would give me greater happiness—a load would be lifted off my mind—to know that you had won Esther's love, and had made her forget. I love my child far too much to bring any pressure to bear upon her; but you have my full consent, and I hope that I shall live to give you both my blessing; but I'm afraid that you have still a rival!"

Then the banker gave an account of what had happened at Roxeter Junction.

The muscles tightened round Revelle's mouth. A fierce, hard light burnt in his dark eyes. It had been the girl's money, in the first instance, that had attracted him; but now he desired her for herself. Jealousy gnawed savagely at his heart. He had been the instrument that had torn Alec Scarsdale from the woman he loved; he had sent him to prison; but he still stood in his path, and barred the way. Seaton Revelle realised now that he had been too quick in jumping at the conclusion that Esther was forgetting Alec Scarsdale. But the feeling of despair that swept over him was only momentary. His belief in himself was infinite. He would play the game all the more persistently. And if Esther's meeting with Alec Scarsdale represented a set-back, he had also gained an advantage. He was sure of her father's sympathy, and assistance up to a certain point.

"Well," he said, "I must be getting back to Winter. I don't know how to thank you, Mr. Mansfield. I shall be seeing you again. Walters has been good enough to ask me to dine to-night. Would you tell—er—Miss Mansfield how awfully grieved I was to hear that she had been so unwell? I hope that I shall see her this evening!"

"What a charming fellow your friend is," said Mr. Walters when, after Revelle's departure, he was joined by the banker. "I hope we shall see quite a lot of him whilst he is down here."

In her room, Esther was praying that Alec's act of heroism might result in a lessening of the awful stretch of years between him and freedom; but if not, she would wait for him.

"Till death!" she whispered, as she had whispered when her convict lover had clasped her in his arms.

Then she gave a little shiver. Again an indefinable feeling that some danger threatened had crept over her. She was conscious of a great sense of loneliness. Her father was with her; he was tenderness itself; but there was a barrier between them. Her mind had harked away to the kindly little man whom she had left behind at Warham. She felt that she wanted him near her. She would write to him at once, not to tell him of her loneliness—she must bear with that—but to let him know that the man whom she loathed beyond expression had arrived at Gurlston Bay!

There was a knock at the door. A moment later, a maid-servant entered with letters. One was from Crump. Esther laid aside the others, and opened it eagerly.

"My dear Miss Mansfield," it ran, "I am afraid, owing to postal arrangements, that this letter will only reach you after a certain person will have arrived at Gurlston Bay. I have only just been able to ascertain definitely his destination. I am exceedingly distressed. I had hoped that for a while, at least, you were going to have a little rest. I am indeed sorry! But I am going to ask you to bear with him. It is very essential that his suspicions should in no wise be aroused. I deeply regret that I cannot contrive to come to Gurlston Bay; but certain complications have arisen, and a splitting-up of parties, that compel me to divide my attentions between Warham and London. A certain person's motive in going to Gurlston Bay is, I am afraid, painfully obvious—it is to be near you! But you will, I know, be very brave. I do wish that I could be with you; but I feel that his motive is obvious, and that I ought to concentrate my attention on matters here, and the movements of a certain party now in London; but, should the unforeseen arise, should you need me, please send two telegrams, one to Warham, another to London. There my telegraphic address is 'Penworthy, Azaleas, London.' 'Come' is all that is necessary. I shall be with you at the earliest opportunity, should such a message reach me. The excuse for coming to Gurlston Bay will be my affair. It grieves me very much to say that matters are still more or less stationary; though the air is very highly charged with possibilities, and there is any amount of work to be done that I believe is destined ultimately to bear fruit. Once again let me preach the gospel of patience and hope. Let these be our colours, and let us nail them to the mast-head, and, though doubts and fears attack ever so fiercely, we will, with God's help, keep those colours flying! I have just come back from London, and am writing from Warham. Tom and Fred have just been to see me. The lads are working well, very well. I am proud of them. Have you been to the caves yet? If not you will find them full of romantic interest. You will doubtless find time to visit Reefe Castle, most interesting historically. I know the surrounding country very well. I wish that I could be with you. Ah, we should have some delightful rambles! The cliffs, too, are magnificent; but please be careful! They are not very safe. You won't venture too near the edge, will you? Altogether, please take great care of yourself. And now, my dear young lady, I must cease writing for the present. Tom and Fred asked me to send you their devoted respects. Will you please also accept mine, and will you be offended if I also add to that—my love?"

Esther felt better and happier after having read Crump's kindly, sympathetic letter. It had braced her up. She would play the game; there should be no faltering! And the knowledge that, if she needed him, he would come to her, brought comfort.

Digitized by Google

Crump had been very busy. Benny had left The Firs for the nonce, and had gone to London. It was very essential that his movements should be watched, and note taken with whom he associated. It was just possible that a clue might be obtained, in this way, as to the channel through which the stolen property had been disposed. Crump had shadowed him personally for a while, and then had intrusted the task to a certain former colleague, of his at Scotland Yard. Railton had been left in charge of The Firs, and Tom and Fred were frequent visitors there now—much to the little man's satisfaction.

And there was another matter that he was not neglecting—the mystery of Vance's death.

On the map that the little man had drawn of Aversham Common, another cross had been added.

Crump had found a third bag of ballast, and it was locked away with the others in the cupboard at Woodbine Cottage.

On his map Crump had drawn the points of the compass.

A line drawn from the cross that indicated where the first bag of ballast had been found, through the second and third crosses, and continued on, pointed directly to Warham reservoir.

Was this the course taken by the balloon?

* * * * *

"What time," said Revelle, "do the evening papers get here as a rule?"

He was sauntering with his friend along the brow of the white chalk cliffs that rose up precipitously from the sea. Their base was burrowed with caves. In some places the water immediately below was deep; in others, cruel-looking rocks jagged up like sharp teeth from the combing foam of the breakers.

"They come down with the six-three train!"

"H'm, well I think that I shall get round to the station."

Would it prove true, this rumour of Scarsdale's escape?

THE ESCAPE AND AFTER.

Scarsdale's act of heroism had been rewarded, not by a remission of any portion of his sentence, but by a remission of the remaining period of Special Orders. Though he still wore the black and drab dress, his leg-chains had been removed, and he had returned to the ordinary routine of prison life. He was no longer submitted to the frequent and monotonous searchings and espionage that had made life well-nigh intolerable. Moreover, his quarters in the prison had been changed. He was no longer in charge of Belton. He had also been shifted into another gang. So terrible had been the strain of Special Orders that he experienced a feeling almost akin to exhilaration when he passed out through the gates for the first time with his new associates.

St. Helen's Island, their destination, stood on the river Reedway, and was separated from the mainland by a small stream that was traversed by a wooden bridge, barricaded on either side. Along this bridge were posted at intervals armed sentries of the civil guard. Owing to its commanding position, the island was being fortified, the work being done by convict labour. Every precaution had been taken to prevent escape. Elevated sentry-boxes were posted round, and a wooden palisade, spiked and of a formidable height, inclosed the half-finished fortifications, and cut off the convicts at work upon them from the river.

The gang reached a small eminence where they were engaged in constructing a bastion. Scarsdale gazed hungrily

WHEN DOES DEAFNESS BECOME INCURABLE.

Although great advances have been made in the treatment of Deafness in the past twenty-five years, it has remained for the Drouet Institute to modify the almost universal opinion, that long-standing cases of Defective Hearing are incurable. In this respect, the report of thirty-six cases cured by the Drouet Method during the past month is truly surprising, as a large number of these patients had been afflicted by deafness of long duration, and had previously tried other special treatment without receiving definite benefit. Some of them, indeed, had been operated on. In contrast with these failures, the success of the Drouet Treatment is so great, that the Editor of the "Journal for the Deaf" has published details of these thirty-six cases in the form of a "Supplement."

Among these cases the following are of great interest:

At the age of 64 years, Mr. Horne presented for treatment, by the Drouet Institute, a case of long standing deafness accompanied by distressing noises in the ears, which had been pronounced incurable by his doctor. As Mr. Horne held the responsible position of Inspector for the British Homes Assurance Corporation Ltd., the deafness was a great drawback in his occupation, and it was therefore with much gratitude that he reported the successful result of the Drouet method:—

48 Penge Road, South Norwood, May 29th, 1902.

Dear Sir,—I am extremely pleased to inform you that I can now hear quite well. I was afraid at my age, viz., 64 years, perhaps I should not get my hearing restored, especially as my doctor informed me he thought I should be permanently deaf. I shall recommend your treatment to all I come in contact with in town and country. With kindest regards and many thanks.—I am, yours faithfully, J. HORNE.

In the case of Mr. S. T. Taylor, the Drouet Treatment restored the hearing after a well-known Yorkshire specialist failed. The deafness was so extreme a watch could not be heard ticking unless pressed closely against the ear. There was a continuous noise in the head, like the hissing of escaping steam, and also severe complications in the form of catarrh of the nose and throat. The completeness of the cure effected by the Drouet Treatment is shown by the following letter:—

High Pittington, Durham, May 30th, 1902.

Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in reporting that my hearing is now as good as ever it was. I could not hear anyone speak, now I can hear all right. Thanking you for your kind attention.—Yours truly,

S. T. TAYLOR.

Those who are interested in reading a full description of the Drouet treatment for deafness and diseases of the ear, nose, and throat can obtain a free copy of the "Journal for the Deaf," with a "Supplement" containing detailed accounts of the cases cured during the past month by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, Regent's Park Road, London, N.W. Each Journal is accompanied by a Patient's Report Form which enables applicants to receive full particulars for applying the treatment at home. Any advice by correspondence is absolutely free.

It is, however, always advisable, when possible, to be personally examined at the Drouet Institute, 72 Regent's Park Road, Primrose Hill, London, N.W., where consultations are held daily, except Sunday, from two to four in the afternoon. Special consultations may also be had at any time by previous arrangement. For all personal consultations a fee is charged.

Digitized by Google

OUR THRILLING SERIAL. YOU CAN BEGIN TO-DAY.

at the broad river, the sunshine upon it, and many tan-sailed barges sailing lazily before the faint breeze. If only he were aboard one of them! If only he had his liberty!

Wrackam Prison was notorious for the strictness of its discipline, and a spirit of discontent had long been smouldering among the prisoners. Scarsdale had not been long at work before he gathered from certain muttered whisperings that something was in the air—something in the shape of a meditated mutiny. Presently the man working alongside, sidled a little nearer.

"Mate," he whispered, with motionless lips, "will you stand in along with us?"

"What do you mean?"

"Some of us can't stand things as they're going on no longer. We can't petition the 'Ome Secretary, and the visiting director won't listen to us. We're going on strike. It ain't no use doing so on the parade ground, 'cos we'll be surrounded by walls and screws; but out 'ere on the island it'll be different. When the signal's given, every man jack will chuck away 'is pick and refuse to do another stroke of work. If one cove was to do this, they'd march 'im off double-quick time to the punishment cells, but if something like a couple of hundred of us do it, it'll be a different matter. There ain't going to be no violence. It's only going to be a kind o' protest as will make them in authority think, and p'raps, by getting into the papers, do a bit of good that way."

Scarsdale had seen enough of the workings of Wrackam Prison to realise that there was a crying need for reform.

"There'll be no violence?"

"No! Honour bright!"

"Then I'll stand in with you!"

"The signal will be given this afternoon. I'm going to give it. I shall chuck down my pick, d'ye see. You keep your eye on me!"

When, that afternoon, the gang returned from the prison to the island, Scarsdale, as usual, glanced across the river. Though on the island itself the atmosphere was clear enough, a faint mist lay over the water. If the mist would only increase, and roll over the island—he glanced at the warders, then at the palisade. The hectic flush of a moment coloured his haggard cheek. He was free of his leg-chains now. It would be the opportunity for which he had so feverishly longed! Thoughts of Esther, a confused vision of Seaton Revelle, his smooth lying face close to hers, breathing some insinuation into her ears, flashed through his brain. For a moment he had forgotten all about the impending strike.

Crash!

The convict beside him had thrown down his pick. A warder promptly hurried up.

"Boys," shouted out the convict, "all of yer that are going to stand by me, knock off work!"

Someone else in the next gang took up the cry, and, barely thirty seconds later, some two hundred convicts had thrown down their tools.

Scarsdale had already flung down his pick. Warders' whistles were ringing shrilly out. Instinctively he glanced at the river. The mist had thickened and was beginning to roll towards the island.

The intention of the convicts who had organised the strike had been to avoid violence. But it is one thing to make plans, another to carry them out. The spark had fallen among gunpowder. One of the warders, a nervous man, had whipped out his revolver, and took a step towards one of the rebels. Quick as thought the convict snatched up his spade; whether the blow drew the fire, or the fire the blow, was never known. To those nearest the scene, they seemed simultaneous—the flash and the report of the revolver, and the swift downfalling of the spade that stretched the warder senseless on the ground.

Then followed a scene of the wildest confusion. Every fierce passion that had for so long been pent up, was let loose. Revolvers cracked out; cutlasses flashed. Convicts, warders, and civil guard were all mixed up in a tangled, struggling mass!

For a moment Scarsdale stood irresolute, gazing at the fierce fight. It could only end in one way—discipline and fire-arms must prevail. Detachments of the civil guard were pouring over the bridge on to the island.

Now or never!

He made a rush towards the tall, spiked palisade; clambered up it — the sentries had deserted their posts to hurry to the main scene of action — the spikes tore him, cut into his flesh; but he scarcely seemed to feel pain.

"Freedom, freedom, freedom!"

It was as if a thousand voices shouted the word into his ears.

Then the sharp crack of a rifle rang out!

One of the civil guard, hurrying towards the general melée, had seen Scarsdale as he clambered up the palisade. Over three hundred yards divided them. Dropping on to one knee, he had taken deliberate aim and fired. A hot, scorching pain seared Scarsdale's left shoulder. At the moment of firing he was astride the top of the stockade. He swayed and fell, but on the far side. The rifleman sprang to his feet, but, before he could rush forward, an infuriated convict, armed with a spade, flung himself upon him. One fierce blow of the spade smashed the rifle from his hand; and a moment

OUR COLOURED COVER FOR NEXT WEEK.

A thrilling incident in a powerful story which will be found in next Tuesday's SHORT STORIES.

Digitized by Google

later the two men were locked together in a mad struggle, each trying to wrench the other off his feet.

Dazed and wounded though he was, Scarsdale was on his feet again in an instant. With breathless speed he covered the ground intervening between him and the river. He had not seen what had taken place immediately after the shot had been fired.

The haze that covered the water was already beginning to roll over the edge of the island. He passed into it, reached the water, and plunged in. He was a powerful swimmer, but his left shoulder was stiff and aching. The river was at least a mile in breadth; even if he reached the other side, he still wore the fatal convict-dress. The mist obscured his vision; even as he struck out, the thought flashed through his mind that he might be swimming in a circle, and would only land on the island that he was striving to leave behind.

He set his teeth. All the determination, all the endurance of his nature was now revealed. He could still hear the cries of the fighting convicts, the occasional crack of firearms. His heavy boots and the wounded shoulder were beginning to drag upon him. If only the mist would lift for a moment that he might see where he was! The water was choppy, and now and again a wave dashed down his throat, half-choking him. Every moment seemed to add to the leaden weight of his boots, and made it more difficult to keep his head above the surface.

For Esther's sake he would not give in! He would struggle on while he could move a limb, so long as breath remained in his body. Esther, Esther—her very memory seemed to buoy him up and give him fresh strength in his fight for freedom and life!

Suddenly, from out the mist, something dark loomed up before him. A gasp of joy escaped his lips. It was a boat—an empty boat that was lying at anchor in the stream. Twice he failed to drag himself out of the water into it. The third time he succeeded, and, bleeding, breathless and exhausted, sank down to the bottom of the boat. But he was up again a moment later. Every second was precious. The mist might rise before darkness came. He must get away, but to where? If he rowed across and reached the other side, his clothes would betray him. Perhaps, even now, the news of his escape was being telegraphed across the country. Every one, on land and water, would be on the watch for the escaped felon wearing the parti-coloured dress.

A hundred different plans crowded through his brain. The tide was running out; perhaps it would be best to drift out with it. The mouth of the Reedway adjoined the Thames. Reaching it, he might work his way up the Thames with the turn of the tide. By that time he would have the darkness in his favour. If he could only obtain a change of clothes!

Casting loose the anchor-chain, he put out the sculls. The tide was with him. Once he nearly fouled a sailing-barge, but though he heard the voices of those on board her, he could not see them, and they could not distinguish, close as they were, the felon's dress. Scarsdale thanked God for the haze that still cloaked the water.

When darkness came at last, he was still toiling at the sculls, though his shoulder had become almost unbearable; and his limbs ached, and his teeth were chattering with the cold. But hope and love still gave him strength. In after years, when he looked back upon that day and the night that followed, it all seemed to him like a dream.

It was quite dark when he reached the mouth of the Reedway, but the mist had risen. Away before him twinkled out the Nore light. Sheerness harbour lights shone out on his right. Once, before his convict days, he had spent a week on a friend's sailing cutter, cruising round the mouth of the Thames. He had roughly learnt the various points, and had sometimes taken the tiller. He thanked Heaven for his knowledge. The tide had turned. It was dead against him as he laboured round the bend that separates the Reedway from the Thames, but once round, it was in his favour, and swept the boat up into the Sea Reach, the broadest part of the Thames before it becomes merged in the sea.

A Mad Cyclist.

An inmate who recently escaped from a private asylum was recaptured whilst trying to ride a bicycle he had seized upon, up the side of a railway cutting. There was but little more foolishness in his attempt than in the daily attempts of scores of people who drive their systems to do impossibilities. Summer heat robs them of their appetite. Food becomes distasteful, and is avoided, yet despite the fact that they are taking less nourishment, they force their systems to do the same amount of work as before. Women are especially sufferers in this direction, and the result is debility, anæmia, "heat fag," and serious ailments peculiar to their sex. Chas. Forde's Bile Beans are a seasonable tonic. They create an appetite, give the weakened digestion power to deal with the food, stir up the sluggish liver, and stimulate it to normal action. They remove congestion which causes headache, and in all the common ailments of the home act like a charm. Your chemist will supply them at one and three halfpence or two and nine pence per box, or you may receive post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 London Wall, E.C., for prices. They are not sugar coated, and may be carried loose in the waistcoat pocket. This is a point for business men to remember.

SULPHOLINE LOTION.

For clearing the Skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

Digitized by Google

OUR THRILLING SERIAL. YOU CAN BEGIN TO-DAY.

He was feeling now utterly spent. He was close in shore, and, with the exception of an occasional stroke to keep the boat straight, had ceased sculling, allowing the tide to work for him.

It would be something if only he could snatch an hour's rest; body and mind alike required it, for never once during the long hours that he had been sculling had he ceased to rack his brains on the question—how was he to obtain a change of clothes? Another thought that haunted him was the knowledge that the further up river he went, the greater was his risk of encountering the Thames police. His escape must be known by this time; the boat he had taken would be missed, and perhaps the river-police were already patrolling in search of him.

He had swept past several barges moored up to buoys, and anchored for the night. From some of them came the sound of voices; others seemed deserted. It was no time to stick at trifles. If he could come across an empty barge, he would not hesitate to board it. Somehow or other, he must obtain a suit of clothes. But he would snatch some rest first. A buoy loomed out of the darkness ahead. Catching hold as he passed, he made fast to it, and then flung himself down full length on the bottom of the boat.

Utterly dead-beat, he lay there like a log, too weary even to think. A few seconds later, he was in a dead sleep—a gracious sleep that gave him rest from pain, anxiety, and anguish.

He awoke with a start, fancying himself back again in his prison-cell, but the stars twinkling down upon him told him that he was beneath God's free Heaven. The rest had refreshed him. The pulse of hope was throbbing more strongly than ever. He sat up, but his shoulder had stiffened to such an extent that he could scarcely move his left arm. The blood had clotted, glueing his shirt to the wound. He cast loose, and once more took to the sculls. It was positive torture to row, and, with all his endurance, more than once a groan was wrung from his lips. He feverishly glanced at the sky; the stars were beginning to fade before the first grey light of dawn. And he was still wearing the hideous prison-dress. He ceased rowing, and looked round. In the distance he could just distinguish a couple of barges lying at anchor. He was getting desperate. If no sounds of life came from them, he would board one of them. The tide bore the boat towards them. Straining his eyes and ears, Scarsdale felt his heart leap into his mouth.

Across the deck of one barge stretched a line on which a number of clothes were hung up to dry.

He shipped his sculls. As the boat glided past, he grabbed the side of the barge. No sounds came from it. Quickly he made fast; then, with difficulty, owing to his shoulder, he drew himself on deck. A shirt, a rough blue flannel suit, a cap, a pair of socks, hung on the line; their owner had evidently had a tumble overboard.

It was the work of a moment to whip them off the line.

As he noiselessly lowered himself into the boat, he glanced at the name painted on the bows of the barge, "The Lively Polly, Rochester." If he came through all right, if ever the opportunity were granted him, he would make good the owner's loss.

Hope was stronger than ever now. Some distance along, he ran into a little creek. It was cruel work getting out of these convict clothes. The wound, furrowed across his shoulder by the rifleman's bullet, started to bleed afresh, and he almost fainted with pain as he tore away the shirt. Dressed in the other clothes, he had all the appearance of a riverside character. He rolled up the hideous parti-coloured dress into a bundle, weighted it with a couple of stones taken from the bank; then cast it into the water.

It sank with a hollow plunge. A great weight seemed to be lifted from his soul; he was free now from that hideous dress, with its arrow-brands, the tokens of infamy and degradation.

It was quite light when he shot out of the creek and made for the mid-stream; he was not afraid now of being recognised.

Esther—she was the keynote of his existence, of the almost superhuman strength and endurance that had buoyed him up.

But he was spent now, and tide and stream were against him. A mist rose up before his eyes. He sank forward over the sculls. He was vaguely conscious of a dark shadow, of a hoarse voice, of what seemed a faint crash; then all was a blank!

* * * * *

"That's better, mate, I thought you were never going to show signs of coming round!"

Scarsdale stared up blankly for a moment, then became conscious of a bronzed, bearded face staring down at him.

"Where am I?" he whispered. "What's happened?"

"You're aboard the Mary Ann. What came over you? You looked as if you were going to cross our bows right enough, and then you fell forward over your sculls. And we were on you before there was time to say Jack Robinson. Anyways, if your boat went to the bottom, we managed to haul you aboard. There now, get some more of this grog down your throat!" Everything returned to Scarsdale's mind with a rush.

"I didn't see me way to heaving-to and putting you ashore with the best of the tide under us, and seeing that I'm on a contract job where time counts; but I daresay you'll be all right here till to-morrow, when you'll be able to go ashore. Now you just keep quiet for a bit whilst I see about getting some sort of grub for you. We can talk of things after you've got something in your inside."

"Where," whispered Scarsdale, "are we bound for?"

"We've got a cargo of bricks aboard for Gurlston Bay!"

WHAT ESTHER SAW FROM GURLSTON PIER.

The rumour had proved correct. The evening paper had contained an account of Scarsdale's escape; but as yet Esther did not know. On the afternoon of the day on which she had learnt of Revelle's presence at Gurlston, she had left her room, and had spent some time in the garden; but when she heard of the invitation given by her host to Revelle, she pleaded her indisposition as an excuse for not appearing at dinner that evening. She told herself that it was only postponing the inevitable; but she was thankful for even a day's grace.

Esther breakfasted in her room on the following morning; but she was feeling much stronger. When she descended shortly before mid-day, she asked one of the servants for a morning paper.

"Please, miss," said the servant on her return, "I can't find any of the London papers. The gentlemen have gone out on the yacht this morning, and I think they must have taken them with them!"

The banker had wished to stay with his daughter, but Esther had insisted that he should go with the others. She had gathered from him that Revelle was to be one of the party. Another brief reprieve! Since his arrival at Gurlston she had not met him.

The village of Gurlston nestled in a sheltered bay, and was of sufficient importance as a seaside resort to boast a pier. In the old days, prior to the advent of the railway, most of the traffic had been water-borne, and even now barges and small coasting craft might be seen drawn up alongside the wooden jetty, hard by the pier, unlading their cargoes.

Esther's only companion at luncheon was her hostess. It was afterwards, while sitting alone in the garden, that a longing came over her to get a nearer glimpse of the sea.

Mrs. Walters was expecting a caller, and could not accompany her.

Digitized by Google

Good! its Mason's

MASON'S EXTRACT of HERBS

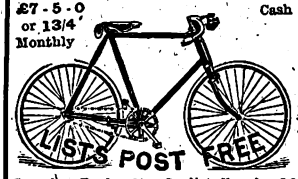
THE BEST BEVERAGE TO TAKE WITH YOUR MEALS, AND AT ALL TIMES.
THE MOST SUITABLE FOR CHILDREN DURING WARM WEATHER.

A Physician states: "It assuages thirst, it is refreshing, and grateful to weak stomachs."

A 6d. Bottle of Extract makes 8 gallons. Bottle, post free, 9 stamps.

Manufacturers:
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

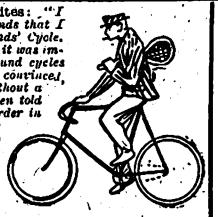
JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN.
Free Wheels. Carriage paid to all parts.
£7-5-0 or 13/4 Monthly
Cash or 12 monthly payments.



£7 5s. ... 13/4
£7 15s. ... 14/2
£8 8s. ... 15/0
£9 9s. ... 15/8
£9 15s. ... 17/6
£11 0s. ... 20/0
£11 11s ... 21/0
£15 0s. ... 28/0

Corsair Plated Lamp, 2/9: A1 Rim Brake, 6/6; Scorcher Brake, 1/-. Cyclist Poncho, 2/9. Write at once for New Season's List of over 100 pages and over 500 illustrations of JUNO CYCLES and latest cycling accessories at lower prices than any other house. Sent Post Free. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd., S.Y. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate St. Without, London, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

A Lincolnshire patron writes: "I told some of my cycle club friends that I was intending to buy a Symonds' Cycle. They said I would be sorry, as it was impossible for any firm to sell sound cycles so cheaply. I pretended to be convinced, bought a Symonds' machine without a transfer, paying you £6 14s., then told my friends I had it made to order in Coventry at £14; they all say it is splendid value, and the club experts say it is a superior model." We have many similar letters. Write for circulars to Symonds' London Stores, 124-128 City Road, London, E.C.



From 1s. weekly. Special Offer. £12 15s. 0d. Sample for £6 6s. Carriage paid. PLATED RIMS, FREE WHEELS, RIM BRAKE FITTED FREE. Agents wanted. — DEREHAM ROAD CYCLE CO., NORWICH.

HOME NOTES.
The Leading Ladies' Paper.
Published Every Thursday.
ONE PENNY.

KEATING'S POWDER KILLS BUGS FLEAS FLIES BEETLES
TINS 3d. 6d. 1s. BELLOWS 9d.

£1,000 FOR CLEVER PEOPLE.

A NEW AND FASCINATING SKILL COMPETITION.

ARE YOU SHARP AT STUDYING OUT WORDS? If so, here is a chance to win a Cash Prize and also your choice from at least 1,000 Special Prizes to be given away by "The British Fireside." See this word below. Can you make seven other words out of it?

FIRESIDE

We shall pay a Prize to every person who can make seven words from the above letters. For example, "Fire" is one of the words, and "if" another, etc. We are doing this to advertise our Journal. We wish the word "Fireside" to burn itself indelibly into your memory. The only condition therefore is that you take in our paper, which you can easily do, and we show you how it may cost you nothing. Sit down and study it out. It may be easier than you think. We shall pay a Cash Prize of £50 among those who send in seven words, and besides this you have your choice of Special Prizes—a beautiful gold-plated Genuine Lever Watch, a Wonderful Camera, a Tip Top Phonograph, our Standard Stereoscope, etc.

We shall also give a further sum of £30 to be divided into three Capital Cash Prizes, as follows:—

£15 to the person sending in the longest list of words made from "Fireside."	£10 for the next longest list made from the word "Fireside."	£5 for the third longest list made from the word "Fireside."

This is a contest where energy and brains count. If you can make seven words from "Fireside" you get a Prize Award. Altogether we guarantee that the Prizes in this unique contest cost at least £1,000. If we do not carry out our conditions, you receive your money back. This is not for lazy people nor idlers, but for smart men and women, boys and girls to show their skill.

What You Have to Do. If you succeed in finding seven words, send them in at once. You thus win a Special Prize under the stated conditions and a cash prize, and you qualify for the Capital Prizes. The fuller lists can be sent later. Do not delay. Work out the words quick, and send two stamps for copy of "British Fireside" prospectus, conditions, postage, etc. We hope you will try for this, but we shall award the £1,000 in prizes anyway. Names and addresses of chief winners will be published. If you like, send 6d. and we will forward you the prospectus, conditions, award and a pretty Gift of Jewellery that will surprise and please you. Address—

"BRITISH FIRESIDE," Dept. 112, 40 GERRARD STREET, LONDON, W.

Digitized by Google

Good looks are assured, for beauty in the box is no exaggerated statement when made regarding David Macqueen's "Vegetine" Pills. These pills are universally acknowledged to be the GREATEST SPECIFIC OF THE AGE for clearing and beautifying the complexion through the purifying of the blood and the cleansing of the liver. THEY CONTAIN NOTHING BUT THE MOST BENEFICIAL AND HEALTH-GIVING PROPERTIES; all the elements being found in edible vegetables.

The pills are packed in the following size boxes, and forwarded post free:

1s. 1½d. (containing 30 pills)
2s. 9d. (,, 90 pills)
4s. 6d. (,, 180 pills)

To prove their priceless worth, a sample box containing 15 pills will be forwarded post free, on receipt of eight stamps. No further test will be required.

The David Macqueen's pills are privately and securely packed in turned wood boxes, and forwarded post free to any part of the world.

One of these small pills should be taken daily. They do not purge like other pills but afford that gentle laxative so beneficial to general health.

Remember, David Macqueen's "Vegetine" Pills will not cure every disease under the sun, but they will purify your blood, cleanse the liver, clear and beautify your complexion, and strengthen and invigorate the whole physical system.

A FEW RECENT TESTIMONIALS.

Mr. H. R. Francis, Beaulieu House, Shandon Road, Clapham Park, S.W., writes (May 15th, 1902): "You will be pleased to hear that after taking your pills my complexion has become most beautiful and clear. Though I am not vain, I find it difficult to abstain from seeing myself in every mirror I come across. I trust you will be able to make your remedy known to all the thousands of sufferers from sallowness and skin blemishes."

Miss M. A. B., of Brixton Hill, S.W., writes (May 5th, 1902): "I have much pleasure in informing you that since I have begun to use David Macqueen's Pills, a great change has come over me. My health has greatly improved, and my complexion (so my friends tell me) is charming, thanks to your pills. I shall certainly recommend them to my friends. P.S.—You can make what use you like of this, with the exception of the full name and number in address."

Miss A. K., Railway Road, King's Lynn (June 28th, 1902), writes: "I am very pleased to say that after taking your pills my comp'exion and health have improved wondorfully."

Miss Bertha H., of Stroud Green, N., writes (May 8th, 1902): "Gentlemen, I write to thank you for the pills which have certainly proved most beneficial. I intend to recommend them to my friends."

Mr. A. Kay, Chadwell Heath, Essex, writes (May 2nd 1902): "I have been taking your pills for a short time only but really must say they have a wonderful effect on my health. They do not purge or act violently in any way, but gently and surely bring about a most healthy state. Apparent outwardly and inwardly felt."

Mrs. S. Wilson, St. Margaret's Terrace, Station Road Bognor (May 15th, 1902): "I enclose 1/1½ for your pills, which please forward to me as before. I think it only right to let you know that I am more than satisfied with the results, and think that every word in your advertisements is true; as my complexion and skin was a great annoyance to me, but after taking one box of your pills my skin is getting simply lovely which I can only attribute to your wonderful blood purifying pills. I feel, when out, bound to stop everyone I see with a bad skin and tell them of your great remedy."

Order Form.

To the David Macqueen Company,

12 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

Please forward me a box of David Macqueen's "Vegetine" Pills, for which I forward the sum of.....

Name_____

Address_____

Digitized by Google

"Are you quite sure that you feel strong enough; let me order you the carriage. Your father seemed to think that you ought not to go beyond the grounds to-day!"

"Oh, but I'm feeling ever so much better, and a little walk will do me good."

It was not a far cry down to the village. Esther made her way on to the pier. She was the only soul upon it. She sat herself down in a glass shelter. One or two craft were drawn up alongside the jetty, so close that she could read their names. For a while she stared out wistfully across the sea; then a flutter at her side called her attention to a paper that had been left behind by some previous occupant of the shelter. Picking it up, she opened it mechanically.

CONVICTS MUTINY AT WRACKAM PRISON.
ESCAPE OF A NOTORIOUS CRIMINAL.

Wrackam Prison, where Alec was! The blood rushed to her cheeks, then died away, leaving them bloodlessly white!

Feverishly she read through the account of the rising, how the civil guard had been compelled to fire upon the mutineers. So far there was no mention of Alec's name. Had he been among them? Had he been one of those wounded? She could scarcely bring herself to read on.

"It was during the confusion that No. 35 contrived to escape by climbing over the stockade and taking to the river. One of the civil guard fired at him, but was immediately overpowered by another prisoner, and prevented from giving the alarm. It was only after the rebellion had been quelled by the arrival of a strong force of soldiers from the barracks, that the identity of the missing man was established. He proved to be No. 35, the Alexander Scarsdale whose act of heroism in saving a warder from drowning was chronicled in our issue of yesterday. Search-parties were at once organised. At first it was thought that he must have perished in attempting to swim the river, but it now appears that a boat, anchored some little way below St. Helen's Island, is found to be missing. The prison officials are confident of his capture. Convict 35, at the time of his escape, was wearing the parti-coloured prison dress that denotes having assaulted an official."

A low cry of half-joy, half-agony, burst from Esther's lips. She clasped her hands together convulsively!

It was joy to think of him free; agony to think of him being hunted like some animal. Then her brain started to throb with a hundred tumultuous thoughts. They had fired upon him. Was he wounded? Where was he? Drifting out to sea in an open boat?

She clasped her pulsing forehead with her burning hands, and stared with great wild eyes across the bay.

A picturesque-looking barge, lying low in the water, moving lazily before the gentle breeze, was creeping round the headland into the bay!

"Oh, my love!" she wildly murmured. "Where are you—where are you? Oh, God! That I could be beside you now! Only to know!"

* * * * *

"But, Mr. Revelle," said Mrs. Walters, "I understood that you were going with the others on the yacht!"

Seaton Revelle had been ushered out on to the lawn where Mrs. Walters was taking tea with her visitor.

"Well, I had every intention of going; then I had a worrying letter from my solicitor this morning, about a little property that I've got up in the north, a fellow threatening me with a law-suit. It meant a long letter from me, so I gave up the idea!"

He glanced round casually.

"No, thank you, awfully good of you; but I won't take tea. How's Miss Mansfield? I hoped to see her!"

"Oh, she seems considerably better. In fact, she's gone down to the village. She wanted to be really near the sea. She said something about going on to the pier!"

A few moments later Revelle was sauntering down to the village.

Esther neither saw nor heard the well-built figure, spotless in "ducks" and blue serge, the yachting cap bearing the flag of a select club, that was strolling towards her.

She was staring in front of her, her eyes fixed unseeingly on a sailing barge that was being warped up alongside the jetty.

The name on the stern was distinctly visible:

Mary Ann!

(A further splendid instalment is published in the Holiday Number, ready Friday next, August 1st.)

A Very Poor Plan.

"HENRY is late again to-night," sobbed Mrs. Nubride, "and he knows well enough that I told him I wouldn't speak to him for a week if he didn't take to coming home earlier." "My dear child," said her mother, "you are very young yet, or you would never try that plan."

To Deceive the Baby.

MRS. JONES: "Why are you setting the alarm for half-past two? You surely don't want to get up at that time?" JONES: "No; I'd like to go to sleep at that time. When the baby hears that, he may think it's time for him to turn in."

Still Unlucky.

A YOUNG man who had been rejected thirteen times by a girl didn't stop there. Remembering that thirteen is an unlucky number, he proposed for the fourteenth time and was accepted. He is now prepared to believe that fourteen is a more unlucky number than thirteen.

Too Weak to Stain.

JINKS: "I called at your lodging-house to-day and saw the table nearly set for dinner, and I must say things looked very neat. I never saw a whiter tablecloth in my life." Blinks: "No, my landlady doesn't make her tea, coffee, or soups strong enough to stain."

OBSERVE THIS.

How to Take and Fake Photographs.

- - BY - -

CLIVE HOLLAND.

AUTHOR OF

"Practical Hints on Photography,"
"The Artistic in Photography," etc.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 1s., or post free, 1s. 2d.

Some of the Chapters are:

THE DARK ROOM.
CAMERAS, PLATES AND FILMS.
EXPOSURE.
DEVELOPMENT OF NEGATIVES.
PRINTING PROCESSES.
HINTS.

THE ART OF BEAUTY.

BY A

Toilet Specialist.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 1s., or post free, 1s. 2d.

Some of the Chapters are:

THE CURE OF STOUTNESS.
THE CURE OF LEANNESS.
EXERCISE.
THE FIGURE.

Of all Booksellers or of the Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

IN CONFIDENCE

By MADGE MORRIS.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Who Should Start Making It Up?

"PUZZLED" has had a quarrel with her lover, but is very proud, and thinks it against maidenly modesty for her to write first. Should she not wait and see whether the overtures will come from him?

* * * *

No, "PUZZLED." If you are conscious of having been foolish, and have in any way wronged him, you should yourself be the first to write to try and set things right again. He will not think any the less of you for it. Do not let pride—which in this case is certainly false and foolish—stand in your way if you are really fond of him.

❦❦❦

The Friend's Sweetheart.

"A VERY great friend of mine," writes "S. K.," "has a young lady whom I find I am getting more fond of every day, and now I feel I must have her, or I shall die. I cannot live without her. Please tell me how I can win her without offending my friend. She herself seems to like me very much."

* * * *

You should not make any advances at all. She is your friend's possession, and, for all you know, they are extremely fond of each other. To thrust yourself on her notice would be very dishonourable and unmanly. Be as nice as possible when you meet, and if, after all, her liking for you is greater than for your friend, she will in time reveal the fact. When that happens your course should be clear, but not while she is your friend's sweetheart.

❦❦❦

Should He Write?

"I AM in rather a poor position," writes "T. S." "and have frequently met a young lady of independent means and good education, who I am almost sure would like to make my acquaintance. She has no male friends, so I cannot get an introduction. She is about to leave the district. Should I write to her and ascertain whether I am right in thinking she would like to know me?"

* * * *

You say the girl is of independent means. I suppose, therefore, she is not living with her parents. Being a free agent, therefore, I do not see why you should not write to her as you suggest. It seems to me to be the most natural thing to do.

❦❦❦

Suspicious Ena.

"ENA" has for a long time known a certain man by sight, but having heard something against his personal character has never wished to meet him. Recently, however, she has been invited to a party, and after accepting the invitation has heard that the man in question will be there. She believes that if he is introduced to her he will make objectionable advances. Should she go to the party at all, and if so, how can she treat the undesirable man?

"ENA" should tell her hostess in confidence that she would rather not know the gentleman, and ask her to avoid, if possible, an introduction. If this cannot be done, it will be quite easy for her to convey to him by a very cool bow that, while she is compelled to know him, she desires no further acquaintance. Unless the man is devoid of pride and manners, he would scarcely attempt to embarrass you after such a definite snub.

❦❦❦

A Case for Restraint.

"PERCY H." has for long admired a girl he met once at a friend's house. But while they have met very often since, and had every opportunity of speaking, she has always avoided him. When she meets him out she gives the coldest of nods, and turns her eyes away.

* * * * *

Evidently the girl does not want to know you, "PERCY H." That being the case, be man enough not to embarrass her. She probably is attached in another direction. Try and put yourself in her place, and imagine how you would feel if persons were continually seeking your acquaintance without any desire on your part to possess it. The girl has probably made up her mind that she could not care for you, and decided that rather than be compelled to inform you of the fact she will avoid any closer acquaintance, a decision which you should respect.

❦❦❦

Must Make His Choice.

"HOWARD" has been "keeping company" with a young lady in Wales, but since coming to London has met another girl whom he has got to like very much. How can he be honourable to both?

* * * *

He cannot. He must decide which of the two girls he is the more fond of, and be loyal to her. Attempts to maintain relations with two distinct girls invariably end in disaster, so, while there is yet time, "HOWARD" should take the path which is at once wise and honourable—that is, to select the girl whom he feels he could best love.

❦❦❦

The Intractable Mother.

"AUSTRAL" is employed in an office where there are several young ladies. One of them he is very fond of, and he knows that she likes him. But one day her mother discovered some rather compromising correspondence, and made the girl promise not to have anything more to do with "AUSTRAL," as she thought her too young for such things. If he got to know the mother, and confessed the whole truth to her, the latter lady would certainly remove her daughter from the office.

* * * *

I think "AUSTRAL" would do well, after all, to make a clean breast of the position to the mother. Otherwise there would be nothing else for him to do but either deceive her, and thereby involve the girl in trouble with her parent, as well as breach of her promise, or allow his acquaintance with her to drop. "AUSTRAL" should tell the mother that he is attached to her daughter, and that he wishes his actions to be thoroughly straightforward. If he is able to convince her of the honour of his intentions, and would promise that his conduct towards the girl would be always discreet, possibly the lady might be induced to waver in her decision. Whatever may be the consequences, I always think it is better for the dealings of a suitor with the parents of his sweetheart to be open and candid. Sooner or later, parents must recognise that they cannot always oppose the wishes of their children, even though it often takes years to convert them to doing so.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

2/6 CYCLE OFFER.

£1,000 if untrue, or if any other firm in Great Britain is supplying to-day as high grade a machine, including all extras and accessories, as specified below, at a similar rate of payment, and at an equally advantageous mode of delivery.

HIGHEST GRADE CYCLE FITTED WITH
DUNLOP (1902) TYRES
ON WESTWOOD RIMS,
INCLUDING
BEST FREE WHEEL
AND
FRONT RIM BRAKE,
COMPLETE WITH
LAMP, WALLET, BELL,
And all Accessories.

The bicycle is made in
COVENTRY AND BIRMINGHAM
and built to your order,
AND FULLY
GUARANTEED TWO YEARS.
No charge for crate, wrapping, packing, &c., &c.

Inclusive of everything mentioned

2/6

a week.

No further payment till after delivery.

If we are too full up with orders when we receive yours we will refund the 2/6.

NO EXTRAS. £1,000. NO EXTRAS.

We will also forfeit this amount if we cannot prove that identical machines have been sold from £15 to £19 cash through cycle agents.

SEND CROSSED P.O. 2/6

and we will forward you catalogue, and if we are able to accept your order we will send on the machine at once, or as soon as it can be built, without a penny more. Machines can be seen at the address below, where critical inspection is most cordially invited. All communications must be addressed and remittance made out to—

MANAGER, ALPHA COMPANY LIMITED,
Est. 1886. Cycle Manufacturers, Reg. 1900.
London Office: 59 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

The above firm is well-known to the Proprietors of "Pearson's Weekly," "Short Stories," and the Pearson publications.

Digitized by Google

BEECHAM'S PILLS

HAVE BEEN, ARE NOW, AND WILL BE

THE PEOPLE'S MEDICINE.

It is possible by plausible advertisements, set forth in an attractive style, to temporarily arrest the attention of a certain number of readers and induce them to purchase a particular article. But it is a more difficult matter to ensure their continued patronage. Unless the advertised article proves to be all that is claimed for it, not only do the purchasers discontinue its use, but warn others against it as a thing to be avoided. Should it be, however, of genuine value, those who make a trial of it naturally become habitual users and advocates, their advocacy being the most effective and absolutely reliable advertisement possible. The present position and popularity of Beecham's Pills prove them to be a preparation of high merit. Old friends show their appreciation of Beecham's Pills by continuing, year in, year out, to rely solely on their remarkable curative and tonic qualities. No other medicine is taken, and none is needed; and it is to the steady recommendation of all who take them that the widespread fame of Beecham's Pills is due. As Beecham's Pills have been tried for more than half a century, and are now recognised as an unsurpassable Family Medicine in all parts of the world, there is no need for you to pause or room for you to doubt. Others have long since put them to the severest test of time and intelligence, and have given the unqualified verdict:

"Worth a Guinea a Box."

BEECHAM'S PILLS are always scrupulously mixed, under the same supervision, and made of the best drugs procurable, with the most excellent machinery.

BEECHAM'S PILLS ARE SOLD EVERYWHERE, in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 pills), and 2/9 (168 pills).

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

Splendid Holiday Number. 1D.

No. 710.

August 9th, 1902.

Suddenly, without an instant's warning, my bicycle seemed to leap into the air, and I was flung violently into the road.

(A Thrilling Incident from the Powerful Story, "The Hound of Death." See Inside.)

Digitized by Google

"Let's Talk of Graves"

Shakespeare

THE "EXPRESS" (Regd.) ENGLISH LEVER, £2 10s.

That word "EXPRESS" on the dial of a watch is a guarantee that it is Pure

British Manufacture throughout and NOT a foreign-made movement in English Cases.

TERMS. Send 5s. and the watch will be forwarded to you. If satisfied, complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of the same amount; or, HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment. If the watch fails to meet with your approval, return it, and your deposit will be refunded in full.

THE LARGEST WATCH-SALES FIRM IN THE WORLD.

Send for our No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., etc., sent to your address Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division Street, SHEFFIELD.

You must try

E. & T.

PINK'S

JAMS

they are

Absolutely Pure

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN. Free Wheels.

£7-15-0 or 14/2 Monthly.

Carriage paid to all parts. CASH or 12 monthly payments.

£7 15s.	14/2
£8 8s.	15/0
£9 10s.	17/1
£9 15s	17/6
£11 0s.	20/0
£12 0s.	21/8

Corsair Plated Lamp, 2/9; A1 Rim Brake, 6/6; Scorcher Brake, 1/-. Celluloid Mudguards, 3/9. Write at once for New Season's List of over 100 pages and over 500 illustrations of JUNO CYCLES and latest cycling accessories at lower prices than any other house. Sent Post Free. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd., S.Y. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street, Without, London, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

SHAW'S GIFT This Handsome Free Blouse

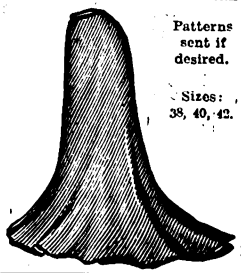
In order to clear out the Remainder of a Bankrupt Stock of Costume Cloths, we will send a tailor-made Costume Skirt in Navy or Black for the small sum of 5/O, or two for 9/6, carriage paid on all goods, and we will include with each skirt free of all charge, a handsome

5/- Two for 9/6. carr. paid.



Patterns sent if desired.

Sizes: 38, 40, 42.

SILKETTE BLOUSE with a Detachable Collar, equal in appearance to silk, and wearing twice as long. These skirts are cut in the very Latest Fashion.

SEND AT ONCE, in order to secure this great bargain, as after present stock is exhausted this offer cannot be repeated. Money returned if not satisfied. Address—

SHAW & CO., The London Tailors. (Dept Sh. S.), 6 LOVE LANE, WOOD ST., LONDON, E.C.

KEATING'S POWDER KILLS BUGS FLEAS FLIES BEETLES

TINS 3d. 6d. 1s-BELLOWS 9d.

From 1s. weekly. Special Offer. £12 12s. 0d. Sample for £6 6s. Carriage paid. PLATED RIMS, FREE WHEELS, RIM BRAKE FITTED FREE. Agents wanted. — DEREHAM ROAD CYCLE CO., NORWICH.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(Really genuine.) In Patent Air-tight Tins.

½-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin and Postage.—Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

FREE TO ALL

MR. H. STANSFIELD (from a photo).

A trial of an entirely new method of curing

RUPTURE,

the same method that cured Mr. H. Stansfield. No cumbersome steel truss, and no loss of time from work. Write to-day for free trial and for interesting literature, including a book containing many testimonials.

DR. W. S. RICE,

57 Stonecutter Street, London, E.C.

A Revolution in Home Dyeing.

New Style Old Style

A 4d. CAKE OF

MAYPOLE SOAP

to be had in any colour, will enable you to dye Fabrics, Garments, Laces, Blouses, Ribbons, or anything dyeable

A DURABLE, NEVER-FADING COLOUR.

Send for Free Booklet, "THE PERFECTION OF HOME DYEING," to the Maypole Co., Ltd., 17, Cumming Street, London, N.

Short Stories

No. 710.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending August 9th, 1902.

THE HOUND OF DEATH.

A Thrilling Little Tale of a Lover's Rescue.

"I appoint as sole guardian to my dear daughter, Enid Lennox, my old and valued friend Derwent Lauderdale."

The words fell on my ears like a funeral knell. I half rose from my seat and muttered a suppressed exclamation, then, remembering that expostulation was useless, and seeing the grave faces round me, I sank back into my chair again with a stifled groan.

I was listening to the reading of my father's will, and I had never felt so alone in the world as on the day when I learnt that I was a wealthy heiress, in possession of more money than I had ever dreamt my father owned.

For all the long list of shares and stocks and estates that were mine, fell upon deaf ears, after the sound of those opening words, appointing as my sole guardian the man I feared and hated beyond anyone in the world—Derwent Lauderdale!

Why he and my father had ever been friends was one of those mysteries impossible of solution. Why I disliked him seemed to be very easy of explanation as I glanced across the library at his thin, evil face, with its closely shut, smiling lips, and the little grey eyes which flashed across at me from under their beetling brows.

The reading of the will ended at last and Mr. Lauderdale crossed to my side.

"I trust, Miss Lennox," he said, in his suavest accents, "that in our new relations of guardian and ward, we may continue on the excellent terms which we have always maintained."

I laughed. I could not help it, unseemly as the sound was in that hushed atmosphere. But it was so absurd to talk of our excellent terms, when he must have known I had always hated him—always—always!

"I shall consult your wishes, of course," he went on smoothly. "Would you like to remain here in your own town house with a chaperone, or will you allow my wife to welcome you under our roof?"

"I will stay here," I answered shortly—too shortly for diplomacy. I saw his brow darken, and though he smiled assent I had made him more of an enemy than before.

He left the room then, and the old lawyer explained to me that I should become my own mistress only when I was twenty-five, or when I married.

"Until then Mr. Lauderdale controls your property, and you are in his charge," the old man said—"and——"

He broke off his sentence suddenly, fidgeted uneasily from one foot to the other, and then, stooping towards me, whispered—

"I should advise you to marry as soon as possible, Miss Lennox."

He said the words so very earnestly that I was surprised, though my sad heart gave a quick, responsive leap, as I thought of a kindly face, and tender eyes that had grown very dear to me during the past six months.

True, Brian Dalrymple had not yet asked me to be his wife, but I knew (Oh! a woman always knows) that he loved me as I had learnt to love him. I realised intuitively that only my father's long illness had hindered him from coming forward as my suitor, and I felt that it would be easy indeed to comply with my lawyer's advice, though I wondered why he advised me so urgently.

Well, his words comforted, whilst they puzzled me.

Ever since I had heard those ominous words appointing Mr. Lauderdale as my guardian, I had wondered whether he would allow me to listen to Brian Dalrymple's wooing, for the man I loved was not rich, and Mr. Lauderdale, I had feared, would regard his suit with scant favour.

But the lawyer's urgent words cheered me! Perhaps, after all, if they were so anxious that I should marry, my guardian would listen to Brian's suit, and surely, I reflected, Mr. Lauderdale would be only too glad to get rid of me and the responsibilities I entailed as fast as possible.

I was happier that evening than I had thought it possible I could be, but, alas, my happiness was short-lived indeed!

Two days later Brian Dalrymple stood with me in the library, telling me how dearly he loved me, asking me to be his wife, holding me in his dear arms close against his breast, looking into my eyes with eyes so full of love that I shivered from sheer joy.

"I only wish, sweetheart," he said, "that you were less rich. I had a hard battle with my pride before I could make up my mind to come to you."

"And love was stronger than pride?" I whispered back. "You would have spoilt two lives if you had let pride win. Now, we shall be so happy—so very, very happy!"

How little I dreamt when I spoke what a terrible gulf lay between me—and happiness!

The blow fell two days later, when, in answer to a letter I

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

wrote my guardian telling him of my engagement, he appeared in person in my Sloane Street house.

As he entered the drawing-room I sprang up to greet him, recoiling at sight of his face. It was blanched and stern, and his eyes positively glared at me.

"Miss Lennox," he said frigidly, when we had shaken hands, "Let us understand one another at once. I should be fulfilling my duties as guardian very ill if I allowed you to marry a man of Mr. Dalrymple's circumstances."

I pleaded with him, I argued with him; finally I grew angry with him. But all was in vain. His smooth manner had vanished completely. I felt the iron hand under the velvet glove. He was stern, implacable, immovable.

"The marriage is impossible," he said, and I, when I found my pleading of no avail, fell silent, only determining in my own mind that come what might, I would marry Brian—some day.

But oh, how my heart sank when Mr. Lauderdale ended by saying quietly, in a stony voice that sent a chill of terror through me.

"My wife is with me. I consider the chaperone you have inefficient. You will return with us to-night to my house—for a time, at least."

I began by flatly refusing to go with them. I went on to beg to be allowed to remain in my own house. I ended—well, as any woman would have ended upon whom Mr. Lauderdale's cold, snake-like eye was fixed, by agreeing with a shiver to go with him and his wife.

I disliked her as much as I did him.

She was one of those women who remind one of cats; soft and pussy like, smooth outwardly, with claws under their dainty paws, and teeth behind their pleasant smiles.

She expressed unbounded pleasure at the idea of my going with them to Danmore—their house in Surrey—and appeared ignorant of the reason of my sudden move.

All the same, she never left me alone for a single minute whilst I made my preparations for the journey, and though I did contrive to scribble a hasty line to Brian to warn him of what had occurred, I had no opportunity of giving it to one of the servants, or of posting it myself before we left.

The Lauderdales watched me as cats watch mice, and a nightmare feeling began to settle down upon me that I was like a prisoner, never again in all my life to be free. Yet why, why—why should they treat me in such a fashion? That was the question which revolved wearily in my mind during the whole journey to Danmore.

Evening had fallen when we drove from the little country station up a long ascent between high hedges which made the lane absolutely pitchy in its blackness.

I had never known the Lauderdales in their country house. They had been London friends of my father, and to me scarcely more than acquaintances, and under the present circumstances I was less than ever inclined to feel amiable towards them, though they were both almost gushing in their attentions to me.

They had succeeded in sweeping me away from London, and in preventing me from communicating with the man I loved, they had every reason to feel satisfied, whilst I grew more miserable at every step we went.

The more I thought over my hurried departure from home the more bewildered I grew.

Why was my guardian so averse to my marriage? And why had I allowed him to bring me away?

I could answer neither question, but each time I met his grey, basilisk eyes and looked into his stern face with its smooth, set smile, I felt how impossible resistance would have been.

"Danmore at last," he said, rousing me from my meditations with a start. We had been driving for miles and miles, now I dimly discerned the outlines of a house before which the carriage drew up with a jerk, and in whose windows lights were burning.

"Welcome to Danmore," Mr. Lauderdale exclaimed, as the front door opened and he helped me up the steps into a large, bare hall, "May you be happy here!"

There was nothing sinister in the words, yet as he spoke a long shudder ran through me, and as the servant shut the great front door with a clang, an agony of fear shook me from head to foot.

* * * * *

"What is it? Oh, what is it?"

I heard myself say the words, and as I spoke them I leapt from my bed with a cry of intolerable fear.

Something had wakened me suddenly—what was it? What——

There it was again!

Upon the night air there fell an awful sound, a sound that seemed to chill the very marrow in my bones—the deep, angry baying of a big hound, and the sound seemed to come from close, close under my room.

Never pausing to think, I flung on a dressing-gown and rushed into the passage, breathless with fright—a nameless horror gripping my very soul. I almost ran into somebody moving towards me. There was a sharp exclamation and I found myself face to face with my guardian.

"Miss Lennox!" he cried.

"I am frightened!" I half sobbed, "What is that noise? The dog, where is it—why——"

He laughed pleasantly.

"Poor Rex! Has he frightened you?" he said. "He is an amiable hound—old and toothless, whose bark is his sole strong point. Do not be afraid of him, Miss Lennox."

I crept back to my room ashamed of my folly, and lay down again—but not to sleep. and early morning found me up and dressed, determined to survey my new surroundings before my keepers, as I called them in my own mind, were up.

My heart sank as I looked out of my window. A neglected garden lay below, bounded by a high wall, over which I could catch a far-away glimpse of a white ribbon of road. But how far away that road looked! How utterly inaccessible!

I was a prisoner! There was no doubt of it; I was a prisoner and closely watched—though why the Lauderdales wished to keep me in seclusion was more than I could imagine.

The weary, weary days dragged by, and no news came to me from the outer world of Brian. I heard nothing, nor had I any means of writing to him. The Lauderdales took good care of that.

And a great despair began to settle on my soul; I began to feel I should go mad if I stayed much longer in this dreary house, where my nights were disturbed by the baying of the hound, and my days dogged by my guardian and his wife. Over and over again I felt I could have screamed aloud for sheer misery, and I could not understand it all—nor would Mr. Lauderdale ever vouchsafe to explain it.

I grew thin and white, I scarcely knew my own face in the glass. I got into a way of crying quietly when I was alone; I felt like an old, old woman, and as if I had lived in that horrible place for years, so cut off was I from all I had known and loved before; and then—a strange thing happened.

One day I was walking in the garden between those hateful high walls, when suddenly, as I passed the kitchen window in my trampings to and fro, I heard a voice say softly:

"Don't look round, or answer, but listen."

The voice seemed strange to me. I tried not to look towards it, as it went on:

"He would kill me if he knew I warned you,

Digitized by Google

but I must—I must—if you do not leave this house your life is in danger. You must go at once."

I paced on as if I had heard nothing; then I came back again—the voice resumed:

"Don't you know that by the terms of your father's will, your guardian receives a large annuity till you marry and pass out of his hands. And—" here the voice dropped mysteriously, "if you die half your property goes to your guardian."

I started violently. I could not help it.

"You must go at once," the voice said again, "at dinner to-night make an excuse to leave the room; take the bicycle from the shed; you will find the door in the wall unlocked. I——"

Curiosity overpowered discretion. I glanced round and to my unbounded amazement saw Mrs. Lauderdale's face pressed against the window bars.

"You?" I gasped.

"Hush," she said, "for—it is I—you—you are so like my child who died, I could not see you injured—perhaps—perhaps—worse. Ah! go to-night, and beware of Rex."

With an abrupt movement she left the window, and I walked on, my brain in a whirl.

Was Mrs. Lauderdale my friend then—after all?

* * * * *

It was evening, and I stood trembling and alone beside the shed in the yard where the bicycle was kept, every nerve strung to the highest pitch of tension.

How everything seemed to creak and groan as I took the bicycle from its place and carried—because I dared not wheel it—to the gate.

Yes! the gate was unlocked! Mrs. Lauderdale had been as good as her word, and I slipped softly out, closing it behind me. Oh! the good white ribbon of road; how I loved it! How my heart sang for joy as I mounted my bicycle and rode swiftly away.

Was it true that I was free again? Was that nightmare of a house behind me for ever?

Should I be able to shake myself free of Mr. Lauderdale, and marry Brian and be happy after my long misery? Should—Hush!—what was that? My heart stood still.

Far off along the road behind me I heard the baying of a hound.

Then I laughed at my fears, for had not my guardian said the dog was old and toothless. Had not——

Cold perspiration all at once broke out all over me, for Mrs. Lauderdale's words swept into my mind:

"Beware of Rex," and as I thought of them, the awful bell-like notes of the dog's voice came less faintly in the breeze.

He was no longer chained in his kennel; he was loose somewhere on the road behind; he—the thought gripped at my heart like an ice-cold hand—he was pursuing me!"

I pedalled furiously. Leaning down upon the handle-bars I rode at a pace I could never have dreamt of riding in more sober moments.

Fear lent me strength, and I rode like the wind, whilst the baying behind me rose loudly, then died away, only to rise again with renewed vigour.

I came to a hill up which I had perforce to walk, and those awful sounds seemed each moment to draw nearer and nearer, and yet I tried to still my fears by assuring myself that the dog was old and harmless in spite of my remembrance of Mrs. Lauderdale's warning.

On the brow of the hill an old man met me. His face looked white in the twilight.

"Is the dog loose?" he whispered fearfully.

"Yes—but he is old and toothless," I answered.

"He is the fiercest, youngest bloodhound in the county," the man replied, "and if he is after you, ride for your life."

"Ride for your life—for your life,"—the words sang and shrieked in my ears as I mounted and tore on again—the wind whistling round me.

Oh! the horror of it, the horror of it! "Ride for your life—for your life—"

I found myself sobbing out the sentence in a kind of ryhthm; whilst my eyes seemed literally starting from my head with fatigue, my limbs almost refused to move from sheer exhaustion.

"Ride for your life—for your life"—my pace had slackened, I could not keep it up; already I was breathing great painful breaths, my heart thumping like a sledge hammer—and the baying drew nearer—nearer—nearer.

The darkness was gathering round me. I could scarcely see the road over which I skimmed, my mind was wholly intent on the one thought of flight, when—all at once—without an instant's warning, my bicycle seemed to leap into the air, I was conscious of a grinding, crunching sound below me, and in another second I was flung violently into the road.

A stone in my path, hidden by the darkness, had done the work, and I lay in the dust for a moment too stunned to even rise.

Then the fearsome sound behind me recalled me to my senses, for it was close, close upon me now.

With a cry of unutterable despair I sprang to my feet, and rushed towards the bicycle that lay by the roadside.

But I was too late! Already round the bend of the road I caught a glimpse of two bloodshot gleaming eyes. I could hear the laboured breathing of the great hound; yes, I could even feel his hot breath upon me. With just one thought in my mind, "I will die game," I gripped at my bicycle and stood upright beside it, as the dog with a fiendish yelp of delight, sprang towards me, bearing me downwards by his great weight—down, down, down, until a great darkness seemed to settle down all around me—and I knew no more.

* * * * *

When the light came back to me I lay in Brian's arms—his dear face was close to mine, and the great dog lay dead at his feet!

Nothing seemed strange in that night of strange things; it was only natural and beautiful that Brian should be there to help me. But as full consciousness came back to me I realised that his presence was little short of miraculous.

He had vainly tried to discover my whereabouts, and at last, in despair had accepted an invitation to stay with his friends in Surrey.

Feeling tired and wretched that evening he had strolled out along the road near his friends' house, taking a gun with him!

And—he had saved my life.

The long arm of coincidence is more wonderful sometimes than we know, and the age of miracles is not ended yet.

Needless to say that I was able to bring such damning evidence against Mr. Lauderdale that he no longer resides peacefully at Danmore, but is detained in one of His Majesty's convict establishments.

For poor Mrs. Lauderdale I have something akin to affection—my great likeness to her daughter induced her to rescue me from what she believed would be my fate. She was sure her husband intended—either to keep me a permanent prisoner, or to put me out of the world altogether.

Brian and I are married and are very happy, but we shall neither of us ever forget the ghastly night long ago, when, but for him, I should verily have fallen into the jaws of the Hound of Death.

L. G. Moberly.

Digitized by Google

An Innocent Intrigue.

A Comedy-Drama of Real Life.

CHARACTERS.

Ethel Harte	Spinster.
Cecil Havergal	Bachelor.
Max Edenheim	Scientist.

"I CAN'T think what it is that is coming to you lately, Ethel!"

"No? I am afraid that I am very much in the same predicament; only that my ignorance doesn't worry me—in the least." "But the thing does worry—and annoy me."

"Perhaps you will be a little more explicit, sir; for, so far, your statement can hardly be said to be definite. We will agree to waive the question of its politeness."

"I impolite—to you?"

"I didn't say so."

"Oh!—I thought you did."

"First thoughts, as you ought to be aware, are nearly always unreliable."

"Look here, Ethel!" said Cecil Havergal, hardly able to control his irritation. "This word-fencing leads to nothing. I mean——"

"There!" she petulantly interrupted him. "It is to know what you mean that I am patiently waiting, instead of keeping a most important engagement."

"Engagement!—what engagement?" he blurted out; not over diplomatically, it must be confessed.

A surprised lifting of the eyebrows, together with the faintest possible shrugging of the shapely shoulders, was all she vouchsafed him in reply to his undoubtedly too bluntly-put query.

High-spirited, and of a naturally independent position, Ethel Harte was a girl not by any means inclined to be dictated to by even the man to whom she had promised herself; and was altogether indisposed to look favourably upon a dress rehearsal by her fiancé of his part in the forthcoming matrimonial drama.

As for allowing herself to be disturbed by any manifestation of jealous feeling in the person of her future lord and master, such an idea never entered her pretty little head; being no believer in the contention that jealousy—masculine jealousy, that is—is to be accepted as an infallible test of love.

"Come, Ethel! You'll tell me all about this engagement of yours, won't you?"

"No! If I'm not worth trusting, I'm not worth having."

"Nonsense, Ethel! I have a right to know!"

"I think not—at present."

"Well," he said desperately, "you will at least say if it is a man or a woman whom you are going to meet?"

"I see no objection to my answering that question. As a matter of fact, it is neither; and yet one of them. My appointment is with a gentleman."

Her emphatic rendering of the last word fairly infuriated him.

"Very well!" he said, taking up his hat and moving towards the drawing-room door, "very well! Perhaps you will favour me also with the gentleman's name?"

"Certainly not!"

"The object of your visit to him then?"

"No!"

"Of course, you are aware of the construction that may be placed upon your refusal?"

"That is a matter which concerns me but very little. But you must excuse me. I have no more time to spare."

There was evidently nothing further to be said, and Cecil Havergal, for once forgetting his courtesy in his disappointment and chagrin, left the room without word or sign of farewell.

At the end of the street something impelled him to look back. There was a hansom at the door of No. 17.

Presently she came out, got into the cab, and drove away in the opposite direction.

Angry beyond measure, both with himself and with her, he sought his club, and buried himself in the current news of the day.

But it would not do; Ethel Harte's eyes seemed to be looking at him in every line of the newspaper—now mockingly, now wistfully—but always honestly and truly.

"Confound it all! if I've made a mistake. I'm a brutal humbug!" he said to himself. "And yet, she admitted herself, that she had an appointment with a gentleman! No, there's nothing for it, but to find the fellow—thrash him—and break with her for ever."

At this moment a club friend drew his attention to a paragraph in one of the illustrated papers.

It had reference to a trial trip, that afternoon, from a well-known pleasure park in the north-west of London, of a new air-ship; the invention of one Dr. Max Edenheim, an eminent young German scientist.

"You are always discussing things aeronautic, Havergal; this ought to interest you," said Major Palliser. "They tell me that nothing has as yet been seen like it, and that even Santos Dumont himself is shaking in his shoes about it."

Now, if there was one thing more than another which appealed to Cecil Havergal's intelligence, it was the scientific conquest of the air. It was not strange that he should not have heard of this particular bid for fame and fortune, in connection with the blue ribbon of aerial navigation, inasmuch as Max Edenheim had kept his secret until nearly the hour of trial. He had selected this country for the experiment, for reasons too sufficiently obvious to need detailing here.

"I would go with you myself," remarked the Major, "bu the War Office claims me this afternoon. I very much fancy however, that Dr. Edenheim and the War Office are not altogether unacquainted, and that sooner or later we shall be hearing something about military air-ships."

Regarding it as something which might distract his mind a bit from other and more worrying matters, Cecil Havergal decided to run northward, and witness the German inventor's experiment.

Digitized by Google

* * * * * * *

Wentworth Park is the happy hunting ground of the sport-cyclist, the running man, the footballer, and the holiday maker.

On this particular occasion, however, it was being used strictly in the interests of science.

The crowd assembled there was eminently well dressed and orderly; consisting, as it did, largely of that class which usually affects the Royal Institution lectures in Albemarle Street.

Towering above everybody was the fair, stalwart son of the Fatherland, who, although the object of a thousand questions —mostly idiotic and irrelevant—had eyes and ears for little else than the child of his brain and patience—the wonderful machine floating at anchor above the heads of the gaping throng.

It wanted some twenty minutes to the arranged time of starting, when Max Edenheim had a card put into his hand.

"Tut-tut!" he said, half aloud, and knitting his brows impatiently. "I thought that I had made this foolish young lady to see the folly of this whim of hers. Well, I must go over it all again, I suppose, for I can't and I won't take her!"

Good humouredly elbowing his way through the crowd, he strode in the direction of a small wooden building used, on this occasion, as a sort of workshop for the convenience of the Doctor and his assistants.

"Ah! Miss Harte!" he said, with continental, if not too effusive politeness. "I did not expect you here to-day after our talk the other evening at Sir John Kinnerton's."

"And, Dr. Edenheim, I fully intended not to come; but —but something occurred to-day——to make me change my mind."

"Ah! that was a pity—a great pity—for, you see, I cannot possibly allow you to accompany me. For myself, as I told you, the risk is nothing; for you, or rather for those who love you, it is everything."

"But Doctor! supposing that I agree to ignore the risk; to think only of the intense delight this maiden trip in your wonderful air-ship would give me—what then?"

"Just this!—that I must still refuse you your request."

As Max Edenheim said, he had reasoned with her at the Royal Society President's soirée, seeing clearly that her desire to share the risk and glory (if successful) of the trip, was due to a mere craving for adventure.

Though she had made up her mind to gracefully accept the Doctor's decision, she had allowed her disappointment to colour her treatment of her lover. When, therefore, he ventured to remonstrate with her, she, in the contrary spirit common to most women of a like nature, resolved to make another effort to get her way, and at the same time to punish her betrothed for his contumacy.

Now, Max Edenheim was not as are the majority of men; he was a man of many moods; a man of impulse, but one whose impulses seldom led him to make mistakes.

Looking at his watch, he saw that but five minutes remained to starting time.

"Miss Harte," he said, seriously, "it is only fair that as you have changed your mind, so I have changed mine. You shall ascend with me; and I will trust to the god of good fortune to bring you safely to earth again."

Then did she begin to regret her success.

"Dr. Edenheim," she said nervously, "if you really think it better that I should not go, I will not."

"That is just it!" he replied. "On consideration, I have come to the conclusion that it may do you good."

He quite thought that it would; this big, brainy German; for he had such supreme confidence in the ultimate triumph of his machine, that, although he was ready to face whatever risk there might be, he felt no real fear in inducing this wilful girl to make the venturous attempt.

"Come!" he said, "everything is ready! and if you will be good enough to follow me, I will settle you in the car at the moment of casting-off."

In the front rank of the excited spectators there now stood one who had arrived during the last ten minutes.

As has been said, Cecil Havergal was an enthusiast in all matters aeronautic, and, so far as was permissible, was closely examining the machine, and everything connected with it.

The parting of the crowd behind him made him to look round.

In an instant he saw, or imagined he saw, it all.

Within a few feet of him was Ethel Harte, in earnest conversation with the tall German, who, he was informed, was the hero of the day.

He was so absolutely dumfounded that, instead of addressing Ethel, he let the pushing crowd edge him further away from her.

What followed was so lightning-like in its action that before he could speak or move Edenheim had lifted Ethel into the car, the anchoring cords were loosed, and, with a mighty "swish" upward, the almost animate monster launched itself into its proper element.

Like a man demented he sought the secretary of the Aero Club, whom he saw watching the airship's flight with a pair of powerful binoculars.

"Carter," he said (being himself a member of the club he knew the secretary intimately), "for God's sake!—tell me—do you think the thing's safe? I want to know! for—for that young lady—you saw her—well, she is a—a friend of mine, and I wouldn't have anything happen to her for—for—what do you think?"

"My dear fellow! there's a risk, of course; there always is in these trial trips; but, so far as I'm able to judge—knowing Dr. Edenheim and the value of his work—I should say that the chances are more than even that his ship will make port, and that its inventor will wake to-morrow morning to find himself famous, beyond even any dreams that he may have dreamt."

"Well, Carter! I think you know. Now, tell me, where does Dr. Edenheim propose, if he is successful, to descend?"

"At St. Albans. If, however, you contemplate being in at the finish, I'm afraid you will be disappointed; for there is nothing fast enough to get you there in advance of the ship."

Cecil Havergal, for the second time that day, was strangely discourteous; for, beyond a curt nod, he said or did nothing in acknowledgment of his friend's informatory kindness; turning away in feverish haste and making for the entrance.

Outside were carriages and cabs without number.

Signing to the driver of a hansom, he jumped in, and, almost shouting out "station!" soon found himself bowling along at a hand-gallop.

A train for St. Albans was signalled and in sight as the cab dashed into the station yard, and drew alongside the platform as he rushed out with his ticket and change in his hand.

That ride to St. Albans was a record one for him.

As he detrained at the old Hertfordshire town, he instinctively looked up into the sky, in search of that which contained all that he held most dear in the whole world.

His range of vision was, however, limited; the booking-office buildings blocking out his view on that side.

He could see nothing.

There was no official about to whom he could address himself for information, except a solitary bucolic specimen in porter's corduroy, who, grinning vacantly, pointed in vague fashion in the direction of the town, in reply to an excited query as to whether anything had as yet been seen of the airship.

Digitized by Google

Deaf to the porter's demand for his ticket, Havergal rushed through the wicket, out into the station road, to see a big crowd—townsfolk and railway people—gazing up at Max Edenheim's wonderful machine as it floated gracefully over the Cathedral, preparatory to a descent.

Evidently it was the "Doctor's" intention and desire to come down in a large meadow some half mile to the south of the old Abbey church.

But Havergal and the others, intently watching the intrepid aeronaut's operations, soon saw that something had gone wrong with the rudder ropes, and that, to a large extent, Edenheim had lost control of the aerostat!

* * * * * * *

Ethel Harte, white of face and trembling in every limb, did not dare to speak to her companion, whose set features and compressed lips showed that the situation was at least serious.

Crouched down in the fore part of the "basket," so as to enable Edenheim to have a good look-out ahead, everything in her, save the sheer "woman," died once and for ever.

Frightened, not only for herself, but for what might mean the loss of a good and true man's love and trust, she could do nothing but bitterly reproach herself for her worse than foolish obstinacy.

Max Edenheim, though pre-occupied with striving to force the machine against the wind in the desired direction, glanced down once, and saw that the girl had learnt her lesson. She was shedding hot, blinding tears, as though her heart would break.

Judging it best to say nothing, he made one more big effort to clear the rudder lines.

At an altitude of about seven hundred feet, the ship was now free of the Cathedral, and immediately over the fifteenth century tower of St. Michael's Church.

Then it began to descend, and not all the "Doctor's" efforts could, unless something miraculous intervened, prevent a terrible catastrophe.

Among the gaping crowd below was a certain local steeplejack. Breaking loose from the throng, this man made a bee-line for the church.

First trying the door of the tower, he found it locked. But he knew every coign and projection of the outside walls.

Selecting a spot up which ran an iron water pipe, he proceeded to shin up it, hand over hand.

More than once in the ascent he kicked with his foot a piece of crumbling mortar or a loose brick, which fell with a crash on to the stone paving below.

It was doubtful which sight, the imperilled air-ship or the venturous steeplejack, had the greatest interest for the spectators.

One supreme moment there was, when, the "ship" having dropped to within touching distance of the top of the tower, the framework supporting the car and the mechanical apparatus, became perilously entangled about one of the four corner pinnacles; the car, with its two occupants hanging, suspended by irresponsible ropes and bamboo débris, literally in mid air, from, what the aeronaut feared, the tottering stone ornament.

More than three parts of the way up, the steeple-jack was half blinded and badly bruised by the shock-dislodged material.

"He's down!" shouted one section of the crowd below.

"No, he isn't!" was the reassuring roar of another.

As, indeed, he was not; for just pausing an instant to take breath, the brave fellow continued his upward climb, till, with a mighty last effort, he gripped the guttering at the base of the castellations, and swung himself over on to the tower leads.

The rest was comparatively easy. Hauling on the main car rope, he managed to bring the basket close alongside the battlements.

Max Edenheim's first thought was for the half-fainting girl. Raising her in his arms, he handed her carefully to their rescuer, following himself when he saw that she was in safety.

By this time the church officials had opened the tower door and were prepared to render every assistance.

As though Fate were determined to make him suffer to the bitter end, Cecil Havergal, in his eagerness to find a quicker route to the scene of action, got hopelessly involved, and amid a maze of side streets and lanes, so that when he arrived at the tower foot it was to learn that the "Doctor" and Ethel had gone to the "George Hotel" for rest and dinner.

The young lady who presided in the combined bar and office at the "George," could not help wondering at the excitable manner of the good-looking gentleman, who wanted no refreshment, no accommodation, only some information.

"The lady and gentleman who descended—I mean, who accidently fell—in the airship—half an hour ago, are they staying here?"

"Yes, sir. Dr. Edenheim is in the dining-room and the lady is resting upstairs."

"Thanks! I will go to the dining-room, and see—er—Dr. Edenheim."

"Very good, sir."

It must have been Fate again that brought Ethel downstairs at the precise moment that Cecil Havergal opened the door of the dining-room; either that or fortuitous circumstance.

She quickened her steps upon seeing him, and he, letting go the handle of the door, took both her hands in his, and wrung them till she cried out.

It was she who spoke first.

"Come in! Come in! There is someone in there whom you must know."

He drew back a little at this, but she would not be denied, and before he well knew where he was, she had him inside and was introducing him to the fair, smiling giant, who stood under the chandelier with outstretched hand.

"Dr. Edenheim," cried Ethel, "please tell Mr. Havergal the whole sum of my wickedness in wanting to do what you denied to your own wife. Yes, Cecil, Mrs. Edenheim, whom we are expecting here every minute, was wiser than I, for she obeyed."

"But I don't quite understand," said Havergal slowly. "If Dr. Edenheim did not approve of your mad desire to go, how came it that you went after all."

"That, Mr. Havergal, I must plead guilty to," said the Doctor, with the mock air of a penitent. "I fancied that by letting Miss Harte go, it would in the end be better for her; as it would, I believed, almost certainly result in her never wanting to undergo such a risk again. And I don't think I was wrong, Miss Harte, was I, eh?"

"Are you angry, dear?" she asked, as the Doctor discreetly left the room, ostensibly to make himself presentable for dinner.

"Angry, sweetheart! No. But you won't do it again, will you?"

"Never!" she said, with a happy look in her eyes.

And he would stake his life that she never will.

Ralph Enderby.

Digitized by Google

THE LADYBIRD.

A Mere Episode.

It was all so absurdly trivial. In fact, she had almost forgotten what it was about. They had quarrelled before, lots of times, and over much more serious matters, but they had always made it up again directly afterwards — until now.

Now she came to think of it, it was always she who had begun the quarrel and he who had begun the making-up.

And quite right, too, she said to herself. When he proposed to her, he had told her that he worshipped her, that he was her slave till death, that, for her sake, he was ready to go through fire and water. She had only to command, and he would obey.

Very well, then, she had taken him at his word. She had commanded, and he had obeyed—until now.

She had never asked him to go through fire or water for her. No, she was much too reasonable for that. She had never demanded the impossible. The things she had expected him to do were all quite simple and easy.

"I wouldn't order George about quite so much, if I were you, Kate," her sister had said to her the other day.

"What do you mean?" she asked, in amazement.

"Well, I don't exactly know how to explain it," said Em. "You know you're quite a pleasant, easy-going sort of person, generally speaking, but with George you're a perfect tyrant. I sometimes wonder why he puts up with you."

"You don't understand," returned Kate, loftily. "When a man is in love with his wife, it is the greatest pleasure and privilege in the world for him to do her bidding."

"Even if it makes him look a fool?" asked Em, whereupon Kate preserved a dignified silence.

Of course, Em had never been married, never been engaged even, and consequently knew nothing about the feelings of people in love.

Yet, somehow, those words of Em's rankled.

She thought of them now, as she stole into the garden, where George had taken refuge after dinner. She knew where she would find him. He was sitting in his favourite place, under the old apple tree at the back of the lawn, unconscious of her presence.

Noiselessly she stole up behind him, and stood watching him, as he moodily puffed at his pipe.

A ladybird had dropped from some overhanging bough, and was crawling slowly up his back, in the direction of his collar.

Had she really made George look a fool? And did he mind looking a fool—for her sake? Surely the ideal, the perfect husband should shrink from nothing, not even ridicule, incurred in his wife's service. And yet—and yet—no man likes to be made to look a fool. It isn't in human nature.

Thoughtfully she stared at the ladybird, as it made its slow, laborious journey across George's light coat.

After all, perhaps she had expected him to do a little too much fetching and carrying, and all that sort of thing.

Of course, man should wait on woman. That was perfectly right and proper, but—there are limits to everything. Was George beginning to recognise this? Was that the reason why he had not been as ready as usual to patch up their last little squabble?

Now she came to think of it, she remembered how the squabble had originated.

She had commissioned him to get a certain back number of an illustrated paper that contained a portrait which she admired.

The offices of the paper were in Fleet Street, and George had an office in Holborn, so that it would have been the easiest thing in the world for him to get that paper. But no, he had simply forgotten all about it. He had had a busy, harassing day, he said. He was awfully sorry, and he would be sure to remember to-morrow.

Now, she had particularly wanted the paper that very day, but what upset her most was, not so much the want of the paper, as the fact that he should have forgotten to fulfil a wish of hers.

His business worries had, for the time, obliterated the remembrance of her! The thought was unendurable. She had told him so, and that is how the squabble had begun.

The ladybird had by this time reached the rim of George's coat collar.

Well, certainly, he had been looking rather worried lately. Perhaps it was a little unfair to expect him to devote his entire thoughts to her and her wishes.

She began to remember a hundred petty tyrannies which she had exercised and to which he had submitted patiently. Harmless little tyrannies, most of them, but quite unnecessary too. Tyrannies she had practised simply because she loved to see him at her feet.

She remembered reading somewhere once that the true secret of married happiness was the principle of "give and take."

The woman, as well as the man, must be prepared to give and take. Up to the present, he had done all the giving, she all the taking.

How blind, how selfish she had been!

She saw it all now.

Why, why should the man be always on his knees to the woman? Why should she be the queen, and he the slave? She had never questioned her right until now, and now she could find no reasonable title to the claim.

Surely the woman who loves her husband should be as ready to serve as to be served. There could be no question of commanding or obeying on either side.

The ladybird was balancing itself in a reckless manner on the edge of George's white collar. If he moved his head ever so slightly, the tiny thing would inevitably be crushed.

In the midst of her remorse, she was seized with a sudden solicitude for the ladybird.

Stepping up behind George, she flicked it lightly and dexterously from his collar.

He felt the gentle touch, and turned his head in surprise.

The next moment, a pair of soft arms were flung about his neck, a hot cheek laid caressingly against his own.

"George, I want to make it up," she whispered, "and—and there's such a lot I want to say to you."

When she had said it, with her pretty head very close to his, he turned to her with a glad smile.

"I'm the proudest, happiest man in the world to-day," he said. "I didn't realise, until this moment, what a sensible little woman I had married. Don't think, dearest," he added, hastily, "that I ever regretted the vows I made to you when I asked you to be my wife. There is nothing I wouldn't willingly do for you. It was only when I found that my love was in danger of spoiling you that I began to resent the—the——"

"The horrible tyrannies I practised upon you," she interrupted quickly. "George, what a selfish little wretch I've been!"

Grete Hahn.

Digitized by Google

Telling the Sad Ending to a Flirt s Proposals.

JACK EDSON was a male flirt. There wasn't a girl in the town who hadn't received attentions from him, and just those attentions which, when a young lady receives them from a young gentleman, are generally considered to "mean something."

But the girls—or all of them but one, at least—found out that such attentions, when they came from Jack Edson, instead of "meaning something," meant precisely nothing at all.

Lucy Brown didn't believe that all Jack's pretty speeches and fine compliments meant nothing. He had walked with her more than with any girl in the town, and she had begun to think a good deal of him. He was so devoted and kind, that she had faith in him.

"Better be careful," said Mary Spooner warningly. "He's the biggest flirt in Christendom. He doesn't mean half what he says."

"I don't believe all I hear about him," said Lucy stoutly. "He's not a flirt."

"Yes, he is!" said Mary, in a tone that indicated that no arguments would change her opinion on the subject. "Isn't he always paying attention to every girl that comes along, Lucy? Isn't he always ready to make love to a new face? You know he is."

"No, I don't know any such thing," asserted Lucy. "He is gentle and polite, and if the girls will insist on taking the attentions which are prompted by politeness for attentions of another nature, he isn't to blame, is he?"

"Fiddlesticks!" exclaimed Mary, in disgust. "Talk to me about its all being prompted by Jack Edson's politeness! Humph!" and Miss Spooner gave her nose an upward turn, thereby expressing her opinion of Lucy's argument, if not adding very much to her beauty.

When Jack went up to London to live, he kissed Lucy after a very lover-like fashion, and made her promise to write often, which Lucy, putting implicit faith in him, was quite ready to do.

She couldn't help feeling a little disappointed to think that he hadn't said anything more definite. He had known her a year, but never had said a word about marriage in all that time; and if he hadn't the idea of marriage in his head, why had he been so devoted and lover-like?

"Perhaps he wants to get started in business before he settles down," thought Lucy, and that thought comforted her.

Jack hadn't been in London a week before he struck up an acquaintance with Miss Grant.

Miss Grant was tolerably good-looking and had a rich father.

Jack began to be serious in his attentions at once. Those attentions Miss Grant received cordially.

"Business is business," thought Jack. "A few thousands won't come amiss to me, and if I can get a good wife and a snug bank account at the same time, I ought to think myself lucky. I say, Jack Edson, old fellow, go in and win!"

And Jack Edson did "go in" accordingly, and for a month devoted himself wholly and unreservedly to Miss Grant.

Then Fate, or accident, or some other means, thro whim into a dilemma by getting him acquainted with Bella Graham.

Miss Bella Graham was a very pretty young lady, with bold black eyes and a mischief-loving disposition, and as Jack had not flirted for some time, he proceeded, after his old fashion, to lay his heart at Miss Graham's feet, metaphorically speaking, and for a month was her most devoted cavalier.

Miss Graham liked a flirtation as well as Jack did, and was nowise backward in playing her part.

Jack was always looking for and expecting sincerity in others, and concluded at once that Miss Graham had found his fascination irresistible, and was ready to capitulate and surrender, whenever he chose to speak the word.

By and by Miss Graham went out of town on a visit, and then he packed up his devotions and the other necessaries to love-making and returned, like a prodigal son, to Miss Grant.

He had been so busy! Work had been unusually pressing for the last month. He couldn't get away from the office. Jack invented a score of excuses to account for his absence, and Miss Grant graciously accepted them all, and reinstated Jack in her good graces, and "Richard was himself again."

In August, Miss Grant went out of town, and Jack had a lonely time of it for want of someone to pay attention to. While she was gone, he thought over the matter seriously.

Here he was, young, good-looking, and earning a good salary, but in need of a home. The first step towards securing a home was to secure a wife. Why didn't he get married? Sure enough, why didn't he?

The more he thought of it, the more firmly he made up his mind to take the decisive step, and accordingly he cast about in his mind as to whom he should honour by giving the privilege of becoming Mrs. Jack Edson.

Jack knew of three who would be glad to have him—Miss Grant, Miss Graham, and Lucy Brown. All he had to do to get one of them to be his, "for better, for worse," was to give them half a chance to say "Yes."

"I like Lucy," he soliloquised, "but she's a plain little country girl, and her father isn't worth much, and I don't think I'll throw myself away on her. There's Miss Graham; she's smart and handsome, and her father's worth a great deal; but she's got too much temper for me. I'm afraid I don't want one of those high-flyers! Miss Grant's the most desirable person of all. Old Grant's bank account is one very satisfactory feature about the transaction. When she gets back I'll speak to her about it, and have the thing off my mind."

Miss Grant came back the next week, and Jack wended his way to her home shortly after her return, to inform her of the decision he had arrived at during her absence.

Miss Grant was rather cool.

"She's piqued to think I haven't spoken on the important subject before," thought Jack.

A good opportunity presented itself, and Jack proceeded to offer his heart and hand to Miss Grant after the most genteel manner possible.

He expected to see her burst into a flood of thankful tears, or perform some other equally original feat to demonstrate the gladness of her emotions; but she did not do anything of the kind.

"You do me a great deal of honour, I suppose," said she, in a tone which seemed to imply that she hardly considered that she was speaking truthfully. "But I don't feel like accepting it. I would refer you to Miss Graham."

Jack was thunderstruck.

He had never dreamt of anything like this. It embarrassed him terribly for a minute or two. Then he rallied and tried to explain matters; but Miss Grant was as obstinate as a woman ever was, and would not listen to a word from him.

Digitized by Google

"Go to Miss Graham," was all she said, and Jack at last withdrew from the field discomfited.

"It's plain as the nose on my face that she's heard something about my flirting with Miss Graham, and she's upset about it. Confound Miss Graham!"

But after sober second thought on the matter, he concluded to accept Miss Grant's advice and go to Miss Graham.

Accordingly he set off to inform Miss Graham that he had concluded to marry her.

Miss Graham was all smiles and pretty words, and Jack felt that he had but to say the word and the thing was settled.

And by and by he proceeded to inform her of the honour he had decided to confer upon her.

"Marry you?" exclaimed Miss Graham. "Why, I couldn't think of such a thing!" And she laughed as if it was the best joke she had ever heard.

Jack began to feel scared.

"Why not?" demanded he.

"Because I'm engaged to one man already, and the law objects to our marrying two, you know!" And thereupon Miss Graham laughed again, as if it were immensely funny.

For the life of him, Jack could not see the point.

"How long have you been engaged?" stammered Jack, feeling cold and hot all over.

"For as much as—let me see"—coolly—"as much as a year, I fancy. Yes, it was in October that it happened. Just about a year ago."

"And you never told me!" groaned Jack.

"You never asked me," said Miss Graham.

Poor Jack! He gathered up his lacerated heart and withdrew from his second battlefield, completely routed.

"I won't give it up!" he decided. "There's Lucy Brown. She'll have me, and jump at the chance, and she's worth forty Miss Grants and a trainload of Miss Grahams! I'll write to her and ask her this very afternoon."

And write to her he did.

He had not answered her last letter, received three months before, but he put in a page of excuses for his negligence, and smoothed the matter over to his satisfaction, if not to Lucy's.

The letter was sent, and he awaited a reply with considerable anxiety.

At last it came.

"It's favourable, of course!" he said, as he tore open the letter. "Lucy always thought the world of me."

But his opinion as to its being favourable changed somewhat as he read it:

"Mr. Jack Edson,—I am very thankful for the honour, etc., but I'd rather not have second-hand articles when I can get them at first hand. John Smith says: 'Tell him I have something to say about it now, and I'm not going to forego my claim on Lucy Brown for all the Jack Edson's in the world; and it isn't quite the correct thing to propose to other men's wives.'

"Love to Miss Grant; also to Miss Graham.

"Yours, Lucy Brown Smith."

"Good gracious! Lucy married!"

Jack's eyes were like saucers when he read that name.

Then he suddenly dropped into the nearest chair.

"Well, I've gone and done it this time!" he groaned. "Jack Edson, you're a fool!"

Poor Jack! He's in the market yet! Who bids?

Ted Lane.

"You're not in love, Bobbie. You only think you are." "Well, how the dickens am I to find out my mistake if I'm mistaken?" "Oh, marry the young woman, by all means."

Fred: "How are you getting on with Miss Angell? Did you speak to her father as you determined?" Frank: "Yes." Fred: "And what happened?" Frank: "I said to him, 'Mr. Angell, I love your daughter.' Said he, 'So do I; now let's talk about something else.'"

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have just secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his prophecies for this week's birthdays.

August 5.—This will be an unfavourable year for business to those whose birthdays occur to-day. Do not lend to friends or loss will result.

Single girls will find love affairs interesting, but unexpected events appear to hinder matters. Put little faith in promises.

A child born to-day will be sharp and clever; not fortunate in a business of its own. If a girl, she will not marry well.

August 6.—A good year for to-day's birthdays. Favourable for farmers, aged persons, lovers, and those in employ. Voyages and long journeys should not be undertaken.

Young people born in the early morning marry. To those born later, there is danger of crosses and intrigues.

A child born to-day will be abrupt, affectionate, and thoughtful. Can go into business for itself and be fortunate. Not so good for a girl.

August 7.—Not a good year for marriage or love affairs to those who celebrate their birthdays to-day. Those born in the evening will have cause for jealousy. Girls born then meet with deceit.

Let others make the first move up till noon, and even then it will be wise to go quiet. Better to sell than buy.

A child born to-day will have a quiet life. Will be rather extravagant and fond of change.

August 8.—A fortunate year for business and employ for to-day's children. Have a care with papers and agreements. Some danger of quarrels and law.

Young girls will quarrel with lovers, and need caution in what they say and write.

A child born to-day will get on in life. Will be active, clever, and ambitious, but will possess a quick temper.

August 9.—A changeable year. Some sickness in domestic circle may be expected by those whose birthdays fall on this day.

Some disappointment comes into love affairs. Young girls must be cautious; guard against intrigues, and attentions from married men.

A child born to-day will not be fortunate, and should keep in employ. If a girl, danger of disgrace and an unhappy marriage.

August 10.—An active year with many changes. Avoid speculation and lending money. Some anxiety over wills or insurance.

Love affairs are unimportant. Girls born near 9 p.m. must have a care; much deceit and little confidence should be placed in opposite sex.

A child born to-day will be active, improvident, and fond of change. Should be in employ of others, as good fortune is not promised.

August 11.—Care will be needed this year with money and business, by those who celebrate their birthdays, to-day.

Young people will be favoured in their love affairs, though girls born early in the morning will be in danger of some deception.

A child born to-day will be rather fortunate in life. Possess a cheerful disposition, be studious, and have good business abilities.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google

Passing the Love of Women.

By Gertrude Page.

Author of "Dearer Than Life," "Maurice Dale's Love Story," &c., &c.

When the firm told Tom Earle to go to Vienna, Tom told the firm to go considerably further, but that, of course, was under his breath.

"I shouldn't mind so much if I could get back by Easter," he grumbled to his friend, Dick Davis, "but it's a beastly shame to send a chap off now. The work could very well wait for another two weeks. If I have to spend the Easter holiday out there I shall swear like a medical student for two solid hours."

Davis looked amused.

"Rough on poor Maisie, too," he said slyly.

Tom did not reply for a moment, but kicked an unoffending hassock half across the room.

"It'll give Haslem all the running;" he said at last, disconsolately.

"A good thing too," was the unsympathetic rejoinder.

Tom took it very well.

"You're always unfair to Maisie," he said. "It isn't her fault if the chaps all run after her."

"Oh, no, not at all. Still, I'll lay a wager she doesn't object."

"A girl can't help being pretty. You wouldn't have her tie her face up in a bag, I suppose."

"No, but I'd have her keep her eyes a little more for you, if you really are to be the one and only."

Tom turned angrily, but meeting his friend's frank blue eyes only said, with a shrug of his shoulders—"I'd knock you down for that, Dick, if you weren't such a thundering good chap."

Dick made no reply, but looked at his friend a little wistfully. He was a good deal fonder of him than he would have dreamt of owning, and he did not want him to marry Maisie Travers. As things stood at present, however, it seemed more than likely that he would do so, unless his eyes were opened in time, or Maisie landed a bigger fish.

"I expect there'll be about three feet of snow," said Tom, returning to the first subject, "to add to the delights of Austria, "and it's as likely as not I shall get lost on the way, and never be heard of any more."

"I'll come and look for you," said Dick, "and I'll find you or die in the attempt."

"If you'd go instead of me, there'd be some sense in it."

"I shouldn't mind at all if it were possible. Having no Maisie, you see, Vienna has considerable charm for me."

The following day they had dinner at Gatti's together, with a view to sending Tom off in better spirits, but the attempt was not attended by any brilliant success.

"I suppose you saw Miss Travers last night," Dick said at last, to try and draw Tom.

"Yes. She's awfully sick about Easter. They are giving a dance, you know, and she won't like it if I don't get back in time."

There was a pause, then Tom remarked suddenly—"I say, Dick, old chap, you might do a fellow a good turn."

"Well?" said Dick, "Say on."

"It's just this way, you see," continued Tom, playing with some crumbs, "What riles me as much as anything is the idea of Haslem having it all his own way, such a bounder as he is, too. Now, if you wouldn't mind just cutting him out for that one evening, I should be so awfully glad about it."

"But, my dear chap—" began Dick expressively.

"Yes, I know," interposed Tom, "but Maisie doesn't really care a fig for him, and knowing you were my special chum, she'd like several dances with you. She's a thundering good waltzer, so you wouldn't be making a martyr of yourself at all."

"But what if I have a special friend there of my own?"

Tom looked up amused, for the idea of Dick Davis with a special friend was decidedly a novelty, he being notedly averse to ladies' society.

"Anything in the wind?" he asked.

"No, old chap. I'll be a cat's paw if you like. As you say, Haslem is an awful bounder, and it would be a bit of sport to worry him."

"Beastly nuisance!" he ejaculated to himself later, after seeing Tom into the train. "If there's a girl I detest—Ah, well, so long as she doesn't attempt to get up a flirtation with me afterwards I suppose I needn't mind!" but it was with rather a gloomy face he turned into his club.

Meanwhile, both looking and feeling extremely sorry for himself, Tom embarked at Dover upon the steamer for Ostend, and after a bad crossing, arrived in a somewhat pitiable condition on the opposite shore. He knew little French and less German, and he began to wonder if he would ever get to Vienna at all, or anywhere else for the matter of that. He felt fairly secure about getting as far as Cologne, because he was in a railway carriage bearing that name as a destination, though that in itself was no certainty, as many a stranger to London can testify after getting into a 'bus labelled Charing Cross and finding it was going in the opposite direction. However, Tom made himself as comfortable as he could, and hoped for the best. But the Fates were not kind, indeed, much the reverse, for though he got to Cologne safely enough, he steamed away again, later on, in the wrong train. It would hardly be correct to say he was in blissful ignorance of this, for any semblance of bliss seemed distant enough just then. Things had not gone smoothly at Cologne at all, and it had been with a scowling brow, muttering imprecations upon the German nation in general, that he had fled in the middle of a much needed meal and jumped into the wrong train. He discovered his mistake on Sunday morning, when the train came to a standstill somewhere in the wilds of the Rhine country. His feelings then being altogether beyond expression, he relapsed into an ominous silence, threw down his portmanteau with a suggestive thud, and went to get some breakfast looking rather like a death's head at a feast.

While stolidly attending thus to the "inner man," he became aware of the fact that his "outer man" was apparently of some interest to a bright-eyed English girl at the next table. Several times when he looked up he met her eyes, and though she turned away at once he could not help feeling she was watching him. When he had finished his breakfast he tried to discover from the waiter how he was to get on to the right route again, but without much success. Then suddenly a happy thought struck him—why not appeal to the bright-eyed English girl? She had left the table, and was only just outside, so he went up to her, and raising his hat, said—"I beg your pardon, but I am hopelessly lost; I wonder if you would mind helping me?"

Digitized by Google

"I will do my best," she said at once, with a frank smile, "Where do you want to go?"

"I am on my way to Vienna, but I got into the wrong train at Cologne. I have no idea where I am now."

She looked amused.

"You are rather a long distance out of your way," she said, "However did you manage to get here?"

"I got into a Rhine train at Cologne, which was what I thought I was told to do."

"Then you must have got into one going the wrong side of the Rhine. Yes, of course, that's what you've done. You've been travelling all night down the wrong side of the Rhine."

"Must I go all the way back then?" he asked disconsolately.

"No. Your best plan will be to come to Frankfort and get into the Train de Luxe. I am going to Vienna myself, and that is what I am going to do. It is a first class train, but you will find it is well worth the extra money."

Tom looked up quite cheerfully. "Expense is no object now," he said. "I must get to Vienna by to-morrow if I have to have a special train. It serves the firm right for sending me, when any other chap would have done."

"Oh, you will like Vienna," she told him. "It is a magnificent city. I have been studying music in Germany, and now I am going to Vienna to stay with an aunt for a few weeks, and I expect to have a grand time."

Half an hour later they started off together, and Tom's views on continental travelling modified considerably as they went along. Indeed, Helen Hamiltonp roved such a charming companion that in the end he began to think regretfully of what he had the previous day longed for before all things, the termination of his journey. When it came, however, he was much gratified by an invitation to call at the aunt's; still more so by his reception when he made the call. Miss Foster was one of the old maids whom everybody loves, and being fonder of young people than anything else in the world, she welcomed Tom most cordially, and bade him come to see them as often as he liked. In consequence he went a great deal, and the subsequent discovery that he must remain over Easter was far less terrible than he had imagined.

Not so for poor Dick, however.

When he had asked Maisie for four dances, and had been given them with a good deal of gush that was abhorrent to his soul, he felt the ties of friendship could expect no more.

"I suppose you are secretly in mourning to-night?" he said to her during their first rest. "It is very hard lines Tom could not get back."

"Oh, I love dancing!" she exclaimed enthusiastically. "Of course, if it had been anything else——. And then you are such a charming substitute, Mr. Davis"—with a little more gush—"really, Tom is rather rash."

Dick knit his eyebrows and stared straight before him, and his thoughts ran away to a bonny English girl he had met on the Calais steamer crossing to the Continent last autumn, and who constituted in ignorance the untold romance of his life. A sudden storm had come up with great violence, causing the machinery to get disabled, and they had had a very bad three hours' experience. He did not know who the girl was, but he and she together had tried to look after some of the passengers, who were not blessed with so good a nerve as they, and ever since she had been the secret heroine of his dreams. And this meant all the more in Dick's case, because there had never been any heroine before. He was what is known as not a marrying man, and the designation pleased him. Yet he knew that if he ever met his friend of the Calais steamer again, he would be her slave. Indeed, he was almost that now, for by night or day, whenever he allowed himself the leisure to dream, she immediately became the chief object of his thoughts—and he loved her in a quiet way that was in itself a prayer for her return. And Maisie was so different. The wideness of the comparison made her all the more distasteful to him, and her persistent flattery the more obnoxious. Tom was such a good fellow, he could not understand at all what charm she could possibly have for him. If this Vienna trip ended in freeing him from her influence Dick felt he would be more glad than he could say.

Meanwhile Tom and Helen Hamilton fast became great friends, and for Tom at least, England grew a little less desirable, and Vienna a little more so every day.

Then came the picnic in the mountains and the climb in the afternoon, followed by a sudden mountain mist, and two young travellers were lost together this time, both in equal trouble.

Tom did everything he could think of to take care of her, but they had got up to the snow line, and he was far more concerned than he liked to show. Helen, with her usual pluck, laughed at their misfortune, and showed a brave face all the time, until she began to feel the bitter cold, and then, though she looked just as hopeful, she grew very quiet. If was impossible to make any progress in the mist, for a single false step might have been their death, so Tom found a small, cave-like hollow, and taking off his coat insisted upon wrapping it round her, in spite of her violent protests.

"I will not allow it," she said at last resolutely, "unless you share it also. We are lost for the present, you and I," looking with her clear, frank eyes, straight into his, "we must forget everything else until we are in safety, and just take care of each other the best way we can, like two children."

He understood her, and with a simplicity as genuine as her own, crouched down beside her for life and warmth. But he was less strong constitutionally, and presently she discovered with horror that he was growing numb with cold. He seemed almost stupefied by it, and unable to speak to her coherently. She took a few steps to try and penetrate through the mist, but returned baffled in every direction. So there was only one thing left, and with a little gulp in her throat, she folded her arms round him and pressed close to keep him alive.

When the mist rose again she was still holding him, and Tom, with returning warmth, lay still in great content.

That night there were two troubled, anxious hearts in Vienna. Helen sat a long time at her window and looked at the stars fixedly, thinking—thinking—thinking. For though he had made no confession, she knew that Tom Earle loved her, and her heart had no answer ready.

"It is not likely I shall ever see him again," she mused, with a sudden, swift sadness in her face. "Chance threw us together that once, but tore us apart again immediately, still nameless and unknown to one another. Yet how he looked at me—Shall I ever forget it? Has he forgotten already?

"Ah, but how absurd to care for a man met in such a way, and known so slightly! I am surprised at you, Helen Gordon Hamilton, with your strength of mind and purpose!

"Only he was so different from other men—he looked so different.

"And then he changed so, even in that little while. At first he was just callous and a little cynical, even while helping everyone—I think he must dislike women. And then afterwards he was so changed. It seemed that he must have liked me."

Digitized by Google

She got up and walked restlessly about the room.

"Only how can we ever meet again?" she urged. "How is it possible seeing we know nothing of each other—nothing at all—not even our names.

"And then Mr. Earle is such a good fellow—if it had not been for that other, how easily I could have loved him. Why, oh, why, do I remember?"

And Tom Earle smoked a last cigar on the verandah of his hotel at a late hour, strolling up and down with a troubled face. "I can't desert Maisie," he said over and over. "I don't know that she cares much, but I can't desert her without being sure."

"There has never been any engagement," said his heart, "You are perfectly free."

"No, no," answered his better nature. "It was understood to be only your position that barred an engagement. It is the same thing really, only if anything more binding because she trusts to your honour."

"I suppose I must wait," he finished, "and hope. I was fond of Maisie, but I did not love her. I did not know what love was until I met Helen Hamilton."

Three days later, in a letter couched in delicate terms from Dick Davis, he learnt that Maisie had been faithless. "They say the chap has ten thousand a year," he wrote. "I hope you won't take it to heart much. She could never have been true, for she had not got it in her."

That evening Tom and Helen stood under the stars and plighted troth together.

* * * * *

Helen had heard so much from Tom of his great friend Dick Davis, that she looked forward quite eagerly to meeting him at the Tennis Club Dance.

"He is a ripping waltzer," Tom had said, "And he will want several with you, because of all he has heard about you."

"Poor man!" she laughed. "I am afraid there is a sad disappointment in store for him, if he has been foolish enough to believe all you have told him."

But she forgot everything when they stood face to face, except a certain Calais steamer and a sudden storm.

"This is Dick," she heard Tom say in a dazed way, and then she gave a little gasp, and the room reeled somewhat, and she held out her hand wondering if she were in a dream, or if it were all real.

Then she noted a sudden sternness in the man's eyes before her, and about his mouth, and she knew that he gripped her hand until it hurt because of some deep emotion.

She waited for him to acknowledge their acquaintance, but he made no sign of doing so, and hardly knowing why, she took her cue from him.

"May I have some dances?" he said simply, and took her programme.

"Have as many as you like, old chap!" laughed Tom happily, "I can afford to be magnanimous to such a friend as you."

Later on they danced together, and still he made no sign.

At last, when the evening was nearly over, they stood alone in a small conservatory.

"You have not forgotten?" he said, and she felt his eyes were looking through into her soul.

"No, I have not forgotten," she replied, struggling to speak with perfect naturalness. "Why did you not mention it before?"

"Because I could not," a little brusquely.

"Why?" Helen stood squarely before him, with her small head thrown back slightly—and clear eyes looked into clear eyes with understanding.

Dick had not intended to give any explanation at all, but now they stood face to face like this, he saw that in her eyes which told him he could trust her.

And his heart so longed to tell her all—was there not pain enough without the added bitterness of silence?"

"I did not mention it because it must cease to be," he told her slowly, "that is, it must cease to be for me."

She waited, and presently, after taking a turn down the conservatory and coming back to her, he said—"In anything that moves me deeply, I am very direct, forgive me if I am over blunt now. Ever since we parted on the Calais Pier I have loved you, and dreamt of meeting you again. It is not easy for me to love, women have never appealed to me, and just as there was never anyone before, so there will never be anyone again. I have known this all along, and waited, praying that you might come.

"Sometimes I hoped, and then at others I was afraid to—it seemed too great a thing to expect. That what has, could happen, never crossed my mind. I may not ask you the question I meant to ask you if I ever met you again, but I cannot think you are quite indifferent since our meeting to-night. What I ask instead is—Never let him know."

She had grown white to the lips, and now she made no answer.

"I shall go away," he said very quietly, "out of the country altogether, and I leave my secret in your hands. I know you will not betray me. It would spoil all his life to know the truth. We love each other, Tom and I—We don't say much, but it is there, 'passing the love of women'! Do not let him know we had ever met—forget if you can we ever did."

And still the girl stood white and silent, making no sign.

"I cannot help being glad you had not forgotten me," he said. "I shall take that thought away with me to the other side of the world, as my best possession."

Then she held out her hands suddenly—

"I love you," she cried brokenly, "Oh, I love you!"

He bit his lip and stood silently wrestling with himself. Then he raised her hand and bending down kissed it reverently.

"Thank you," he said, "God bless you for that. Only it cannot be. I would rather die than take his happiness. For my sake give him all, and be always just what you would had we never met. If you will promise me this, you will take half of the bitterness out of the future for me."

"I will try," she breathed, "for your sake."

Then he turned hurriedly and left her.

* * * * *

There was a good deal of surmise on Helen Hamilton's wedding-day, as to the deathly whiteness of her face. No one had ever known her to be nervous, so it did not seem possible it could be that, yet her voice faltered strangely over the vows. Afterwards, in spite of much persuasion, she and her husband drove straight to the railway station, and later on came home from the wedding-trip without saying a word to anyone.

And in the five years that followed, though she lost none of her actual charm, she never unbent to make a great friend again, and this also was the subject of much surmise.

Then her husband died, and as soon as it was possible, she went away quietly alone without seeing anyone.

But there was most surmise of all when it leaked out a year later that she was going to be married to someone from over the sea. At first it had been generally supposed that she was broken-hearted, and much sympathy had been expended upon her. When it was known, however, that she was to be married again, the sympathisers were not so pleased as might have been expected. To be broken-hearted was one thing—to be consoled by a second husband quite another. Everyone, however, scented a romance in the background, and made strenuous efforts to find it out. But they were baffled on every side, and finally gave it up.

And there was no one in the big, gloomy, London church the day Helen Earle was married to Dick Davis. Even the passers-by did not think it worth while to waste a second on them, since there were neither carriages nor horses, nor any paraphernalia whatever.

Yet it is generally such weddings that have the true spark of interest in them, and just that element of the ideal which is what we would fain look for at the hymeneal altar above everywhere else.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.

Mrs. Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia: Her companion.

MRS. NORTON RAISES £5,000.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF NEW READERS.

CYNTHIA tells in the opening chapter of her arrival at her cousin's in the capacity of companion, and of her discovery that Mrs. Norton is taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money are being lost and won. The climax is reached one night when Mary Vernon stakes her diamond ear-rings (a gift from Lord Kinross) and one of the onlookers finds them to be paste. The diamonds, it appears, were stolen by Mrs. Norton. A few weeks later the notorious Mrs. Norton, with Fluffy's help, succeeds in stealing a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew at the Café Regal, by substituting for the millionaire's pocket-book one exactly like it. Later on Cynthia discovers the original pocket-book, empty of course, in one of her boxes. Not knowing what to do, she confides in Fluffy, who is very kind, but makes her promise to say nothing at all to anyone else on the subject. He takes charge of the duplicate pocket-book. Mrs. Norton now moves into her new house in Pont Street, and it is while here that Sir John Strickland, a poor baronet, proposes to her. She refuses, but hints to him that if he will consent to allow his name to appear on the directorate of certain companies he will be bound to make money, and then her answer might be different. Mrs. Norton is next presented at Court by her friend, Lady Gaveston. For this function she wears some superb diamonds which have been lent her by Lord Kinross. The Society papers declare her to be the most beautiful and best-dressed woman at the presentation. The same evening Lord Kinross calls at Pont Street for a private interview, and it is during this interview that Percival Hope enters the room unannounced, and makes the startling statement that Mary Vernon has discovered the thief who stole her diamonds. Shortly afterwards Mrs. Norton leaves the room, Cynthia however stays, unknown to Kinross and Percival Hope. While there she overhears Hope, who turns out to be Kinross' cousin, tell Kinross that in a fortnight's time he will prove to Kinross that Mrs. Norton is an adventuress living upon the proceeds of the robbery of her friends. Cynthia tells Mrs. Norton what she has overheard. On the evening of the next day Lady Gaveston tells Mrs. Norton that she doesn't approve of her behaviour towards Sir John Strickland, and that unless she decides at once either to marry or refuse him, she will return to Scotland. Mrs. Norton asks for and obtains a fortnight's grace in which to make up her mind. Mrs. Norton and Cynthia go to the Derby, where Mrs. Curtis Blount, instigated by jealousy, entices Cynthia to bet heavily, by which she loses £800.

WE were a very silent party coming home from the Derby. Even Frankie's spirits flagged; she had lost heavily, and the thought of her bets, plus Clairette's cheque, that somehow or other would have to be met on the morrow, weighed on her mind.

As for me, I was too wretched to think. I sat crushed by the consciousness that I owed eight hundred pounds, and had not as many shillings!

When we arrived at Pont Street, Frankie suggested that the rest of the party should come in to supper; they were all too tired—or cross—to accept, however, except Toby Ffolliot, who eagerly grasped at the invitation.

Lady Gaveston had long since retired to rest—somehow one could not say "gone to bed" when speaking of Milady—and Frankie ordered supper in the morning room.

It was a cosy little place, with low, soft-cushioned chairs, and rose-coloured draperies, and a general air of luxury. The decoration was Frankie's special fad, and consisted of shoes. Shoes of all sorts, sizes and descriptions twinkled at you from the walls, pointed their toes upon the mantelpiece, danced wickedly on the shelves of a giant Japanese cabinet. Dainty pantofles in blue velvet embroidered with pearls, coquettish pompadours with red heels and diamond buckles, thin Moorish slippers, a tiny pair of sabots, Canadian snow shoes, and Indian mocassins.

Every woman in the smart set was bound to cultivate a fad for something; it might be animal, vegetable, or the other thing, but it must be original.

Lady Wetherall, for instance, had a unique collection of snails. They lived in a crystal tank, and were white and black, and pearly green. Mrs. Curtis-Blount went in for metal curios, and boasted a number of ancient pots and pans in iron and copper, and a few modern "gods" in gold and silver. One couldn't hope to be even faintly smart without a fad. Snails and saucepans I thought rather slow, but I was enthusiastic over Frankie's shoes. They were all pretty, and some of them had histories.

Digitized by Google

Leaving Toby in the morning-room, my cousin went upstairs to change her frock for a tea-gown. I followed, misery at my heart.

"If you don't mind, Frankie," I said, "I won't come down again. I want to go to bed."

"What's the matter?" she asked sharply. "You look positively wretched."

"It's nothing to what I feel. Oh, Frankie, what am I to do? I owe eight hundred pounds."

She turned round and gazed at me. Her hair was loose on her shoulders; in her soft white draperies she looked wonderfully young, and very lovely.

"Tell me all about it," she said kindly, but an odd smile twitched at the corners of her mouth, and her eyes danced with mischief.

She heard me out in silence, fixing her hair the while.

"You've got yourself in a nice mess," she remarked. "What are you going to do?"

"Oh, Frankie, won't you help me?" I said earnestly.

"My dear child, I'm stony broke myself. Still, we must manage it somehow, I suppose. You'd better speak to Fluffy and see what he can do. What a cat dear Vi is, to be sure."

"I'm certain she let me in for those bets hoping I should lose. Does she dislike me, Frankie?"

"Dislike is a mild word, my dear. If there's a person on this earth whom Mrs. Blount would cheerfully roast to death, it's you."

"But why? What have I done to her?"

"The worst possible injury; you have superseded her in a man's admiration—affection doesn't count nowadays. Don't look so innocent, Cynthia, it annoys me. You must know what I mean. Chesterton, my dear, Chesterton's the man. He and Algy Tresham were dear Vi's special property up to last Christmas, then his lordship grew restive. In other words, Vi was too exacting, and Chesterton retired to the Rockies to shoot big game. He has only just come back, and showed signs, I am told, of a reviving interest in dear Vi until—he saw you. Since then he has pointedly and painfully ignored the lady, who is naturally indignant with you as the cause of his indifference. Now, she knows that Chesterton hates a young girl to go the pace, though he's not particular about married women, and her game is to make him think you a forward and frivolous young person. To that end she inveigled you into making these preposterous bets. All things considered, I must confess dear Vi has scored. Whether she will win all along the line depends on you."

"Do you mean that Mrs. Curtis Blount cares for Lord Chesterton, is—is—in love with him?" I gasped.

"My dear Cynthia, we don't use such expressions in Society. Chesterton and Vi were very good friends—until you appeared."

"But Frankie, Mrs. Blount is married, her husband——"

"Is in South Africa, so he doesn't count," interrupted my cousin. "Besides, poor Teddy Blount knows his part to perfection. You and Vi are rivals, Cynthia, but"—she used—"unless you play into her hands, I'll put my money on you."

"I don't care a scrap about Lord Chesterton," I cried indignantly.

Frankie shrugged her shoulders.

"You always were a fool," she observed politely. "However, we have talked enough about your affairs, I've my own to think about. We must go down to supper. Toby is hungry, and as he's got to help me raise some money he mustn't be kept waiting. Come, Cynthia, don't look so glum, we'll talk about your debts to-morrow."

It was difficult to suppose the impecunious Toby could help anyone to raise money—he certainly had none of his own. However, I held my peace on that score, and followed Frankie, slim and girlish in her white satin, amber roses at her throat and in her hair.

Supper that night was a great success; never had I seen Frankie so light-hearted or so gay. She told smart stories that sent Toby into peals of laughter, imitated distinguished people, their gestures, and their tricks of manner, till I forgot my troubles and felt light-hearted too. We had lobster salad, cold chicken and strawberry ice, and lots of champagne—I was beginning to quite like champagne.

Under the influence of Frankie, the supper and the wine, Toby waxed eloquent. He lost his shyness, said some amazingly brilliant things, thought others even more brilliant, and made a desperate though futile effort to look fascinating.

Supper over, Frankie lit a cigarette and made room for Toby beside her on a lounge. I sat in a rocking chair by the window. I felt tired, not to say sleepy. The room was heavy with the scent of flowers—roses, roses, everywhere—and the light from the shaded lamps was soft and pink.

I leant back and closed my eyes. All the happenings of that eventful day passed through my mind in a strange medley. Lord Chesterton, Mrs. Blount, Clairette and Toby danced before me in sabots, high-heeled Pompadours, or Moorish slippers. Of a sudden Mrs. Blount took off her shoes and threw them at me sharply. I started—wideawake in a second.

It was not, all things considered, an opportune time for me to awake. Toby—poor foolish Toby—was stammering out a declaration of his love for Frankie. It made me impatient and irritable to listen. I wished my cousin would arrange not to receive proposals in my presence. One feels so horribly de trop on such occasions. It was no good for me to attempt to escape, however, Frankie would not have asked me down to supper had she not intended me to stay, no matter what occurred. There was nothing before me to do but grin and bear it.

"You won't mind my telling you, Frankie?" said Toby. "Of course, it's nothing to you. I daresay you are bored at hearing it. But—but—" he grew white and caught his breath. "I love you," he said hoarsely. "Yes, I love you."

An easy smile came to my cousin's lips, she leant towards him, her fingers rested lightly on his arm, the scent of her hair thrilled him.

Toby clenched his hands and tried not to look at her. He was a nice boy, as I have said, and his reverence for Frankie was a thing to marvel at. He would not so much as touch her gown unless she willed it.

Smiling she moved nearer. Her face was close to his.

"And are you sorry that you love me?" she said softly.

He stared at her then, and the light on his face was good to see—there came a flash of comprehension. He rose, and with a little laugh, tender yet exultant, took her in his arms.

She let him kiss her, heard his protestations, ardent, simple, strong, listened to his endearments fresh and sweet as young love alone can be—and still she smiled.

"You are all alike," she said at last. "Ready to swear any and everything. But when it comes to proving your words!"

"I only wish there was a way for me to prove the truth of what I say," he interrupted. "I long to do something. Can't you think of anything you want, Frankie?"

Digitized by Google

"I want lots of things, dear boy; most you couldn't get for me, one you might, but——" she paused.

"Tell me, and if it's humanly possible you shall have it."

She laughed and laid her head upon his shoulder.

"I want five thousand pounds," she said softly, "and I want it by to-morrow. That is, of course, the difficulty, otherwise I could sell out some securities, get an advance from my trustees, or a hundred other things. As it is, I have to make a payment—bets, you know, can't wait—and unless I have the money——" She let her hands fall with an expressive gesture. "You'll help me, Toby, won't you?"

"On my soul, Frankie, I couldn't lay my hands on £20. My salary is mortgaged six months ahead, and my uncle would not advance a penny of the allowance he makes me."

"I didn't suppose you had the money," said Frankie. "But"—she looked hard at him—"there are such things as money-lenders, you know. Nathan will let me have £5,000 on my own and another's security. Will you"—she looked meaningly at Toby—"supply that other?"

"I? Why, Frankie, no money-lender in London would take me as security for £5,000. You see, I'm not sure of inheriting my uncle's money. I'm bound to come in for the title, but that's about all. Sir Edward can leave his fortune as he chooses. There's no chance of raising any money on my expectations."

"It's the mere matter of a name that is wanted," said Frankie. "Look"—she took a paper from a table at her side—"this is the bill. As you see, I have put my signature. Another name under mine and I should have £5,000. The bill will not fall due for three months, by that time I shall be able to pay it three times over. You see"—she paused, fixing her eyes on Toby—"it is only a signature we want—nothing else."

"If you think mine is any good at all," said the boy in a bewildered fashion, "I'll sign like a rocket, but I'm sure Nathan won't take it."

"Can you think of anything else?"

"Chesterton would back a bill for me, or Kinross. I'll ask them, if you like, they wouldn't know it was for you."

"You evidently don't understand me, Toby. I must have the money by to-morrow, therefore I want the signature to-night. What of your uncle?" she asked abruptly.

"He'd order me out of the house if I were to suggest such a thing. He has a horror of money-lenders. Besides, he's not in England. He left yesterday, for Egypt."

Frankie made no answer. Going to the table she poured out some brandy. She drank it off, then lit a cigarette, and leant against the mantelpiece.

Toby went to her.

"I have vexed you, somehow," he said. "I am stupid, I suppose, and don't understand. What is it—dearest?" He uttered the last word shyly, rapturously. To be able to call the woman he loves "dearest" seems a wonderful thing to a young man, at first. Later it comes to mean something altogether different.

Frankie put down her cigarette and turned quickly. Her face was flushed, her eyes brilliant.

"Not five minutes since you swore you loved me," she cried; "declared there was nothing that you wouldn't do for me. And now, when I take you at your word and ask you for something, you quibble and pretend you do not understand. Listen," she snatched the bill and held it before him. "I want another signature beneath my own, and you must put it there. No, don't ask questions, nor offer explanations—write!"—and she thrust a pen into his fingers.

The boy listened with a bewilderment that gradually gave place to a horrified understanding. He threw down the pen, and sinking into a chair hid his face.

In a second Frankie was kneeling at his side.

"It doesn't mean anything dreadful," she whispered. "You've only just to write the name. No one will ever know but you and I. The money will be paid for certain when the bill falls due. Won't you do it for me, Toby? Think what it will mean if you refuse. If I don't get the money to-morrow, I shall be ruined, disgraced——"

"What of me," said the boy in a low voice, "how can I ever hold up my head again if——"

"No one will ever know, dear, but you and I. And we are the only people that matter, so long as we love each other."

"And if I sign—what then?" He raised his head, meeting her eyes. He looked white and drawn, and there were lines about his mouth, lines that, traced by the suffering of the moment, cut deep into the boyish face and left it hard.

"If I do this thing what am I to get?" He grasped her wrist and must have hurt her, for she gave a quick, sharp cry.

"I'll marry you—I swear it," she said quickly.

He caught her to him, kissing her eyes, and mouth and hair, then half staggered to the table and signed for pen and ink.

The lamps were burning dim so that he could not see to write. Frankie drew back the curtains. The dawn was breaking in the city, and the daylight stole into the room, making all things look garish in its clear purity. The greyness of the dawn fell full upon his face; so strange and terrible it looked that with a cry I rushed towards him.

I was too late. Toby had signed his uncle's name!

Another minute he had left the room, and Frankie followed him. I sat and cried, and wished that I and Toby were both dead.

My cousin took a much more cheerful view of the situation.

"You are really too silly, Cynthia," she said, "anyone would think that Toby had committed forgery to see the way you're going on."

"But it is forgery," I protested.

"Not a bit of it. It's forgery if a person signs another's name to get money for himself, not otherwise. You often write letters for me and use my signature, don't you? Well, that is not committing forgery, and Toby hasn't either. Besides, the thing's done now. Nobody will be a penny the worse, and I shall be £5,000 richer. I suppose you know that if I did not meet Clairette's cheque to-day, something very unpleasant would happen to me. Just as unpleasant as will happen to you if you don't pay your bets."

"Frankie!"

"Oh, yes, you're very innocent my dear, and very young. All the same, you'll have to pay £800, and unless I can help you I don't know where you'll get it from. And I shan't help you if you are not sensible. Promise me not to say a word of what has happened to any living soul, or I'll turn you over to Mrs. Blount's tender mercies. It's quite possible she may prosecute you, and you might be found guilty of trying to obtain money under false pretences. You know you hadn't a penny when you made the bets. Are you going to promise?"

She stood before me fair and smiling in her rich dress and jewels. What could I do? I was tired, worn out with fatigue and worry, haunted by fears of what might happen to me, weighed down by the thoughts of my debts.

"You are sure Toby won't get into trouble, Frankie?"

"He can't, except through you."

"You'll be able to pay the moneylender?"

"Am I a fool, Cynthia? Of course I shall pay. Come, be sensible and promise."

And too weary to combat further I yielded and gave my word.

I went upstairs and flung

Digitized by Google

Confessions of Cynthia.

NEW SERIES OF STORIES.

myself exhausted on the bed. For the first time life looked grey to me. I had no joy in to-day, nor in the thought of to-morrow. Alas, alas, why had I made those bets, the bets that had tied my hands and set a seal upon my tongue? What should I do? How would it all end?

I slept that morning until lunch-time, when Frankie came to see how I was feeling. She had just returned from a drive, and looked deliciously cool in white crêpe de Chine, with a great bunch of lilies in her hands.

"Poor child," she said sweetly, "you do look fagged. Cheer up, Cynthia, things are going well with us to-day. I've been to Nathan, and he cashed up at once. Infamous interest he's charged, of course, but any way I've got the five thou. I've paid in two to the bank to meet Clairette's cheque, and distributed the rest between hungry tradesmen and bookmakers. Still I saved enough to buy you this," and she threw a little packet on the bed. I opened it and found a necklace of gold beads exquisitely chased.

"I'm glad you're pleased," she said, "I want you to wear it to-night. I've just seen Lord Chesterton, he brought a note from the Duchess—he's a special favourite of hers—asking you to the ball to-night. Isn't that good news? You'll look sweet, Cynthia, and utterly rout Mrs. Curtis Blount. I've spoken to Clairette about your frock, and as a special favour she will get it done and send it along this afternoon. It is white chiffon over silk, with motifs of lace. Aren't you glad?"

"It's nice of the Duchess, Frankie, but——"

"Oh, I won't listen to objections, you're coming, there's an end of it."

"But, Frankie, what about my bets?"

My cousin paused.

"You must see Fluffy," she said, "as soon as possible. By the bye, Cynthia, when you left the convent, did not the sisters hand you over a packet that your father left in their charge. What was in it—letters?"

"No, mining shares, and a few legal papers."

Frankie nodded.

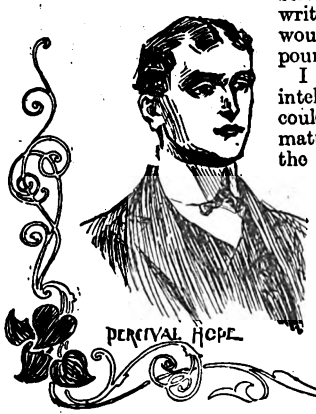
"You must take the shares to Fluffy and ask him to sell them for you."

"You really think they're worth money?"

"Maybe; anyway, Fluffy will tell you. Give me the papers and I'll send them to him at once by special messenger."

I was only too glad to do so. The mere thought that I might be able to pay that terrible eight hundred pounds was joy.

The messenger brought back an unexpected piece of news. Fluffy was leaving London for the Continent quite early the following morning, if possible he'd run up to Pont Street before he started. If not he'd write me. The shares he thought would sell for about a thousand pounds!



I was very delighted at the intelligence, though sorry I could not see him and get the matter settled that day. For the moment, however, I could not help thinking of the ball.

Frankie spared no pains nor expense with my frock. It was very lovely, all shimmering white, soft chiffon draperies caught here and there with bunches of white jasmine, costly lace, fine as a cobweb cunningly draped. I wore the gold beads at my throat, and in my hair was a spray o jasmine.

Frankie looked superb in a marvellous gown of jewelled lace over an underskirt of eau de nil; the pattern of the lace, water lilies with their broad flat leaves, was outlined with silk, filled in with pearls, brilliants and tiny emeralds. The jewels flashed at her every movement, opalescent, gleaming, like sunshine on a lake. It was the most magnificent, certainly the most costly gown worn at the ball.

Lady Gaveston, in mauve satin and Irish point, looked severe but unimpeachable. She condescended to express great approbation of my appearance, but warned me against "vanity" and other sins of the flesh.

"Percival Hope may be at the Duchess'," said Frankie to me in the brougham. "Be quite nice to him, Cynthia, just as if nothing had happened. By the bye, I'm going to ask Sir Gregory Stokes to help me about Jim—Ella's sweetheart. Sir Gregory is a general, you know, and a person of immense importance at the War Office. He can get the young man's discharge if he will."

"I'm sure I hope you'll persuade him, Frankie. I'm so sorry for Ella."

"So am I," said Frankie, with a little smile.

The scene at the Duchess of Warminster's was more wonderful than anything I could have imagined.

The great hall, with its marble staircase, brilliantly lit, glowed with colour. Masses of flowers, crimson, scarlet and gold, threw up the dazzling purity of the white marble, and up and down the broad, cool steps there came and went a procession, never ending, gorgeous beyond words. Stately women flashing with diamonds, brave in silk and satin, young girls fair and sweet as the lilies that they held. Princes from the Far East in garments rich in warmth and colour as the sun, purple and gold standing side by side with a grave, blackcoated Englishman, or a foreign diplomatist blazing with orders heavily jewelled.

Frankie made a sensation even in that assemblage. Something there was in the carriage of her head, in her slow, graceful movements, in the brilliance of her smile, that marked her out; she was distinctive and created an impression on the mind apart from that called up by other and perhaps more beautiful women.

The Duchess gave me a charming smile and said Lord Chesterton must take care of me. His Lordship immediately seized my programme and commandeered some half-dozen numbers. He waltzed to perfection. I never enjoyed myself so much.

We sat out in the conservatory for one dance, and I took the opportunity to explain that I was not wholly given over to betting. I didn't give Mrs. Blount away. I think it's mean of one woman to tell tales of another, but I fancy he gathered how matters stood.

"Promise me you won't bet any more—except for gloves," he said, taking my hand.

"Never," I answered fervently, and told him how worried I had been to get the eight hundred pounds.

"When I've sold the shares and got the money I don't know exactly how I am to pay the bookmakers. I suppose I'd better send it to Mrs. Blount?"

"I'll settle with them, if you like," he said.

"Thank you so much, Lord Chesterton. I shall have the money by to-morrow afternoon, if you wouldn't mind calling for it at Pont Street, I shall be very grateful."

He said something foolish but rather nice in reply, about the happiness it would give him to see me not only the next, but every day.

We didn't talk much after that, but sat and—thought.

Sir Gregory appeared at the beginning of the next dance, Frankie on his arm.

The distinguished general was entirely captivated. Rumour had it that Lady Gregory, though extremely virtuous, was somewhat acidulated; doubtless the contrast between Milady and Mrs. Norton depressed the gallant soldier, for he sighed heavily and looked sentimental.

I did not think it necessary to remain as a spectator of the interview, so suggested to Lord Chesterton that we should make a move. I can only surmise, therefore, as to what transpired between my cousin and the brave Sir Gregory. The conclusion of the matter, however, came under my notice. Frankie passed me on the staircase leaning on his arm.

Digitized by Google

"It is so good of you, Sir Gregory," she murmured. "You've taken such a weight off my mind. How glad my poor maid will be when I tell her that her sweetheart will get his discharge. How can I thank you?"

Sir Gregory did not reply in words. He gave a quick glance up and down the stairs; for the moment the coast was clear—I suppose I didn't count. Then, with a sudden movement he slipped his arm about my cousin's waist and kissed her!

When I and my partner regained the ballroom, Frankie was the centre of a group of admirers. It was during the first interval, and she was holding a sort of court.

I shall never forget her that evening.

Tall, stately, regal almost in her jewelled robe, she stood surrounded by men, clever, distinguished, notable throughout Europe.

It was the zenith of her triumph. I watched and almost held my breath. Suddenly she turned to a dark, clever-looking man at her right. He was a very celebrated person indeed, and remarkable as much for his dislike of woman as for his talents. It was, therefore, a distinct tribute to my cousin's fascinations that he should single her out for his attentions.

Fêted, flattered, and caressed she must indeed have felt triumphant. All thoughts of past unhappiness must, I thought, have left her; there could be no shadows in the past dark enough to cloud the present. Nothing could stop her now. Those years in Jamaica—a reference to which always called up a look of apprehension in Frankie's face—must seem to her a dream. There could be nothing in that far-off time that could touch her now—the guest of the most exclusive lady in England.

Suddenly her face grew white, a look curiously like fear crept into her eyes. She clutched my arm and her limbs trembled. I followed her gaze, travelling down the ball-room, radiant with light and life, resplendent with every sign of wealth and taste—and she the centre of it all. I followed her gaze right to the end of the vast room, and there in a doorway stood two men—Percival Hope and another.

That other was a mean and sordid-looking man, yellow skinned, with a furtive expression in his eyes. He was strangely out of place by Percival's side, resting his hand on Percival's arm. What could so mean a creature have to do with the beautiful woman who turned sick and faint at sight of him?

The man was speaking now, pointing with a lean finger towards Frankie. He leant forward, and in a clear, piercing voice called out:

"Yes, it is she, I swear it."

And at the words and gesture my cousin quailed. She drew a deep, hard breath and seemed to gasp for air. Quickly the crowd round her dispersed, one ran for water, another for this remedy and that.

My cousin did not seem to heed them. She leant against me heavily.

"After all these years," she gasped, "to come now, now."

"What is it?" I inquired. "Oh, tell me what it is!"

"He is from Jamaica," she said in a low, hoarse voice, "and he knows all!"

(A most exciting instalment is published next Tuesday.)

POET: "Whatever does this mean? My publisher sends me a bill for a new waste-paper basket!"

MOTHER (to suitor): "No, I can never give you my daughter. I have quite made up my mind." Suitor: "Then I'm doubly disappointed. I vowed that I would have a lovely wife and a young looking mother-in-law." Mother: "Well—or—you may call again. I may change my mind."

Your Editor Chats.

THE editor of a popular fiction paper like SHORT STORIES has opportunities of coming in contact with very queer specimens of humanity, either personally, or through the post. Scarcely a week elapses but that I receive a call from some extraordinary individual who is under the impression that he, or she, is a sort of Charles Dickens or Charlotte Brontë, who has never yet had opportunities of getting their true merit appreciated.

A WOULD-BE NOVELIST.

I am one of the first to encourage young and promising writers of fiction, and to give such advice as lies in my power to bring out their best points, but I like modesty even in a story-writer. I am, therefore, highly amused when I get a letter from a youth from which I make the following extract:

"Of course, I don't suppose you will be able to fully appreciate the merits of my story, because, you see, your standard of merit is so infinitely below that of my own. I sometimes look over your paper, SHORT STORIES, and I think it is very good of its kind, but I think that you ought to insert more fiction of the nature of the inclosed."

"The inclosed," my dear readers, was entitled "Julius Cæsar," and was the story of the life of Julius Cæsar obviously written in the form of an essay after the writer had read Shakespeare's play!

A GENEROUS OFFER.

Another young writer, this time a girl, in inclosing me a story which would occupy a whole issue of SHORT STORIES, all about nothing at all (and very badly written at that), tells me that I can have this story for nothing if I will send her six copies of the paper in which it appears, for which she is willing to pay. I am sorry to say I was unable to accept her generous offer.

But, seriously, I know that there must be amongst the readers of SHORT STORIES a large number of girls and young men who are quite capable of turning out a good story, and next week I shall have a chat with you about the best method of getting to work.

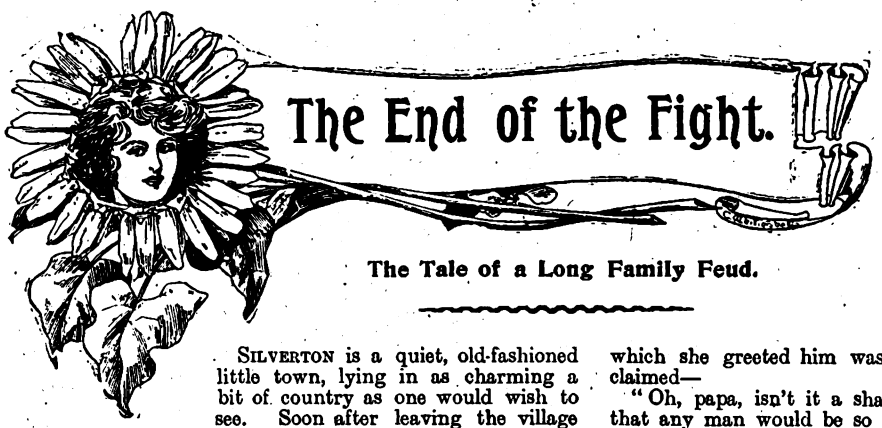
WOULD YOU WIN A SILVER PENCIL-CASE?

This week I am offering one of our now famous solid silver pencil-cases to the reader who sends me the longest list of words of six letters and upwards which also form a word when spelt backwards, thus "drawer" when spelt backwards is "reward." Lists must be written on the backs of postcards only, which must be marked "Reverse," addressed to the Competition Editor, SHORT STORIES, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C. The competition closes after the first post on Tuesday morning, August 12th. Ten consolation gifts of rolled gold charms and rolled gold hearts will be sent to those competitors whose lists come next in order of merit.

RESULT OF THE "THREE WORDS" COMPETITION.

The first prize of a handsome barbaric guard for this competition goes to J. Jones, 5, Worcester Place, Swansea, while the ten consolation gifts of rolled gold hearts and rolled gold charms go to the following: Miss B. Gush, Cruwys Morchard, Tiverton, Devon; F. Beadnell, 282, Stanhope Road, Tyne Dock, South Shields; A. Isted, 3, Caxton Villas, Gordon Hill, Enfield; J. Ramsden, Wallwark Terrace, The Hague, Stalybridge; D. Ferguson, 13, Anfield Row, Dundee; Miss M. H. Ingles, Westberry Stores, Westberry Avenue, Wood Green; J. R. Morris, 27, Richmond Road, Oxford; C. J. Long, 49, Walsingham Road, Colchester; A. Reoch, 123, Victoria Road, Dundee; J. Gluck, 23, Southwold Road, Upper Clapton, N.E.

Digitized by Google



The End of the Fight.

The Tale of a Long Family Feud.

Silverton is a quiet, old-fashioned little town, lying in as charming a bit of country as one would wish to see. Soon after leaving the village the road towards the south passes an old stone house, which has been standing there for ages, and still looks strong enough to be the future home of generations yet unborn.

About and beyond it lie broad fields of grain, growing yellow under the August sunshine, and acres of corn rustling in the summer breeze.

And all this is the property of one fortunate man. Standing upon the broad balcony of the old stone house, he can look towards the east and towards the west, and call it his own almost as far as he can see.

But some years ago the farm had two owners, and Richard Dean, who lived in the stone house, and John Marshall, who owned the land opposite to it on the other side of the road, were no friends. There had been some ancient quarrel about landmarks, the families had nursed their enmity, and transmitted it from father to son along with the family acres.

There had been Deans and Marshalls in Silverton almost from the time when the town first had a name; but they were from widely different walks in life. The first of the Deans was a wealthy Londoner, who, in travelling through the country, was charmed with the natural beauty of the place, bought a large tract of land there, and built the stone house of this story.

The first of the Marshalls came into Silverton with all his worldly goods in the bundle which he carried under his arm, and the bundle was not heavy. He came as ordinary farm hand to one of the farmers in the neighbourhood. After a year's service he married the farmer's daughter, who, being an only child, in process of time dutifully inherited her father's acres, and handed them over to her lucky lord.

Since those days there had been some great changes. None of the Deans had ever added to their original inheritance, and one of the family had so crippled his resources by extravagance that it became necessary for him to sell a portion of his estate.

The Marshalls, from father to son, had ever been a frugal set, and the grandfather of John Marshall was, by this time, able to buy the land his fast-living neighbour was forced to part with. It was from a dispute as to landmarks, arising from this sale, that the quarrel which we have mentioned sprung. The case was carried to law; the Deans came off victorious, and the Marshalls never forgave it.

Moreover, it was rumoured, that when Richard Dean of this story married the beautiful daughter of the old Silverton clergyman, it touched John Marshall very nearly; so that between the old wound to the pocket and the wound to the affections, the family quarrel seemed in no way likely to die out.

It reached its climax when the two farmers, who belonged to opposite parties in politics, became rival Parliamentary candidates. John Marshall was beaten, and choosing to consider his defeat as a direct personal injury inflicted by his neighbour, vowed that he would be even with him. And Richard Dean, when he came home at the close of his session, found that this had been no idle threat.

Across the road, directly in front of his house, loomed up before him the frame of a huge barn. Workmen were busy plying their noisy hammers, loose timbers were scattered about, great heaps of boards lay piled up here and there ready for use, and all the dirt and rubbish of building defaced the once beautiful meadow.

Mr. Dean stood aghast, and could scarcely believe his eyes. His pretty daughter tripped out upon the balcony to meet him; but almost before the kiss with which she greeted him was off her pouting lips, she exclaimed—

"Oh, papa, isn't it a shame? Could you have believed that any man would be so mean? Is there nothing to be done? Must we have that horrid barn always before our eyes?"

Yes, the barn was there, and stayed. Mr. Dean found himself powerless. In the eye of the law the barn could not be made to appear a nuisance, whatever it might be to the dwellers in the stone house. So there was nothing to be done but to pocket their wrath, and, if possible, to possess their souls in patience, while the monster grew day by day, until at last it stood complete in its ugliness, cutting off the view of the beautiful hills and the pretty pond which nestled at their feet, hiding the big knoll, where a group of gigantic trees kept watch and ward over the meadows below them, and shutting out even the sunset.

The acme of ugliness was reached, and the disappointed farmer's revenge must have been fully satisfied when the building had been painted the brightest, tawdriest yellow that ever disgraced a paint-pot, and "Marshall's barn" had become a byword in the neighbourhood.

"'What can't be cured must be endured,'" Mr. Dean remarked to his daughter, by way of saying something both original and comforting.

But Miss Alice had no idea of sitting down patiently to endure, when, though a cure was not to be hoped for, matters might at least be mended. The mountain would not move for Mahomet, and the barn was not likely to be more accommodating; but something might, perhaps, be done in the way of hiding it. And Alice was to be seen daily on the lawn, busily at work with her own hands, and superintending the labours of others. Hitherto the balcony had been left entirely open, with nothing to intercept the beautiful view; but now creepers began to climb there, seeming to vie with each other in hastening upward with their delicate, leafy wall, and hanging baskets with tall plants and long streamers of luxuriant ivy did what they could in the common cause. Here and there screens of lattice-work were set up, where, one of these days, roses would bloom, and a hawthorn hedge was planted, and coaxed with every cunning device for speedy growth.

All this did very well while summer lasted; but when the autumn winds and frost had laid bare every tree and shrub, stripped the leaves from the creepers, and carried destruction among the flower-baskets, then the barn stood forth again in its nakedness, a great yellow blot upon the landscape. In fact, as they looked out of the balcony windows of the stone house, it seemed to be the only thing that was seen.

Mr. Dean tried to take the infliction philosophically, since there was no remedy for it, and succeeded in putting it out of his mind about as well as people generally do when a thing is constantly in sight. But Alice, who was a lady of some spirit, was at no pains either to lessen or conceal her indignation.

It was during the winter which followed the building of the barn that young Marshall, as he was called, returned from Germany. John Marshall had bestowed upon his only son every opportunity for that extended intelligence and culture which those of his name had hitherto considered of little value compared with the accumulation of land and money. "There is money enough," he said, "and John shall have what he wants, provided he does not squander it."

Digitized by Google

Sole heir to the Marshall farm, which had grown to be the largest in the county, good-looking, frank, and jovial, and with an ease and grace of manner conferred by three years of foreign travel, he speedily became the lion of Silverton. At the village parties and social gatherings all united to welcome and do him honour, with one exception. A haughty bow was the only acknowledgment that Alice Dean would vouchsafe his presence. She could not be brought to include herself in any conversation in which he took part, and her cool withdrawal from a group which he chanced to join would often place their mutual friends in embarrassing positions. Her father, having noticed this on one occasion when they had been out together, remonstrated with her on their return home, mildly suggesting that she should endeavour to keep her angry feelings a little more out of sight.

"This young man is not to blame for his father's conduct, you know," he continued.

"Of course not," said Alice, "but he's his father's son. No," she added, after a moment's silence, "it's of no use trying. I can never be civil to a Marshall, with that hideous yellow barn staring me in the face,"

Five minutes later, Mr. Dean, who had taken up and was looking over his newspaper, laid it down in a hurry, as Alice remarked, in a slow, deliberate way, as though she had at last made up her mind—

"Papa, that barn will be the ruin of my temper. I am going to set fire to it!"

Mr. Dean glanced about the room, half afraid that they were not alone, before he replied—

"My child, that may be a pleasant little joke of yours, but it is lucky that there was no one to hear it but myself."

"It's no joke at all, papa. I am quite serious. I have been thinking about it for some time, and I mean to do it."

Mr. Dean took off his eyeglasses, and looked attentively at his daughter.

"Upon my word, I believe the child has some such intention," he said to himself. To her he said—

"It is your opinion, then, that you have a right to make away with your neighbour's property whenever your pleasure is not consulted in its situation?"

"It is my opinion," said Alice, with the confident logic of eighteen years, "that my neighbour has no right to set up an abominable nuisance under my very nose. And if he can't be made to remove it, I think I should be justified in getting rid of it in the easiest way possible."

"And you think also, upon mature consideration," said Mr. Dean, "that you would prefer the view of four walls of a prison for the next ten or fifteen years, to that of your neighbour's barn?"

"Is that the punishment for arson?"

"It is."

"Oh, but I should not be caught. I have several plans, any one of which is quite safe."

"But, unfortunately, you have a witness of your intentions," said Mr. Dean quite seriously.

"No one but you, and, of course, you wouldn't testify against me."

"Indeed, I should," returned Mr. Dean, with the air of a stern, impartial judge.

"Oh, papa, I won't believe it!"

And Alice took a seat upon her father's knee.

"Yes," said the inexorable father, "I mean it. If you burn Mr. Marshall's barn, I shall tell all I know about the matter."

"And send me to prison?"

"To be sure. I would be sorry, of course, as it would deprive me of a valuable housekeeper. Nevertheless, I should feel bound to do it."

And Mr. Dean, looking into the large blue eyes which gazed at his with such a serious expression, seemed half in earnest.

"Come, come, Alice," he exclaimed, at length. "It is high time for us to put a stop to such talk as this; and, what is more, you must promise me not to harbour such dangerous notions in that busy brain of yours."

"I can't promise. It is impossible to control one's thoughts," returned Alice, with a shake of the head that was comically serious.

"Very well," said Mr. Dean; "then I must keep you where you will be in no danger of doing mischief."

Here the pretty incendiary burst into her usual merry laugh, kissed her father, bade him good-night, and went to her room, coming back to say:

"I won't burn the barn to-night, papa, so you can rest in peace."

It was late in July, and the day had been very warm; one of those sultry days which come unexpectedly, and, taking us unawares, half prostrate us with their sudden heat. Clouds had been threatening all the evening, great masses which seemed to gather blackness as they rolled westward, and at midnight low growls of thunder began to break the stillness, and the big drops of rain to patter noiselessly against the window-pane.

Alice awoke, and lay watching the vivid flashes which now and then lighted up her room and left it in blacker darkness than before, when suddenly there came a sharp, deafening crash, then peal after peal of thunder, which seemed to shake the old house to its very foundations, and to shiver and vibrate through its every inch of mortar and stone.

Alice buried her head among the bedclothes, and lay quaking with fear and half-benumbed by the shock. When she at last ventured to uncover her head and look out from her retreat, the room was all aglow, every object in it as plainly seen as at noonday. It could not be the lightning, for it remained steady and uninterrupted, each moment growing brighter and brighter. Jumping from the bed, she rushed to the window, and saw a sight which chained her to the spot, forgetful of everything but what was before her.

The barn was in flames!

The lightning had struck it and set fire to its contents. Tons upon tons of hay were burning fiercely. Their dry masses, kindled into a huge red mountain of roaring, leaping flames, shone luridly upon the black sky, and glared over the country for miles around.

In the weird, fitful beauty of the scene, Alice was for the time totally unmindful that it was of any direct, personal interest to her; but when it suddenly occurred to her what it was, she flew to her father's room, half wild with excitement and delight.

Mr. Dean's room was on the opposite side of the house, and he had seen no signs of the fire. Being a sound sleeper, the thunder had only partially disturbed him, so that he was no more than half awake, when Alice came bouncing to his bedside, exclaiming:

"Oh, papa, papa! The barn is burning! But I didn't do it!"

"Alice, are you crazy?" said Mr. Dean, as by the dim light of the night-light he saw her whirling about the room, performing a rapturous pas seul, and looking, in her long white gown, like a very frisky goat.

There was no more sleep that night for the family in the stone house; and when morning broke, cloudless and beautiful after the storm, there lay the untarnished landscape spread out before them in all its old familiar beauty, and Marshall's barn a heap of ruins at their feet.

For one short week Mr. Dean and his daughter rejoiced over this unlooked-for deliverance. They blessed the storm, and congratulated themselves morning, noon, and night, as they gazed upon the unbroken prospect which had never seemed half so charming before. Then there began to be a stir among the few charred and blackened timbers which the fire had spared—fresh ones were deposited beside them, load after load of building materials arrived, and, to their utter dismay, they learnt that the barn was to be rebuilt. Mr. Dean remonstrated to no purpose, and friendly neighbours vainly tried their persuasions on the obstinate old man. Young Marshall, who was deeply mortified and grieved at his father's course, exerted all the eloquence which he possessed to prevent the carrying out of this malicious design; but the only reply which he received was: "See here, my boy, you come and go as you choose, and I interfere with none of your plans. You act your pleasure, and I shall act mine."

Digitized by Google

So the work went on with all possible speed, and the raising day was at hand. A crowd had gathered, as was usual on such occasions in the country. The huge frame was being slowly hoisted to its place, with shouts and cheers and heave-aways, when some part of the structure suddenly gave way, and timber after timber came tumbling to the ground. Two or three men received ugly knocks and hard bruises, but all escaped without serious injury, with one exception. John Marshall lay upon the ground under a heavy timber, with a broken arm, and a stream of blood flowing from a wound in his head, cut by a sharp stone, upon which he had struck in falling.

He was taken up insensible, and laid upon the grass; water was dashed in his face to revive him, and his head bound up in handkerchiefs to stop the flow of blood. A doctor was quickly brought to the spot, sewed up the wound, and bandaged the disabled arm.

"What is to be done with him?" he asked, with a grave face, as he concluded the operation. "To move him any distance in his present condition would surely prove fatal."

"Bring him into my house, and we will do the best we can for him," said Mr. Dean, who came out on hearing of the accident.

So the unconscious man was carried in and placed upon a bed; and there he lay for many a long day, prostrate and helpless in the house of him whom he had hated and injured. His son had been sent for, but the messenger was long in finding him. When he arrived the crowd had dispersed, and Mr. Dean was standing by the bedside of his father, while Alice was bathing the invalid's head, and striving to keep it cool with applications of ice.

"Mr. Dean," said the young man, after gazing silently for some minutes at his father, who was still in a state of stupor, "I should in any case be extremely sorry for such an intrusion as this; but, under the circumstances, I feel that it is truly unpardonable. I will have my poor father removed to-night, if it is possible."

"You must not think of such a thing," Mr. Dean replied warmly. "The doctor has expressly forbidden it. You must take care of your father here, and in doing so I trust you will spare yourself all uneasiness as to intrusion."

"Good Heavens! Are we to thrust ourselves upon you in this way?" exclaimed young Marshall, half-beside himself with anxiety for his father's safety, and mortification at the embarrassing position in which he found himself. "I beg pardon, sir, but your generosity makes me feel more painfully than ever that all claim to it has been forfeited. I can only assure you that even you yourself cannot have regretted the cause of trouble more than I have done."

"I believe you!" said Mr. Dean cordially, much affected by his impulsive expression of feeling. He extended his hand, which Marshall received gratefully, while Alice, who had melted at the first signal of distress, wished from the bottom of her heart that she had treated the young man with more consideration. Her blue eyes were swimming when he said to her: "Pray let me relieve you, Miss Dean; I fear you have tired yourself already."

Weeks had passed before John Marshall became fully conscious of his situation. Fever set in, and he grew delirious; and when at last the delirium passed away, he fell into a stupor, which seemed almost more hopeless than his former state. He had been lying for a long time with scarcely a sign of life about him, except the feeble fluttering of his pulse, when his son, who had watched over him night and day, saw him slowly open his eyes and gaze with a look of faint wonder about the room. He was too weak to speak; but when days had elapsed, and he had gained sufficient strength, he asked no questions. The barn, or rather its skeleton, which remained as it had been left on the day of the accident, was in plain sight from a window near his bed; and he would lie hour after hour gazing at it, silently closing his eyes at any attempt at conversation, and scarcely giving an answer to the few questions which were put to him.

Young Marshall was sitting one day sadly wondering what were the thoughts over which he seemed brooding, when the sick man turned slowly in his bed, and, in a quiet way, as though it were no uncommon request that he was about to make, said to his son:

"John, I should like to have you see that everything belonging to that barn over there is carried off, and the place cleared up. Do it as soon as possible—will you?"

"Certainly, father, if you wish it," his son remarked, not knowing whether to be most astonished or rejoiced.

"Perhaps you can attend to it now," said Mr. Marshall. "I do not need you. I think I shall go to sleep." And he closed his eyes as if he wished nothing more to be said.

Young Marshall was not slow in executing his father's wishes, and two days had not passed before all traces of the barn had disappeared. A few days more, and Mr. Marshall signified his intention of going home, firmly resisting all persuasions to the contrary.

"I shall leave here to-day," he said to his son. "And when I am ready to go, John, I should like to see Mr. Dean and his daughter. Ask them to meet me on the balcony."

So, leaning upon his son, a weak, broken-down man, he tottered across the threshold over which he had been carried two months before. Sinking into an arm-chair, which Mr. Dean made ready for him, while Alice softly arranged the pillows about him, he said, in a voice shaken with weakness and emotion:

"Richard Dean, I never thought I should have to thank you for anything; but I have been brought to it. You and I were never the best of friends, and a year ago I swore to do you harm as long as I lived. But the Almighty set his face against me. 'Vengeance is mine; I will repay,' saith the Lord, and He kept his word. He has repaid me for all I have done. This thing has made an old man of me, and there's no telling now how long I shall last. I want to make my peace with you, Richard, and your family, and to live as friends for the rest of my days, if you will let bygones be bygones."

"With all my heart," said Mr. Dean, grasping in both his own the thin white hand held out to him. "We shall have you a hale, hearty old man yet, and we shall begin anew; and from this day henceforth Marshalls and Deans shall dwell together in unity."

"That's just what Alice has promised me," said young Marshall, twining his arm about the young blue-eyed girl by his side, all tears and smiles and blushes, while the two fathers gazed—one with astonishment, which soon changed to gladness, and the other with a satisfied look in his eyes, which had long seen what was going on between the young people.

Meanwhile the sun went down upon a group the like of which was never seen in Silvertown.

The lovers have long been happily married, and an orchard of apple trees is now growing where once stood "Marshall's barn."

Digitized by Google

POST THIS COPY TO A FRIEND!

THE GREAT "PASS-IT-ALONG" SCHEME.

First Award, £10. Second Award, £5. Third Award, £2. Six Awards of 10s. each.

(A)

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE COMPETITOR WHO SENDS THIS COPY.

When you have carefully read these rules, put an ink line round the instructions in the next column, write your name and address in the space at the foot of this page*, and in the next column; wrap up this copy of SHORT STORIES in a wrapper, fix a penny stamp on it, and post it to a friend of yours whom you think will help you. Then wait until the copy is returned to you.

All you need do is to send out your copy or copies of SHORT STORIES and wait until they come back to you with the names filled in.

The first prize will be awarded to the person whose copies of SHORT STORIES contain the greatest number of names of people to whom the copies have been sent, provided that the wrappers which carried the copies of SHORT STORIES through the post to each person accompany the list.

It is not necessary for you to know the people whose names you will find on your list when your copy comes back; they will, of course, be the friends of your friends.

There is no absolute necessity to write a letter to your friend explaining the scheme, but if you did so it would carry more weight.

HOW TO SEND IN.

Keep the wrappers as they are sent to you, and when this copy comes back send all the wrappers, together with this copy, to the Editor of "Short Stories," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., in an envelope marked "PASS-IT-ALONG," to arrive not later than Thursday, August 21st.

NOTE.—Competitors may send out at the same time any number of copies of this issue.

The Editor's decision is final, and readers may enter only on this understanding.

(B)

INSTRUCTIONS TO THOSE WHO RECEIVE THIS COPY BY POST.

This copy of SHORT STORIES has been sent to you by a friend who is interested in this competition and who wants to win one of the prizes offered. When you have read this announcement write your name down in the space provided, and then forward this copy at once in a penny wrapper to a friend of yours. If you have no friend to whom you can send it, return the copy of the paper, together with the wrapper in which you received it, to the original sender.

If the original sender of this paper (whose name and address is written at the foot of this page) wins the first prize, you will also receive a prize. The paper must be returned to the original sender on or before Saturday, August 16th.

You must at once return the wrapper in which this copy reaches you to _____

(Competitor must insert here his or her name and address.)

IMPORTANT.

Fill in your name at once and post it on the day this is received. If you keep it longer it will lessen the chance of the original sender securing the first prize, as the paper will not be able to get into so many hands within the time limit.

If you receive this copy on Saturday, August 16th, fill up your name and post it at once to the sender, whose name appears at the foot of this page.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO COMPETITORS IN SECOND COMPETITION.

The condition under which every signer of the coupons of the 1st and 2nd winners will receive a money prize is altered to read as follows:

"If the original sender of this paper (whose name and address is written at the foot of this page) wins the first prize, you will receive a pretty gift.

The line on right side of coupon will also be altered accordingly. The competition closes on Thursday, August 7th.

This offer will be repeated in SHORT STORIES for August 23rd (the next number but one), when another £20 will be offered in awards.

Those to whom this copy is sent sign here.

	NAME.	ADDRESS.
1.
2.
3.
4.
5.
6.
7.
8.
9.
10.
11.
12.

Those who sign here will get a prize each if this wins first award.

*Name and Address of Competitor.....

Digitized by Google

The Retort Crushing.

Lord Tuffnutt: "You have nothing to grumble at whatever; you were a rich American girl, I an impoverished English nobleman, with a proud title. You bought me with your wealth. I was what you would simply call in shopping, a bargain!" Lady Tuffnutt: "Pardon me! Not a bargain—a remnant."

Same Thing.

She: "Did you ever play football?" He (watching the game): "No; but I once got caught in a drove of stampeded oxen."

Might Have Been Said Differently.

She: "You say that my consenting to marry you has made you very happy?" He: "Yes. You see what a simple thing it takes to make me happy."

Fruitful Soil.

"I've noticed one thing about widow's weeds," said his reverence. "What's that?" asked his worship. "They rarely interfere with the growth of orange blossoms on the same soil."

Didn't Appreciate Music.

"I'm sorry you don't like the new nurse," she said to her husband. "She is so good about singing to baby and keeping him quiet." "Yes," was the calm reply, "but I'd rather hear the baby cry!"

Still Worse.

Penelope: "I suppose he broke your heart eventually?" Perdita: "Far worse" Penelope: "You don't mean to say he broke the engagement?" Perdita: "No. He played nap with papa and broke him."

Very Precious.

What more precious offering can be laid upon the altar of a man's heart than the first love of a pure, earnest, and affectionate girl, with an undivided interest in eight corner plots and fourteen three-storey houses?

His Expectations.

Angelina: "What did you tell papa about your prospects?" Edwin: "I said had expectations from my uncle." Angelina: "Why, Edwin, you told me you had no relatives at all." Edwin: "Oh, yes, but I'm going to pawn my watch this evening."

Poor Human Nature.

"Women dress very ridiculously," he said, as he watched his wife finishing her toilet. "It is the fashion, John," she said, pleasantly. "Fashion be hanged!" said he. "I would be superior to fashion if I were a woman, and wear nothing not useful." Five minutes later he asked her to sew a button on the back of his coat.

All Over.

Lady Belle: "I should think that he would propose soon?" Miss Grahame: "Oh, no; it's all over! He never really meant anything." Lady Belle: "Why, have you quarrelled?" Miss Grahame: "No, but yesterday he gave me a box—such a lot—of stationery!" Lady Belle: "But presents are always promising." Miss Grahame: "But my initials are on it; and such a lot! Oh, no! It's all over between us!"

Self Condemned.

Teacher (to scholar): "What are you laughing at? Not at me?" Scholar: "Oh, no, sir!" Teacher: "Then what else is there in the room to laugh at?"

Before and After.

"What's this card in your pocket, John?" asked his wife. "That? Oh, before I went to lunch that was a bill of fare. Now it is my table of contents."

So He Ought.

Figg: "What a peculiar man Dunder is. He has a sovereign contempt for anybody who doesn't know as much as he does." Fogg: "I should think he would."

Nurses' Elysium.

First Nurse-girl: "So you've got a new place?" Second Nurse-girl: "Yes." "Do you like it?" "Like it? Why, it is right in front of a police-station!"

Unselfish.

Waiter (to farmer visiting London who has been dining in a restaurant): "Anything, sir, for the waiter, sir?" Farmer (looking at his plate): "Oh, yes. Take all there's left; I've finished."

Too Large-Hearted.

Brother: "And you rejected him?" Sister: "I did." "He has the reputation of being a large-hearted man." "That's the trouble with him; he is too large-hearted. He can love half-a-dozen women at the same time."

Photographic.

Dolley: "Well, old fellow, I asked Miss Amy last night to marry me, and she declined." Goslin: "Did she deliberate as though hesitating to pain you?" "No, she produced her negative by the instantaneous process."

Gets Ready the Evidence.

A judge of much experience says: "I never had a breach of promise case before me in which the mother of the girl didn't know more about it than her daughter. She always suspects the fellow is a rascal, and gets ready for him."

A Pleasing Gift.

He: "Have you decided what to give your old aunt for a birthday present?" She: "No; but now I come to think of it, the poor old maid has had very little pleasure all her life; you might just write her an anonymous love-letter."

An Anchor to Windward.

Agnes: "What is troubling you so, love?" George: "I was thinking that if you declined me when I proposed to-night whether I should accept the heiress who is so anxious to marry me." Agnes: "Why, George, you know I love you."

What is Milk?

They were in the country for the summer, and the little daughter had been shown all the farming processes. Two or three nights ago she pushed away her bowl, declaring that she did not care to feed any longer upon milk. "But, my dear," said mother, "why not?" "Because," said the precocious child, with a conscious air of superiority, "I know all about it. Milk is only chewed grass."

A Sure Sign.

Anxious Mother: "My dear, I'm afraid William is getting into bad company. He is out late every night." Observing Father: "Oh, he's all right. He goes to see some girl or other. Shouldn't wonder if he'd announce his engagement soon." "He hasn't said a word about any young lady." "No; but he's keeping company with one all the same. His right wrist is covered with pin scratches."

Digitized by Google

THE GIRL AT NUMBER NINE.

A Pathetic Narrative of a Lovers' Quarrel.

SHE was neither picturesque nor romantic; and in the suburban parish where she lived there were probably a hundred girls prettier than she. But a bright, unselfish nature will make even a plain face attractive; and there were times when you would have said that little Nellie Graham was more than comely.

Each week-day morning, punctually at a quarter to eight, you might see her setting off for a two-mile walk to the Board School in Hirst Street, where, as head teacher, she received a salary which enabled her to provide for the wants of the household.

Of a sunny disposition she always endeavoured to look on the bright side of things. But the dark side would persist in showing itself, especially when, as it often happened, her father—a confirmed beer-drinker—with foul oaths would demand money from her; while her mother—a confirmed invalid—would signal to her from the horse-hair couch to obey him.

At length, however, the time came when even her darkest days had a gleam of sunshine. Love, entering her life, had glorified it.

Her sweetheart's name was Marston. He was a draughtsman at Cranston's big works; and, with a salary of £140 per annum, had dreams of future greatness.

To most people he was an ordinary young man, with a fair amount of good looks; but to Nellie he was a hero, and well-nigh as handsome as Apollo Belvedere.

* * * * *

"First love is a pretty romance,
But not half so sweet as 'tis reckoned;
And when one awakes from the trance,
There's a vast deal of love in the second."

Such was Tom Marston's belief. He was three-and-twenty, when a certain bright-eyed, golden-haired damsel jilted him. Possibly she had a good reason for so doing. At all events, Tom considered himself ill-used, and for a time was an avowed cynic. And then he met Nellie Graham.

Twelve months had now elapsed since the day of their engagement; and so far he saw no reason to doubt his sweetheart's fidelity.

His was not a big nature; he was not of the stuff of which heroes are made; but probably the strongest affection of which he was capable was given to Nellie Graham.

But the course of true love, hitherto running smoothly, received a sudden check. In this wise. Having been informed by his chief that his salary would shortly be substantially increased, Tom on leaving the office went straight to town and there invested eighteen-and-sixpence in a present for his sweetheart, to be given to her upon her birthday. And that same evening, well pleased with himself and the world, he set off for 9, Ventnor Road. Nellie was not at home, and the news momentarily damped his spirits. Would she be long away? Mrs. Graham could not say; and so Tom sat down, and chatting with the old lady, waited eagerly for the sound of his sweetheart's footstep in the hallway. But he waited in vain, and at length he took his departure.

By this time his high spirits had completely evaporated. "I wonder where she has gone?" he said to himself. "She might have told her mother. Bother it! she has spoilt the whole evening."

The twilight was deepening; but Tom's eyes were keen, and presently he saw Nellie's trim little figure on the opposite pavement. She was walking quickly, her gaze straight in front of her, and not until she heard his voice was she aware of her sweetheart's presence.

His greeting was anything but lover-like—nine women out of ten would assuredly have resented it. "Where have you been?" he said, a note of irritation in his voice.

"I—I have been," she began falteringly, and then stopped, her head averted, her eyes upon the ground.

Instantly the demon of jealousy awoke within him. "You've been walking with someone," he exclaimed hoarsely. "Who was it? Some man, I suppose!"

With that she raised her head, and looking straight into his eyes: "Yes," she said firmly, almost, it seemed to him defiantly, "it was a man, and I have been walking with him for an hour or more."

For a moment he was dumfounded. Then, "Oh, indeed!" he said, striving to control his voice. "I—we'll talk about it later on—perhaps. Good evening!" And off he swung, chin in air, twirling his cane between his fingers.

* * * * *

That evening, and the day following, Tom sulked like a spoilt child. Nellie must be taught a lesson! His wounded self-esteem demanded as much. But it was far from his thoughts to allow this parting to be final. For hers was the stronger nature (in his heart of hearts he knew it); she was his wise little counsellor, and without her he would assuredly drift on life's voyage, like a barque that has lost its steering gear.

He did not doubt he had a rival. Probably the fellow was good-looking and glib-tongued; and so Nellie, woman-like, was flattered by his attentions. But her heart—ah, that belonged entirely to him, Tom Marston! And he did not intend to lose it! But Nellie, he repeated, must be taught a lesson. She would be expecting him to call to-day or to-morrow or the day following; and then she would write, begging him to come and see her.

But as the days went by (the longest four he had ever known) without bringing the looked-for letter, Tom became decidedly unhappy. To stay in his room was unbearable; to seek his friends in his present frame of mind was not to be thought of; and so, eager for distraction, he walked into the city, and turning into a music-hall, booked a seat in the stalls.

The curtain rose; and as "turn" succeeded "turn," it is probable that in all that vast audience the one implacably severe critic was Tom Marston. Nothing pleased him. The comic songs lacked humour, the sentimental possessed a distinct tendency to pathos, the acrobatic feats were devoid of originality; even Stella May, the "star" of the evening, radiant, outshining all her predecessors, failed to awaken his interest

Digitized by Google

On the following day, his pride was perilously near capitulation. Yes, he would see Nellie—perhaps this very evening—and if her explanation of her conduct should prove satisfactory, all might yet be well!

He had changed his collar, and was adjusting a neat brand-new necktie, when he heard the whirring of the electric bell. The postman! His heart beat faster at the thought; and, full of eager expectancy, he hurried to the front door.

"Chronicle, sir?"

With a sense of keen disappointment Tom took the local weekly newspaper from the newsboy, and re-entering his sitting-room, sat down, and mechanically opened the sheet.

For a moment or two he glanced indifferently across the columns, and then, suddenly, his eye caught the following paragraph.

"Heroism of a Handsworth Lady."

"Yesterday evening a horse, standing between the shafts of a trap in Claremont Avenue, took fright at a passing steam-roller, and suddenly bolted. A little boy who happened to be playing in the road at the time was in imminent danger of being run over, when a young lady (Miss Ellen Graham of Ventnor Road) seeing his peril, ran into the roadway and rescued him. Miss Graham, we regret to state, was knocked over, the wheel passing over her body, and now lies at her home in a precarious condition."

In a flash a numbness fell upon his brain. This, however, lasted but a moment, and was followed by a curious sense of unreality; and for a space he sat staring at the paragraph, his face the colour of cigar ash. "Miss Ellen Graham." It was a mistake! It could not be his Nellie, his little girl! She, who was so healthy and strong when he last saw her, to be suddenly struck down! To be lying on a bed of pain! The troubled current of his thoughts came to an abrupt standstill. Snatching his cap from the table he rushed from the house; and never before did he cover a mile so quickly as the one which lay between his lodgings and Ventnor Road.

The door was opened by a tall, good-looking man of thirty or thereabouts, whose deeply-tanned complexion seemed indicative of a recent residence in a tropical climate.

Straightway Tom panted out the question nearest his heart. The reply to which ("Better, much better") acted upon him like news of a reprieve upon a man awaiting execution.

"You are Tom Marston, I suppose? . . . I thought so. I am Ned Graham—Nell's brother. Will you come inside?"

* * * * *

Ten minutes later Tom was standing by the bedside. They were alone.

"I knew you would come," she whispered, her eyes lighting up with a smile of gladness.

A hard lump suddenly sprang into Tom's throat. It came to him that the shadow of death was on her face, and with a broken cry he sank down by the bedside. "Nell! Nell!" he cried, "can you ever forgive me? My God! what a heartless brute——"

"Hush, dear," she said soothingly; and, stretching out her hand she laid it caressingly upon his head. "It was my fault—mine. I could have explained; but I didn't. I let you go, and I made you unhappy. My brother Ned," she continued, her voice growing stronger, "wrote me a letter begging me to meet him——"

"'Twas he you were with that evening. Oh, what a fool, what a blind fool——"

"Hush, Tom! you mustn't talk like that. Besides" (with a faint smile and a look of mock severity) "it's very rude to interrupt. Ned, you see, had a dreadful quarrel with father some years ago, and ran away to Africa. But now it's all right again between them. And father has taken the pledge; and Tom says he is going to take care of mother. It seems almost too good to be true." She paused; then suddenly, "Sir," she said, "do you know that you haven't kissed me yet?"

"I was waiting to be forgiven," he said humbly, almost reverently, as he bent over the pillow.

"There was nothing to forgive, dear," she said softly. "Besides, sweethearts often have tiffs, you know; and we've only had one! And we have been engaged twelve months—twelve months this very day, Tom. Did you remember?"

"I—I had forgotten," he stammered.

"We've been very happy," she went on, dreamily, as if speaking to herself. "We couldn't, of course, expect to have all the sunshine; and 'twas only a very little cloud that came between us."

"Nell, dear," he said, "with God's help I'll try to control my wretched temper. And nothing shall ever come between us again."

"Except one thing, Tom. I know you love me, dear; and if I don't get well, if I should die, I want you to be brave——"

"Nell, Nell!" he cried, with a horrible sinking at his heart, "you mustn't talk about dying. What should I do without you?" He paused. A middle-aged woman in the garb of a nurse had entered the room, and in obedience to her signal he turned to Nellie. "And now, dear," he said, with forced cheerfulness, "I must be going. I'm afraid I have wearied you."

She shook her head smilingly.

"I will come again in the morning," he went on. "We won't talk very much, but I'll just sit here beside you, and hold your hand, like this. D'ye see?" And bending over the pillow, he kissed her very tenderly.

"Good-bye, dearest," she said, her pale face illumined by a smile of absolute content.

"Not good-bye, sweetheart, but good-night." He strove to speak cheerily, but the effort was a failure. And then he went out into the darkness.

Next day his seat in the Drawing Office was vacant. For Number 9, Ventnor Road, was a house of mourning. And a mile beyond the suburb, Tom, like a stricken animal, crept beneath the friendly shades of a spinney; and there, casting himself upon the ground, wrestled with his grief, the greatest his life had ever known.

W. T. Crosbie.

PEARSON'S GOSSIPY GUIDES.

With New Maps and the latest information for all travellers, arranged Alphabetically and with beautiful illustrations from Photographs specially taken for this series.

Foolscap 8vo, price One Shilling, and in a few cases Sixpence each.

Each volume contains a coupon for

£500 FREE INSURANCE.

"Thorough, interesting, complete yet compact, and ridiculously cheap."—Bookman.

THE THAMES.
THE LAKES.
WEYMOUTH.
WESTERN HIGHLANDS.
EDINBURGH.
PARIS.
LONDON.
SOUTH DEVON.

YARMOUTH AND LOWESTOFT, &c.
BOURNEMOUTH.
SWANAGE, 6d.
NORTH CORNWALL.
ILFRACOMBE.
GLASGOW AND CLYDE.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Guide" to ..... for which I inclose the sum of One Shilling and Threepence.

Name.....

Address .....

Digitized by Google

OUR THRILLING NEW SERIAL.

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

By HENRY FARMER.

The Thread of the Story.

A BELT full of diamonds has been stolen from a safe belonging to Mr. Mansfield, a wealthy banker, by Seaton Revelle (who is a friend of the banker's) and an accomplice named Benjamin Beard. Revelle accuses Alec Scarsdale, who is in love with Esther, Mr. Mansfield's daughter, of the crime, and he is sentenced to sixteen years' penal servitude.

Mr. Crump, late Chief-Inspector at Scotland Yard, feeling sure Scarsdale is innocent and Revelle is guilty, determines to prove the latter's guilt.

Mr. Mansfield as fully believes in Scarsdale's guilt as does Esther in his innocence, and his friendship for Revelle increases. Revelle constantly visits the banker's house in an endeavour to win Esther's love, but so far has not prospered at all. While talking with the girl one day, Mr. Mansfield's new maid, Vance, enters the room with a tray bearing cups of coffee. No sooner does she catch sight of Revelle than she drops the tray, and, pointing to Revelle, screams: "That—that man is my husband!" But Revelle, by sheer force of will, compels her to acknowledge her mistake.

At about this time Esther and Mr. Crump are walking together when they observe Vance about to throw herself into the reservoir. Crump stops her just in time—he and Esther taking her back to The Woodlands. Later on she is placed in the county asylum.

In the meanwhile Scarsdale manages to pass through several letters to Esther to which he receives replies full of hope and affection. On account of an assault upon a brutal warder, however, he is to be removed to Wrackam Convict Prison, an establishment famous for its hard discipline.

A charity concert is now announced, in which both Esther and Benny are billed to take part. Revelle, of course, is present; so also is Mr. Crump. It is while returning from this concert that Revelle proposes to Esther but is refused.

The great balloon incident now approaches. There is to be a grand fête in Lord Normanhurst's grounds, the chief and closing event being a balloon ascent by Mr. Seaton Revelle. Everything goes well till two horsemen arrive with the news that Vance has escaped from the asylum.

Acting upon Crump's advice they go straight to the reservoir, but fail to find the missing girl. The search is given up at nightfall. Shortly before nightfall Revelle makes his ascent. A storm, however, compels him to come down, the anchor touching ground on a neighbouring common just where Vance is waiting for him. The girl clings on to the anchor, and Revelle, quickly making a terrible resolve, throws out a number of sandbags, and the balloon again rises and continues its flight till Warham reservoir is reached. Just as the balloon is passing over the water Revelle cuts the anchor rope.

Vance's dead body is found next morning, Mr. Crump being informed of the discovery while walking with Esther.

Mr. Crump examines the body and finds that a leg is broken, evidently by a fall. The coroner's jury return a verdict of "Found drowned." Mr. Crump next takes a walk on the common, and discovers some sand-bags.

Mr. Mansfield thinks it best that Esther shall leave Warham for a little holiday. It is while changing at Roxeter Junction en route for Gurlston Bay that Fate brings about a meeting between Esther and Alec, who is on his way to Wrackam. An impassioned scene takes place on the platform. Before many days are passed Seaton Revelle also journeys to Gurlston Bay, and it is while there that they hear of the plucky rescue from drowning of a warder at Wrackam Prison by Alec Scarsdale, and, subsequently of his rumoured escape from prison.

The rumour proves to be true. Alec had indeed managed to escape from the prison, and taking a boat had pulled down the river, after purloining some sailors' clothes from an empty barge. Just when he is thoroughly exhausted, however, he is run down by a sailing barge. His boat is smashed, but Alec is rescued and taken on board. The barge proves to be the Mary Ann, bound for Gurlston Bay. Arrived at its destination, it is hardly moored to the pier before Esther, who is taking a walk, arrives at the pier to watch the unloading.

ON BOARD THE BARGE.

TORTURING doubts and fears were scurrying fast through Esther's brain as, her chin resting on her hands, she stared at the name white-lettered on the stern of the barge. Catching sight of the pensive, graceful figure, Revelle was conscious of a thrill, and a quickening of the heart-beat. He felt annoyed with himself. He must watch himself, see that his heart—if indeed he possessed such a thing—did not obtain the mastery over his brain.

"Miss Mansfield!"

Esther started at the sound of the soft voice beside her, soft in tone, but jarring harshly on her thoughts. Crushing back a shiver, she glanced up. Revelle's hand was outstretched, his cap raised. His dark eyes were filled with a look of sympathy and respectful admiration; but, only a second before, they had glinted most unpleasantly. A newspaper lay at Esther's feet. He had been able to read the big-typed headlines staring up at him. She knew of Scarsdale's escape! At every twist and turn that fellow seemed to rise up and stand in his way! He seemed to be everlastingly figuring in the papers now. If only that warder's aim had been more true!

With an effort Esther took the outstretched hand; but she could not trust herself to look him in the face. Her eyes shifted away to the barge moored up alongside the jetty, and fastened on the name, Mary Ann.

"I'm awfully glad to have found you," said Revelle, placing a hand on the back of the seat, and bending over her. "Awfully glad to think that you're well enough to get out again. I was—er—dreadfully distressed to hear that you had been ill. I had no idea till I got down here. I'm afraid that ghastly affair at Warham—that poor creature's sad end—must have upset you frightfully."

Never so much as a falter in his voice, nor a twitch of a muscle.

"Single again!"

Never so much as a flicker of remorse, nor even of fear;

Digitized by Google

OUR THRILLING SERIAL. You can begin to-day.

only the exultant feeling of relief at being quit for ever of a burden. Fear! Why any fear? What chance was there, humanly speaking, that the truth could ever out?

"Please don't talk about that," whispered Esther.

As delicately as possible, avoiding all detail, Crump, in one of his letters, had told Esther of the verdict of the coroner's jury on Alice Vance, and of her interment. The little man had followed her to the grave, and after dusk, not wishing to call attention to himself, had placed a wreath upon the newly turned earth. In his letter he had not breathed a word of his suspicions, nor of his discoveries. In Esther's mind there was no suspicion of foul play—so far as the poor creature's end was concerned; but she had not forgotten that strange scene in the drawing-room of her home, when Vance, pointing at the man who was now bending over her, had cried—"That man is my husband!" The words had been subsequently denied; but the mystery of it all had haunted Esther. Was it possible that the words had been true, and the denial an untruth? Was it possible that this man who was still bending over—so horribly close—was morally guilty of the poor creature's loss of reason and sad end?

"I'm awfully sorry," murmured Revelle apologetically. "It was brutal—thoughtless of me."

The hatches covering the Mary Ann's capacious hold, had been whipped off, and the process of unloading started upon.

"They're picturesque things, these barges, with their tanned sails, aren't they?" added Revelle, abruptly changing the subject.

"Yes," answered Esther mechanically.

Where was he, the man she loved? A picture of him in an open boat, wounded, and dressed as she had seen him that day at Roxeter Junction, rose up, blotting out the immediate scene before her, for the moment making her forget the man at her side.

Revelle realised that her thoughts were wandering. He bit his lips. His rival had come between them as effectually as if he had been present. He was far too much of a diplomatist to make any reference to the convict's escape; but where was the fellow? Confusion overtake him!

The vision of the wounded felon in an open boat melted away, and reality, in the shape of the barge, shaped itself again before Esther's eyes. She could distinguish the features of the men on the deck as they toiled to the creaking music of crane and pulley-block. One man, sun-bronzed and bearded like the pard, who occasionally shouted out a command in a stentorian voice, was evidently the skipper. His red cap of stockinette gave a piratical touch to his appearance.

The light of the slanting afternoon sun swept the deck.

"If," said Revelle, "I were an artist, there would be the subject for a picture ready to hand—splendid effect of light and shade—chiaroscuro, don't you know, and that fellow in the pirate cap a magnificent study of character. I do so envy a fellow who can paint! I should so awfully like—er—to have a picture of you, not that it could do you justice, but, well, I should like to have it!"

Esther did not seem to hear. The piratical-looking skipper had ceased to bellow out commands, and was moving towards the cabin in the stern.

"How are you feeling, mate?" he shouted down the hatchway.

"Better," came back the answer, in a muffled, rather indistinct voice. What followed was so indistinct that it did not reach Esther and the man beside her.

But for a moment Esther had held her breath. A flush of colour had brightened her pale face. Only one word had reached her; but something in the tone of that muffled voice had recalled—the flush faded from her cheeks; she was breathing again. It was impossible. It was the work of her cruel imagination. The wish had been father to the thought.

The skipper went forward again.

"How long do you think of staying here, Miss Mansfield?" asked Revelle.

"We have not quite made up our minds. Mr. Walters has been kind enough to ask us to stay as long as possible."

Revelle sat down on the seat beside her, and leant forward a little, his face turned towards her and away from the barge.

A man was passing up slowly from the cabin. His head and shoulders appeared above the hatchway; then he stopped, and, shading his eyes from the light, glanced round.

The sunlight caught his face, unshaved, haggard, the hair about his temples streaked with grey.

Alec Scarsdale's face!

Esther had seen. The blood seemed to fade away from her very lips. Her dark eyes dilated, their expression indescribable! Scarcely conscious of what she was doing, she half-rose to her feet. A wild longing was upon her to call him by his name, to stretch out her arms to him.

Oh, God! But he was looking towards her now! But he had come up from the darkness of the cabin into the light. He only saw two blurred figures on the pier.

Revelle had seen the sudden change sweep across Esther's face. Swift as thought, he turned his head!

As he did so, the man also turned, and, leaning forward on the hatchway, watched those who were busily engaged in unloading. His back was presented to Revelle.

Revelle's movement had recalled Esther, awakened her to the danger! With a low cry, she sank back into the seat, her eyes half-closed, her face turned away from the barge. It was a desperate, magnificent piece of acting—for the sake of the man she loved. And she had succeeded—distracted Revelle's attention from the barge—and the man!

"Miss Mansfield!" he cried in a low voice. "You're ill! Let me——"

"I—I am all right again now!" she whispered strainedly. "It was only momentary. A sudden wave of faintness. Perhaps my father was right. I oughtn't to have gone so far to-day!"

She must keep his attention away from that barge, the man upon it! The thought that she was fighting for her lover's freedom gave her strength, and stimulated her faculties. A faint smile played round her lips—a smile that deceived the man beside her.

"I'm really quite ashamed of myself," she went on. "But perhaps I ought to be going back. Would you mind if I took your arm?"

Crump would have been prouder than ever of her, could he have seen her, heard her now! She rose up, and took Revelle's proffered arm. She dared not glance at the barge lest he should follow the direction of her eyes. With the faintest pressure of her hands, she led him between two of the glass shelters to the far side of the pier. The deck of the barge was no longer visible to them. Her touch thrilled Revelle. She pointed away across the bay to the white cliffs and the undulating downs beyond.

"That," she said, "would make another subject for a picture, wouldn't it?"

"Yes. You're awfully plucky, Miss Mansfield!"

She gave a little laugh.

"Not really. Perhaps I looked a great deal worse than I felt. It was just momentary, though I don't mind confessing that I'm very grateful to you for your arm!"

She was playing the man's own game, acting, and was beating him at it!

"But you're trembling!" he whispered a little unsteadily.

"Well, of course, I'm still a little weak. To-day's the first time that I've been out of the house you know!"

Every step was taking them farther away from the barge, and with every step Esther felt the stifling grip at her heart relax a little. As they passed off the pier, she withdrew her hand from Revelle's arm. She crushed under an almost irresistible desire to glance back. When, Revelle still escorting her, she reached the house, though she longed for the privacy of her own room, she sat down on the lawn, and talked to Revelle with a feverish vivacity of manner. She dreaded lest he should leave her, return perhaps to the pier. The strain upon her was frightful. To appear collected, to talk rationally, to conjure up an occasional smile to her lips—God alone knew how hard it was!

Digitized by Google

When Mr. Walters, accompanied by her father and the other men, returned, Revelle was still seated beside her on the lawn. John Mansfield noted the fact with inward approval.

"Revelle," said Mr. Walters, "you must dine with us to-night!"

"It's awfully good of you. Miss Mansfield, if you'll excuse me running away—I—er—must get away back and dress!"

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Walters. "We're not so punctilious here as all that. Mrs. Walters, I know, will excuse you. Miss Mansfield, would you be horribly shocked if Mr. Revelle dines with us in his present attire?"

"Of course not," answered Esther, with a little laugh.

She dreaded the idea of this man—this man whom she loathed beyond expression—being out of her sight for a moment.

"Well, 'pon my word, I hardly like to. Ah, here's Mrs. Walters!"

Revelle made his way to the lady in question. He was a little puzzled in his mind. Had John Mansfield unconsciously exaggerated when he described the meeting between Esther and Scarsdale at Roxeter Junction? When he had spoken to her first on the pier, she had been abstracted and sad in her manner; then the sudden faintness; now she seemed almost feverishly vivacious—hardly the same person! He felt quite certain, remembering the tell-tale paper beside her, that she knew of Scarsdale's escape. He was at a loss to explain these changing moods. For all his cleverness, he had not nearly plumbed the depths of Esther's character. He realised her charm, her simplicity, her womanliness in a measure; but not her strength!

Mrs. Walters insisted that he should dine with them as he stood. Then the ladies disappeared to dress. The gentlemen lingered still on the lawn. One of them took an evening paper from his pocket, and led Revelle on one side.

"I say, it looks as if it were all up with that fellow Scarsdale. The boat that was missing off St. Helen's Island was found ashore at low tide in the Thames, one side of her completely stove in. Of course, the idea is that he was run into in the dark!"

Revelle took the paper, read through the account. His eyes brightened a little, his lips smiled under his moustache.

"Not a word about this at dinner," he said in a low voice. "I think, between ourselves, that Miss Mansfield has quite got over her infatuation for the fellow, but any mention of this would be awfully painful!"

"Quite so. But if it's true, I, for one, am deuced sorry for the chap. After that plucky act of his he deserved to get clear; but, at the same time, that stove-in boat isn't absolutely conclusive evidence."

Revelle shrugged his shoulders and turned away.

"Heaven knows, I don't wish the fellow any harm, but—well, I knew him!"

Then he joined his host. He had implied that the world would be well quit of Alexander Scarsdale.

In her bedroom Esther was upon her knees. It was a brief interval between the acts. In a few minutes she would be the actress again, playing her heart-breaking part. Her heart told her that her eyes had not played her false. He was free, near her: but for how long?

Oh, to be with him, if only for a few moments! To feel his loving arms about her, to be able to whisper to him again of her undying love.

"Alec!" she choked out, "My beloved Alec! If you would only come to me—no, no! Not that! Your freedom is most precious now. Pray God, you keep it!"

The dinner-gong started to boom out. Esther sprang to her feet, pencilled a few hurried sentences on a piece of paper, addressed the envelope to "Mr. Penworthy."

(Continued on next page.)

A Useful Wireless Message.

Now that the Marconi system of wireless telegraphy has been brought so prominently before the public, the minds of many readers have been turned on this subject. No doubt many messages fraught with the utmost importance will be conveyed over enormous areas of space by this principle. It would be difficult to imagine a message more important, and which resulted in more gratifying consequences, than the one which reached Miss Bessie Denbury, who lives with her parents at Washford, Somerset. In consequence of this message she underwent a course of Bile Beans, and was restored to perfect health. Speaking to a Somerset County Express reporter Miss Denbury said: "For over three years I was dreadfully disfigured with pimples and skin blotches all over the face and body. My face was completely disfigured. The flesh was lumpy and discoloured. The pimples enlarged, and burst like gatherings, causing such fearful pain that I have fainted away. Often I have been unable to hold myself up, so weak and sickly did I become. I had only a poor appetite, and an utterly wretched feeling overwhelmed me. I tried various measures which were equally unavailing; and the case had apparently grown hopeless, when I tried Bile Beans. It was not very long before I noticed a remarkable improvement in my appearance. I also began to eat and sleep well, and take exercise, and I am now perfectly cured. Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness are a certain cure for pimples, skin eruptions, and all blood impurities, congestion of liver, headache, dizziness, "summer fag," biliousness, indigestion, anæmia, wasting affections, and female irregularities. Obtainable from all chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 and 120 London Wall, London, E.C., for one and three halfpence, or two and nine.

"ALKAN" CURES IN ONE MINUTE

by inhalation, HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, FACIAL NEURALGIA, NEURALGIA OF THE EAR.

PRICES 2/9 AND 4/6 PER BOTTLE.

Of all Chemists and Stores, or of the Proprietors,

The "ALKAN" Ltd., General Depot, 150 STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

GIVEN AWAY

with next week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 448.)

PAPER PATTERN of this

RUFFLE

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

Our Thrilling Serial. You can begin ... to-day.

"Mrs. Walters," she said as she entered the drawing-room, "I'm so sorry to be late."

There was no trace of the past storm of emotion on her pale, sweet face. Revelle moved across to her, and held out his arm.

"I am to have the pleasure!" he said, in his smoothest tone.

It was after dinner, after the gentlemen had joined the ladies in the drawing-room, that Mr. Walters approached Esther and asked her if she would sing. She made her way quietly to the piano, and glanced through the music upon it. Her father stepped up to her.

"Nothing sad, Esther," he said.

"No, father."

"Oh, but," ejaculated a sentimental young lady who had been wasting a number of rather languishing glances upon Revelle, "do sing something sad, please, Miss Mansfield. You know the—er—sweetest songs oft tell of saddest thoughts, or something to that effect. Don't you think so, Mr. Revelle?"

"'Pon my word, I—er—don't know that I can quite agree with you, Miss Bullivant."

He moved across to the piano and glanced at the song in Esther's hand. "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes!" was printed across the title-page.

"I wish you would," he said in a low voice, "er—sing that one."

Esther sat down at the piano, Revelle stood beside her, in readiness to turn over.

Again John Mansfield's eyes spoke silent approval. He, too, was at a loss to account for the sudden change in Esther, but the fact that it was for the better was sufficient.

Esther was playing through the opening bars. Mr. Walters tapped the banker on the shoulder.

"I say, Mansfield," he said in a whisper, "what a good-looking pair they make! Are they——?"

"Well, it hasn't quite come to that yet, but——"

Walters nodded his head, implying that he understood the situation.

"Rather hot in here, isn't it?" he added. He moved quickly across to one of the windows and flung it open.

"'Drink to me only with thine eyes——'"

The words floated out across the lawn, melodiously breaking the stillness of the night, and reaching the ears of a man who was staggering up the white road beyond the grounds.

He stopped dead.

"My God!" he panted out hoarsely. "Her song—her voice!"

The moonlight fell upon a haggard, old-young face, unshaved, emaciated, the hair about the temples grey.

Alec Scarsdale!

He stood for a moment swaying like a drunkard, glaring round him with staring, hungry eyes.

"'Or leave a kiss within the cup——'"

Her song, her voice! It had galvanised into life a hundred memories that scampered pell-mell through his reeling brain.

A hoarse, low cry burst from his lips; then he staggered across the road to the gate that gave access to the grounds.

A few moments later, he was creeping through shrubs to where light was shining from an open window, the transparent curtains waving softly in the night breeze.

Crouching, creeping, he reached the window.

He peered round. He could see Esther at the piano. Her back was turned to the window.

Then a convulsive spasm swept him from head to foot. He had recognised the man standing beside, and bending over her, from where he was, seeming so close.

Seaton Revelle!

Was what assistant-warder Belton had taunted him with in the prison cell, true?

For a moment he doubted; his belief in the woman he loved failed him. His white lips crinkled up like a dog's. There was nothing to live for now, but revenge!

But, thank God, it was only momentary. Only for a moment had he wronged the woman who had suffered and was suffering such agony for his sake. But the picture that he had pictured in his cell was before his eyes. His fingers were opening and shutting. He hungered to twine them round the vile hound's throat. He took a forward step—then a chorused murmur stayed him.

The song was at an end.

"Oh, thank you so much!"—"Charming!"—"Ben Jonson wrote the words, did he not?"—"Yes, Ben, not Samuel, don't you know. He was the fellow who wrote the dictionary; took snuff, drank an awful lot of tea, and used to say rude, smart things. A fellow called Boswell, don't you know, a bit of a prig, has written all about him!"

Every word of the small talk reached the listener outside. He had himself under control again. It was well!

Before Esther could rise, Mr. Walters had approached her, and laid his hand on her shoulder.

"Esther," he said genuinely, "that was a great treat. Now, I'm not going to worry you. If you feel too tired, you must say so; but if you would just give us one more we should all be so delighted."

Esther half turned round on the seat.

"Is there any particular song that you would like, Mr. Walters? I might perhaps know it."

Then suddenly her eyes dilated, her lips parted. She seemed turned to stone!

"Ah, but you are tired! You're feeling faint!"

She drew her hand sharply across her eyes, then gave a little laugh.

"No, no! Will—will you suggest some song? I—I might know it."

She turned round again to the piano. Her fingers wandered listlessly over the keys. A few chords, then, from the chords, the refrain of a song took shape.

"True—true till death!"

"That's 'True till death" you're playing, isn't it, Miss Mansfield?" questioned Miss Bullivant.

The notes had reached the haggard-faced man who crouched outside. For a moment, that moment when Esther had seemed turned to stone, their eyes had met!

And now, God be thanked, he knew that it was a lie!

Mr. Walters was busily turning over the pile of music, searching for a song.

John Mansfield moved up to the piano.

Esther looked up at him.

"Father," she said unaffectedly, "what does this remind you of?"

She played a few bars, then sang softly, just a little tremor in her beautiful voice, but not so softly that the words did not reach him for whom they were meant.

"Her father he has locked the door,
Her mother holds the key,
But neither bolts nor bars shall keep
My own true love from me!"

John Mansfield patted her on the shoulder.

"Why, Esther," he said smiling, "that was the song you used to sing as a tiny mite in the nursery!"

AN INTERRUPTED MEETING.

At the end of the song, Miss Bullivant, who had come to the conclusion that Mr. Revelle was the most interesting man present, had—to use a colloquialism—made a dead set at him, and had manœuvred him away from the piano and Esther. The attention that he had been paying the latter throughout the evening had perturbed her considerably.

"It's so hot in here, Mr. Revelle!" she said, fanning herself

(Continued on page 191.)

Digitized by Google

MYSTERIES OF THE EAR.

In a late number of the "Journal for the Deaf," there is a series of popular articles describing the anatomy and physiology of the ear, and the various ways of becoming deaf. This publication which is devoted entirely to the interests of those who are afflicted by deafness, or by any diseases of the ear, nose, or throat, can be obtained free by post by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, Regent's Park Road, Primrose Hill, London, N.W. The "Journal" also describes a Method of Treating deafness by external application that has been repeatedly successful in curing ear diseases, and in restoring hearing in cases pronounced incurable by the usual aural treatment. Those who are interested in knowing how to apply this method will find that each "Journal" is accompanied by a Patient's Report Form, which enables anyone to receive full particulars as to the use of the treatment at home. Any advice by correspondence is absolutely free.

Good! it's Mason's

MASON'S EXTRACT of HERBS

THE BEST BEVERAGE TO TAKE WITH YOUR MEALS, AND AT ALL TIMES.
THE MOST SUITABLE FOR CHILDREN DURING WARM WEATHER.

A Physician states: "It assuages thirst, it is refreshing, and grateful to weak stomachs."

A 6d. Bottle of Extract makes 8 gallons. Bottle, post free, 9 stamps.

Manufacturers:
NEWBALL & MASON, NOTTINGHAM.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

FOR LADIES

SYMONDS' CYCLES

They are GOOD machines, warranted 1 to 3 years, according to grade. Over 20,000 in use. Thousands of voluntary testimonials. The cheapest genuinely guaranteed cycles in the world. Prices £4 to £8, ladies', gent's, juveniles'. Cash or easy payments. Sent anywhere. Full particulars free on application.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128 City Road, London, E.C.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

SAFE SPEEDY

KAPUTINE cures NEURALGIA equally as well as HEADACHE. NEVER FAILS.
KAPUTINE is USED as well as recommended by MEDICAL MEN!

NOTHING LIKE IT OR AS GOOD

PACKETS OF 18 1/- FOR KAPUTINE THE SAFE REMEDY FOR HEADACHE CURES IN 10 MINUTES.

Packets of 18 doses 1/-. Samples 1d. of all Chemists and Stores, or post free from KAPUTINE Ltd., HUDDERSFIELD, for 12 stamps. Refuse dangerous substitutes. DEMAND KAPUTINE the SAFE Remedy.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

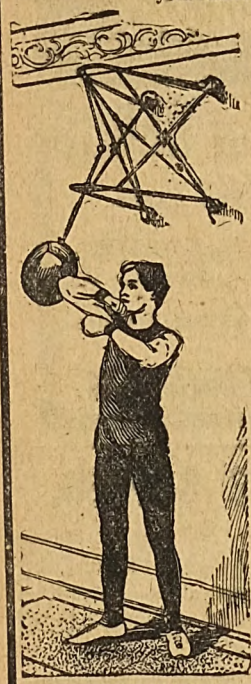
THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Digitized by Google

INTELLIGENT MEN AND WOMEN

have discovered the wonderful reward secured by a few minutes' daily practice of physical exercise. Our finest men and most beautiful women never neglect this exercise for health. Why should you, when you can improve your health, strength and beauty from 50 to 100 per cent? We supply "everything for health and strength," and publish a monthly magazine you should read. Its title is "Health & Strength," and it contains reading and illustrations which cannot fail to help you in the important matter of your health and strength. Sample copy free for 3d. stamps, or price 2d. at all bookstalls and booksellers.



NEW PUNCHING BALL.

Can be easily and quickly fixed up anywhere. Provides simply magnificent exercise. Instructions free.

Price £2 10s. complete.

EXERCISERS OF ALL KINDS.

Sandow's Developer. .	12/6
Whitely Exerciser .
" " Ladies'	4/6
" " Men's .	5/6
" " Athletes'	6/6
Ryan Combination . .	10/6
Travellers' Exerciser .	3/6
1 Strand Chest Expander	1/6
3 " " "	3/6
5 " " "	6/6
5 " Athletes'	7/6

BALL MASSAGE CHAIN

With Instructions.

Non-stretching . .	3/6
Stretching . .	8/6
" (strong)	10/6
" (ex. strong)	12/6

GRIP MACHINES.

For developing strength in hand, wrist, and forearm, with chart of exercises:

	Pair.
Rubberoid pattern .	2/6
Cork " .	4/6
Spencer " .	4/6
Sandow Grip Dumb-bells	7/6, 10/6, 12/6
Hendrickson pattern	4/6

HEALTH & STRENGTH BOOKS.

Sandow's . . .	2/6
Apollo's . . .	2/6
Milo's . . .	2/6
Miles' . . .	7/6

40/- FOR 17/6

If you send your Order now.

2 Big Volumes. Weight 6½lbs.

1539 Pages. Hundreds of Pictures (Coloured, &c,). Numerous Superimposed (layer upon layer) Charts, showing various organs.

The Best Physiological and Health Guide ever produced.

No one will be able to buy this magnificent work after this small lot disposed of. Books cost more than above price to produce. Tells how to prevent and cure every known disease and ailment.

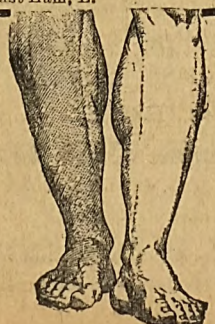
HEALTH & STRENGTH MAGAZINE, 29 Stonecutter Street, Ludgate Circus, London, E.C.
Call if you can. No obligation to buy.

HEALTH & STRENGTH MAGAZINE is sold at all bookstalls and booksellers.

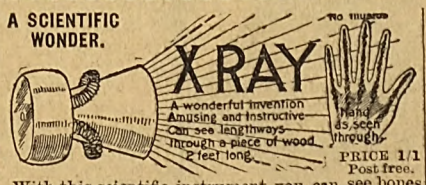
A PAIR OF GOOD LEGS

FOR EVERY ATHLETE.

The Trainer of several well-known Cycling Champions tells in the form of a small illustrated book how everyone may become possessed of a pair of well-developed legs with big calves. The advice if followed will transform the worst pair of "spindle shanks" into symmetrical and strong legs. No medicines, food, or anything costing money required. Send P.O. and stamps for 1/1 and book will be sent under cover and post free. Cycle Champion Trainer, 1 Abbot Road, East Ham, E.



A SCIENTIFIC WONDER.



PRICE 1/1 Post free.

With this scientific instrument you can see bones whilst moving as well as still.

WHO TO MARRY. WHEN

PLAIN TALK by the most celebrated American Medical Author and Specialist, Dr. Foote. A wonderful book. Nearly 1,200 pages. 200 anatomical illustrations. 26 true-to-life coloured illustrations. Over a million copies sold. Ours is the genuine unabridged American Edition with coloured plates, exceedingly valuable recipes, health advice, etc. Post free, 8/6.

SHOULD TO MARRY MARRY

THE "KAISER" MOUSTACHE TRAINER AND PATENT COMB.

Invented by German Imperial Barber. Used by the German Emperor. Cures a straggling, ragged, etc., moustache, and quickly forces it to assume any desired style of arrangement. Worn at night. Sent per return post and free from observation, post free, for 2/6, or (finer quality) 3/6 only. Money back if not satisfactory.

THE STUDENT'S MICROSCOPE.

8d. Post Free, with full instructions. This illustration shows one drop of water as magnified 200 times by above marvellously effective student's microscope. The animalculæ can be seen moving about, fighting and eating each other, etc. This microscope also shows the insects that live in cheese as large as fleas.

LONDON NOVELTY CO., 1 ABBOTT ROAD, EAST HAM, LONDON.

a little petulantly. "Please take me into the garden. We shall be able to hear the song there, just as well!"

Mr. Walters had selected a song. Esther had caught Miss Bullivant's words. Revelle was moving towards the window.

"Mr. Revelle," said Esther, a little quickly, he must not go out into the garden! "Would you mind very much turning over for me again!"

"With pleasure."

Miss Bullivant bit her lips, and mentally designated Esther Mansfield a designing minx. Revelle was conscious of a decided thrill of satisfaction at being recalled to her side. There was no trace of sadness in the song that Esther sang. A colour had mounted to her cheeks; her eyes were flashing brightly. Not a soul within the room dreamt of the frightful tension on nerve and heart; but outside the man, who was crouching among the shrubs, knew! "But neither bolts not bars shall keep my own true love from me!" The words were ringing in his ears. Borne on the wings of music, her two messages had reached him, and he had understood. He would wait there. She would come to him that night!

The song over, Esther retired into a corner of the room away from the window, Revelle accompanying her. Though Miss Bullivant employed every device known to her to lure him from her side, she failed utterly.

"I say, old chap," whispered one of the men to his neighbour, "Revelle is making the running pretty fast with Esther Mansfield. Nobody else can get a look in!"

"Yes. He's a lucky dog. She's positively charming; but I don't think it's all on one side. The way she outmanœuvred Miss Bullivant just now was quite masterly. As a matter of fact there's a rumour afloat that they're engaged, and it does look very much like it; but I suppose it won't be announced for a while." The speaker dropped his voice to a low whisper: "You see, it seems only the other day that she was engaged to that poor chap Scarsdale."

Mrs. Walters cast a sweeping, inquiring glance round at the ladies; then rose to her feet. Good-night was said. The ladies retired to their bedrooms; the gentlemen to the smoking-room.

Once in her room, the mask fell from Esther's face. She stood for a moment, the flush faded from her face, panting quickly, as though the terrible strain had physically exhausted her. Then she went to the window and peered through the blinds. The light was still shining out from the drawing-room below. Straining her eyes, she tried to penetrate the darkness; but, though she could distinguish nothing, she felt that he understood, was waiting for her.

"Alec," she whispered, "are you there? I'm coming to you, my love, soon now!"

She left the window, and, having donned a hooded cloak, extinguished the light. Having opened her door ever such a little, she sat down close beside to listen. It seemed an eternity of time before the sounds that she longed for reached her ears—voices and footsteps ascending the stairs. The men were retiring to bed at last.

She still sat listening—heard the sounds of the servants locking up. Then an absolute silence prevailed.

Her heart was beating fiercely, her limbs trembling as she crept out of her room into the darkness of the corridor and groped her way to the top of the stairs.

The front door was locked. The key had been removed.

She paused for a moment, for all her beating heart and trembling limbs, her mind was unnaturally clear. She must get out through the drawing-room. She shut her eyes tightly for a second as if to assist her memory, and conjured up a picture of the ground-floor as she knew it by daylight. Only a woman, nerved and guided by love, yet neither the Marquis nor Benny Beard could have moved more silently and unerringly than she did. Only a faint click of the latch told of her passing into the drawing-room. A mental picture of the room was before her. She remembered the exact position of the furniture. Without so much as brushing against anything, she reached the shutters. She raised up the iron bar, opened them. The moonlight was streaming on to the lawn.

She opened the window—it creaked a little.

A rustling came from the shrubs that fringed the lawn. They parted. The moonlight fell upon a hungry, haggard face, unshaved, emaciated!

A swift-moving shadow flitted across the lawn.

Two low, whispered cries, simultaneous, and blending so that they seemed but one!

The moonlight was upon two figures locked in each other's arms, on the threshold of the open window; then they vanished into the darkness of the room. And for a time the silence was so great, the room might have been empty!

* * * * *

"I say, Revelle, old chap. Wake up! But don't make a noise! Something's up! There's someone in the house."

Revelle sat up abruptly in his bed. Gerald Phipps was at his side.

"What?"

"Couldn't sleep—look sharp, out you get and put some clothes on—went to open my window wider—saw somebody dart across the lawn—there's a strong moon on. It fairly staggered me. When I shoved my head out, drawing-room window below was open. No sign of anybody."

Revelle was already out of bed.

"Look here," he said in a low, sharp voice, "no need to wake anybody. We can see this job through by ourselves, Phipps! This isn't my first experience of this sort of business!"

"Right!" whispered Phipps excitedly.

"Put out that light!" said Revelle. "We shall work better without it."

He, too, was conscious of a strong sense of excitement.

"Come on. Keep close behind me. When in doubt, catch hold of me."

He led the way silently out of the room. If he brought this affair off successfully, he would earn quite a reputation for himself as a thief-taker. A shadowy smile played across his features. The irony of the situation had tickled his sense of humour. He, too, like Esther, seemed to have a picture of the surroundings photographed on his brain. He never hesitated; made no mistake. More than once his companion behind was obliged to reach out and catch hold for guidance. Revelle would have done better alone.

The existence of one more step than he had anticipated at the foot of the stairs suddenly precipitated Phipps to the ground with a thud, and drew from him a muttered exclamation.

Revelle left him to look after himself, and, despite the darkness, made a straight line for the drawing-room door.

* * * * *

In the darkness the escaped convict held the woman he loved in his trembling arms. For a while both had been silent, their hearts too full for words! But they were whispering now, incoherent quick words of love, undying hope, and mutual belief. The power to reason coldly, make plans for the future, had not yet returned to them. The passionate joy of being together overmastered all.

"You will never doubt me, Alec," whispered Esther, as she drew his unshaved face down to hers and kissed him, "whatever the world may say! I am yours—yours—yours for always. Oh, Alec, thank God for this moment!"

"Amen to that," he breathed out hoarsely.

Again a silence, heart beating against heart, lips pressed to lips, soul in unison with soul!

"Alec, when you—you go from me, where—will you go?"

"God knows—what's that?"

A faint thud, accompanied by a sharp though muffled expression had just reached him. Esther, too, had heard. Her face had turned the colour of death.

"Go!" she breathed out chokingly, "for God's sake, go!"

He hesitated, for the moment not thinking of himself, but of woman he loved. It meant her reputation com promised! It meant——

"If you love," she whispered in her agony, "go!"

Seaton Revelle's hand was on the handle of the door.

(Another splendid instalment next Tuesday.)

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

A Fearsome Father.

"Laurie" is in business and dependent on his father for his financial support. He is also living at home, which is a great pecuniary saving to him. He has now fallen in love with their servant, but knows that if he told his parents he would be dismissed from home, and would lose his father's financial support—perhaps to the detriment of his whole career.

* * * *

Now, what advice does "Laurie" suppose would be given him in cold blood in such a matter as this? On the one side his whole chances of success in life, on the other a girl for whom he may entertain simply a passing passion, and probably poverty. Of course, "Laurie," if your father is, as you say, likely to cut you off if you continue this love affair, your duty is to wait until such time as your business position warrants you in making your own choice of a wife, when presumably your father would see that any objections to your marriage from him could not have any effect.

❦❦❦

"P. W.'s" Advice Taken.

"Veilchen" some time ago asked the advice of the Editor of Pearson's Weekly on the question of how to make the acquaintance of those whom you admire but do not know. She has since adopted the advice given by him, with results different from what she anticipated.

* * * *

I will not go far into details, as "Veilchen" wishes me not to give the whole of her story, but, briefly, it is as follows: For some time she noticed in her daily walks that a man looked admiringly at her. He was of lower social position than herself. After a time she grew to wish to know him, and gave him a hint to this effect. On receiving the hint, to her astonishment, the man seemed completely abashed, and avoided her whenever he saw her. "Veilchen" now feels that she has done a very foolish thing, and suffers continued regret for having done so.

* * * *

I am very sorry for you, "Veilchen." I do not think you did wrong in giving the hint, as you had some reason to suppose that the liking between yourself and this man was mutual and genuine. As to why he took the hint as he did is another matter. There were, no doubt, reasons beneath the surface. One is that possibly he was married, and, while content to look his admiration, would not dare to carry it further. Another is that he was afraid to know you because he might not be in a position to make any proposals of marriage, and desired to avoid going too far. Yet another possible solution is that his look was merely one of admiration for you—perhaps you are a very attractive-looking girl—which did not convey any suggestion of a desire to make your acquaintance. The world is only too full of men who dare not do more than look the things they feel. This being perhaps the case, I should not worry any more about the matter. You have evidently misinterpreted those looks he gave you, and I do not suppose he thought any the worse of you. I have yet to meet the man who did think worse of a girl for returning his admiration. I shall be glad to hear further from you.

❦❦❦

A Prospective Mother-in-Law.

What are you to do when the girl's mother will not let you alone for five minutes together? Thus "Perplexed," who is engaged to a girl, and whose engagement is sanctioned by the mother; yet that good lady always manages to be in the same room when "Perplexed" pays his visits.

* * * *

Evidently the mother requires a good deal of vigorous hinting. Try the following. When you hear her approaching, discontinue your embraces just as she opens the door. When she is in the room, sit perfectly silent. Directly she goes out prepare, as it were, to renew the fray. If, after a while, she does not get a little tired of this kind of thing, arrange always to meet the girl elsewhere—at a friend's house, or somewhere out of doors, near a country lane. If the mother follows her there also, I should advise you either to be prepared to take on board a mother-in-law of the most extreme character, to share with you your marital relations, or to break off the engagement.

❦❦❦

A Lenient Lover.

Before the war broke out, "Nemo" was engaged to one whom he thought was the dearest girl in the world. One morning recently he learnt that she had eloped the previous night with an admirer of three weeks' standing, who had more money than he. Since then the man has been imprisoned for bigamy, and the girl has written "Nemo" to ask him to take her back on the old footing. "Nemo" still loves her, but fears he can never again trust her.

* * * *

If your love is so constant that it endures after such unpardonable conduct on her part, I should certainly not counsel you to give her up. You evidently see qualities in her which are not evident from your story of her behaviour. Perhaps she was cajoled or deceived into eloping with the man in question, in which case her severe lesson must endure for life, and you would be safe in resuming the old relations. What her reasons were for her conduct you surely know, and will be the best judge as to her true character. If her elopement was of her own free will, and was carried out with the full knowledge that she was deceiving you, I can see little prospect that such a girl will make you a faithful wife.

❦❦❦

Wants to Educate his Sweetheart.

"Sincere" is engaged to a girl whose education has been neglected. He himself is well off, and would pay from £50 to £100 a year for two years or so, with a view to improving her. How can he proceed?

* * * *

I think, if there are no questions involved as to her willingness to accept "Sincere's" assistance, the best thing would be for the girl to go to one of the religious convent schools in Belgium, France, or Germany for a while. Lots of English girls go to these schools, and learn several languages, as well as music, and other useful accomplishments. Besides this, they get a good idea of the world through mixing with girls of various nationalities, and there would not be the same social prejudice abroad as might stand in the girl's way at an English school. If "Sincere" can do this, he should write to the British and Foreign Schools Society, Temple Chambers, London, E.C., where all information on such a point could be obtained.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa.

"Strongest and Best."—Health.

Not a stimulant merely for the moment; but a Permanent and Agreeable Form of Nourishment

"TATCHO"

Gets the Hair Back.
Puts the Hair Right.
Keeps the Hair Right.

WHO SAY SO.

COMMANDER T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.

"Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902.
"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair."

MAJOR-GENERAL KEATE.

"High Croft, Winchester.
"I find the Renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time."

LADY SYKES writes:

"Mayfair, W.
"I can honestly recommend 'Tatcho.' It has really entirely renovated my hair."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFORUS PALŒLOGUE writes:

"Belvedere Hotel, Kensington, W.
"I would not be without it on any account."

MRS. BROWN POTTER.

"I use only 'Tatcho.'"

A 4/6 FULL SIZE BOTTLE of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' "Tatcho" is supplied to enable you to test its value at the NOMINAL PRICE of 1/10 at all Chemists', Stores, and Hairdressers', or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, 81 Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn, London.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the world, in bottles at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/-.

30/ 2/6 FIRST - - PAYMENT, 30/

and this FAMOUS WATCH will be sent you on approval.

A High-Class Watch at a Low Price.

Lady's Keyless Watch 30/ or 5/- monthly

MASTERS' World-Famous

6-PRIZE-MEDAL WATCHES.

These are the most perfectly constructed Watches ever offered to the public, being fitted with a horizontal escapement, every part being interchangeable, all wheels being made of specially-prepared metal, well gilt, polished steel pinions, hardened and tempered springs, patent winding work, patent regulator to keep hairspring in position, to withstand rough work. Silver cases, price 30/-.

First send 2/6, and MASTERS' FAMOUS WATCH will be sent you. If satisfactory, you send 2/6 on receipt, and complete purchase in monthly payments of 5/- each; or if you send the full balance WITHIN SEVEN DAYS, we will give you A REAL SILVER ALBERT as cash discount. If Watch is not satisfactory, your money is returned if Watch is returned at once.

CATALOGUE of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, &c., POST FREE.

AGENTS WANTED. Write for particulars, &c., to

MASTERS LTD., 157 HIGH STREET, RYE, SUSSEX.

EVERY WISE WOMAN

WILL INSIST ON

HAVING

CROSFIELD'S PURE CANE SUGAR

Sweeter and more economical than common beet sugars. It produces no fermentation.

THE BEST SUGAR FOR HOUSEHOLD PURPOSES.

Write for Name of nearest Agent to CROSFIELD'S Ltd., Sugar Refiners, LIVERPOOL.

MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very Large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Chapman's ENTIRE-WHEAT Food

IS NOTHING NEW, BUT HAS Without Advertisement Stood the test of 30 years.

Every Physician knows that it contains the Greatest Nutriment in Smallest Compass.

BUILDS & SUSTAINS THE BODY.

Stocked by all Chemists,

CHAPMAN'S FOOD COMPANY, BATTERSEA.

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH

Should you have any difficulty in obtaining supplies, two 6½d Tins will be sent Postage Free, (with address of nearest Dealer) on receipt of P.O. or Stamps for 1/-.

Manufrs. THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH Co. Ltd. LEEDS St. LIVERPOOL

"MENE" Ladies say these Towels are superior to all other makes for cleanliness, comfort, and economy. May be obtained from all Under-clothing Houses and Chemists, or 2 doz. No. 1, 1/-; 1 doz. No. 2, 1/-; 1 doz. No. 3, 1/6; post free. A Free Sample of No. 1 sent post free to any lady mentioning this paper.

SANITARY TOWEL FOR LADIES.

MISS HAYNES, 55 Fann St., London, E.C.

SHORT STORIES

THE GREAT HOME STORY PAPER.

TARTAN COVER
No. 2.—MACPHERSON.

No. 711.) Week Ending August 16th, 1902 (Price One Penny.

A KODAK for 5/-

The No. 1 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2½ by 2½ Inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 BROWNIE is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK

The No. 2 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3¼ by 2½ Inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Everset time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of

KODAK LTD., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

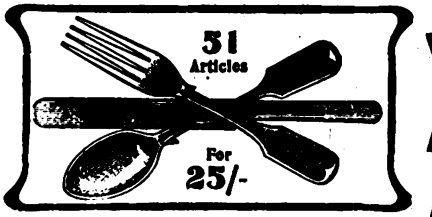
Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, W.C.

"Let's Talk of Graves"

The "Enterprise" Parcel 25/-

Contents: 6 Table Knives, 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Knives, 6 Dessert Forks, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 1 Pair Sugar Tongs, 2 Table Spoons, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Silver Mounted Bread Knife.

J. G. Graves is the only manufacturer who supplies the public direct, and the whole of the Goods are manufactured in the Firm's own Factory in Sheffield.



HOW TO PAY.

Send 3s. with order and complete purchase in six more monthly payments of 3s. and one of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment. If not satisfied return the Goods, and your deposit will be refunded.

Our No. 1 ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., etc., will be sent Post Free to your address.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms.

J. G. GRAVES, 6) DIVISION STREET, SHEFFIELD.

THE ONLY EFFICACIOUS SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

ABSOLUTELY PURE.

NO PRESERVATIVES USED.

(Really Genuine). In Patent Air-tight Tins.

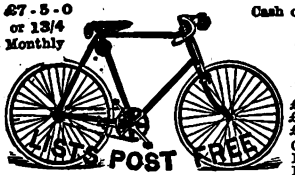
½-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin & Postage.

Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, DEVON.

JUNO CYCLES

ARE THE VERY BEST FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN. Free Wheels.

£7-5-0 or 13/4 Monthly



Carriage paid to all parts. Cash or 12 monthly payments.

£7 5s. ...	13/4
£7 15s. ...	14/3
£8 5s. ...	15/0
£9 5s. ...	16/6
£9 15s. ...	17/8
£11 0s. ...	20/0
£11 11s ...	21/0
£15 0s. ...	28/0

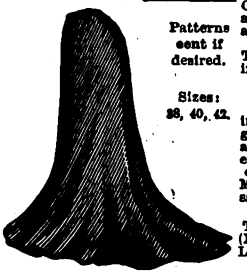
Corsair Plated Lamp, 2/9; Al Rim Brake, 6/6; Scorcher Brake, 1/-. Cyclist Poncho, 2/9. Write at once for New Season's List of over 100 pages and over 500 illustrations of JUNO CYCLES and latest cycling accessories at lower prices than any other house. Sent Post Free. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd., S.Y. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate St. Without, London, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

SHAW'S GIFT Free

This Handsome Blouse

In order to clear out the Remainder of a Bankrupt Stock of Costume Cloths, we will send a tailor-made Costume Skirt in Navy or Black for the small sum of 5/O, or two for 9/6, carriage paid on all goods, and we will include with each skirt free of all charge, a handsome

5/- Two for 9/6. carr. paid.



Patterns sent if desired.

Sizes: 38, 40, 42.

SILKETTE BLOUSE with a Detachable Collar, equal in appearance to silk, and wearing twice as long. These skirts are cut in the very Latest Fashion.

SEND AT ONCE, in order to secure this great bargain, as after present stock is exhausted this offer cannot be repeated. Money returned if not satisfied. Address—

SHAW & CO., The London Tailors, (Dept Sh. S.), 2 LOVE LANE, WOOD ST., LONDON, E.C.

CLERGY ENDORSE THEM.

We sell a great many cycles to Clergymen from all parts of United Kingdom and Colonies, on easy payments. No guarantors required, no references demanded. We supply persons of both sexes, all ages, all occupations. We want YOU to write for our circulars. We will deal with you as honourably by post as if you call. Mention S. S. when writing.

Symond's London Stores, 124-128 City Rd., London, E.C.

THE END OF ECZEMA IN SIGHT

If you wish to get rid of Eczema or any form of skin trouble, as easily as you can be cured of an ordinary cold, all you have to do is to write, naming this paper, to the Antexema Co., 83 Castle Road, London, N.W. You will have posted to you per return an interesting treatise on the skin, and a free trial sample of "ANTEXEMA." These will be sent to you in a plain envelope wrapper, absolutely gratis and post free.

You will then see for yourself how wonderfully "ANTEXEMA" acts, how immediate is the relief from itching and burning, and how, if you obtain a bottle from your local chemist or store (Price 1/1½, post free from us for 1/3), you will be able to complete the cure which the trial bottle has so auspiciously begun.

FREE

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very Large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 711. ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending August 16th, 1902.

"All's Right With the World."

By DAISY PENDER CUDLIP.

An Adventure at Sea.

A LAZY hot afternoon in August. Not a breath of wind stirring the leaves of the trees, or making the faintest ripple on the intense blue of the water that came lapping drowsily on to the little pebbly beach.

The little fishing village of Porthtowan, usually so brisk and lively, was following Nature's example and taking a siesta. No one seemed to be stirring, and there was absolutely no sound to break the intense stillness that usually prevails about three o'clock on the afternoon of an intensely hot day.

On the bench in front of a boat-house three ancient mariners sat, their pipes gone out, their arms folded and their eyes closed, half asleep, warming their old bones in the hot sunshine. On the beach a shock-headed boy was sprawling full length, one arm thrown across his face to shade him from the glare, while the other was stretched out carelessly, the palm of the hand turned up, with the fingers in the graceful curve that is only seen in the utter abandonment of repose.

Down the village street sauntered a man and a girl, her scarlet sunshade making a brilliant patch of colour and casting red reflections on to the white-washed walls of the cottages, as they slowly came towards the beach. Arrived there, they stood still for a moment, the girl gazing dreamily at the sea, while the man gazed intently at the girl, so much so, that involuntarily she turned and looked at him, but it was not the colour of her sunshade that was responsible for her glowing face just then.

"Shall we take the boat out, May?" he asked. Nodding her head in assent, as if afraid of breaking the spell of silence, she led the way to where the little brown dinghy was drawn up high and dry on the beach. The silence hitherto had been complete, but the spell was broken by the scraping noise of the boat running over the pebbles down to the water's edge. The shock-headed boy jumped up quickly and shook himself, the familiar sounds breaking suddenly in upon his dreams brought him back to the realities of life. The three ancient mariners woke up to find their pipes had gone out, and to go on with the yarns that had been interrupted by sleep an hour before.

A woman came to the door of the little inn and shook a duster, yawning as she did so, completely doing away with the impression she had meant to convey, namely, that she at any rate had not been taking a siesta. The sharp slap of the duster as she shook it had the undesired effect of waking up the baby next door, and roused by its lusty cries, the whole village machinery was once more set in motion.

Meanwhile the two who were responsible for this change had drifted away from the beach, the girl guiding the tiller with her little sunburnt hand, while the man pulled lazily at the oars. He was a striking looking man this Leonard Davis, tall, broad shouldered, with a figure well knit, giving an impression of strength with suppleness, while he carried his head erect as a soldier and as a gentleman should.

It has been said that "Man is fire and woman tow, and the Devil brings them together." Certainly if that is the case May Leslie was just the sort of woman who would be as tow to this man's fiery nature. Possessed of a strong vitality, she lived every moment of her life either suffering keenly or enjoying keenly. Her sensitive nature answered readily to all outside influences, either happy or otherwise. Therefore it was not in the least strange when this man crossed her path that she should be attracted by his strong personality, while he on the other hand was puzzled and fascinated by the many-sidedness of her character.

As yet no words of love had passed between them. They had seen a great deal of each other, and of course instinctively knew that they were drifting into those dangerously sweet paths, where the presence of each to the other makes the sweetness.

They had met some months before at a big dance, but it was not until Mrs. Leslie and her two girls settled down at this quiet little village, to live a life of the strictest economy, that they were thrown much together. But just above the village on the heights was a Fort where at this time two companies of the Royal Wessex Regiment were quartered, Leonard Davis being the captain of one of them. So it happened that instead of perpetually going into the neighbouring town, which was the garrison, he used to prefer going down to a certain quaint little cottage in Porthtowan where he was sure of a welcome from one pair of eyes at least. May's sister Nelly was many years younger, being only thirteen, and the most incorrigible tomboy. But the three of them were on the best of terms, and many a pleasant afternoon had they spent together.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

On this particular afternoon he had come down from the Fort as usual to take the girls out for a row, but Nelly, for a wonder, was cross, and generally upset by the heat, and announced her intention of staying at home. Leonard Davis and May, however, did not press her to join them as she had meant them to do, but went without her, nothing loth at being alone together. The village of Porthtowan was in the corner of a very sheltered bay, the land on the right running out to a point thickly covered right down to the water's edge with luxuriant foliage.

It was here that those two guided the boat on this particular afternoon in August. They turned the bows of the boat into a long, narrow cove, and, shipping oars, drifted silently up to a tiny sandy beach, deliciously cool and shady after the glaring heat outside. Leonard jumped out of the boat and held out his hands to May, who, placing her two little brown hands on his, sprang lightly down by his side.

"Take care, the rocks are very slippery, you must let me guide you safely across them," he said, still retaining a firm hold of one of the hands so confidently resting in his, and so led her across the slippery ground to a comfortable seat on the rocks.

"How charmingly cool and pretty you look this afternoon," he said. "I like you in that white thing, awfully," touching the sleeve of her white boating dress as he spoke.

"Do you?" she answered laughing. "I'm glad my appearance pleases your lordship," and getting up she made him a mock curtesy, a thousand mischievous glances dancing in her eyes, as she turned them full upon him. It was a battery against which the man was not proof; he caught her hands and said:

"If you look at me like that I must kiss you, so be careful."

"You wouldn't dare!" she laughed back; and what evil spirit was it that prompted her still to look straight into his eyes with that merry, defiant look? that said as plainly as possible, "kiss me," while all the time her heart was thumping with the conviction that she should hate for him to kiss her, and yet—she hardly knew, her brain seemed in a whirl, and before she knew how it happened his arms were round her, straining her passionately to his heart, which she could feel beating violently. His face was close to hers, in another second their lips would have met, when a fierce angry light came into her eyes, and throwing back her head out of his reach, panting with anger she cried out, "How dare you!" Instantly he let her go, and she would have fallen had he not caught hold of her arm, for she was trembling violently.

"I beg your pardon," he said, in a cold, cutting voice.

"How dare you!" May repeated, her eyes blazing and her breath coming in little short, uneven gasps, with the suddenness of her anger. For answer Leonard turned and looked steadily at her. The look of grave reproof puzzled her.

"What was your motive in trying to humbug me?" he said in a tone that roused all the girl's fighting instincts, and in a moment this yielding little bit of womanhood became hard and stubborn as the veriest mule.

"I don't know what you mean," she said; "and, moreover, I question your right to take that tone with me. It is for you to beg my pardon."

"I do most sincerely," he answered. "But," he continued, "you must acknowledge that it was your own fault, you led me on to do it."

An indignant denial was on her lips, but the words were checked just as she was about to utter them, as she caught sight of the look on his face. Instantly she saw that she had led him on, and that it was useless denying it when he saw through her so plainly; but, on the other hand, no power on earth should drag an acknowledgment of the same from her lips. She was angry with herself for her folly, but with the justice of her sex, she was ready to vent her anger on the man. She was angry with him for not divining at once why she was angry, forgetting that she herself hardly knew, so mixed were the workings of her mind.

She was a woman who must be proud of anything or anybody she cared for, the man who should win her love must be stronger than herself, and now she was angry that this man should have put himself in the position of begging her pardon, when all the time the fault had been on her side. The thing that hurt her pride in him most was that he should submit to it, but such was the contradictoriness of her character, she would fight against his getting the upper hand until the very last gasp, although she wished him to conquer her. She hated the idea of being conquered, but still more she would hate the man for not conquering her. So setting her teeth she maintained a dogged silence, drawing patterns on the sand with the point of her boot, and then angrily rubbing them out again, when she found her companion, to her annoyance, kept silence also.

At last, her patience exhausted, she turned her head sharply round and said: "Well?"

"I am waiting for your sense of justice to prompt you to say that you did not act quite fairly by me just now, May—and I'm not going to move from here until you do."

If only he had stopped at the first half of his sentence, he would have won a generous acknowledgment from her, but the fatal attempt to force her hand conveyed in the last words, checked the generous impulse, and roused all the pride and stubbornness in her.

"Then I'm afraid you'll have to wait for some time."

"Very well, I assure you it's a matter of the smallest consequence. I have made a mistake in my first impressions of you, but luckily in time not to be humbugged by you any more. Please do not trouble yourself about it in the very least, it's not worth troubling about." The cool deliberate way in which he spoke cut her heart like a knife at each word. The nonchalance of his manner was far more galling both to her pride and her love—yes, she acknowledged the latter now that he seemed to be drifting away from her—was far more galling than any outburst of anger, or assumed superiority.

"You don't understand me," she said, and her voice sounded harsh and unnatural to herself.

"Understand you!" he replied with a mocking laugh, "I wonder if you understand yourself? It's more than I do. But as I said before it really doesn't signify," and he coolly set about lighting a cigarette. The manner and tone of his words made her wince and her lips quivered for a moment, the tears being very near the surface, but she controlled herself with an effort, glad that her momentary weakness had escaped his observation. But he had noticed it, and his assumed nonchalance gave way under the conviction that perhaps after all he was wronging her in thinking her a humbug.

He loved her desperately, and, until his doubts of a few moments ago, had been ready to stake his oath on her sincerity. But the horrible doubt that she was merely a coquette trifling with him, galled him. Much as he loved her, if she was only amusing herself at his expense she should not have the satisfaction of seeing how he suffered, so he assumed an air of indifference, which, however, gave way momentarily at the sight of the evident distress in the girl's face. He clenched his hand fiercely until the knuckles stood out hard and white like polished ivory. She saw it, and her instinct told her that his nonchalance was assumed, he really did care for her. If he had not cared, he would not have taken the trouble to be angry at her supposed defection. Impulsively she put out her hand and touched his coat sleeve, he started violently at the mere touch of her fingers, sent a responsive thrill through his whole being, but still he kept his head averted.

"Leonard, you are misunderstanding me, cruelly, you think I am a common flirt and a humbug. I am not, I am not, why won't you believe me?"

"Because, having led me on to make a fool of myself once, you can't expect me to be as ready to do so again. How am I to know you are not humbugging me even now for all your apparent sincerity," he answered, and looked at her in a way that would have cowed a less plucky woman. She met his look steadily, her head proudly thrown back, giving an unmistakable air of dignity to the little figure.

Digitized by Google

"You must know perfectly well," she answered quietly, "that I am not humbugging you, as you call it, and only the suspicious part of your nature won't let you acknowledge it."

"I wonder if I can believe what you say?" he replied. "You must confess you were rather to blame just now; you didn't act quite fairly by me. It was not exactly riding straight, was it?" He asked the question almost imploringly; but getting no response he went on rather sadly, "Never mind, if you didn't see of yourself that it was not quite generous, I cannot be the one to show you."

He had touched the right chord at last, he had appealed to her generosity and reason, and she responded instantly.

"I see it all, Leonard," she answered, turning her face impulsively towards him. "It was not generous of me; in fact, it was horribly mean. Will you forgive me?" The proud little head drooped, and she blushed furiously as she spoke.

"Forgive you, my darling!" drawing her gently towards him. "Why, there is nothing now for me to forgive, rather will you forgive me, for mistrusting you? I was a brute to do it. Can you forgive me for being such a brute to you?"

"Of course I can," she answered, smiling radiantly up at him. "But seriously, you'll never mistrust me again, will you? or I think it would kill me. You don't know how cruelly you hurt me just now."

"My darling, forgive me, how could I have been such a brute?" and taking her two hands in his he bent his head down and kissed them, as a subject might a sovereign. The action touched her—"It was my own fault," she said.

"Not a word more about that," he answered gently, "that is over and done with, and you must never speak of its having been your fault again. Do you understand me, little woman?"

"Thank you," she answered, "I do understand you," raising a pair of eyes glistening with love and gratitude to his face. She had sacrificed her pride in acknowledging herself in the wrong. This man had shown himself to be her master, and her love had conquered her pride when he had conquered her.

"May," he said, "you must know I love you, do you think you could love me well enough to be my wife?"

He had taken hold of her hands, and for answer she let herself be drawn gently towards him, and lifting her face with the light of a great joy in it, to his, their lips met in a long, passionate kiss. In that supreme moment Time seemed to stand still for both of them, May's heart was throbbing with a wild happiness that was almost a pain, so intense was her

"How dare you!" May repeated, her eyes blazing and her breath coming in little, short, uneven gasps, with the suddenness of her anger. For answer Leonard turned and looked steadily at her. The look of grave reproof puzzled her.

Digitized by Google

love, that now could allow itself to find an outlet. But even the greatest moments of our lives have their ending.

With a sigh of happiness May drew herself away from him, but only to let her head rest caressingly on his shoulder while his arm was round her.

"Am I only dreaming, or is it real, that you have asked me to be your wife?" she said.

"Stern reality, little woman," he answered, "I shall ask your mother to give you to me soon, we've nothing to wait for, and I want my little wife."

"I'm just the very happiest and proudest girl in the whole world," she answered, "I'm so happy, that I hardly dare to realise it for fear it should escape me, as most of the things I do wish for escape me."

"You little fatalist, don't think I am going to let you go once having got you. I'm afraid you will just have to reconcile yourself to the idea of putting up with me for the rest of your natural life."

"Leonard, darling, I wonder if you realise how happy your love has made me?" and once more she held up her face readily and gladly for her lover to kiss.

Lost to everything but themselves they had disregarded time, and taken no notice of their surroundings. Had they not been so preoccupied they would have noticed that the tide had gone far out leaving the boat high and dry, held fast by a rock.

"By Jove!" exclaimed Leonard Davies when this fact suddenly revealed itself to him. "Just look at the boat. We're stuck here till next tide unless I can get her off. Do you know it's nearly half-past six," looking at his watch. "I'd no idea it was so late."

He ran down to where the boat was lying and tried to shove her off, but she was heavier than he had thought, and try as hard as he would nothing would move her, and the water line already about one hundred yards away, was still receding. The whole awkwardness of the situation flashed upon him.

"Give me a helping hand, little woman," he called out. "The boat has just got wedged a bit, but I can jerk her out if you help me, I think."

She came as requested, and together they tried to move the boat, the more they jerked, the tighter she seemed to get wedged. "What are we to do?" said the girl, turning pale as the idea of having to remain there struck her for the first time.

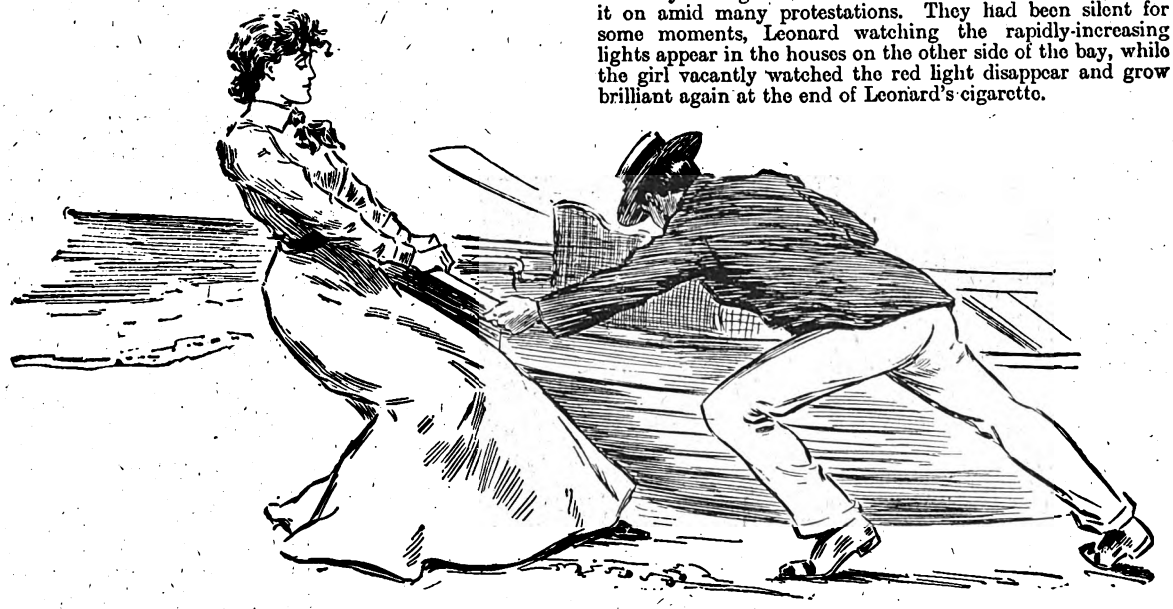
"I'm afraid there's nothing for it but to wait until the tide returns, I'll have one more try though to see if I can't move her, when I say three—just you give a lifting kind of a jerk, and perhaps we may manage to get her off."

But it was no use—nothing they tried had the least effect. At last, giving it up, they sat down and looked helplessly at each other. "I'm awfully sorry, darling, but I'm afraid we shall have to make the best of it and wait here for the next few hours."

"I don't mind one bit," she answered, nestling closer to his side, "I should have been afraid had I been stranded here alone, but with you I don't mind a bit."

So resigning themselves to the inevitable they prepared to wait—watching the gradually lengthening shadows, then the pink reflections on sea and sky cast by the setting sun—succeeded in its turn by the silver light of the moon, as she rose making a silver pathway on the calm water.

Although the day had been scorching, the evenings were chilly, and May shivered slightly, but tried to prevent showing she was cold. Her lover noticed it at once, however, and instantly taking off his own coat he insisted on her putting it on amid many protestations. They had been silent for some moments, Leonard watching the rapidly-increasing lights appear in the houses on the other side of the bay, while the girl vacantly watched the red light disappear and grow brilliant again at the end of Leonard's cigarette.



Together they tried to move the boat, but the more they jerked the tighter she seemed to get wedged.

"What time is it?" she asked at length, breaking in upon his thoughts. He looked at his watch—"Just ten minutes past nine, we can't have much longer to wait, the tide will be up in another hour or so," but in his heart of hearts he knew it would not be up sufficiently to float the boat until eleven o'clock at least.

He was torturing himself with bitter reproaches for his carelessness in having, unwittingly, placed his darling in a false position, and so given the reins to malicious tongues, who are ever ready to put the worst construction on anything. The girl, for her part, was far too happy in the consciousness that they two were apart, alone together in this the supreme moment of her life, that any other aspect of the situation did not present itself before her. It did occur to her that her mother might be anxious and wonder what had become of her, but she quickly consoled herself with the thought that her mother would guess something of the kind had happened, and cease to be nervous, knowing that Captain Davis was there to see no harm could come to her, for as she had often said, "Captain Davis was a man who could be trusted to look after a boat." Consequently the next two hours seemed to pass very rapidly, and it was with feelings not unmixed with regret that she learnt the boat was floated and they could go.

Digitized by Google

It was a lovely moonlight night, and once outside the Cove, everything stood out as clearly as in the day. The soft, mellow light seemed to Leonard's eyes to play lovingly round the face of the girl he loved, and reveal fresh beauties in the sweet, essentially womanly face. Her dark grey hazel eyes with the dove's ring round the iris, glowed with a deep liquid light, that transformed her whole face, and revealed the very depths of her soul. Her heart on her lips, and her soul in her eyes, how could he help loving her, and he was proud and happy in the thought that she was to be his alone, his to love and to protect.

(To be concluded next week.)

Firmness Which Failed.

A Forbidden Outing and its Sequel.

"You cannot go, and that settles it!" said Alfred Saylow, loudly.

If a bolt from the heavens had descended in the midst of the little group seated about the breakfast table it would hardly have created more consternation.

Julia Saylow, stout and impressive, put down her coffee cup with deliberation, and eyed her husband in open-mouthed wonder.

Violet and Mignonette pushed back their chairs as if a second outburst would precipitate immediate flight, and looked anxiously at their mother.

Only Willoughby, the nine-year-old scion of the house of Saylow, retained his composure to any extent. He was accustomed to violent surprises in his daily walk and recovered himself quickly.

"Why not?" he asked, boldly.

"Because you can't—that's why," returned his father, sharply. "You all hear me, don't you?"

It was quite evident that he had been heard, although no reply was forthcoming. The girls feebly played with their food; Julia's face underwent various changes of colour, which finally settled into an aggressive red; and the boy broke into a long whistle of bewilderment.

"Will, you may leave the table," said Mr. Saylow sternly.

Willoughby gazed thoughtfully at him for a moment, then seized a slice of toast and vanished. He had seen that in his father's eye which reminded him of an almost forgotten hour of sadness, closely associated with the tingling recollection of a strap. So he went.

"He meant it," he ruminated as he slipped away; "yes, I'm sure he meant it! What's got into him?"

Fortunately breakfast was nearly over when the surprising dictum had been announced; while digestive processes were undoubtedly impaired in the case of all except Willoughby, it was better than a disappointment on an empty stomach.

Saylow was not an imposing figure as he folded his napkin and rose to depart. A thin, undersized man, with much grey in the light brown hair and straggling beard. He stooped slightly from close attention at his desk, and there seemed an air of physical weakness about him, in strong contrast to his portly wife and bouncing daughters.

But his usually kind grey eyes, wrinkled at the corners with his perpetual smile of conciliation, were now quite fierce, as he stopped with his hand on the door knob and looked severely at Julia. "You heard me!" he said with emphasis.

When the sound of his quick little nervous steps was heard fading away in the passage, the feminine tongues were unloosed.

Violet spoke first. Plump, pretty, and independent, she tossed her head with a gathering bloom on her round cheeks.

"The idea!" she observed; "how entirely uncalled for!"

"I should think so," cried Mignonette, younger and even prettier than her sister.

The repression of Julia now burst forth. She was an affectionate wife, a devoted mother, and possessed of many virtues. Alas, the rod of authority was to her fingers as a clasp of gold to the miser, and she had waved it calmly and unflinchingly over the heads of her household for so many years that the fact of Alfred's imagining he could uplift his voice in opposition to her wishes seemed preposterous.

Surely, he had renounced all claim to such recognition long ago. Why, he was only her husband!

"My dear children," she began rapidly, but impressively, "I trust you observed that I controlled myself. I thought it better to say nothing in reply, nor to open an argument. There will be no argument—we shall go as I have planned. Vi, you will invite Edgar; Min, you may order the waggonette from the stable. We shall go. Tell Willoughby. We start at eleven."

Her daughters embraced her with pride. So that was all she cared for the paternal explosion. How foolish they were to have been so upset. But, then, they had never known him to speak so before. He was always so meek and complacent and did just what was expected of him.

"Of course we will go," cried Vi. "I knew we would all the time. Let's get the luncheon ready."

Trips to the lake, five miles from the town, had become weekly occurrences. Alfred had sat down to a lonely midday meal so frequently that he could scarcely remember the number. And these meals had been occasions of trying thought.

"It cannot go on," he had said to himself again and again. "I do not see what Julia is thinking of. It is too expensive. The bill from the stables is something enormous—and they get boats and men to row them and hire fishing tackle. I can't bear to say anything—they enjoy themselves, I suppose—but Julia should know better. She is so thrifty in some ways and so improvident in others. I do not understand it. I am so out of the habit of finding fault at home that I don't know what to say. I shall lose my self-control some day; I know I shall."

And he had. No one but he knew the volcano smouldering under that eruption—it was but the hiss of the puff of steam from the safety valve of the boiler of a surcharged mind, anxious and worried and shrinking—hating to give offence and having to.

Digitized by Google

Saylow attended to his business that morning with a certain feeling of exalted emancipation. He had asserted himself. He had not intended to be so cross, but his voice had sounded different from what he meant it should. Still, they had said nothing, and it would be all right by dinner time, and he would exert himself to be very pleasant.

For the apparently meek little man was of a fierce temper at times, and some men knew it. But at home—oh! at home—anything but an angry word. So he had often seethed inwardly with a closed mouth.

"Going?" queried Willoughby, in great astonishment, when he was notified. "Why, father said we couldn't."

"Ma says we are, and she is the one," answered Vi. "He didn't mean anything. Hurry up, Will, and go over to Edgar's."

The boy shook his head dubiously. "I don't know about this," he said cautiously. "He did mean it. They say pa's awful in the office when he gets cross."

"Oh, come on," laughed his sister; "he is a dear, harmless old thing, and will be all right by to-night. Run along. We are going to fish to-day, you know. The wind is just right."

This was too much for Willoughby. He started for the house of Edgar Lovell immediately, and that young man welcomed him with the effusion due to a prospective brother-in-law of tender years and hardened remarks.

"Tell Mr. Saylow that we will be back about six o'clock," called Julia to her maid, as they drove away in style behind a pair of greys. "Give him a good lunch, Margaret."

"It is a lovely day. I almost wish they had gone," sighed Alfred as he walked into the house at noon. "I had to do it, though. I will try to make it up to them in some way—why, where is everybody? Hullo, Julia, where are you?"

"They're gone, sir. Mrs. Saylow said she expected to be back at about six. Your lunch is ready, sir," announced Margaret, appearing from the kitchen.

"Gone! Gone where?" gasped the man with a shrinking premonition of the reply.

"To the lake, sir. Didn't they tell you?"

"Oh—oh—yes! To the lake. Yes, I forgot," replied Alfred, instinctively hiding his feelings, while a great wave of anger surged through him. "Serve the luncheon now."

He flew upstairs to his room, closed the door and paced up and down with clenched fists and set lips. The mirror on the bureau reflected a white, strange face, unlike his own.

"I'll teach them a lesson they will never forget," he muttered. "It is high time. I will show them who is master in this establishment!"

He had never been so angry and he had never before known such a feeling of hardness. "I'll begin at once," he decided.

"Maggie," he said calmly to the girl as he sat down at the table, "this house is to be closed to-day. Here are your wages and a month extra. I want you to pack up and be gone by five o'clock. You shall have a splendid recommendation—you have been a good girl."

Margaret began to weep loudly with incoherent protests.

"Stop crying, now," said Saylow; "it cannot be helped. Do as I say and leave everything."

"But, Mr. Saylow——" snivelled Maggie.

"I'll attend to everything," he replied. "This is my affair, and you must be out by five o'clock. Don't try to talk to me. I will not listen. Go now and get ready."

With the firm belief that she was alone in the house with one demented, the domestic dried her eyes and departed for her little room to pack her small belongings with alacrity.

"That settles Maggie," thought the irate Saylow. "Now I will write her a testimonial, and also one to my dutiful wife, lock up everything as tight as a miser's fist and get out myself."

It was a very thoroughly closed domicile that Alfred Saylow contemplated from the pavement, when, at half-past four, he watched a wild-looking girl take her departure.

Margaret's fears had grown to frightful dimensions during the last two hours, as she heard the enraged man of the house tearing about and fumbling with locks. Now he stood glaring after her and jingling a big bunch of keys. Surely it was a fortunate escape.

A short but impressive note was lying on Julia's little writing desk for her edification, in view of the time when she should gain admittance. Her husband looked cautiously about, mentally noting such articles as might be used for battering rams. He was quite positive that his better half would not delay operations. All the afternoon he had worked in a frenzy of anger. Now he stopped, wondering at himself.

"It's done," he murmured. "Am I a fool or not?" A curious reaction possessed him. Thoughts of Julia, of the girls, of little Will—a strange medley of their loving ways and tender words and kindly acts, of the home-comings and home-goings of the past, of the trustful look of the slender-faced bride of the long ago, the babies' faces, the burdens and joys borne and shared, rushed through his brain.

He started irresolutely up the steps, his eyes full of tears. Then he shook himself together and walked rapidly away, hardening his soul.

A boy stopped him—a boy who was breathless and panting. "Here, sir!" he gasped, holding out a paper. "It's from the stable."

"Tell 'em I can't pay that bill to-day. I'm too busy to attend to it!" snapped Saylow.

"No, no," cried the lad; "'tain't no bill. It's about your folks. They're all drowned in the lake."

Saylow clutched the note, glanced at it, and ran, making little moaning sounds like a tortured, dying animal. Five minutes later he was galloping like the wind through the dust on the road to the lake. People yelled at him.

"It's a madman!" they shouted. "Get out of the way!" Then the pounding hoof and the savage lash of the whip were by and out of hearing of their shocked ears.

"Thank God and that doctor, Mr. Saylow!" exclaimed the proprietor of the boathouse; "we thought your wife and one of the girls were gone. The young man kep' the other girl up and the little feller swam ashore. Lucky they was close in, and lucky the doctor knowed how to bring folks to. They're all right now, I think. All in bed up at the hotel."

Alfred leant against him, white and trembling. The rough man covered his eyes. The other was praying aloud, a strange, incoherent mixture of heartfelt words. Presently he stopped with a long breath. "They must stay at the hotel to-night," he said. "I'll go there now, if you'll lend me your arm. Send their waggonette home, Bob. I'll ride back. I think Mr. Lovell had better stay too, to look after them. Our girl had to go away suddenly, and they'll be more comfortable here. I'll drive out in the morning and get them, and I'll send out everything they need this evening. I have some business I must attend to and I may not be able to come myself."

Saylow sat by Julia's bed for a long time, holding her hand in happy silence. She was very weak, and glad to stay.

Alfred, a carpenter and a locksmith were busily engaged from seven o'clock until nine. Maggie was recovered immediately and silence purchased with the extra month's wages, but she has been known to say that Mr. Saylow is a queer man.

"Yes," said Julia, as she went up the steps the next day on her husband's arm, "we were very comfortable at the hotel, but after all, Alfred dear, there is nothing like the comforts of one's own home. Why, what's that litter in the corner?"

"Oh, nothing," answered Saylow, meekly. "I had a man in to mend some of the doors. They squeaked, you know, and the locks needed mending."

"Yes, they did," replied his wife. "I'm glad it's done."

E. Walker.

TO THOSE WHO WRITE.

A Prize of One Guinea will be paid every week by the Editor for the best short story sent in by any of his readers. Contributions should not be less than 1,500 words in length, and not more than 3,000. The Editor reserves to himself the right to publish any contribution submitted. Stamped addressed envelopes must be inclosed for the return of the stories, but, while every care will be taken, the Editor does not hold himself responsible for possible loss of MSS.

Digitized by Google

A Rank Outsider.

Telling of Two British Officers and a Girl.

"Who's the new man, Dolly?"

"That's a hard question."

"Why?"

"Well, the individual referred to seems to me to be just—the new man, who, as far as this regimental community is concerned, will never attain into the 'old man.'"

"Ah! what's the matter with him?"

"Matter! Nothing that I am aware of."

"Well, what's his name?"

"Jones—Absalom Jones."

"Great Scott! Why, that settles it!"

"Settles what?"

"His social status; his position in the regiment—everything!"

"What has his name to do with his position as an officer in His Majesty's Two-hundredth Foot?"

"What has his name to do with it? Could any man answering to the name of Jones—Absalom Jones—ever be anything else but a rank outsider?"

"Oh! I don't know!" replied Lieutenant Adolphus Trevor, suddenly assuming the argumentative. "I haven't the faintest idea as to the blue-bloodness or otherwise, of the worthy sub's. forbears, but I have heard that, in spite of his name, he is a rattling good fellow."

"That remains to be seen," returned Captain Rayne. "He's beastly rich, has no manners worth mentioning, and dresses like a counter-jumper."

"Well, I'm open to bet you anything you like, that, in less than a month, you will not only have changed your opinion, but will be our friend Absalom's most devoted."

Captain Arthur Rayne was in the way of being the "big dog" of the Two-hundredth's mess; when he barked every other curled and scented military canine barked in unison. But with one exception—Dolly Trevor—who took the keenest delight on any and every occasion of pinching the "big dog's" tail.

Now it was a curious fact that the gallant Captain himself was, from an ancestral point of view, a social mystery. True, his service dated well back into the conveniently dim past; not one of his present comrades of the Two-hundreth having witnessed his joining; but there were officers in more than one out-of-the-way station abroad who could recollect the talk and circumstance attending Arthur Rayne's regimental initiation.

One thing there was about him, however, in these latter days, which puzzled everybody—from subaltern to colonel. Whence did he derive the means to keep up a more than ordinarily extravagant mode of living? Four-in-hand, fine stable, Scotch shooting, up-river places—these were not maintained out of the rent-roll of a Spanish castle or estate; there must be some more tangible source of income than that to warrant expenditure more appropriate to a millionaire than to a holder of His Majesty's commission.

But though the majority wondered, they accepted his invitations; it was Trevor, and Trevor only, who doubted and declined. This piqued the Captain, who left no stone unturned to conciliate this rebel to his rule.

But though courteous and tactful, Trevor would not be "commandeered," and the two men, therefore, though outwardly civil, were mutually conscious each of the other's distrust and suspicion.

This was the state of affairs when Rayne tackled Trevor on the subject of the new recurit to the mess, and though he ailed to obtain much in the shape of satisfactory information he gleaned sufficient to almost make him believe in his mind that the cultivation of the new-comer might be attended with profit to himself.

"I needn't introduce the brute about," he argued with himself; "that wouldn't be in the running at all; introduce him, that is, except to a select few!" and the Captain smiled in a way which, had the Lieutenant seen at the moment, would inevitably have confirmed the latter gentleman in his opinion with regard to Captain Rayne's moral position.

"Anyway, I'll consult Kit about it, and, there being no time like the present, I'll run down to Molesey as soon as parade's over."

The Two-hundredth were stationed at Hounslow, convenient alike for towns and for up-river trips.

It was a hot day in July, and the parade ground was like a sandy Sahara.

Just before the commencement of the morning's duties the Colonel was seen issuing from his quarters in company with a young officer, a stranger. The pair were in close, pleasant conversation, continued until they reached the group surrounding the "colour."

"Gentlemen!" said the Colonel, "let me present you to a new comrade—Lieutenant Jones."

"Charmed to welcome you amongst us!" said Captain Rayne, as spokesman. "Not on duty to-day, I see."

"No," put in the Colonel, "Mr. Jones will simply watch the parade this morning, and come on duty to-morrow."

There could not be a greater contrast than that between this tall, fair, boyish-faced young fellow and Captain Arthur Rayne, whose dark, almost saturnine features insensibly reminded one of Velasquez's portrait of Philip II. of Spain.

It must be admitted that Absalom Jones created, on the whole, a good impression among his new messmates; while Trevor, already predisposed in his favour, at once made advances of a friendly nature.

Now, this was altogether opposed to the Captain's ideas of what ought to be, and of that which he intended, all being well, should be. He did not desire that Absalom Jones should be popular; did not wish even that friendship, in the ordinary sense of the word, should exist as between the new man and himself. Hence it was that, parade over, he at once changed into "mufti" and looked up the trains on the Thames Valley line.

"If anyone can arrange details in a little matter of this sort, it's Kit! I don't think I'm a fool by any means, but Kit is a born genius—a Circe and a Delilah in wonderful combination. What's this she says in the note I received this morning? 'Father has asked me to tell you that if you will go down to your place at Shiplake on Friday, he will meet you there, and bring a friend with him. His friend is young Abner Jones—Jones, the big contractor's eldest son. A younger brother, Absalom, is, I see, just gazetted to your regiment. They have both of them pots of money, so you can make a safe book if you hedge judiciously. Wire me as to what you intend doing about Friday. Love, Kit.'"

He was in the act of folding up this letter, when his servant brought in a card.

"Ladies to see you, sir."

He glanced at the pasteboard.

"Mrs. and Miss Seymour."

"Carriage from town, Hobbs?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes, sir; and Miss Seymour told me to say as she wished to see you particular, sir."

"Oh, very well; say that I'll be done in a moment. Confounded nuisance!" he said viciously, as Hobbs left on his errand. "To think that she should come down just at the wrong moment! Wonder what's up? If they want me to go back with them, I must make some sort of an excuse. I can't let this Jones chance slip, engagement or no engagement!"

Daphne Seymour was a girl that any man might have been proud to prospectively own. Her name fitted her like the daintiest of gloves, for there was an old-world atmosphere and freshness about her that was perfectly delicious.

People often wondered at her acceptance of Arthur Rayne, and prophesied anything but happiness when they should marry.

Just as Rayne came to the carriage side, Absalom Jones strode across the square in their direction, and, with an earnest glance at Daphne, passed up the steps into the quarters.

"Who is that, Arthur?" asked Daphne eagerly.

"That!—Oh, only the fellow who joined this morning. He is something of a cad, I hear; a tradesman's son; plenty of money, but a 'rank outsider.'"

"Oh, I shouldn't have thought so!" said Daphne. "Why, he looked just like a living picture of a Saxon warrior of Alfred's time!"

"Do you think so?" said Rayne, with an ill-concealed sneer. "Sorry I can't agree with you."

"But, Arthur!" said Mrs. Seymour, "we have come to fetch you back with us. Daphne wants you to take her to the Opera to-night."

Worrying to get away, Rayne, after hurriedly expressing his regret that he could not accompany the ladies back to Cadogan Square, only waited for the carriage to be well out of sight, to take a cab for the station.

Meanwhile, Hobbs was busy putting his master's rooms to right.

"Hullo! what's this?" he exclaimed, as his eye fell upon a half-folded note upon the floor of the bedroom.

No man, folks say, is a hero to his valet, and the reason of it is, perhaps, that the servant has so many chances of illicitly acquiring information, and is not too scrupulous in availing himself of them.

Hobbs' present action was a case in point.

"'The Paddock, Molesey.' Why, that's where old Ransome, the bookie, lives; who is a trifle more than a bookie, if all's true as is said about him. '!Kit'—that's handsome Kitty, his daughter. Blest if I didn't think he had some game on down that way; and him with such a lovely sweetheart, too! If I'd a girl like Miss Seymour I'd let the rest of the sex go hang!"

It may be supposed that Hobbs sometimes "had a bit on" himself, he seemed to be so well up in betting matters. He made no scruple about reading the letter; the result being a long, low whistle of surprise and disgust.

"I ain't a saint, by a long way; but afore I'd pluck a pigeon or rather, a pair on 'em, just to give a she cat like Kitty Ransome the biggest part of the feathers, I'd drown myself, and drowning's too good for my man while there's a noose of honest rope, and one as can use it, knocking about."

The room door was open, and Hobbs, unusually excited, was talking louder than prudence suggested.

"Hobbs!"

"Sir."

The soldier-servant came smartly to attention as Lieutenant Trevor paused in the corridor, opposite the Captain's bedroom.

"What's that you are muttering to yourself about 'pigeons,' and the hangman's noose? And what is that you have in your hand?"

"It's a letter, sir, the Captain dropped, and——"

"Which you have read?"

"Well, sir——"

"No! I don't want to see Captain Rayne's letters! Lay it down!"

"Excuse me, sir, but unless you do read it, or get the Colonel to read it, or let me tell you what is in it, there'll be mischief, and that before the week's out."

"Well, stay where you are, while I call the Colonel."

As fortune would have it, Colonel Mildmay that moment passed along the corridor.

"Colonel," said Trevor, "something very awkward has happened. Hobbs, come here!"

Hobbs marched obediently into the corridor, and stood at attention.

"Now, Hobbs!" said Trevor, "in the ordinary case a gentleman's letters are sacred—a fact you don't seem quite to comprehend—and we should order you not only to replace the letter where you found it, but punish you severely for breach of trust; but certain circumstances connected with the interests of an officer of the regiment render exceptional action necessary. Hand the Colonel the letter you picked up—and read."

Making a pace forward, Hobbs placed the letter in Colonel Mildmay's hands.

"Now," said the latter to Trevor, after a careful perusal of it, "now the secret of Captain Rayne's extravagance in living is out; and without a doubt I am warranted in placing this letter, together with the whole facts of the case, in the hands of the War Office."

"I am afraid, Colonel, that there is nothing better to be done."

"Where is your master now?" asked the Colonel of Hobbs.

"Gone to Molesey, sir.'

"Ah! he has asked for leave over Sunday."

"What are you going to do about Jones, sir?" said Trevor.

"I hardly know. Perhaps you are not aware that his father, the man who built that wonderful railway in Morocco, and I are the oldest and closest of friends. He is a singular man—witness his naming of his sons—but a strong man, mentally and morally. His son Absalom takes after him, and you can understand, therefore, Trevor, why it is that I wish the boy to be comfortable with us."

"Certainly I do."

The old veteran then expressed his more than regret at ever having introduced Arthur Rayne to the Seymours; Daphne being an especial pet of his, and his godchild.

The Colonel and Trevor were now in the former's quarters, Hobbs having been for the time dismissed, as under suspension.

"Lieutenant Jones to see you, sir."

"Ask him in, Sergeant."

"What's the matter?" said the Colonel.

"It's a queer thing to ask, sir, after just joining, but I have strong reasons for asking for a couple of days' leave."

"Well, truth to say, I'm not surprised; for I suppose you have heard something?"

"Yes, sir; Hobbs, Captain Rayne's servant, sent for me, and has told me that which necessitates my presence at once at——"

"Molesey?"

"How did you know that, Colonel?"

Then everything came out, and after a consultation with his two friends, and with a particular injunction from the Colonel to be careful and judicious, Absalom Jones was on his way to rescue his weak-minded elder brother, and to square accounts with Arthur Rayne.

That one glance which he had had of Daphne had served to imprint on his mind something he could not, even had he so desired, shake off. That she should be "engaged" to the man of whom he was now about to demand a reckoning was, beyond measure, inexplicable; inasmuch as the mating of light with darkness is always a matter for better men's wonder.

Arrived at Molesey, and having enlisted the services of one of "Taggs" people to pilot him to the "Paddock," Sam Ransome's place, he found himself to be only just in time.

At the gate stood a brougham and pair, into which was being assisted an "old" young man of thirty or thereabouts.

A tall, handsome girl and Captain Rayne were on either side of the other. Coming down the path was old Sam Ransome him-

(Concluded at foot of next page.)

Digitized by Google

Post next week's copy of SHORT STORIES to a friend.

The Great PASS-IT-ALONG Scheme.

FIRST AWARD £10.

SECOND AWARD £5.

THIRD AWARD £2.

Six awards of 10s. each.

AN ENTIRELY NEW FORM OF MONEY MAKING.

This novel and clever scheme will be continued in the next issue of SHORT STORIES. For the benefit of those who have not seen our previous announcements, we give below a rough idea of the scheme, so that they may be prepared for next week's offer.

Every person who buys a copy of "SHORT STORIES" will have the opportunity of entering for this scheme by first of all writing his or her name and address in a space which will be found at the foot of one of the pages, and then sending the copy of the paper to a friend whom the competitor thinks will be likely to sign his or her name in a space provided. This friend of yours will then post the copy to a friend of his or hers, and so your copy will go from one person to another for fourteen days, when you will find it returned to you. Then you simply send the copy to us, under the conditions which you will find next week, and if it contains more names than that sent by anyone else

You will get £10, and every person who has signed your papers will receive a pretty gift.

Your whole expenses will be one stamp for sending a copy of Short Stories to your friend. Your friend, and his or her friends and friends pay the other postage. If, however, you don't want to send your own copy away, and you can't get a friend to give you his or her copy (readers, you will find, don't like parting with their copy of dear little S. S.), then why not get an extra copy of the next number, as thousands of other readers will do?

The copy will cost you one penny, and may bring you £10.

But don't leave it till Tuesday, when the next number is published, or you will find your newsagent is sold out. Just ask him to keep it by for you till you call on Tuesday for it. . .

Next week's issue, we may add, will be worth twopence in itself, so full is it of bright and dainty little stories. But, as usual, the price is only one penny.

self, as well known on every English racecourse as the King on his throne.

Stalwart and determined, Absalom Jones just stepped to the carriage door, and with a simple "Pardon me!" drew the trembling figure's arm through his own. Raising his hat to Kit Ransome, Absalom turned to Arthur Rayne.

"It was my intention, sir," he said gravely, "to demand an explanation of you, concerning your share in this business. I see, however, that my brother's condition is such that an instant removal to his home is necessary, so that the explanation is only deferred until an early future opportunity."

Within the hour, the brothers were safe under the paternal roof in Pont Street.

* * * * * * *

That which came to be styled the "Rayne affair" was more than the usual proverbial nine days' wonder, by reason, perhaps, of the popularity of one of the actors in it.

Absalom Jones more than justified his friend, Colonel Milward's estimate and appreciation of him, for, the Rayne despotism at an end, his genial, happy disposition set him on a pinnacle, from which he has never since descended.

Arthur Rayne deemed it advisable to visit the Continent, whither the War Secretary's request for his immediate resignation in due course followed him.

* * * * * * *

Colonel Milward was not satisfied until he had brought his godchild Daphne and the son of his friend together. His object was evident, although Mrs. Seymour expressed herself as being somewhat suspicious of the Colonel's introductions.

A year after the above events to the day, Absalom Jones wedded Daphne Seymour.

At the breakfast Trevor and the Colonel were next each other. It was a quiet corner, and no one heard the former whisper to the latter—

"That fellow Rayne once dubbed our bridegroom 'a rank outsider'; it's curious, Colonel, isn't it, that that too clever gentleman should unconsciously have been suggesting his own social epitaph."

"Very curious," echoed the Colonel.

Ralph Enderby.

Digitized by Google

Left by the Express.

A Station-master's Story.

There was dead silence in the cottage of Will Haynes, the station-master. The station was a small one on a loop line, which had been opened for traffic rather more than four years, in the hope that the loop would develop into something important; but the cutting of the line had not worked the slightest effect in the development of the surrounding country, and the cottage and large garden were just a clearing in the edge of the wood, and as far from neighbouring cottages as it was when Mary Bird became Mrs. Haynes, and began life as the station-master's wife.

It was Sunday evening and an off-time for Haynes. After one o'clock no train stopped at that station, and only two trains passed through it. Haynes was seated on a stout wooden chair, which he had tilted, till the back rested against the wall next to the door-post. He was very comfortable, for it was a warm evening, and he was drowsy. Mary sat on the doorstep, her elbows on her knees and her face in her hands. Her back was towards the room, so Haynes could not see her face even when he turned his head.

"Your flowers look well, Mary," he remarked. He had said that twice already since dinner, but he wanted to make her talk and could think of nothing better to say.

"Pretty well," rejoined Mary wearily.

Silence again. Will Haynes was uneasy about this silence, so he made another attempt.

"The 'sturtiums are getting on, ain't they?"

"Yes."

"The peas is all right too, don't you think so?" ventured John again.

There was no answer, so John slowly let the front legs of his chair drop till they touched the floor, and then half-turned towards her.

"You feel a bit lonely?" he asked, with more tenderness than usual.

It had dawned upon him before that evening that Mary was not happy. She had been taught the trade of a tailoress as she phrased it, and while stitching away as a merry-hearted girl, she had conceived ambitious ideals, and had hoped for their realisation; but time went by and the realisation was as far off as ever. When Will Haynes came along and took a fancy to the bright-eyed, merry-speaking girl, and told her that he was to be the station-master of the little country station as soon as it was opened, telling her of the cottage and the garden and of his prospects, she resolved to accept his offer.

The little cottage appeared like a small paradise at first, and she was happy; but the aspect gradually changed. It was very lonely; her ideals faded one after another; and Will was a reserved man, saying little and outwardly cold. She maintained her merry ways at the beginning of their married life, but she fancied that Will did not care for them, and she ceased in her efforts to amuse. In point of fact, Will was much amused, but he made the common mistake of many husbands, and showed no gratitude, no warmth. Mary interpreted it wrongly, and became cold in turn and still less happy.

"You feel lonely at times?" queried Will once more, as she did not reply.

"There they come!" said Mary, with a quick jerk of her head in the direction where a curl of smoke was rendered visible in the growing darkness by the flame that accompanied it. "All enjoying themselves."

"The up-express," observed Will Haynes casually.

The headlight of the swiftly-running train was visible, and presently it dashed along the line at the end of the garden, the lights from its windows illuminating the night for a brief space.

"There they go!" cried Mary bitterly. "It's nice to be able to travel there and everywhere! I hate the people in those trains, when I see them pass; they can go about and see all kinds of sights and people, while we stick here and see nothing, day in, day out, in this forsaken place, alone nearly all the time, and nothing to do. I believe it's killing me!"

It was a struggle between rage and tears, and the former conquered for the time.

"It is a bit lonely," admitted Will, rather sadly. "Mary, why don't you go and sit with Blake's wife sometimes? That would be company."

"I don't like her, Will. Then the children make a noise, and she's always so taken up with the children."

"How many have they got now?" asked Will with a strange intonation in his voice.

"That last made four. They have a lot, and others——"

Mary was about to say that many other people had none, but she stopped. Will sighed, and Mary echoed the sigh unconsciously.

"Isn't there something you could do to make the time less tiring?" inquired Will helplessly.

"I could get some wool and knit things for the winter, but we can't spare the money, and we've got enough things for another three winters!" returned Mary angrily. "When I say as I've nothing to do, of course I can make work. I have to, or I should eat my heart out. I look at the trains and I see the happy people, and it hurts me so that I have to turn to and do some housework. I scrub the kitchen floor in the morning, and I often scrub it again in the afternoon. When those feelings come over me, I have to do something or I'd go mad, stark, staring mad! So I get the soap and water and scrubbing brush, and I work on that kitchen floor to relieve 'em!"

During the next few weeks his wife's fits of depression increased in frequency, for whenever he went in to the midday meal, he smelt fresh soap and the kitchen floor was damp; and in the evening it was the same smell, the same dampness, and he knew that the floor had been scrubbed at least twice that day. His own inability to create an interest for Mary served to irritate him still more, and he would go out as soon as he had finished eating, declaring that it was enough to drive him out of his home. He failed to understand that he would do more to bring happiness into the home by the exercise of patience.

It was Sunday evening once more; an autumn Sunday, with the night falling at an earlier hour. Will Haynes was standing moodily near the kitchen door, outside this time, while Mary was seated on the step. Both were staring blankly into the twilight. There had been angry words at tea-time.

"I'm going to watch the down-express pass," said Will suddenly.

He moved away. He did not wish to see the express pass; it was only an excuse to get away. Mary might be in a better mood when he returned.

He walked along the line for nearly a mile until he saw the train coming. The signal was against it, and it slowed down and stopped. This was rather a surprise for Will Haynes, but he supposed that the company was running an excursion on the main line where the loop joined further on, and excursions are always late. It was rather strange that expresses should be run on that loop at all, Will Haynes had thought when he first took up his duties, but he learnt that the line served as a connection with the system of another company, and it was considered policy to run them.

Digitized by Google

These thoughts were passing through Will's mind when he observed, in the dim light, a figure on the line near the bank. He saw the figure approach the train, and then he noticed that a carriage door was open. The figure climbed on to the foot-board and entered the carriage, shutting the door just as the train began to move. In half-a-dozen seconds the express was running past him with steadily-increasing speed.

Will was curious and made his way to the spot where he had noticed the dark form. There was something by the side of the line; it proved to be a large hamper. More curious than ever, Will cut the twine that secured the lid and began to examine its contents. He drew back with a suppressed cry, then emitted a whistle, and sat down to think it over.

"Yes, that will do it, if I work the thing all right," he said softly.

He took up the hamper in his strong arms and carried it to the cottage. Placing it on the floor, which, fortunately, had not been scrubbed since the morning, he called Mary, and, without answering her question, opened the lid and pulled aside a light cloth. In the hamper lay a baby, just beginning to wriggle and cry.

"Somebody's left it on the line," said Will simply, "so I thought I'd bring it here."

"I don't want other people's brats!" declared Mary harshly.

Will was nonplussed, but he contrived to hide the fact, and played his part very well.

"All right!" he said coolly. "I'll go and see the policeman in the village, and tell him. He must find somewhere for it to go. But I can't take the child with me, so I'm afraid I'll have to leave it here till I come back. S'pose you don't mind attending to it till then?"

Mary's face remained hard in expression, and Will glided out before she could reply. The baby began to whimper again, and then to cry lustily.

"Poor thing," murmured Mary softly. "It's hungry and cramped."

She took it up and soothed it by rocking it in her arms. She contrived to give it some milk and water, feeding it with little drops in a tea-spoon. Then it dropped into a slumber of peace and innocence, and Mary sat with it in her arms and waited.

It was nearly ten o'clock before Will returned, and he found Mary still sitting with the baby asleep in her arms. She held up her head with a warning expression on her face as he entered rather noisily with his heavy boots.

"S-s-sh! You'll wake her, Will!"

"Why didn't you put her in the bed?" inquired Will in a stage whisper. "Been holding her all this time?"

"I couldn't turn the clothes down without disturbing her," replied Mary in the same tone, "and she's so comfortable and easy-like here that I was afraid to venture. You can do it now."

Will moved across the kitchen to go to the bedroom, but he made so much noise that Mary stopped him.

"Hadn't you better take your boots off?" she demanded. "You'll wake her, sure enough!"

Will removed his heavy boots and together they stepped lightly into the bedroom, where he turned down the clothes, and she tenderly deposited her human burden.

"She looks all right there, don't she?" asked Will.

"Almost a pity she's got to go. I've had a talk with the village policeman, and he said at first as how he didn't think that she was found in this parish. We had an argyment about it, that's what made me so late. But it's all settled now, and he says she'll have to be taken to the infirmary or the workhouse, and that's ten miles off if it's an inch. Anyhow, she goes to-morrow."

Out of the corner of his eye Will watched the effect of his words. He saw Mary's face go white and her lips quiver. She gave one long look at the pretty bundle of humanity in the bed, and the next instant she was sobbing with her head on Will's shoulder.

"Must she go away, Will? Oh, can't we keep her?"

Will passed his arm round his wife; an irritating cough prevented him from speaking for nearly a minute, but he got the better of it at length.

"Yes, I should say so. She won't cost much to keep for a time, and I may get a lift up. I daresay the policeman won't be much upset at not having to take her to the workhouse."

"But, Will, I s'pose we may keep her?" inquired Mary, with sudden fear. "There isn't anything in the basket to say we mustn't?"

They looked in the hamper and overhauled its remaining contents, consisting of baby clothing. There was no note, no trace of identity.

"There's nothing agen it," said Will, "so we'll keep her."

"I can look after her," said Mary confidently. "I'll take care she doesn't get on the line."

"Ah, that reminds me!" exclaimed Will. "I must rig up a gate at the end of the garden to keep her off the line. I'll do it to-morrow!" he added quite seriously, as though he fancied that the baby would be running out on the line before they were aware of it if he were not quick about the task.

"What shall we call her?" inquired Mary, when they had returned to the kitchen. "I think it would be a good idea to give her a name that would remind us how she came. Suppose we call her Express, eh?"

Mary looked at him as if she had had an inspiration. Will shook his head doubtfully.

"Don't seem to be a very handy sort of name," he explained. "And we might mix it up with the trains. Never heard a girl called that, have you?"

"That wouldn't matter!" exclaimed Mary. "I don't see why such a darling as that should be bound to have a name that any other girl can have. Well," she continued, after a pause, "suppose we call her Pressie now? That's nice and handy, and it will remind us just the same."

So it was settled. They crept to the door of the bedroom and listened. No sound. They crept back again. Will put on a pair of light boots which he called his slippers, and together they went out into the garden. Their hands came together by some mysterious influence, and they stood drinking in the balmy air.

They looked up at the stars, they talked of their prospects—of what they would do for Pressie as she grew up, and how she would look when she was grown up. Everything was so different, so bright; life was so well worth living.

"Oh, I'm so glad she has come; I'm so happy, Will!" laughed Mary.

"I say, you haven't left the bedroom window too wide open, have you?" asked Will in sudden alarm. "We don't want her to catch cold. And you mustn't scrub the kitchen floor so much, you know, or she'll——"

"I shan't want to, you silly man!" laughed Mary.

It was so pleasant to hear her laugh! The whole world was changed for her; she had tasted the sweets of motherhood.

Will Payne.

Digitized by Google

A CHANCE ACQUAINTANCESHIP.

A Seaside Meeting, a Parting, and a Reunion.

"Then you do not think it very dreadful of me, talking to you without an introduction?"

"Not I. Why should I? It would be impossible to look upon anyone as dreadful in whose delightful company I felt such pleasure."

Then there was a laugh upon both sides, and a mock bow on the part of the first speaker in acknowledgment of the compliment. It was the seaside, and these two were feeling the delightful sensation of freedom from everyday formalities met with in the ordinary humdrum life of a large city—hence this meeting. He was a young man of about twenty-seven. She was a girl of about twenty-two, very pretty and full of fun. It was a case of mutual attraction. He longed to know her, she wished to know him. As no one came forward to introduce them—well, there they were on their holidays, what could it matter if they dispensed with that form just for once; the chances were they would never meet again. That was what she thought—he hoped otherwise.

"You cannot think," she said, "what a bore it is coming away with only an aunt—and an old maid at that—to look after you."

"I can quite understand," he answered; "almost as bad as going on your honeymoon in company of your mother-in-law, as well as your bride. They must both be in the way."

She laughed.

"Auntie will be frightfully distressed when she knows I have spoken to you,."

"Then don't tell her."

"Oh! but I told her I was going to speak to you, and the poor old soul preached at me for over an hour."

"Poor little girl."

"Thank you. She has all sorts of notions, you know; she says a fellow has no respect for a girl who will allow him to talk to her without proper introduction; do tell me that's not true."

"My dear girl, that's all nonsense, in one sense at least; it depends on the girl. Let me try to explain. Now, there are plenty of girls, empty headed things, who come away for a holiday with the one intention of speaking to any fellow who will speak to them; anything is good enough so long as it is a man. Now, those girls I have no respect for from the start. Then, there are girls like yourself. You did not come away with the intention of speaking to anyone you did not know; at least, that is what I think. You found it intolerably dull, and I flatter myself that I don't look as though I was satisfied with anything. You saw, I daresay, that I wanted to know you; what happened? I venture to hope something like this—'Old aunt a bore, no one here I know or care about, somebody there seems as though he would like to know me—perhaps pleasant company,' and—well—here we are."

"Yes, you are quite right; that was exactly how I looked at it."

"I knew it, therefore, how could I look upon you with disrespect? I should be sorry to think that after you leave me you would be at once with another; but I know you will not do so, therefore it is all right."

"Hadn't we better know each other's names? It would be more convenient, don't you think so?"

"Certainly. Gilbert Somers is mine; but stay, I have a card. And yours?"

"Kitty Dunstan. I like Gilbert awfully—and, oh! you come from London, so do I." She blushed, and seemed rather disturbed. He did not notice, however.

"Do you? How jolly; we may meet again at home. I'm awfully glad."

"But London is such a big place, we may not after all, you know."

"Don't be unkind. You would like to meet, would you not?"

"Oh, yes, I hope we shall; but really we ought to change the subject; we must have been talking nonsense for the last hour."

"I like this kind of nonsense, one gets tired of being serious in town; but what shall we talk about?"

"Anything you like—the place, the people. Do you like it, and what kind of people do you like best?"

"If I answered that, we should be getting personal once more. Try again."

"Then how goes the enemy?"

"The time you mean? Half-past twelve."

"Then I must fly, lunch at one, you know, and auntie gets so wild if I keep her waiting. No, you must not come with me."

"We meet this afternoon in Devonshire Park, don't we?"

"If I can get rid of auntie—three o'clock—au revoir. And she put out a little gloved hand.

"Au revoir," he said, giving it an affectionate little squeeze.

Gilbert remained seated for some time after she had left him, considering himself a lucky fellow. He was not as a rule impulsive, but there was something in the girl that attracted him from the first moment he saw her; and now—although they had known each other for so short a time, he knew that he was head over ears in love for the first time in his life. He felt very happy—Eastbourne had never seemed so pleasant—and he walked back to his hotel in a very contented frame of mind.

Gilbert Somers was a lucky fellow, blest in no small measure by the world's goods. He was wealthy, good looking, and easy tempered; a very charming companion, and yet he had remained single. He was not easily satisfied; he liked girls' society immensely, but he was careful in his choice. Kitty Dunstan appealed to him as no other girl had done. She was so fresh, with a most winning and charming manner, and a lady evidently brought up in the best society. He laughed often at his good luck, and felt in the best of tempers.

The weather was kind enough to assist his enjoyment, and they sat in one of the most secluded seats in one of the delightful paths of Devonshire Park, the world was a delightful place to these two. While the band discoursed sweet music from the music garden they talked more nonsense.

"Auntie wanted me to go for a drive this afternoon," she said. "I was terribly afraid I should have to go."

"How did you get out of it?"

"I told her I was in love with the first violin, and that he was going to play a solo for my especial benefit, so that I was bound to come. That was not a lie—the latter part, I mean. Auntie hates music, so I knew she wouldn't come with me. I shock her dreadfully, I'm afraid."

"A capital excuse. I shall have to ask that first violin to dine with me, if he is going to do many good turns like this. How did you know him?"

She laughed.

"Oh, another of my informal acquaintances; he fell over my parasol the other afternoon, and apologised profusely, so I told him he must do penance. He was very humble. I told him he must play one of my favourite pieces, and he is going to oblige this afternoon."

Digitized by Google

"How nice. I wish I could do something for you."

"Oh, I can easily give you something to do, if you wish it."

"Please do."

"Talk auntie round to more modern views; she is such a Puritan, you can't think. If you could do that, I should be everlastingly grateful."

He sighed.

"The twelve labours of Hercules rolled into one," he answered. "I am afraid my powers of persuasion are not very good. If you will give me the opportunity I will try."

"How brave of you. Well, you shall try. We shall be on the Parade this evening. I will introduce you."

"And I will try to acquit myself well for your sake."

"Thank you, Gilbert," she answered.

"How nice of you, Kitty, to use that name. I had no notion it could be made so pretty. Don't call me anything else any more."

She held up a warning finger.

"We are talking nonsense again; let us talk of the people. Oh! there is my first violin; let us go and listen. I am sure he will be sorry if he does not see me."

Gilbert was introduced to Miss Dunstan's aunt, Miss Selby, in the evening, and tried to make himself agreeable.

He was left alone with her shortly after, Kitty going into the town for something.

"I do hope, Mr. Somers, my niece has not shocked you, for I'm sure I do not know what to do sometimes, she seems to have no idea of propriety."

Gilbert laughed to himself at Miss Selby's idea of propriety, whilst he promptly did his best to allay her fears.

"I should not mind so much," continued she, "but I do think that when a girl is engaged she should behave with more caution."

Gilbert started. His heart sank; he felt as though he had received a blow from an invisible hand. "Engaged! engaged!—Kitty, I mean, Miss Dunstan—engaged?"

"Yes. A good match for him, too. Kitty has money, he has not; but if she loves him, that is the great thing. You did not know, then? Engaged, oh, yes."

Poor Gilbert, it was a blow to him. He did not wait for Kitty. With more haste than was perhaps in accordance with politeness, he bade Miss Selby good-night, and walked moodily down the Parade in the depths of melancholy.

He felt hardly against the girl at first. Was she playing with him, was she as innocent as she looked; did she take pleasure in tampering with men's affections? No, she could not mean to delude him. Perhaps it was his own fault; he should have taken it as it was meant—a chance acquaintanceship, and nothing more. It was done now. He allowed himself to fall in love, and it was not easy to climb out.

He walked to his hotel, and sat down to write to Kitty.

"My dear Miss Dunstan," he wrote, "I am the unhappy recipient of a piece of news this evening that seems at once to have altered the whole course of my life. This, you may guess, is the knowledge of your engagement. For your sake, my dear girl, I cannot feel sorry, and from the bottom of my heart I wish you every happiness. It is, perhaps, wrong of me, under the circumstances, to say that during the brief time we have been acquainted, you have become more and more to me, and I feel it very sorely that we must end our friendship.

"I say we must end it, not that I blame you; but you seem now to have become so much a part of my life that I think it better that we should not meet again. As our lives must now lie in different ways, your presence would only make me long for that which I see now can never be.

"Forgive me if I pain you in any way by this letter. I shall remember the last few days as amongst the happiest of my life, and I can never forget you. With every wish for your future happiness, Believe me, yours sincerely,

"Gilbert Somers."

Kitty was angry with her aunt for telling Gilbert about her engagement, but, on the receipt of his letter, she saw where she had made the mistake, and she broke down utterly. She never thought, in her careless way, that there was a possibility of Gilbert falling in love with her; she only felt the pleasure of his company; she had not meant to be unkind. Now she saw what she had done, and shed bitter tears of repentance. Out of a pleasant little comedy had come a tragedy that she had never dreamt of. With trembling hand and in true penitence she wrote back—

"My Dear Mr. Somers,—I hardly know how to write an answer to your letter. I did not know what I was doing; I should not have spoken. I little foresaw this. You ask me for my forgiveness. It is I that should ask yours. My aunt was right in a way, and a way I did not think of. There is only one thing I beg of you; do not think I meant to trifle with you; I never thought you would care for me beyond a seaside acquaintance. I see I have much to learn, but why should I have to learn my lesson at your expense? Why should you suffer that I might be taught? In you I have nothing to forgive. In me you have everything. Try and forget me. Let me go out of your life; and, oh, forgive me if you can. Thank you for your wishes for my happiness. At present it seems in the distance. Good-bye.—Yours sincerely and repentant, "Kitty Dunstan."

Another letter passed between them, and then it seemed as though they had passed out of each other's lives for good.

Gilbert returned to town, but his spirit for the time appeared crushed. He took no interest in anything. It was the first time he had been in love, and it took too great a hold upon him to be thrown off at once.

He had no business to go back to, to take him out of himself, which was bad; and he kept to his own society, and brooded over his trouble, which was worse.

He was for a time, in his own estimation, the most miserable man in London. He was getting over the worst, and was beginning to mix with his fellow-creatures again. And one evening, in the beginning of November, found him indulging in a dinner at the "Trocadero."

He was sitting at a table with a friend he had not seen for a considerable time, and they were discussing the most expensive menu and old times. A couple of bottles of champagne in ice by the table proved that the world was favourably inclined towards them. Gilbert had not much affection for his friend, Jack Wilson, but was enjoying his dinner, and the conversation, as an accompaniment, went well.

"By-the-bye," said Wilson, in the course of conversation, "did I tell you I was engaged, Gilbert?"

"No, my dear chap. Let me congratulate you."

"Thanks, awfully. It's rather a lucky thing for me; there's plenty of money flying round in her quarter."

"Lucky man. I suppose you are awfully fond of her, Jack?"

"Oh, well, I suppose I am in a way; she is good enough to like me; never was given to be sentimental myself, you know, but as there was money at the end of it, I went in and won."

Gilbert looked serious. He did not like this kind of thing. He hated the idea of marriage for money; but he felt he must take an interest now for his friend's sake.

"And who is the girl, may I ask?"

"Kitty Dunstan. I don't know whether you know her? What's the matter, old man! You're not ill, are you?"

Gilbert had turned white, and had dropped his spoon and fork upon his plate, which caused a little jump from several diners at neighbouring tables.

"No, the room's very warm, and these sweets are rather rich. I'll have some wine to pull me up." He drank two glasses straight off and seemed better. "Kitty Dunstan," he said, "yes I have met her. Look here"—he said, suddenly rising—"don't you hurry. I'm going to the door to get some fresh air; it's too hot in here. Come when you're finished."

Digitized by Google

Gilbert was in a worse position now than before. He would have borne up, believing that she was going to be happy, but how could he remain silent and let the girl he loved better than his life marry a man who cared practically nothing for her, only for what she would bring him.

It was terrible, yet what could he do!

He dare not tell her himself; he couldn't, it was unbearable. He at last decided it was impossible for him to do anything. He would go abroad, travel anywhere, and try to forget.

He did not see Wilson again. He dare not trust himself, and a month or two went by whilst he made arrangements for his tour.

It was about the middle of January, and Gilbert was sitting alone in his dismantled room the evening prior to his departure.

A servant entered, with a card upon a silver tray. He took it absently, but paled, and caught his breath as he read the name of Miss Dunstan.

Why, oh, why, did she come?

To see her would bring back memories he was doing his best to forget. But he could not send her away, and so he asked for her to be shown in.

He rose as she entered, and noticed that she was prettier than ever, though pale; and she looked as if she had been crying.

"Gilbert," she said, "you will forgive me for coming. You are going away, I know, and I wanted to see you before you went. I am in trouble, and I wanted sympathy."

"My dear little girl, what on earth is the matter? And why do you come to me—not that I wouldn't do anything for you—I shall always be ready to help you—but is there not someone else you ought to go to?"

"No! No! Gilbert." And her voice trembled. "He does not love me—not myself; it is only my money, and I am miserable."

Gilbert felt as though a load had been lifted from him. He felt happier, in spite of her trouble, than he had been for months past.

"Kitty, you know it. I am very sorry for you. I have known it some time, that is why I am going away. I could not bear to see you married to him."

"You have known it! Oh, then, why did you not tell me? You would have let me marry him, and you knew he did not love me. Oh, how could you!" And she burst into tears.

"Kitty, listen," he said, sitting down beside her and taking her hand. "How was it possible for me to tell you? I hardly think you would have believed me. Your aunt, everyone would have thought I was doing it for the sake of breaking off your engagement for my own ends. No, I couldn't have told you; do you not see that, Kitty?"

"Yes! Yes! Of course you could not. I heard it from his own lips. I was at a dance and was sitting out with my partner, when I heard Jack's voice from behind a screen. He was talking to another fellow, and about me. I could not help but listen. It was very hard for me. He said love was not a part of his nature—money was more in his line. Then his friend laughed and said he was a lucky fellow. Jack laughed too, and said 'yes, I rather think I am!' It came to an end that night. I shall never speak to him again."

"Thank God!" was Gilbert's muttered ejaculation. Aloud he said "Poor little girl, I am so sorry for you."

"I knew you would be, that was why I came. I wanted your sympathy. Auntie wouldn't give me any. She said I was foolish to give him up. Oh! I hated her then, and then I came to say good-bye." She looked up at Gilbert, and her voice trembled: "You are going away?"

"Why am I going away?" he exclaimed. "Kitty, it depends on you. Will you send me away? Ours was a chance acquaintance, cannot it ripen into something deeper? Kitty, you know I love you. I thought never to be able to tell you that again. Must I go?"

"I think you must go," she said. Then looked up at him and smiled. "But not to-morrow—wait awhile—and we needn't take auntie with us, unless you like."

Baxter Thompson.

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have just secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his prophecies for this week's birthdays.

August 12.—An unfortunate anniversary; go carefully in business. Some sickness in the family circle.

Those in love will have crosses and opposition, especially if born in the early morning, or from six to nine p.m.

The day is rather favourable to buy and sell from eight a.m. to five p.m. Deal with professional persons in the afternoon.

A child born to-day will be ambitious, generous, and cheerful. It will experience much sorrow, and be subject to accidents.

August 13.—Those whose birthdays fall to-day will have a year of change. Some grief in the family circle.

Girls will have many annoyances in love and domestic affairs; will need to be cautious with strangers as some deceit is shown.

The day is good for asking favours, seeking work, travelling, and introductions. Not good for love affairs and marriage.

A child born to-day will be fortunate and make its way in life.

August 14.—Men born on this day should not speculate; with care business will succeed.

A quiet time with love affairs. Girls receive good news from absent lovers.

A child born to-day should keep in employ. The mind will be active, witty, and ingenious. Fond of travel and literature.

August 15.—Not a fortunate year for business to those who celebrate their birthdays to-day. Farmers, builders, and landlords need care in their dealings.

Girls born from eight to nine p.m. will meet with deceit and trouble in love affairs. Many curious experiences.

The day is evil for letter writing, asking favours, removing, or for letting property. Defer travelling, and avoid law.

A child born to-day will be secretive, cunning, and difficult to know. Rather fortunate if born about noon.

August 16.—An unsettled birthday; the year will bring change and anxiety. Guard against quarrels and mishaps. Insure against fires.

Those in love, both sexes, will have trouble and disappointment.

A child born to-day will be suspicious, untidy, hot-tempered, and subject to mishaps. If a girl she will have an unhappy marriage.

August 17.—A quiet year; things proceed as usual. Some discord with friends or professional persons.

Girls need extra care with the opposite sex; some deceit and attentions from married men.

A child born to-day will have a quiet life. Will be clever and artistic, but abrupt and hold some strange beliefs.

August 18.—A good year for business for those whose birthdays come on this day. Friends will be useful.

Girls should seek introductions and new friends. Those who were born in the early morning will have chances of marriage.

A child born here will rise in life. Will be generous, affectionate, ingenious, and inventive. Will make friends easily.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google

A PRESCRIPTION FOR TWO.

Which Brought Happiness to Both Doctor and Patient.

Doctor Gilman rapped briskly on the front door, and drew the collar of his fur coat higher to shut out the sharp north wind. Inside the house there was a moment's confusion, and then Mrs. Green, assisted by six little Greens, opened the door.

"Why, doctor!" she cried in surprise. The little Greens lined up, and held their mouths open.

"The governess, I hear, is ill." Doctor Gilman announced the fact deliberately. He stepped into the hall, holding his medicine case in one hand, while, with the other, he made an opening in the line of little Greens.

Mrs. Green closed the door and protested. "The governess is here, but she isn't ill. That is, no more'n usual. She's always ailing," in a disparaging voice. "Did she send for you?"

The doctor ignored her question. He threw off his fur coat, picked up his medicine case again, and asked calmly, "Where is she?"

"In the sitting room," replied Mrs. Green, her arms akimbo. Instantly six small voices cried, "In here," and the noisy troop made a dash for a weary-looking figure lying on the couch near the fire-place.

Doctor Gilman paid no attention to the figure on the couch. He blocked the entrance against Mrs. Green, and said firmly, "Come children, I'm here to visit the sick only."

The Greens, unused to obeying, looked sulky.

"Hurry up," came the doctor's strong, cheerful voice, and as they filed slowly past him, casting longing glances behind, he added. "Now don't let me see one of you back here again until my visit ends." His glance included both mother and children.

Then he closed the door, drew a chair in front of the couch, and sat down.

"I have come to prescribe for you, Miss Eggy," he said, looking for the first time at the girl on the couch.

At his abrupt entrance, Becky Eggy had sat up. She leant an elbow against the back of the couch, and rested her throbbing head on her hand. She was perplexed at this unasked call from Doctor Gilman.

Life was always offering perplexities to Becky Eggy. The first had been her queer little name, and the last and greatest was what to do with her queer little self.

At least, Becky Eggy thought she must be a queer little self because everything she loved had been taken away, and so many things she did not love had been substituted, while she stood by, powerless to shape her life. In the midst of such great perplexities, Doctor Gilman's visit was the least.

"I am not ill, doctor," she replied in a wondering tone.

Doctor Gilman smiled inscrutably at the fire, and held his palms up to the warmth. Then he turned suddenly, and looked keenly at Becky Eggy. She fidgeted nervously with her black dress with one transparent hand. What was going to happen? Had he come to tell her she must give up her little school? Poor little Becky Eggy! What would become of her then?

All her faults swept in order before her; she could not make the big boys mind. How was that possible, when she had not strength enough even to shake the little ones? Her head ached so badly she often had to rest it on the desk; perhaps he had heard how, only a few days before, she was so tired she had insisted that six times eight are fifty-four. Sitting there before Dr. Gilman, she felt painfully ignorant and weak.

She looked at the doctor's hand lying on his knee. Once, when she had been so ill that even she was obliged to admit the fact, he had taken her head between his hands and pressed the ache out and she had slept.

As if in response to the memory, the doctor leant forward and laid his hand a moment, in his most professional manner, on her hot forehead. Then he leant back in his chair and said in a most unprofessional tone, "Tired little Becky Eggy!"

She rested her head against the high back of the couch, and hastily closed her eyes, but not until the doctor saw the gathering tears. He scanned the thin face and the shabby black dress with a curious expression on his face. Then he said abruptly, "So you are not ill?"

Becky shook her head. She could not trust herself to speak after the sympathy in the doctor's voice as he said, "Tired little Becky Eggy."

But his voice was not sympathetic now. It was brusque. "People who are well usually have a little colour in their faces and plumpness in their cheeks."

"It's walking so far in the snow and cold," said Becky faintly.

"You are not strong enough to walk. You ought to ride."

Becky attempted to smile. "But the 'ought' doesn't provide the horses."

"It does in this case," still more abruptly.

Becky's eyes opened widely now in spite of the tears. Doctor Gilman was incomprehensible. She made no reply, and he seemed to expect none. "Your school worries you, does it not? The big boys are a tiresome lot."

Becky gasped. It was the school after all. She dropped her eyes and a pitiful expression came into her face. Her voice faltered.

"I'll try to do better, doctor. You see, I am not strong enough to punish them. Perhaps, if I tried harder, I could manage all right—I'll try——" There was a choke in her voice.

Doctor Gilman looked at the thin hands moving nervously on the black skirt, and at Becky's strained, anxious face. She did not look equal to the emergency of managing even the smallest Green!

The doctor's lips smiled, but not his eyes. They filled as they looked into Becky's and her perplexity increased. His abrupt tone vanished, and his next words were very gentle:

"Will you take my prescription?"

She glanced down at the medicine chest on the floor, and said submissively, "Are you going to give me a tonic?"

Doctor Gilman laughed a little and pushed the medicine case away with his foot. "I brought that with me as a bulwark against the Greens."

Becky responded with a smile, and went on more cheerfully "I am willing to take everything you advise, doctor."

Doctor Gilman suddenly sat up very straight. "I prescribe a home——" He was looking at the fire now, but he saw Becky's lip quiver and her hands touch her black dress, "and care and—love."

"No, no," she whispered, "you know, perhaps you do not know—they are all gone. There is no one left except me."

Doctor Gilman looked at her with a smile which made his rugged face beautiful. "But it's my home I'm prescribing, dear little Becky Eggy, and my care, and my love. If they could bring you happiness——" The doctor did not finish the sentence, but looked wistfully at Becky.

She gazed at the fire now. Its warmth seemed to have settled, suddenly, around her heart. She had felt so useless a few moments before, so shorn of all womanly power and dignity. Now, her soul suddenly expanded in the knowledge of a satisfying love.

She looked up shyly, and said hesitatingly, "if your home and your—love—would bring me happiness, would I be the only one benefited by your prescription?"

"Dear little girl," said Doctor Gilman. He bent and kissed her face, soft in a new pink glow. "It's useless to confess that I have been prescribing for myself all the while."

A. Lee.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.

Mrs. Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia: Her companion.

THE MAN FROM JAMAICA.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF NEW READERS.

CYNTHIA tells in the opening chapter of her arrival at her cousin's in the capacity of companion, and of her discovery that Mrs. Norton is taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money are being lost and won. The climax is reached one night when Mary Vernon stakes her diamond ear-rings (a gift from Lord Kinross) and one of the onlookers finds them to be paste. The diamonds, it appears, were stolen by Mrs. Norton. A few weeks later the notorious Mrs. Norton, with Fluffy's help, succeeds in stealing a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew at the Café Regal, by substituting for the millionaire's pocket-book one exactly like it. Mrs. Norton now moves into her new house in Pont Street, and it is while here that Sir John Strickland, a poor baronet, proposes to her. She refuses, but hints to him that if he will consent to allow his name to appear on the directorate of certain companies he will be bound to make money, and then her answer might be different. Mrs. Norton is next presented at Court by her friend, Lady Gaveston. For this function she wears some superb diamonds which have been lent her by Lord Kinross. The Society papers declare her to be the most beautiful and best-dressed woman at the presentation. The same evening Lord Kinross calls at Pont Street for a private interview, and it is during this interview that Percival Hope enters the room unannounced, and makes the startling statement that Mary Vernon has discovered the thief who stole her diamonds. Shortly afterwards Mrs. Norton leaves the room, Cynthia however stays, unknown to Kinross and Percival Hope. While there she overhears Hope, who turns out to be Kinross' cousin, tell Kinross that in a fortnight's time he will prove to Kinross that Mrs. Norton is an adventuress living upon the proceeds of the robbery of her friends. Cynthia tells Mrs. Norton what she has overheard. On the evening of the next day Lady Gaveston tells Mrs. Norton that she doesn't approve of her behaviour towards Sir John Strickland, and that unless she decides at once either to marry or refuse him, she will return to Scotland. Mrs. Norton asks for and obtains a fortnight's grace in which to make up her mind. Mrs. Norton and Cynthia go to the Derby, where Mrs. Curtis Blount, instigated by jealousy, entices Cynthia to bet heavily, by which she loses £800. Mrs. Norton has also lost heavily, and to pay her own and Cynthia's debts, she prevails upon a young fellow, by promising marriage, to sign his uncle's name to a bill for £5,000. That same night at the Duchess of Warminster's ball, Mrs. Norton comes face to face with a man from Jamaica who knows all about her past life.

FOR a moment I thought Frankie was going to faint, the next, however, her power of will came into play. She dropped my arm, drew herself up, forced a smile to her lips, and with a self-command wonderful to witness, gaily disclaimed any feeling of ill-health or fatigue.

"I've been waltzing too much," she said to her agitated and concerned admirers, "and am just a little giddy. Indeed, it's nothing else, and you mustn't trouble any more about me. I'll rest the next dance, if you don't mind"—she smiled sweetly at her partner—"and Cynthia will take care of me."

She passed quickly from the room. Percival Hope and his companion remained behind.

Going swiftly down the corridor Frankie made her way to a seat well screened by flowers and ferns from observation.

"Cynthia," she said abruptly, "you've got to do something for me. Yes, it's in connection with that man. I must see him alone; speak to him if only for five minutes."

"Shall I tell him to come to you, Frankie?"

She drew me back impetuously.

"No, no, that would never do. Percival Hope doesn't mean to let him out of sight if he can help it, but you will have to make him."

"How?"

"You must go to Percival and talk to him, smile, laugh, jest, make love to him—do anything to get him out of the way, if only for five minutes. You can do it if you like, Cynthia. If I know anything of men, Hope won't need much persuasion to flirt with you. Your face always attracted him, and to-night you're looking at your best."

"Frankie, I can't! I don't know what to say."

She took me by the arm.

"You've got to," she said fiercely. "Listen, if I don't see that man to-night, alone, the game's up. I'm done for—ruined—and you with me. I tell you he knows things about me in Jamaica, things that will smash me utterly if they get about. Hope brought him here to-night to identify me, and is going to buy his knowledge to ruin me. But give me the chance of seeing, of speaking to him by myself and I'll defeat Hope yet. In five minutes, five minutes I can turn him round my finger. Don't I know—haven't I won every man I wanted to all my life? Only one I couldn't make a fool of, and he——" She paused—"he is in your hands. Go, go quickly. Get Hope out of the way and leave the rest to me. You won't fail me Cynthia? Promise."

Digitized by Google

"I'll do my best," I stammered, "but——"

"If you fail," she said quickly, "I shall kill myself. Now you know what to expect."

She pushed me from her as she spoke, and, too frightened to protest I went towards the ballroom. How I wished the corridor was twice, no, twenty times as long! How I longed to be anywhere in the wide world but there.

I have never experienced such mental confusion and discomfort as I suffered in the next few minutes. I was weighed down by the thought of what I had to do, even while I rebelled at having to go through it.

What could be more humiliating! I was to induce, if needs be, force, Percival Hope into conversation with me; he, whom at our last meeting I had dismissed with such indignant scorn.

As I approached the ballroom the band struck up a waltz. A young fellow came towards me quickly.

"Our dance, I think, Miss Hamilton," he said pleasantly. "I've been searching for you everywhere."

I felt myself turn crimson. It was impossible for me to dance with him. And yet what excuse could I make?

In my distress I fell back upon the truth, or rather part of it.

"If you don't mind I'd rather not dance this number, I want to stand here and watch instead."

"It's cooler on the stairs or in the conservatory," he suggested.

"I'm not tired," I explained, "but I want to stay here."

He looked surprised but made no further protest. Side by side we stood—just in the doorway. Amidst the crowd of dancers Percival Hope's great height made him conspicuous. He was standing by the window talking to Mary Vernon.

I stared hard at him but he either did not or would not see me. Once indeed he flashed a look in my direction, but when I smiled in answer, he deliberately turned his head. I bit my lips, colouring with mortification.

My companion regarded me, I thought, with suppressed amusement. More than one man glanced at me curiously—I fancy I must have looked distressed—and Chesterton, who was dancing with Mrs. Blount, positively frowned as he passed by. The situation was intolerable. I could not remain longer where I was, gaped at by people who should have known better. Time was passing, at any moment Percival might leave, and with him the man from Jamaica. And then——

An inspiration seized me. "I want to speak to Miss Vernon," I said to my partner, "can you pilot me across the room? She's sitting over there next to that tall man by the window."

"Do you mean Hope," said the youth. "Yes, I'll take you with pleasure."

Mary greeted me very nicely, she smiled and made room for me on the window seat. Percival bowed gravely and became interested in the ceiling.

"Aren't you going to speak to me, Mr. Hope?" I said at last. "I've been expecting you all the evening; indeed, I've kept a dance for you—but if you're going to be cross!" I showed him my programme as I spoke, with one vacant number. "Aren't you grateful?"

He looked at me with such a puzzled air, but I smiled quite steadily and motioned him to sit beside me, moving my skirts with a little gesture I had learnt from Frankie.

"Do you think my frock is pretty?" I went on, "or do you like me best in pink? You remember my pink dress surely—you sent me some roses to match."

"I remember quite well," he said slowly. "What a sweet, shy convent girl I thought you. I think, Miss Cynthia, all things considered, I liked you best in pink."

"Is that why you did not send me any flowers to-day?" I asked.

He gazed at me very earnestly.

"Would you have worn them?" he said anxiously.

"I wore your roses."

"But things were different then."

"Is it so much more difficult to like me now?" I whispered.

For a moment he made no reply. I glanced at him quickly, but what I saw in his face made me turn my head, my cheeks hot with shame. Mary Vernon, a surprised look in her eyes, had walked away. My late partner had also disappeared. Percival and I were left together.

I took a swift glance up and down the room. The man from Jamaica had drifted some distance from where we sat and was standing disconsolately alone. Through the doorway at the far end I caught a glimpse of Frankie. She was leaning on Sir Gregory's arm, and was walking towards—yes, towards the man from Jamaica.

At all costs I must keep Percival from seeing her, from stopping her. I leant back, the window curtains shading me from the room.

Percival leant towards me.

"It is—difficult, Cynthia," he said at last.

"Do you wish so much to dislike me?" I asked.

"I desire more to love you," he replied, and moved closer, resting his arm behind me on the lounge.

"And yet you think me frivolous, shallow?" said I, fencing desperately.

"I am not in the mood to discuss your faults. I like better to look at your face. Look at me, Cynthia."

He took my hands and turned me gently towards him. I forced myself to meet his eyes, and read therein that which for the moment made me forget all things, save that we two were together; forget that I was holding him by trickery, keeping him by stratagem, playing with him and with his love—for what? I remembered then, remembered that I was fighting for time, that my cousin might save herself—she had said it—from disgrace, and at the cost of honour, self-respect, love, ay, his love, I must play the game to the end, fight it to a finish.

"I have not thought you cared for me much," I said.

He sighed impatiently. "Things have been against us," he said, "and are still. I had not meant to speak to you while you were with your cousin, but Fate has willed it otherwise. You have thought me harsh and cruel in the past, Cynthia, you may have occasion to do so again, but I would ask you to trust me, to believe that I act for the best, so far as I can see it, and always in sympathy and tenderness to you. Indeed, my thoughts are much for you, and all my love. Will you have me, Cynthia?"

I have no words to paint the tenderness, the gentleness in his voice, no words could tell the sorrow in my heart, that I could not freely give to him the trust, the confidence that he invited, that I could not gladly, proudly accept his love.

"I am impatient, dear, I want your answer," he took my hand. I let it lie unresisting in his clasp, and for a moment we sat silent.

Digitized by Google

CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

New Series of Stories.

My cousin had reached the man from Jamaica, and was speaking to him; he flushed at her approach, and glanced round apprehensively for Percival. Thank Heaven, the curtains sheltered him from view; thank Heaven, his face was turned to me so that he could not see the man's imploring look. My cousin smiled, the man grew quieter, more composed, gradually yielded to her fascination, and—yes, followed her from the room.

My eyes fixed on the clock, I sat wound up to bear what might ensue in the next five minutes. Never did the seconds tick so slowly. Five minutes—it was an age, eternity.

"I am waiting for your answer, Cynthia."

"A minute longer," I said, trembling, "a minute." The time was up and I was free to speak.

"I couldn't marry a man who tried to make Frankie unhappy," I said slowly. "If you would think and act differently towards her——" I paused, anxiously watching his face. "Promise me that from this evening you will let her be and then," I laid my hand upon his arm. "Poor Frankie," I said softly, "haven't you any pity?"

For a while he made no answer; he was, I think, softened by what I said, for his eyes were quite tender. It may be that he would have given the promise that I asked, and so have altered both our lives. But on the instant, as he was about to speak, he caught a glimpse of Frankie gazing eagerly in our direction. He looked from her to me, then with a flash of comprehension, glanced quickly round the room searching, I felt it, for the man from Jamaica!

Wrath on his face he turned upon me. Instinctively I shrank from him towards my cousin.

He pulled me back quite roughly into the shadow of the curtains.

"So you've been fooling me," he said, in a hard, grating voice, "leading me on, idiot that I am, from one crass stupidity to another. A dupe, is that it? A dupe to your innocent face and childish ways, a fool who has plucked out his heart for you to kick at. Oh, you have played your part to admiration. You have hood-winked me to the top of your bent. Do you think I don't see through it all, understand the whole mean business from beginning to end? Your cousin wanted to get hold of Casellis, the man that I brought here to-night, and you, as her decoy, were told off to befool me. You have succeeded to perfection! I congratulate you on your ready wit, your aptitude for learning how to cheat is wonderful. No, you shall not go yet. I have still more to say. Had you asked me honestly, fairly to let your cousin speak to Casellis, I would not have refused you. I say it, I mean it. What have you gained by your deceit? I loved you, Cynthia, truly, deeply, as a man can. You were to me something apart, far different from, above all other women. My thoughts of you were moments of exquisite tenderness, you were sweet and fresh to me as a Spring morning. And now," he broke off and pointed to my cousin. "Now," he said, "I realise that you and she are hideously alike."

He flashed a last look of indignation, then turned away. I sank limp and inert on to the window-seat. My limbs seemed to have grown powerless, and I felt stunned. I watched the dancers in a dull, unapprehending fashion, and wondered they could be so happy and light-hearted. I did not seem to feel anger at Percival's injustice, nor resentment at Frankie's selfishness. I was dazed with pain and misery, and could not analyse my sensations. Only I longed greatly for a quiet place where I could suffer alone.

A peremptory signal from Frankie roused me.

I got up and wearily made my way towards her.

"You're looking tired," she said, "come with me and have something to eat. I've secured chicken and champagne for you."

She drew me into an ante-room, put me in a chair, and forced me to eat.

"You've done awfully well, Cynthia, and I'm very grateful to you. I've talked Casellis over, and he's consented to give Percival the slip if I pay him a thousand pounds. But he'll only wait until twelve o'clock to-morrow. If he doesn't have the money then he'll go to Hope and give me away, lock, stock, and barrel. Never mind what he knows—it's quite enough to do for me—that's all you need trouble over. Now there's only one way I can get the money, the few hundreds I have left of what Nathan advanced I want for present expenses. Sir John has lent me all he can, not another penny can be squeezed from him. There's only Fluffy left, and he, as you know, is starting for Paris early in the morning. I dare not leave it till then, at all costs I must get the cheque to-night."

I looked at her despairingly.

"It isn't possible, Frankie. It's past midnight."

"I know, but Fluffy never turns in till quite late. I would go to him myself but my absence would be commented on. I've made a great hit to-night, Cynthia, and I want to follow it up. It would be a great mistake to leave so early in the evening. Now your going won't matter."

"Why, Frankie, you don't mean to send me to Fluffy's?" I asked piteously.

She glanced at me, uncertain whether to frighten or cajole. I think my face must have startled her, I felt very white and tired—for with one of her swift changes she grew gentle and caressing.

"I was her dear little Cynthia, if only I would do this one thing for her she would be for ever grateful. If I refused what could she do? She had no one else to turn to," this and much more in the same strain with kisses and endearments.

"I'm not asking you to do anything wrong, Cynthia. It's a little unconventional certainly, but you're not usually so particular. Besides, you can settle with Fluffy about your shares at the same time. The bets oughtn't to go unpaid after to-morrow. If you see Fluffy to-night, the matter will be settled and done with."

At that I felt a little bit relieved. It would be something to lose one's anxiety, at any rate.

"You'll go, Cynthia?"

"I suppose so," I sighed. "Goodness knows where it will all end, Frankie. I feel frightened somehow."

"Nonsense. You're overstrained, that's all. A drive in a hansom will freshen you up. Come, you're not going to be silly? Would you like Ella to go with you?"

"No thank you," I said weakly, drying my eyes, "I'll get through somehow by myself. Have you written what you want to Fluffy?"

"Yes, here's the note. You know his address? Drive to the Temple and tell the cab to wait for you. I've brought your cloak, so you can slip downstairs, send for a hansom and get away without anyone knowing. They're nearly all at supper. Ready? That's right, give me a kiss. Bring me back good news. Mind I must have that cheque."

She watched me down the corridor, then flitted away, a brilliant figure in her gorgeous dress.

The staircase and the great hall were comparatively deserted, but a stream of men came out of the smoke-room as I passed by; Lord Chesterton and Percival Hope among them.

His lordship hurried after me.

"I'm tired," I explained, "and want to get away. No, you mustn't come with me on any account, but if you'd tell them to fetch me a hansom I should be grateful."

Digitized by Google

He went forward to give the instructions; for a minute Percival stood quite close to me. His face was troubled, as he met my eyes, its expression deepened into regret, almost, I thought, self-reproach. I looked weary and forlorn in my white draperies, and the sight seemed to hurt him.

He followed Chesterton, who put me in the cab. His lordship waved adieu from the top of the steps, Percival remained on the pavement.

I put up the trap and corrected the address that Chesterton had given.

"Not Pont Street," said I sharply, "drive to the Temple."

Percival must have heard what I said, for he gave a start at the words, and made a step forward as though to stop me. If that was his intention he was too late. We had already started. Once or twice during that midnight drive I fancied I was being followed. The jingle of a hansom close behind kept time with us, hastening or slackening speed. It gave me an eerie feeling, but as we approached the Strand and neared my journey's end, the sensation was lost in a whirl of conflicting emotions. Would Fluffy be there, would he send my cousin the cheque? Also would he give me the money for my shares? If not, Frankie declared that she must bid a long farewell to Society and the smart set. And I—I shivered in my cloak. What would become of me?

The cab drew up at the Temple gates, close shut as any prison. Telling the driver to wait, I summoned up my courage and knocked at the grim portals. The porter could not tell me for certain if Mr. Thomson was in, but he thought so.

Fluffy rented his flat from a barrister friend at present in South Africa. They were nice rooms, and suited Fluffy, being near the City, and not so very far from the West End. Frankie and I had lunched with him several times, and I had been there with messages more than once. But then it had been daylight, now the place looked quite different. Strange, lonely, remote, it seemed far from the bright town, far from the present time.

I hastened nervously through the deserted courts, glancing timidly behind me, for I fancied I heard footsteps following; the moon cast fantastic shadows on the flagstones, touching the grey walls of the old buildings with a beautiful, soft light. It was very still, and very strange.

Fluffy's flat was half way up a tall block of buildings. The entry was dark, I stumbled once or twice, and half thought I heard the footsteps hurrying towards me. Fear gave me strength. I flew up the old staircase, nor paused until I found myself at Fluffy's door.

I knocked loudly, startling the echoes of the grim place. I had not long to wait. Quiet, self-possessed, Fluffy himself stood before me.

Now Mr. Thomson was invariably nice to me, but I thought it strange, on this occasion he did not seem at all pleased that I had come. He frowned when I said Frankie had sent me to him, and muttered something about "shameful."

However, he soon regained his good-humour, took me into the sitting-room, and put me into a comfortable chair. He then read Frankie's note, asked one or two incisive questions, and sat down to write.

"You'll send Frankie what she wants?" I said wistfully. "She's afraid this man will ruin her if he doesn't have the money. Don't think me curious, Mr. Thomson, indeed, I don't want to pry into my cousin's affairs, but has she any real cause to fear this person? I was too confused to ask Frankie when she sent me here, but surely her fears are exaggerated?"

"I share your views, Miss Cynthia. Mrs. Norton has nothing really to fear from this Casellis—what could he know to harm her? What, indeed, is there for him or anyone to know? But your cousin is a beautiful woman and attractive to men, about such people are ever ready to talk, not always kindly. In Jamaica, as elsewhere, she excited envy as well as admiration. There may have been some little gossip concerning your cousin and certain of her admirers. This gossip Casellis might retail. As for its effect on people who know your cousin——" He shrugged his shoulders—"Society's a strange thing, full of caprices as a Creole. I have known a bit of gossip ruin a woman's reputation before now."

"Surely it would be better to threaten Casellis than pay him? Don't you think so, Mr. Thomson?"

Fluffy smiled amiably.

"I think we must leave that for Mrs. Norton to decide," he said, and commenced looking through some papers.

For a minute there was silence, the silence of night, deep, profound.

The next and the stillness was broken.

There came a knocking, violent and prolonged, upon the outer door.

Fluffy started to his feet, his face white and distressed. His eyes sought mine, then glanced hurriedly round the room. He was more perturbed than I had ever seen him.

"Too bad," he muttered under his breath, "and such a child!"

Then, for the knocking was continuous, with a last look, protesting and apologetic, he went quickly from the room.

I heard the opening of the door, a voice, quick and angry, hurried footsteps down the hall. The portière was roughly flung aside, a figure, a man's figure strode into the room.

With a scream I started to my feet.

Percival Hope stood there before me!

(Another exciting instalment appears next Tuesday.)

Hard to Please.

PAPA: "My daughter tells me, sir, that you kissed her forcibly last night. What have you to say for yourself?" Harry: "I'm sure nobody regrets the occurrence more than I do." Papa and Daughter (together): "Sir!"

Some Alteration Necessary.

"HURRY to the door, Mary, and let Mr. Smith in. He has rung twice." "That isn't Mr. Smith, it is the other young gentleman." "Well, wait a minute, then. I must change these photographs on the mantelpiece."

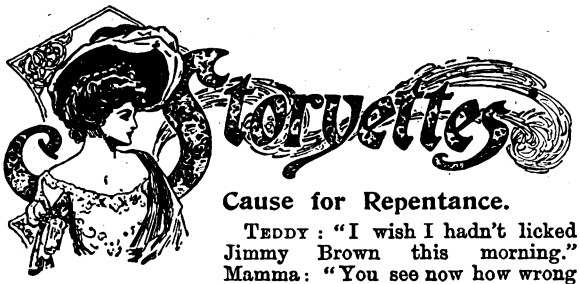
To Create an Impression.

BROTHER CLAUDE: "Waiting to see Ethel?" Young Somerby: "Yes; I sent up my card some time ago." "Well, she isn't in." "Why am I kept waiting, then?" "I heard mamma say she expected the new minister every minute, and you look so well with the rest of the things in the parlour she wanted to keep you."

An Able Partner.

"TOM, I hear that you are engaged to Miss Spider." "Yes." "But do you intend to marry her?" "Why not?" "Is it possible that you have not heard?" "Heard what?" "That she has, at different times, sued five men for breaches of promise?" "Yes, I heard that." "And still you intend to marry her?" "Of course. She won all the suits, and as I am a lawyer I cannot help but admire her skill. She will make me an able partner, old boy, and business is so slow with me that I cannot afford to let such an opportunity slip through my fingers."

Digitized by Google



Cause for Repentance.

Teddy: "I wish I hadn't licked Jimmy Brown this morning." Mamma: "You see now how wrong it was, don't you, dear?" Teddy: "Yes, 'cause I didn't know till noon that he was going to give a party."

Not to be Declined.

"A kiss, I'm told," said pretty Susie Brown, "is both a common and a proper noun." "That's true," her lover said, "but you will find it is a noun not easily declined."

Married Bliss.

Mr. Nuwed: "Good gracious, dear, what on earth have you been doing with my meerschaum pipe?" Mrs. Nuwed: "Why, darling, I saw it all stained brown, so I gave it a good scouring with Bristol brick; but it doesn't seem to have done much good."

Practice v. Sentiment.

A sentimental poet writes: "How can I meet my darling?" After some deliberation over the question we have come to the conclusion that he can meet her by approaching her from an opposite direction.

Solving the Problem.

George: "Women are still pushing their way into all the industries." Jack: "That's so. I have just been discharged to make way for a woman." "You have? Well, well! What are you going to do now?" "I am trying to marry the woman."

Heroism.

Sharpe: "I saved a girl's life this morning." Wooden: "Why, how was that?" Sharpe: "Well, I was smoking on the hotel verandah that cigar you gave me, and she said, 'Pardon me, sir, but that cigar is killing me.' So I threw it away and smoked one of my own."

Curiosity.

She: "Women haven't a bit more curiosity than men, I'm certain." He: "No, but it is manifested in different lines. For instance, a woman might own a sewing-machine without finding out how it is made, but she wouldn't have a seamstress in the house a day without knowing all about her."

A Suitable Profession.

"I don't believe in opposing the preferences of a son in the matter of choosing a profession," said an indulgent father. "Nor I," said another father. "Has your son chosen his profession?" "Well, in a way." "What is it?" "Why, he was stage-struck, and insisted that he was 'born for the boards,' as he expressed it; and so I apprenticed him to a carpenter!"

Philanthropic Travellers.

Little Ethel: "Read me some of that pretty story, won't you, mamma?" Mamma: "Very well. Where were we? Oh! here is the place: 'When the half-frozen travellers had reached the shore they climbed up the bank, and, skirting the woods——'" Little Ethel: "What did they do that for, mamma?" Mamma: "Why, it was winter, you know, dear, and the wind blew fiercely, so they——" Little Ethel: "Oh, I know. The limbs of the poor little trees were bare, so the travellers skirted them. Wasn't it nice of the kind travellers?"

Nearly the Same.

Little Girl: "Did you ever dream of being in Heaven?" Little Boy: "No, not 'xactly; but I dreamt that I was right in the middle of a big apple dumpling."

Squeezing Business.

"Seems to me, Maud, that young Mr. Hankinson stayed pretty late last night. Did he have any pressing business?" Maud (blushingly): "Not till just before he went away, mamma."

Love at First Sight.

She: "Here come the bride and bridegroom. Do you suppose it was a case of love at first sight?" He: "Oh, yes. He caught a glimpse of the conterfoil of her father's cheque book."

Has to be Muscular.

She: "Why is it they speak of a man as a 'strong' candidate? He doesn't have to lift anything, does he?" He: "Er—not exactly; but his friends all expect him to carry the day."

Rough on Father.

Perdita: "If you continue much longer to play cards with my father I won't marry you." Jack Dashing: "If your father continues to play cards much longer with me I won't need to marry you."

Unhealthy Kissing.

Mr. Huggins: "What do you think of the latest medical dictum that kissing is unhealthy?" Mr. Hunker: "It is quite true. Mr. Munn happened to catch me kissing his daughter, and I was laid up a whole week."

He Paid for It.

Stranger: "You are the only gentleman in the room." Guest: "In what way, sir?" Stranger: "When I tripped in the dance, and went sprawling on the floor, tearing my fair partner's dress, you were the only one in the room who did not laugh." Guest: "The lady is my wife, and I paid for the dress."

But She Didn't Jump.

"Is it true, Miss Gertie," he said, "that there are just two things a woman will jump at—a conclusion and a mouse?" "No," she answered. "There is a third, Mr. Philip." After thinking the matter over for a few minutes he tremblingly made her an offer, but she didn't jump at it. He was not the right man.

Great Business Ability.

Father: "I hope you are doing well in the financial world, my boy?" Son: "Yes, father; I made three thousand last year, but if I have good luck this year I shall make a cool fifty thousand." "You have great business ability, Jack. It is a legitimate speculation, I suppose?" "Oh, yes; Miss Hendrick is going to answer me to-night."

Misunderstood.

Passenger (angrily): "Why didn't you stop the car for me?" Conductor: "How was I to know you wanted to get on?" Passenger: "Didn't you see me swinging my arms, and jumping up and down and waving my umbrella?" Conductor: "Of course. Could anyone help seeing you? The whole street was looking at you." Passenger: "Then why didn't you stop?" Conductor: "I thought you were dancing to that organ."

A Case for Pity.

She was not young, but she had money. "Dearest," he began, but she stopped him. "I anticipate what you are about to say, Mr. Simkins," she said, "and I would spare your feelings, for it can never be. I esteem you highly, and will be a sister to——" "I have four sisters already," he interrupted bitterly; "four grown-up sisters—and life is a hideous burden. But, oh, Clara," he went on passionately, "if you cannot be my wife, will you not give me a mother's protecting love? I am an orphan."

Digitized by Google

LOVE'S SILENT WORK.

A Pretty Little Romance of a City Office.

Miss Lizzie Metcalfe sat in front of the typewriting machine with her hands resting idly in her lap, and with a vacant stare in her usually expressive eyes. Presently her brows curved slightly as the eyes assumed a troubled look and the whole appearance of her face indicated deep and perplexed meditation. Her thoughts ran in this way:

"I shall not be able to endure this for long; I must get another situation. That won't be difficult, but I don't think I can bear that, either. Oh, dear, how wretched I feel!"

There was just a suspicion of moisture about the eyes; she closed the lids in order to repress the rising tears, but this had the effect of making the first tears emerge and cling to the lashes. She hastily wiped them away, and glanced round to make sure that no one had entered and seen her.

"Mr. Henry Carter—Harry, I cannot help calling him—has changed much during the past few weeks. I suppose I ought not to have imagined that the managing clerk of a stockbroking firm such as this would ever think of me except as a typist, yet——" She seemed afraid to pursue the thought further, and looked round again. "Yes, he did. He paid marked attention to me, and encouraged me to think that—that he was—in love with me! Why should I not think it? I love him; I can, at least, admit that to myself. There is nothing to be ashamed of, even if he does not return it. Love recognises no controlling power; it comes as it will. But I am certain that he loved me, and now he avoids me as much as he can. What does it mean?"

Then her thoughts took another turn, apparently not more congenial.

"I must get away from here, because Mr. Desmond's attentions are becoming too evident. I can't marry that man, and if the chief of a big firm finds that a typist in his employ doesn't want him, there is no doubt about what will happen. Oh, I wonder why these things happen? And what has made Harry look so careworn lately?"

She was aroused from a deep reverie by the entrance of one of the juniors.

"Hallo, Miss Metcalfe! Haven't you been out to lunch?"

Lizzie coloured slightly as she remembered that she had sat for three-quarters of an hour busy with her thoughts instead of going out to lunch as she should have done.

"I —I didn't feel quite well, thank you!" she stammered. "I don't want any lunch."

"Oh, but you must have some!" expostulated the youth with good-natured concern. "You haven't appeared quite well lately, you know, and——"

"I have some biscuits," interrupted Lizzie hurriedly, not liking the idea that her secret should in part have shown itself in her looks and manner. "Those will be sufficient."

The afternoon was rather a busy one for all in the firm, and Lizzie had little time to think of her own concerns. All the letters had been cleared off, and she was thinking of going when Mr. Desmond called her in to take down another letter.

"You needn't stop for me, Carter," he said. "I'll lock the private door when we leave."

All the clerks had gone, and Carter had no desire to stay. He went to the lavatory to wash before departing, for he was a well-groomed man, leaving his roll top desk open.

Mr. Desmond was a man of fifty, just a little under, perhaps, but not far from the half century. He was a widower, with a daughter about the same age as Miss Metcalfe, as he himself remembered with just a little misgiving. Of course, he admitted, it would be more natural for her to fall in love with a younger man—Carter, for instance, a smart fellow of twenty-eight, who had risen to his present position by his ability. Still, there was no reason why she should have any objection to marrying a man of fifty. He had money, which counted for a good deal in such matters, and there was also a great amount of truth in the hackneyed remark about a young man's slave and an old man's darling. And he wasn't an old man! A woman gets old sooner than a man, so the discrepancy would lessen as the years went on!

Mr. Desmond took a long time to collect his thoughts in order to dictate that letter, and he appeared to have mislaid a paper containing information necessary for the purpose. They heard Carter return to his room, and they heard him depart.

"He didn't shut his desk," thought Lizzie. "I didn't hear the rattle and the bang. I must shut it when I have done. What a time this tiresome man is! Can he be doing this on purpose?"

She had guessed correctly.

"Miss Metcalfe," said Desmond suddenly. "I have no letter to dictate; I want to say something. I'll go straight to the point. I want you to marry me!"

He gazed at her anxiously, waiting for some reply. She turned pale, her very lips seemed white. She tried to speak, but no words came.

"I am afraid that I have upset you," said Desmond with some compunction. "It was rather sudden, I suppose, but surely you have guessed something from my manner lately? My daughter, I am sure, will be delighted!"

He was not at all sure of that, despite his words; he had made that remark for want of something better to say. He was confused.

"I really don't know what to say," gasped Lizzie at length. It was perfectly true; she felt that she could not accept, but she wished to say so in a manner that would not utterly offend him, and that was beyond her strength at that moment. "I think that you might do—that is, I don't think—— Oh, Mr. Desmond, let me go now and I will tell you to-morrow!" she concluded in desperation.

"Certainly!" responded Desmond with alacrity. He was feeling uncomfortable.

Lizzie almost rushed from the place and hurried home to her lodging. Her first idea was to write a refusal, and not go to the offices of Desmond and Co. again, but on reflection she gave up the notion and resolved to wait till the morrow and make the refusal as gently as possible. The decision to wait was in itself trivial, but it changed the whole course of events.

Lizzie's sleep was troubled; she dreamt in several ways that Harry was in distress, and that did not strike her as strange because she knew how preoccupied and thoughtful—almost neglectful—he had been. Her first thought on awaking was that she had not shut his desk; she took this upon herself as an act of negligence, for which he would blame her; she ought to have done it over night before leaving the office.

"It isn't my business!" she muttered at the breakfast table. Nor was it, yet she felt in an indefinable manner that she ought to have done it. "Perhaps I think so because I love him!" she admitted. And she forthwith resolved to get to the office before anyone else and shut it.

The caretaker handed her the key when she reached the large building in which the suite of offices was located. She entered the outer office and passed swiftly to Carter's small private room. The desk was open, and a curious clerk or office boy could have amused himself with the perusal of papers regarded as private by the firm, and possibly of Carter's personal papers and letters.

Digitized by Google

As she approached the desk she noticed two letters lying on it, stamped ready for posting. Understanding that the managing clerk had forgotten these in his preoccupation, she took them up and casually glanced at the addresses, and her face paled. One was addressed to "Miss A. Desmond" and the other to a man to whom Carter often wrote. Then she noticed another thing; the writer had exchanged the addresses, sending Miss Desmond's letter to the male correspondent and vice-versâ.

"He is writing to her! Then he is in love with her, and she returns his affection!" murmured Lizzie hopelessly, a sharp pain at her heart. "I must send these letters on, but I must alter the addresses. Shall I type fresh envelopes and inclose these as they are?" She was almost too agitated to know what to do for the best, but she finally decided to take the addressed envelope off the letters and place them in fresh ones, addressed on the typewriter.

"No one will then know that he made a mistake, and he will not be laughed at!"

She addressed the envelopes first, then opened the letters; and then, perhaps it was only human nature, she read a line of the letter.

It certainly was not one of a series of love letters; it was like an apology for writing. She forgot the usual rules of upright conduct and read on.

It was a humble proclamation of affection; the writer dared to lay his suit before her in the hope that she would not find it unacceptable, that she would favour him with a reply and an appointment, or allow him to approach her father on the subject.

What did it mean? Lizzie stamped the letter as an effort, not a spontaneous effusion. That was not like Harry; moreover, Miss Desmond was scarcely the kind of girl to attract him, she reflected, although she had thought differently at first when reading the superscription on the envelope.

She was standing at his desk now, and she looked upon it as if in search of a clue. She found it in the form of a crumpled piece of paper just inside a pigeon-hole.

She felt no scruples now; she did not stop to feel or think anything. She smoothed out the paper and deciphered a few of the shorthand notes hastily written thereon. Only a small portion of the writing was legible to her, but that was enough. She took the other letter and read it; afterwards she placed the two letters in the new envelopes and hastened to post them. The air was cool and it soothed her.

"Good Heavens! I see it all now!" she gasped, her breath coming in short, quick pants. "I see now why he has been so worried, and I understand one or two remarks I have heard, weeks ago. Harry has been speculating with the firm's money; he was fortunate for a time, so he could 'cut a dash,' as they say; but he has lost and must get two thousand pounds in a few days, or——"

She shuddered; it was too terrible to think of.

"He is in debt now all round, and a loan is impossible. He will be found out in a few days, so he is trying to win the affections of Desmond's daughter as a last resource. If he succeeds, he will save himself, for Desmond cannot prosecute his daughter's affianced husband. He will be unhappy with her, and it is not fair to himself, to her, or—anyone else!"

She was back in the office again. Harry was making a desperate move, but it was very doubtful whether he would succeed, as the time was so short that the plot could not be far enough advanced for him to shelter himself behind the engagement. Could she, Lizzie, do anything to save him?

"I cannot believe that he is really wicked, he has been led away and this would be a terrible warning to him. I am sorry that he has come in contact with Groser, he is not a good man. Is there any way? Yes! It is hateful of me, but love is self-sacrificing, and I will do it—for him!"

Mr. Desmond shot a meaning glance at her as he passed through the office, her heart beat high, and she half arose to follow him, but sank back again. She must not be too precipitate. The managing clerk passed to his room, and it was evident that he knew nothing of his forgetfulness of the previous evening.

At last, Lizzie's agitation would allow her to remain inactive no longer, she rose from her chair with an air of stern determination and went straight to Desmond's room.

Mr. Desmond watched her expectantly as she carefully closed the door behind her. Lizzie approached him with an expression of determination which Desmond tried to interpret as an indication of pleasure, but with indifferent success.

"I have come to give you my answer, Mr. Desmond," said Lizzie with an effort. Her mouth was dry, and she had some difficulty in uttering the words. "I will consent to—to marry you—on one condition."

"Any condition you like!" exclaimed Desmond jumping up and taking her hand. "I hardly expected—and yet, I thought—I mean, I'm as happy as can be!" And Desmond certainly appeared beside himself with delight. "There is nothing I wouldn't do for you, Miss Metcalfe! Let me see, what is your Christian name? You must call me by mine, you know, and you must give up this work, and——"

It is impossible to tell how long he would have rattled on if Lizzie, who felt herself shrink from him, had not stopped him.

"You may not agree to the condition, after all, Mr. Desmond," she interrupted, trying hard not to betray her agitation. "It is this—That you give me two thousand pounds in Bank of England notes to-morrow!"

Desmond stared; he did not consider the condition a very onerous one, for he had made much money, but he was startled at the strangeness of it. What could a girl like Miss Metcalfe want with that sum, cash down at once?

"Ah, you do not agree!" cried Lizzie, showing distress in spite of herself. "But I must have the money or I will not consent. To-morrow or the next day?"

"Oh, I agree!" exclaimed Desmond hastily. He was not going to lose her. "But, you see, it's a strange condition. I can give you the money now, if necessary, but—h'm!—it is strange that a young woman should require so much immediately. You could have all you wanted when we are married, you see! Yes, yes, perhaps some relative is in trouble, eh?"

Desmond did not feel quite easy; it was mysterious, and he wished to get to the bottom of that mystery. He was an honourable man, very strict in his dealings, and with a horror of everything that appeared shady. The kind of man who would be generous to those who did right and very severe, almost merciless, to those who went astray.

"Exactly!" responded Lizzie laconically. She dared not trust herself to say much.

"Well, I can help them in other ways, perhaps," continued Desmond. "It is not always wise to do as you propose; it is sometimes better to help a little, and so stimulate individual effort towards getting out of trouble."

"Not in this case. The money is wanted at once," said Lizzie decisively.

"Then you shall have it to-morrow!" declared Desmond. He felt a pang of disappointment that the girl was not giving herself to him freely, but there is a thorn with most roses, and he persuaded himself that it was all right, and that they would be very happy together.

"Thank you!" said Lizzie simply.

She was about to turn towards the door when he caught her and lifted her face—such a white face!—to his, at the same time stooping to kiss her. The handle of the door moved, and Desmond hastily released her as Carter entered. He was too busy with the subject in his mind to notice anything; he concluded that Lizzie had been taking down letters, and held the door open for her to pass out.

An office-boy, who entered Desmond's office an hour later, was stricken with temporary speechlessness at seeing that gentleman waltzing about the room. Desmond hurried out to lunch after that, and when he returned he placed an envelope in front of Lizzie.

"I have fulfilled the condition without waiting for to-morrow," he whispered, and I expect you to come and thank me!"

He passed through the office to his room. The clerks were at lunch. Lizzie trembled as she recognised that the notes were there. She forgot about going to thank Mr. Desmond; she hastily typed a few words on a plain slip of ordinary note-paper which she had in her drawer, placed it in the envelope, then sealed the latter and laid it on Carter's desk. The words contained on that slip were: "From a friend. To help you out of trouble and disgrace."

Digitized by Google

Lizzie watched the door till Carter entered, and then hurried away to have her own lunch. She ate nothing, she could not eat, and she wandered aimlessly about the City streets till she suddenly remembered that she had been absent longer than the prescribed limit of time, when she returned to the office as quickly as she could.

"I say, Miss Metcalfe, the governor is waiting for you!" cried the office boy. "There's something wrong. Miss Desmond came just now and—There, that's his bell again!"

Miss Desmond had found out that her father wanted to marry his typewriter girl and objected, so thought Lizzie as she took off her hat and jacket and answered the call. She was in a dazed condition.

"Miss Metcalfe," said Desmond, holding out a letter, "has the money required by you any connection with this?"

Lizzie took the letter, and her heart sank as she recognised the letter written by Carter to his friend and accomplice. It was useless to make any denial, the letter stated the sum required, and detailed circumstances that revealed the misdeeds of Carter, and the blow had come so suddenly that Lizzie's countenance betrayed her. But how did that letter get into her employer's hands, and what had Miss Desmond to do with it? Then the idea flashed across her mind; she had, in her agitated condition, placed the letters in the wrong envelope and sent the incriminating epistle to Miss Desmond. In trying to save the man she loved, she had brought a disaster upon him!

"I know that the envelope was typed by Miss Metcalfe," observed Miss Desmond coldly. "She has a set way of typing envelopes. She knows all about this wrong use of your money!"

Lizzie Metcalfe sank into a chair and sobbed bitterly for a while, but Desmond spoke kindly to her, after bidding his daughter remain silent, and soon had the whole story out of her, so far as she knew it. It was not pleasant to learn that the girl had tried to sacrifice herself in order to save the man she loved; yet, on the other hand, it made him regret that he could not possess a woman who was ready to do so much. He stifled a sigh that such love could not be given to him, and asked the still weeping girl to go straight home at once.

"But you won't punish him, will you?" pleaded Lizzie. "I am sure he is not really wicked; it was a temptation."

"I will do my best," said Desmond, as he conducted her to the door. "For your sake!" he added, in a low, wistful tone.

Miss Desmond departed a little later, and Desmond rang for Carter.

"Carter," said his chief gravely, "this letter was sent to the wrong person. It will not be necessary for you to secure the hand of my daughter as stated therein, in order to raise the money, or get out of the scrape. The money has been obtained for you by some one in the office. You can guess who that is! Although there is no need for flight, it will be well for you to go away to some other country where you can begin again and work honestly. I will forgive the discrepancy which I shall detect in your books, and I will also give you the notes laid on your desk. They were mine, but you owe them to a girl who was ready to sacrifice herself to save you, and would have done so but for an accident. I do not suppose that you will ever possess her now, but you can at least try to be worthy of her!"

The last words have never ceased to ring in the ears of Carter, and they have furnished him with a motto and an incentive in the colony where he has settled. It is six years ago, but he knows through a friend that Lizzie Metcalfe is still single, and hope is gradually rising in his breast that he may one day venture to write to her and ask her if she will join him in the far-off land, and that she will consent.

Geo. Day.

Your Editor Chats.

As I promised last week, I am now going to give you a few hints as to the best method of putting your ideas for a story into readable form.

To begin with, the most successful stories are those which don't deal with "trick" ideas, but with the human emotions. By "trick" idea stories, I mean stories the plots of which turn on some sort of improbable invention—a walking stick or brooch which squirts out poison at an appropriate moment, or a mysterious handle to a front door which seems to have a human face in it, or nonsense of that sort. Avoid, if possible, incidents in which there is anything of the "knock-about" business, where one man fights a dozen and beats them, or where the gentle heroine gets dragged round the room by the villain, by the hair of her head. Select some striking situation and then sit down for an hour and think it carefully over, introducing as few characters as possible, and playing as much as you can upon the emotions of your characters. An excellent example of this style of writing is to be found in the serial story now running through these pages.

Having got your ideas roughly put together in your head, the next process is to commit them to paper. In doing this don't strain after fine writing; the best stories are always those which are written in the simplest language. Avoid a lengthy description of people or places at the opening of the story. To do this simply tires the reader from the outset. You want, so to speak, to jump in with both feet and grip the attention of the reader from the first line.

Now that you know what to do, see if you can write a short story. You can make it as short as you like, so long as it is not less than a thousand words. Then send it to me in an envelope marked "ATTEMPT," to the offices of SHORT STORIES, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and I will give a guinea to the writer of what I consider to be the best. All stories should reach me before August 22nd.

Result of the "Sentence" Competition.

THE prize of a barbaric guard goes to M. M. Payne, 3 Chicheley Street, Newport Pagnell, Bucks, for the following sentence composed entirely of words of four letters each, relative to our F. A. F.:—"From what vile slum come they—this vast host, this huge army? What real hope have they? They need food, they need play; give them what they need, feed them well. Take them away from this life that they live; away from this foul city, just this once. Make them feel real, true life. Help this good fund then; send your mite; open your hand, then your mind will find rest." Consolation gifts go to the following:—H. Barnes, 2 Vauxhall Walk, S.E.; J. Ryan, 21 Abbotts Road, East Ham, E.; D. G. Jelley, 85 Ermine Road, Ladywell; W. Hambridge, 20 Milton Street, Banbury, Oxon; B. R. Dixon, Magherafelt, Co. Derry, Ireland; E. Payne, 3 Chicheley Street, Newport Pagnell; J. A. Downie, 231 Gt. Junction Street, Leith; Mrs. Carpenter, 4 Greencroft Gardens, South Hampstead, N.W.; R. Gray, 14 Algernon Terrace, Tynemouth, North Shields; T. Allison, 18 Fleet Street, Gorton, Manchester.

Digitized by Google

OUR THRILLING SERIAL.

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

By HENRY FARMER.

The Thread of the Story.

A BELT full of diamonds has been stolen from a safe belonging to Mr. Mansfield, a wealthy banker, by Seaton Revelle (who is a friend of the banker's) and an accomplice named Benjamin Beard. Revelle accuses Alec Scarsdale, who is in love with Esther, Mr. Mansfield's daughter, of the crime, and he is sentenced to sixteen years' penal servitude.

Mr. Crump, late Chief-Inspector at Scotland Yard, feeling sure Scarsdale is innocent and Revelle is guilty, determines to prove the latter's guilt.

Mr. Mansfield as fully believes in Scarsdale's guilt as does Esther in his innocence, and his friendship for Revelle increases. Revelle constantly visits the banker's house in an endeavour to win Esther's love, but so far has not prospered at all. While talking with the girl one day, Mr. Mansfield's new maid, Vance, enters the room with a tray bearing cups of coffee. No sooner does she catch sight of Revelle than she drops the tray, and, pointing to Revelle, screams: "That—that man is my husband!" But Revelle, by sheer force of will, compels her to acknowledge her mistake.

At about this time Esther and Mr. Crump are walking together when they observe Vance about to throw herself into the reservoir. Crump stops her just in time—he and Esther taking her back to The Woodlands. Later on she is placed in the county asylum.

The great balloon incident now approaches. There is to be a grand fête in Lord Normanhurst's grounds, the chief and closing event being a balloon ascent by Mr. Seaton Revelle. Everything goes well till two horsemen arrive with the news that Vance has escaped from the asylum.

Acting upon Crump's advice they go straight to the reservoir, but fail to find the missing girl. The search is given up at nightfall. Shortly before nightfall Revelle makes his ascent. A storm, however, compels him to come down, the anchor touching ground on a neighbouring common just where Vance is waiting for him. The girl clings on to the anchor, and Revelle, quickly making a terrible resolve, throws out a number of sandbags, and the balloon again rises and continues its flight till Warham reservoir is reached. Just as the balloon is passing over the water Revelle cuts the anchor rope.

Vance's dead body is found next morning, Mr. Crump being informed of the discovery while walking with Esther.

Mr. Crump examines the body and finds that a leg is broken, evidently by a fall. The coroner's jury return a verdict of "Found drowned." Mr. Crump next takes a walk on the common, and discovers some sand-bags.

Mr. Mansfield thinks it best that Esther shall leave Warham for a little holiday. It is while changing at Roxeter Junction en route for Gurlston Bay that Fate brings about a meeting between Esther and Alec, who is on his way to Wrackam. An impassioned scene takes place on the platform. Before many days are passed Seaton Revelle also journeys to Gurlston Bay, and it is while there that they hear of the plucky rescue from drowning of a warder at Wrackam Prison by Alec Scarsdale, and, subsequently of his rumoured escape from prison.

The rumour proves to be true. Alec had indeed managed to escape from the prison, and taking a boat had pulled down the river, after purloining some sailors' clothes from an empty barge. Just when he is thoroughly exhausted, however, he is run down by a sailing barge. His boat is smashed, but Alec is rescued and taken on board. The barge proves to be the Mary Ann, bound for Gurlston Bay. Arrived at its destination, it is hardly moored to the pier before Esther, who is taking a walk, arrives at the pier to watch the unloading.

Shortly afterwards Revelle saunters up, when suddenly Esther catches sight of Alec in the barge. With great presence of mind she leads Revelle away from the spot before he discovers whom she has seen. Late that night, after everyone has gone to bed, Esther contrives a meeting with Alec in the drawing-room of the house in which she is staying. The two lovers are clasped in each other's arms when a man's footsteps are suddenly heard outside the door.

A CHASE IN THE DARKNESS.

"If you love me, go!"

Alec Scarsdale pressed a burning kiss upon Esther's lips; broke away from her; darted across the room. The moonlight was playing on the lawn beyond. As his figure became framed in the window, the door was flung back. Seaton Revelle darted in, and sighted the figure, on the lawn now. As he reached the window it plunged into the shrubbery. The room itself was in darkness. He had glanced neither to right nor left, had not seen Esther crouching down so close to him that with an outstretched hand he might almost have touched her. His every thought had been centred on the man. It had all happened in far less time than it takes to describe. Only as he passed out into the moonlight did Esther realise that the man in pursuit of her lover was Revelle! Terror and surprise had momentarily robbed her of the power to think, to plan. Still crouching in the darkness, her hands locked together in a grip of agony, she saw him plunge into the shrubbery. Had he recognised the man whom he was pursuing? Oh, Heaven! What was happening out of sight? Her brain had recovered from the shock. Thoughts were scurrying through her mind with lightning speed. It might be that Revelle had not recognised Alec; that Alec might baffle pursuit! But if she were found there, her presence might give a clue to the identity of the unknown man. If she could only gain her room unnoticed? Her thoughts were not selfish—to screen herself and her reputation from scandal—but to shield the man she loved!

Swiftly, silently, she glided towards the door. She reached the threshold; then stopped dead. Someone was moving towards her from the hall.

Before she could retreat back into the room, there was a rasping sound. A match had been struck. A flickering light broke the darkness. A moment later one of her wrists was gripped, only to be released with a startled, incredulous cry, "Great Scott! Miss Mansfield—you!"

Digitized by Google

Having gathered himself up after his tumble, Gerald Phipps, the young Oxford undergrad., finding himself deserted by Revelle, had altogether lost his bearings, and, after groping his way forward for a few steps, had struck a match, to find himself face to face with a woman. The first thought that flashed through his mind was that she was one of the servants, an accomplice of the man whom he had seen on the lawn. Then the light had played on her features—Esther Mansfield!

The match fell from his hand. He trampled it under foot. Was it possible. Great Scott! Here was a pretty kettleful of fish! Esther Mansfield, the banker's charming, refined daughter, admitting a man into the house in the small hours of the morning. Revelle must have missed her in the dark. Phipps stood for a moment speechless, aghast at the situation. He was a happy-go-lucky young fellow, with rather rapid tendencies, but chivalrous to a degree. One of his tenets was—"Never give a woman away!"

"Look here!" he whispered quickly, "has anyone seen you?"

Esther had seen his face by the light of the match.

"No!" she breathed out.

"Then, for Heaven's sake, get back to your room. I—I won't give you away. Be quick! We shall be having the whole place awake in a minute, and down here!"

He had told himself that it was not a question of a burglary, but of an intrigue. He wished to save her reputation. Esther realised this; but she was willing to accept the slur on her character.

"You won't tell a living soul?" she whispered.

"No!" There was a distant, cold note in the hurriedly breathed out answer. "But go!"

The sound of a sharp in-drawing of breath, the faint rustle of a dress, told him that she had gone. He waited for a few seconds; then, striking another match, was about to enter the drawing-room, when voices reached him. They were followed by the appearance at the top of the stairs of two airily-dressed figures carrying candles. The next moment Phipps was conscious that some sort of fire-arm was being pointed at him, and a shaky voice, that he recognised as the butler's, cried out:

"Hands up, you ruffian, or I fire!"

"Coleman, don't do anything of the sort!"

"Gracious me! Mr. Phipps!"

Unseen, Esther had reached her room. It was in darkness. Quivering from head to foot, her anguish-wrung heart throbbing fiercely, she sought the window and peered out. Her own plight, her compromised reputation, were nothing to her! The episode of a few moments before was only remembered because the man had promised silence. And if Alec had not been recognised and had made good his escape, that silence would be invaluable. Let Gerald Phipps think the worst of her, it mattered not, so long as he held his peace! But what was happening? Lights were moving to and fro on the lawn now. Most of the household had been awakened. The suspense was almost unbearable. The window was open. Esther strained every nerve to catch what was being said. She recognised her host's voice; then Gerald Phipps spoke. She heard him explain how, leaving his bed to open the window wider, he had caught sight of a man in the act of crossing the lawn; how he had awakened Revelle; how he had tumbled at the foot of the stairs. Not a word about herself!

"Could you distinguish the man?" Esther heard Mr. Walters ask.

Her heart ceased to beat.

"No. I could see that he was a man, and that's about all. Revelle must have gone off after him!"

The house itself was being subjected to a rigorous search. Nothing was missing; but presently the butler approached his master with the rather sensational information that there were no signs of the drawing-room having been broken into. The man must have had an accomplice who had admitted him from the inside. The butler was quite certain that the window was securely fastened when he made his final round.

Phipps and some of the others were meditating starting in search of Revelle, when a figure limped on to the lawn.

"Hullo! Here's Revelle!"

Esther's heart leapt into her mouth. He was promptly surrounded by eager questioners.

"A confounded nuisance!" he ejaculated with considerable annoyance; "I managed to catch my foot in a branch or something. I had to give up the chase. My ankle is sprained!"

"Would you know him if you saw him again?"

"I'm afraid not. Only saw his back. Couldn't distinguish much; but there was something about the fellow's cut that suggested a sea-faring man!"

"Oh, God be thanked!" whispered Esther, as she locked her fingers together.

Alec had not been recognised. He had made good his escape!

These were her first thoughts; then—what of the future? Their moments together had been cruelly brief. There had been no time to shape plans. Esther had not even learnt how he had contrived to reach Gurlston Bay.

"The future!" she whispered, "it is in God's hands!"

A servant was hurrying away to the police-station. Speculation was rife in the smoking-room whither the gentlemen had retired. The ladies, all but Esther, had gathered together in one room. Miss Bullivant, staying in the house, repeatedly stated that she felt inclined to shriek, and then, being satisfied that her toilette, if somewhat unconventional, was decidedly "fetching," announced her intention of joining the gentlemen in the smoking-room. She did so want to know what had exactly happened, and, also, she would feel safer—"somehow, don't you know!"—with a lot of men around her. On reaching the smoking-room, she made a bee-line to where Revelle was sitting on a couch, his injured foot propped up. She had gathered a rough outline of what had happened.

"How frightfully brave of you!" she murmured. "I'm so sorry to think that you never caught the wretch. And your poor ankle? I'm so sorry! Does it hurt you very much?"

She sat down close beside him, and glanced round with a little laugh.

"I hope that I shan't shock anybody; but if anyone could spare me a cigarette—thanks awfully!"

Gerald Phipps had obliged. His boyish face wore a puzzled, rather pained expression. If it had been Miss Bullivant whom he had encountered so unexpectedly in the drawing-room he would not have been so utterly taken by surprise; but Esther Mansfield! Had anyone told him such a thing he would have flatly refused to believe it. But there was no gainsaying the evidence of his own eyes. He was feeling altogether uncomfortable. He had not seen much of Esther; but her charm of manner, her unaffected grace, had made an impression on him.

Perhaps on the morrow she would vouchsafe some explanation. Anyhow, rightly or wrongly, he had no intention of giving her away. But who, in the dickens's name, could the fellow have been? Great Scott!—the idea suddenly flashed across his mind as he held a light to Miss Bullivant's cigarette—could it have been that convict fellow to whom she had been engaged? The idea was not arrived at by any process of reasoning. He could not have explained why it had occurred to him, unless the talk that there had been among the men about Scarsdale had unconsciously affected the current of his thoughts. In fact, it seemed to be flying in the teeth of reason. Wrackam prison was a far cry from Gurlston Bay. According to the evening paper, it looked very much as if Scarsdale had come to an untimely end, though, as yet, there was no proof positive. But once an idea springs into existence, though based upon no solid foundation, it is not always easily eradicated; and Phipps found himself continually thinking of that convict fellow, for whom, both on account of his act of heroism in saving a warder's life and his daring escape—"so awfully

Digitized by Google

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

Our Powerful Serial.

sporting of him, don't you know!"—he had already conceived a great admiration.

Further speculation was put an end to by the arrival of the police. After a careful examination and much questioning, they came to the conclusion that there must have been an accomplice in the house; but whether burglary had been intended, or it had been a clandestine lovers' meeting, it was impossible at the moment to decide. The servants would have to be submitted to a close examination.

* * * * * * *

"If you love me, go!"

The words had spurred Scarsdale into flight. Capture meant prison again, and hopelessness. Freedom, if he could but keep it, meant opportunity to seek for proof of his innocence, perhaps to see Esther again! He heard the crash as his unknown pursuer plunged into the shrubbery after him. Then a low cry and a thud. He must have fallen. The hunted man quickened, gained the road, and went speeding on blindly. The neighbourhood was strange to him.

The road inclined steeply upward. The wound, furrowed across his back by the warder's bullet, had not yet healed. He had not yet recovered from the terrible strain of his escape; but he panted on and up desperately. Once he paused for a second to listen. No sounds broke the stillness. His plight was desperate; but not so desperate as it had been when, wounded and wearing a felon's dress, he had taken that leap into the fog-veiled river. And he had seen her, held her in his arms, heard again from her own lips of her undying love. The words had been as a draught of red wine to him! He had, indeed, much to be thankful for. But for the humane heart of the captain of the Mary Ann, he might have been back again at Wrackam prison by now. The nature of Scarsdale's wound had awakened the man's suspicions; he had started to question him closely, and Scarsdale, seeing more danger in evasive answers, had made a clean breast of it. It had proved the right course. "Look here!" skipper Barlow had said, "I'm a married man with a big family, and for their sakes I can't afford to run any risks. Same time, don't you be afraid that I'm going to give you away, because I ain't. If you hadn't told me, I shouldn't have known; but when we make for Gurlston Bay, I reckon we'd best part company!" And this had happened. After dark, Scarsdale had left the Mary Ann. At the last moment the skipper had forced a packet upon him containing bread and meat. He had taken the first road leading out of the village. He had shaped no definite plans when Esther's voice reached him.

When he paused again he was on the summit of a cliff. The dull roar of breaking waves reached him. The road turned away inland; but a foot-path, marked at intervals by white stones, ran parallel with the edge of the cliff, and at the point where it branched off from the road stood a sign-post. The words on it were legible in the moonlight: "To the Caves and Black Crag Lighthouse." The skipper had told him of the famous Gurlston caves. He was well-nigh spent, and wanted rest and time to think. He turned from the road and hurried along the footpath. Quarter of a mile further along the path divided, the upward track, according to the sign-post, leading to the lighthouse, the downward one to the caves. He took the downward track. A steep descent of some hundred yards, then a black, tunnel-like mouth, hewn in the rock that barred the way, confronted him. He was without matches. Entering the tunnel, he felt his way along the side. The descent was winding and very steep. Melancholy sounds, the distorted echoes of wind and wave, gave additional uncanniness to the darkness. At last he saw below him a light so faint that it was but visible darkness. The opening led out on to a ledge of rock, strewn with great boulders that had fallen from the cliff above. Now and again the spray of a breaker splashed over. Scarsdale turned. The rock wall behind him was perforated with as many holes as a rabbit-warren, entrances to the network of caves and passages that honey-combed the rock that towered up, sheer and precipitous, above. He stepped to the brink of the ledge. More rocks, cruel-looking, protruding like sharp, black teeth, from the white swirl of the water below. Away in the distance the reflection of the lighthouse beacon shimmered on the rustling waves. The spell of night added to the weird romance of the rugged spot. Scarsdale leant upon a boulder and stared out into the night, thoughts of joy and agony coursing through his soul. He thanked God for those few moments with Esther; yet it was agony to try to picture what had happened after his flight. Had his pursuer passed her unnoticed in the dark? Had she gained her room unseen? Or had she been discovered? He knew that she would rather die than betray him. He imagined her screening him at the cost of her reputation. Remorse stabbed him like a knife. He would have brought it upon her!

He was dead beat. He could go no further that night. Mechanically he drew from his pocket the packet that the skipper had thrust there, and opened it. Besides bread and meat it contained a screw of tobacco, a pipe, and a box of matches. Scarsdale felt a lump rise up into his throat, touched by the thoughtful act of kindness. Then something that he had not noticed fell to the rock with a metallic jingle, and lay glittering in the moonlight—a five shilling-piece!

Perhaps—he prayed God that it might be—he would be able to make good these acts of kindness one day! He picked up the coin, and made his way to one of the cavernous openings. Within, he struck a match. The light revealed a large cave, its low roof seamed with cracks, and here and there dark mouths that looked as if they must lead into the very bowels of the earth.

Surely a man might remain concealed here for days!

A wild thought surged to his brain. Would it be possible to communicate in some way with Esther, let her know of his whereabouts? The idea had quickened the beat of his heart. But how? He sat down in the darkness, filled and lighted his pipe. Would it be possible? Thought followed hard upon thought, but the question was still unanswered when his head began to droop forward and nod, and a desire for sleep mastered all else. Scarcely able to keep his eyes open, he struck a match. The inevitable picnicker had left traces behind him in the shape of litter and paper-bags. He twisted up a fragment of paper and lighted it. He was inured to a hard bed. Behind a fallen fragment of rock where the dust and sand of years had accumulated, he laid himself down. A few moments later he was in a dead sleep!

LOOK OUT FOR THE SPLENDID COLOURED COVER OF NEXT TUESDAY'S "SHORT STORIES."

MR. CRUMP COMMITS A BURGLARY.

It was rather a remarkable fact that so long as Miss Mansfield was at home, Mr. Penworthy had daily superintended the horticultural operations that were being carried on at the Woodlands; but, after Mr. Mansfield's and Esther's departure for Gurlston Bay, he had been content to leave matters largely in the hands of Banks, the gardener. He had, as he explained to Mrs. Cobb, a number of jobs that required attending to. He had retained his rooms at Woodbine Cottage, though he had slept but one night there since Mr. Revelle and Mr. Faversham had left the Firs—much to the distress of Pollie, who missed the presence of the kindly little man more than words could have expressed. As a matter of fact, Crump had been assiduously shadowing Mr. Faversham, otherwise Benny, though parallel with this, he had not been neglecting the grim mystery that enshrouded Vance's death. A certain pencilled map that he carried about with him, and which he frequently scrutinised, bore a third cross that denoted where he had found the third bag of ballast, and a line had been drawn through the three crosses, the arrow-head at the end pointing to the words "Warham Reservoir." Crump was devoting most of his attention to Benny at present, in the hope of obtaining a clue as to the disposal of the stolen diamonds and notes. Having learnt that Revelle had gone to Gurlston Bay, and realising his motive, his movements were, for the time being, of less importance, and he could rely on Esther to keep him well informed. Tom Jackson and Fred, in the same way, accounted for the silent Railton between them. But Benny's life in London was altogether above-board. He had not spent his share of the robbery so lavishly as Revelle. Freed from the strain of mixing with upper circles, he was indulging in a mild career of dissipation—billiards, music-halls, theatres; but there was no display of impatience on Crump's part. He was a veritable Job. Once during his official career he had shadowed a man for some years—but he had "bottled him up" at the finish.

Digitized by Google

"Grandmother, grandmother!" cried Pollie, from the garden-gate of Woodbine Cottage. "Here's Mr. Penworthy!"

Then she darted out towards the homely little figure that had just surmounted the crest of the hill. There was a look of distress on Crump's kindly face; but it brightened with pleasure at the sight of Pollie. As she rushed upon him with open arms, he picked her up, kissed her affectionately, and then, having mounted her on his shoulder, ambled to the cottage, singing of how Pollie and he were sweethearts, many a year ago.

"Oh, I hope you're going to stop for long!" cried Pollie, as she slid down to the ground.

"Not for long, Pollie, I'm afraid. I must be off again to-morrow. Ah, Mrs. Cobb, I am very glad to see you again! And I hope the rheumatism hasn't been troubling you; but I haven't forgotten!"

He produced a bottle from his pocket.

"It isn't a patent medicine, Mrs. Cobb. It is made up from a doctor's prescription. I got it from my friend. I hope you won't need to use it; but if you should I hope that it will do you good!"

It was characteristic of the little man. He had been doing the work of three men; but he had not forgotten the old lady's rheumatism, and a promise made to obtain a prescription from a friend of his similarly afflicted.

Children are children, and Pollie was eyeing, at the same time pretending not to do so, one of the little man's pockets that bulged in a most promising way. Crump's own eyes were twinkling.

"Dear me!" he exclaimed, patting the pocket in question. "Why, what on earth's this in my pocket?"

He produced a package.

"But this is some mistake. No—how remarkable! It's addressed to 'Miss Mary Cobb, Woodbine Cottage, Warham.' Well I never! And to think that someone slipped this into my pocket without my noticing it. Dear me! Well, it's evidently meant for you, Pollie, so you had better open it and see what it contains!"

It contained one of those miniature tea-services beloved of little girls.

"O-o-oh!" cried Pollie, scampering with delight, "and we'll have tea out of it next time we go on the common!"

"We will, Pollie!"

And Crump's brightened rather curiously, perhaps from the remembrance of certain discoveries made after his last tea there.

A Woman's Feat.

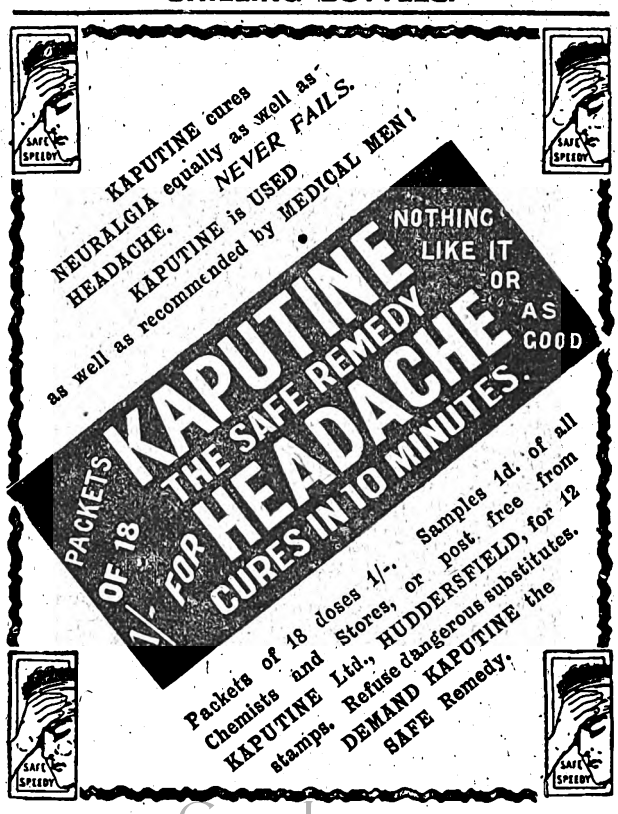
For a woman to walk eight miles with ease within a short time of being so weak from anæmia and indigestion that she could not walk across her house floor, may be regarded as a pedestrian feat of more than ordinary interest. Chas. Forde's Bile Beans enabled Mrs. Gertrude Morley, of Awsworth, near Ilkeston, to do this. She says: "I was so weak from anæmia, indigestion, and other allied ailments from which I had suffered from girlhood, that I could not walk across the floor without being fagged. Constipation and headache also troubled me sorely. For months I had been in this condition and had vainly tried all sorts of medicine. My husband then bought me a box of Bile Beans, and by the time I had taken them I was a great deal better. A little perseverance with them was all that was necessary to restore me to health. I am now well and recently walked eight miles with ease."

The above is by no means an isolated case of the vast benefit resulting from Bile Beans. They are the world's specific for anæmia, indigestion, constipation, piles, headache, all female ailments, liver and kidney disorders, warm weather languor, and all diseases arising out of loss of energy, defective liver action and assimilation. Supplied by all chemists at one and three-halfpence or two and nine per box. They are sold only in sealed boxes: refuse all offered loose.

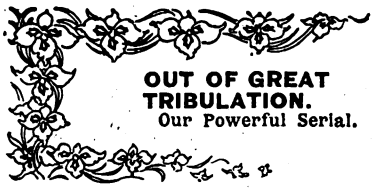
SULPHOLINE LOTION.

For clearing the Skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.



Digitized by Google



"And now, Mrs. Cobb, my young friends, Tom Jackson and Fred Wilton are off duty this afternoon, and are coming to see me. Can you manage tea for us, without putting yourself out?"

Then, having been hugged most vigorously by Pollie for the beautiful tea-things, he went into his sitting-room. The sad look returned to his face. He had read of Alec Scarsdale's escape in the morning paper. In the evening paper, he had read of the finding of the battered-in boat.

"It doesn't follow," he whispered brokenly; but—poor girl, poor girl!"

He drew his hand across his eyes, then, seating himself, started to write a letter to Esther. It was a simple, brief, but noble letter. He had finished, and was writing the address on the envelope, when Tom Jackson and Fred—both in mufti—entered. They, too, had seen the evening paper. The little man shook their hands silently. For a while the conversation was carried on in a subdued whisper; it was of Alec Scarsdale, Miss Esther, of hopes and fears. There was a set, strained look on Tom Jackson's honest face.

"We can do no more," said Crump gently, "than put our trust in the All-merciful!"

There was a considerable pause.

"But if it is so," whispered Tom Jackson fiercely, the first to break the silence, "we shall want payment in full for his life—for Miss Esther's broken heart!"

"We shall indeed, Tom!"

And Crump's face assumed an expression that was seldom seen upon it. There was another silence.

"But, my dear lads, we must not stand still. God helps those who help themselves, and I say it with all reverence. Fred, it is in consequence of your letter that I am here. An old colleague of mine, who does private work now—but, of course, you remember Grogan—has promised to look after Faversham in my absence. I regret to say that my efforts in that quarter have up to the present resulted in nothing. I had hoped—but no matter. Your letter, Fred, told me that you are going to have a quiet supper with my old friend, Tomlinson. Now for some time past I have been desirous of gaining access to the Firs. Hitherto the presence of Mr. Revelle and Faversham, also Tomlinson, have been obstacles in my way. But I fancy that a favourable opportunity presents itself to-night. I am afraid my entry, according to the letter of the law, would be accounted felonious, or, at least, unlawful, but I'm prepared to take my chance. I want, while you are supping with Tomlinson, to have a thorough look round the premises."

And at that moment, the little man moving in his chair, a faint rattle came from his pocket that to Fred's excited mind suggested skeleton keys.

"But, look here, uncle!" gasped Fred. "You don't mean to say——"

"But I do, my dear lad. I have quite made up my mind!"

There was a knock on the door, and Mrs. Cobb entered with the tea. And it was indeed a tea good to behold. Others had lodged at Woodbine Cottage; but never such a tea had been set before them; but then there had never been such a lodger as Mr. Penworthy. Crump inspired the men and women whom he came in contact with to do their best for him, whether they were landladies or young constables.

The little man sat himself down at the head of the table, and proceeded to pour out tea. Fred winked at Tom. The wink was returned. But they were sad winks, for a gloom was over all.

"And I hope," said Mrs. Cobb, "that you'll find everything to your liking, Mr. Penworthy!"

"Mrs. Cobb," answered the little man, "you have set before us a regal feast. And I wouldn't mind wagering that that delicious-looking jam is of your own preserving!"

"What I like about Mr. Penworthy," said Mrs. Cobb to herself, after she had left the room, "is that he's never too busy to be pleasant. And he does notice little things so."

"Tom, do you take sugar? Fred, I know you do! I understand, Fred, that with the exception of Tomlinson, and the old lady who comes in to clean up the place and cook for Tomlinson, the other servants have been given a holiday. In your letter you stated that nine o'clock was the time fixed for supper. Tomlinson is one of those machine-like, well-oiled men who are punctual to the minute. Those parts of the Firs that neither you nor Tom have had access to—I have contrived to obtain a very fair idea of from Mrs. Cobb. She is on intimate terms with one of the maid-servants. At about a quarter past nine I shall endeavour to effect my entry, probably by the back door. I don't suppose that it will be locked until after you have left the premises; but should it be, then I shall find another mode of ingress. I shall effect my entry while you are at supper. There is a very excellent billiard-table at the Firs. After supper, Fred, I want you to challenge Tomlinson to play you 'a hundred up!' Have a couple of sovereigns on the game. It will increase Tomlinson's interest. You will lose, Fred; but play him a second game for the same stake."

The little man drew out a five-pound note, and handed it to his nephew.

"Don't be afraid to flash that about rather ostentatiously. It will impress Tomlinson. Should he remark upon it, hint rather mysteriously that a policeman, if he knows his way about, has other sources of income besides his pay. Don't be afraid to give him the idea that you are an unscrupulous young man. Knowing something of Tomlinson, I take it for granted that you will have your supper in his master's dining-room. I shall want to know when you are passing to the billiard-room. You might either sneeze loudly, or whistle some tune—shall we say the 'Honeysuckle and the Bee'? And that Fred, I think, is all. Let me give you some more tea. Tom, pass your cup!"

The two young men interchanged glances of admiration. The little man, having poured out tea, affixed something into his button-hole, and the next moment a beam of electric light flashed from his chest. He gave a little chuckle.

"It is superior to a lantern," he explained, "and I obtained the idea from one of those men who suddenly spring on to 'buses and demand to see the ticket that one has invariably mislaid or lost. They carry such a lamp at night time. It is a compact and ingenious little affair!"

He switched off the light, and passed the jam to Tom. Then he produced a bunch of skeleton keys from a pocket.

"These 'twirls'—to give them their professional name—were once the property of Cully Scott, alias the Smasher, who is now leading an honourable, manly life, and whom I am proud to count one of my best friends. Better twirls than these he has assured me, could not be obtained for love or money. Fred, would you please cut me another piece of bread. Thank you! This bread is home-made. There is always such a charm to me about home-made things. I shall have to be very careful to-night, my dear lads; a mistake might render me liable to five years' penal servitude. But"—the little man's eyes twinkled—"if I should bungle, and Tomlinson's suspicions be aroused, I trust, Fred, that your zeal may be misdirected, and that you will look for me in the wrong place. Tomlinson is an arrant coward. If it were a question of looking for a supposed burglar, he would let you lead the way, and you would lead the wrong way!"

When, some time after, Fred and Tom had taken their departure, the little man lighted his pipe, and sat in sad meditation. His kindly heart ached for Esther. The morrow, perhaps, might bring news of Scarsdale. He felt that he would welcome even the news of his re-capture. Then he drew his pencilled map from a pocket, and studied it for some time. He shook his head.

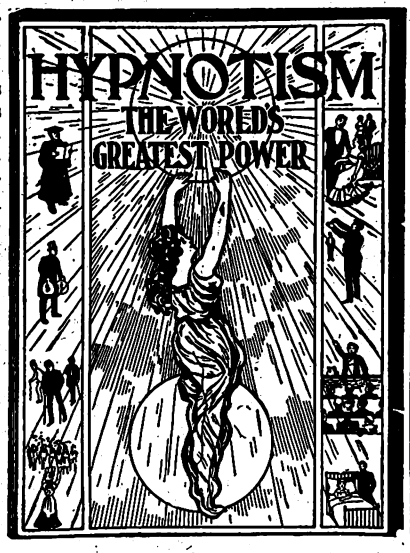
"Rightly or wrongly," he muttered, "I am convinced in my own mind now; but, though the circumstantial evidence is growing stronger, there's not nearly enough to go before a jury at present—at present! To prove that poor young fellow's innocence is my first object; but I don't despair of bringing home this other foul crime to you, Mr. Seaton Revelle.

Digitized by Google

THIS BOOK IS FREE.

The Mysteries of Hypnotism and Personal Magnetism Revealed.

The American College of Sciences of Philadelphia, Pa., has just published a remarkable book on Hypnotism, Personal Magnetism, and Magnetic Healing. It is by far the most wonderful and comprehensive treatise of the kind ever printed. The Directors have decided, for a limited time, to give a free copy to each person sincerely interested in these wonderful sciences. It is the result of the combined effort of twenty of the most famous hypnotic specialists in the world. You can now learn the secrets of Hypnotism and Personal Magnetism at your own home free. Hypnotism strengthens your memory and develops a will of iron. It overcomes bashfulness, revives hope, stimulates ambition and determination to succeed, and gives you that self-confidence which enables you to convince people of your real worth. It gives you the key to the inner secrets of mind control. It enables you to absolutely control the thoughts and actions of whomsoever you will. When you understand this grand and mysterious science you can plant suggestions in human minds which will be carried out in a day or even a year hence. You can cure bad habits and diseases in yourself or others. You can cure yourself of insomnia, nervousness, and business or domestic worry.



You can instantaneously hypnotise people with a mere glance of the eye, without their knowledge, and powerfully influence them to do as you desire. You can develop, to a marvellous degree, any musical or dramatic talent you may have; you can increase your salary; you can develop your telepathic or clairvoyant power; you can give thrilling and funny hypnotic entertainments; you can win the love and everlasting friendship of those you desire; you can protect yourself against the influence of others; you can become a financial success and be recognised as a power in your community.

The American College guarantees to teach you the secret of attaining all these things. It is the largest and most successful school of Hypnotism in the world. It is chartered by the State laws, and carries out every promise faithfully. If you want a copy of its free book, just send your name and address on a penny post-card, no money, to the American College of Sciences, Dept. WL 23, 420 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., U.S.A., and you will receive it by return mail, post paid.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

BORAX
Dry Soap.

There are many reasons

why ladies should see that no other powder soap but Borax Dry Soap is used in their homes. Briefly, the chief are as follows:

It is pure,
It is antiseptic,
It is economical,
It saves time,
It saves energy,
It preserves the clothes,
It is cheap,
It is the best.

Any of the great army of Borax Dry Soap users will corroborate, but conviction can by easily obtained by getting it from the Grocer next time.

Sold in ¼lb. packets and dozens everywhere.

Write to-day for Free Packet. Name "S. S."

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT MAKERS TO THE KING.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

EIFFEL TOWER

We are Lemon experts—having personally visited the Messina Lemon Orchards to select the finest fruits for our celebrated Eiffel Tower Lemonade. We are now using our special knowledge to produce a most delicious Lemon Jelly, exquisitely flavoured, brilliantly transparent and delightful in appearance. It always sets. Pint packet, 3½d. Send Post-card for FREE SAMPLE to G. FOSTER CLARK & Co., Lemon Produce Importers, MAIDSTONE.

LEMON JELLY

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. Room 81, 115 Oxford Street, London, W.

HOME NOTES.

The Leading Ladies' Paper.
Published Every Thursday.
ONE PENNY.

From 1s. weekly. Special Offer. £12 15s 0d. Sample for £6 6s. Carriage paid. PLATED RIMS, FREE WHEELS, RIM BRAKE FITTED FREE. Agents wanted. — DEREHAM ROAD CYCLE CO., NORWICH.

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money, and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £7-12-6

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment.

EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

KEATING'S POWDER KILLS BUGS FLEAS FLIES BEETLES

TINS 3d. 6d. 1s-BELLOWS 9d.

"TATCHO"

Gets the Hair Back.
Puts the Hair Right.
Keeps the Hair Right.

WHO SAY SO.

COMMANDER T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.

"Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902.

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair."

MAJOR-GENERAL KEATE.

"High Croft, Winchester

"I find the Renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time."

LADY SYKES writes:

"Mayfair, W.

"I can honestly recommend 'Tatcho.' It has really entirely renovated my hair."

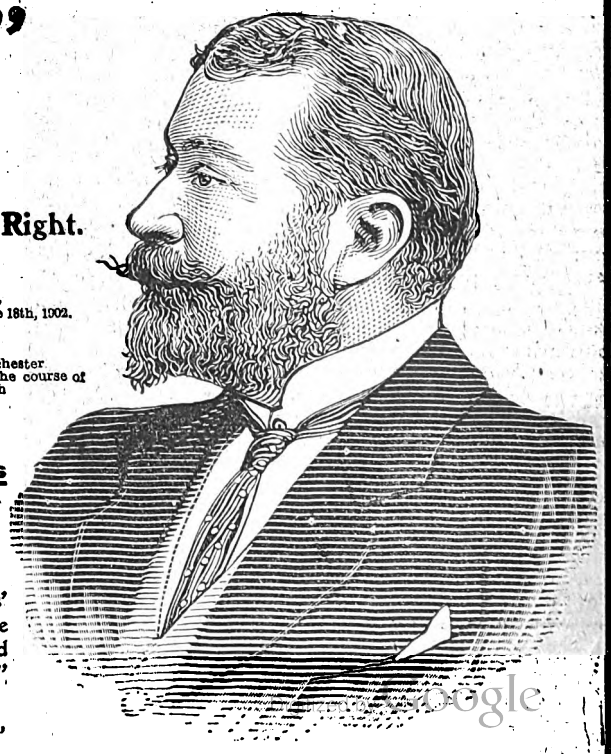
PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFORUS PALŒLOGUE writes:

"Belvedere Hotel, Kensington, W.

"I would not be without it on any account."

MRS. BROWN POTTER.

"I use only 'Tatcho.'"



A 4/6 FULL SIZE BOTTLE of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' "Tatcho" is supplied to enable you to test its value at the NOMINAL PRICE of 1/10 at all Chemists', Stores, and Hairdressers', or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, 81 Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn, London.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the world, in bottles at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/-.

The fouler crime, but poor Vance is out of her misery, has found, I dare to believe, the rest that she craved for; but Esther Mansfield's misery continues, grows more acute. You cowardly dog, you! You foul fellow, you!"

When Mrs. Cobb entered, Mr. Penworthy announced his intention of going out for a stroll. Mrs. Cobb—nine o'clock was her average bed time—would not wait up for him. He carried his key.

Warham Church clock was striking nine when Crump left Woodbine Cottage. There was nothing about his bearing to suggest the daring venture upon which he was bent. It was only when the Firs was in sight that he knocked the ashes out of his pipe. Then, sitting on a stile, he drew off his boots, and drew on an extra pair of stout woollen socks. He concealed his boots in a ditch. The quiet road was deserted.

In his days of active service, Crump had been noted for his unconventionality of method. He was certainly living up to his old reputation now.

He passed into the grounds. Lights were shining from the windows of the room that he knew to be the dining-room. He chuckled softly.

"I thought so," he said to himself, "in the absence of his master my old friend Tomlinson is doing himself in style!"

He crept up to one of the windows, and peered through a chink in the shutters. He chuckled again. His sense of humour was tickled. A most récherché supper was spread upon the snowy cloth. Wine sparkled in decanters. Cut glass glittered. Tomlinson sat at the head of the table, in his master's accustomed place, and Fred was apparently doing full justice to the delicacies set before him.

"I take wine with you, Wilton!" said Railton, otherwise Tomlinson, raising his glass politely. Fred bowed, and also raised his glass. "I trust the wine is to your liking!"

"Quite a little comedy!" said Crump to himself, and then made his way round to the back entrance. The door, as he had anticipated, was not locked. He quietly admitted himself. There was not the slightest sign of strain or flurry on the homely face; its expression was rather one of mild amusement. Lights were burning.

"Mr. Revelle's rooms first, I think!" he said to himself.

He had never set foot inside the place before; but the description furnished him by Mrs. Cobb amply sufficed for his purpose. He made his way up the back stairs to Revelle's bedroom, a dressing-room adjoining. Here there was no light. He closed the door. A beam of light flashed from his buttonhole; then seeing a gas-jet, he drew the thick curtains over the window and lighted the gas. Had it been his own house, he could not have seemed more thoroughly at home.

Locks yielded magically under his skilful manipulation of the twirls, once the property of Cully Scott, alias the Smasher. Swiftly he searched through cupboards, wardrobes, chests of drawers, replacing the articles in such a careful way that there were practically no signs that they had been disturbed.

But, as yet, nothing of importance had been unearthed.

The whistled tune of "The Honeysuckle and the Bee" just reached him. He smiled faintly. Fred and Tomlinson were passing into the billiard-room.

"Good lad!" he muttered under his breath. "So far I've drawn a blank. Let us now try the dressing-room!"

In the dressing-room there was more skilful manipulation of the skeleton keys, more careful searchings and replacings.

"Hullo! This looks more promising. There's a false bottom to this trunk!"

The little man's eyes brightened. He withdrew his hand from the trunk in which he had been rummaging, and started to empty out the contents.

(Another splendid instalment next Tuesday.)

OUR NEW SERIAL.

In the course of a few weeks a powerful new serial story will start in Short Stories. It is the work of a favourite author, who has given many months of careful work to the story. The date of the number in which it starts will be announced shortly.

A WOULD-BE funny man writes us a joke about the weather, and spells it wethur. We don't like to criticise a good attempt, but this seems like the worst spell of weather we ever experienced.

LIPSLEY: "You know those cigars Miss Beacon sent me for Christmas?" Lapsley: "Yes." Lipsley: "Well, I gave a lot to my friends, and now I haven't any left." Lapsley: "What, cigars?" Lipsley: "No, friends."

A VERY small boy was trying to lead a big St. Bernard up the road. "What are you going to do with that dog?" asked a kindly gentleman. "I can't make up my mind," was the answer; "not till I find out what the dog thinks o' doin' with me!"

LITTLE BOY: "I want you to write me an excuse for being late at school yesterday." Jeweller: "Eh? You are not my son." Little Boy: "N—o, but mamma says I had plenty of time to get to school, so I suppose the clock you sold her doesn't go right."

FIRST YOUNG MAN (last summer): "I have met a good many amateur photographers, but I never saw one quite so devoted to the fad as you are." Second Young Man: "I never take photographs." First Young Man: "Eh? Then why do you carry that detective camera about with you all day, week in and week out?" Second Young Man: "Because when the girls see me coming all the ugly ones run away and all the pretty ones stay."

Have You Read

THE FINAL WAR

By Louis Tracy.

A

3s. 6d.

NOVEL FOR

6d.

Post Free 8d.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "The Final War," for which I inclose the sum of 6d.

Name.....

Address.....

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

The Advanced Flirt.

"A young lady to whom I was recently engaged has thrown me over," writes "Georgie." "She has been in the habit of leading fellows on to propose to her, and then refusing them. She has had twenty proposals of marriage, and will do all she can to attract anyone who looks at her a second time. Do you call her a flirt?"

* * * *

Yes, "Georgie," I do. If you had asked me to give my definition of a flirt, I could not improve on your own description of the girl. Further, she is a flirt of the most malignant type; one who appears to have no serious regard for the affections of anyone. Such girls, as we all know, usually end their lives old maids, or social outcasts, as, after a certain age, when their surface attraction has passed away, retribution always follows in their train, and sourness and disappointment soon do their work.

❦❦❦

Is She a Flirt?

"Herbert" has been hearing things to the detriment of his sweetheart. People have told him that she is only trifling with him, and give him instances of her flirtations with others. He has not seen her for some weeks, and has not heard much from her. How ought he to act to find out whether the stories are really true?

* * * *

It would be very much better for "Herbert" to tell her straight out what he has heard, and make her give either a denial or confirmation of the story. Too many love troubles are the result of this miserable mischief-making, and too many lovers allow themselves to be swayed by the off-hand opinions of others, when they have access to first-hand information which might easily dispel them.

❦❦❦

A Case for Withdrawal.

Is a man compelled to declare anything to a girl? "T. G." has been seeing a great deal of a certain damsel lately, and knows that she is steeped in admiration for him. He, on the other hand, is not particularly fond of her, though he does not know whether in time he may not grow to be. Meanwhile should he reveal his feelings to her at all, in response to her overtures?

* * * *

"T. G." is very foolish to be so attentive to a girl if he has no particular liking for her. Surely it is not necessary for him to be constantly with her? As he is, she has very good ground for suspecting that her own liking is returned. "T. G." had better draw off while there is yet time.

❦❦❦

Lover or Friend?

Is it a sign of love when a man makes a confidant of a girl, and tells her of his own private affairs, his past attachments, and other things of a confidential nature? "Lucy" is constantly made the confidant of men in these matters, but one man in particular is always seeking out her company, and when with her, constantly talks of himself in the most confidential strain. Does this suggest that he is in any way in love with "Lucy"? He has not as yet made any professions.

I should think the sign is rather that he looks upon "Lucy" as a friend. Some people, as you know, have the curious faculty of drawing other people's confidences from them. It is rather a trait of a person with great qualities of friendship than one to invite the overtures of love. "Lucy" had better not think too much of this man's confidences in her. Wait till he says something definite about his feelings towards you. When he does, be pretty sure he will be in earnest, as he evidently values you too much as a friend to make overtures in anything but sincerity. I have rather an admiration for friendships of this kind. They often have more likelihood of ripening into love than a good many of the idle vapourings of boys and girls.

❦❦❦

A Faint-hearted Swain.

"Bandy" has, he tells me, fallen in love with a certain girl, but does not want to say anything about it to her. How can he find out in return whether she loves him?

* * * *

Oh, faint heart, do you suppose these tactics will ever win you fair lady? There is no hard and fast rule on which to proceed in love-making. If in the course of your conversation you do not find some method of gaining her confidence, and talking intimately, evidently she is not in sympathy with you to a very great extent. Before you speculate as to whether she loves you, make sure if she likes you. That settled, the other may follow with time. These emotions are not made in a moment, and often take months to mature. Pursue your friendship with her as far as you can, and leave it to time to decide whether it is to ripen into love.

❦❦❦

Unrequited Affection.

Six years ago "Hetty" was seventeen and met the man who has attracted her more than anyone else in life. She has never seen another to equal him in her estimation. But since that time she has never set eyes on him until the other day. On meeting him again, he did not seem to show any particular pleasure at their renewed meeting, but "Hetty" felt more infatuated than ever. Should she give him any hint as to her feelings, or keep them absolutely to herself?

* * * *

"Hetty" had far better forget all about him now before the infatuation grows on her. Probably the man has other attachments. His coolness to her may have been the result of a desire not to arouse in her the old feelings, as he knew he could not reciprocate them. Let "Hetty" blot out his image from her mind—at any rate, if he shows no signs of reciprocating her attachment—and it will be an easier matter than allowing the infatuation to spread, and cause certain disappointment.

❦❦❦

A Question of Priority.

"Lottie" has two gentlemen friends who often visit her. One of them invited her to go to the theatre one night. After accepting she had a misunderstanding with him, and he left the house without visiting her for some time. Thinking the engagement was cancelled she accepted another invitation from the other friend for the same night. But after accepting the latter engagement, the first man called and claimed the appointment. She would rather have kept the second one than the first. Which ought she really to have kept?

* * * *

As "Lottie" had accepted the first engagement, she had no right to cancel it without letting him know. It would have been quite easy to drop him a line to say that she "regretted being unable to keep it." As it happened, the first man was entitled to claim his engagement, and "Lottie" should refuse the second. At heart the second man would have thought none the less of "Lottie" for being constant to her engagements.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

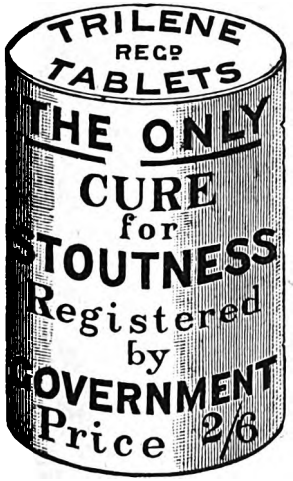
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.
Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

MRS. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

MISS NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Risholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."
"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

MR. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Liatorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure.

MR. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 2lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

MRS. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

MRS. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes, Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

MRS. H. COX, 23 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

MRS. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st., and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

MRS. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

MRS. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 39 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

MRS. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

MISS JANE CARTER, of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

MR. THOS BLAKELY, of 27 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

To Keep in Health

YOU NEED A HEALTH-GIVING BEVERAGE,
which must be pure and unadulterated.

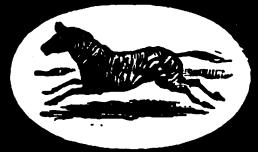
Cadbury's cocoa

is universally admitted to be a health-giving drink—most refreshing, invigorating, and sustaining. It is beneficial to everybody: Men, Women, Boys, and Girls.

CADBURY'S Cocoa is Absolutely Pure, the Lancet pronouncing it "the standard of highest purity." It is Cocoa, and the best Cocoa only.

CAUTION.—How to test the Purity of Cocoas.—If treated with alkali and chemicals such cocoas will have a medicinal scent when the tin is opened, and will be a darker colour when in liquor. Cadbury's Cocoa has no addition of any kind, and is guaranteed absolutely pure.

ZEBRA



CRATE POLISH

In Packets or Tins.

A DAILY LUXURY.

BIRD'S CUSTARD POWDER

BIRD'S CUSTARD is Pure, Creamy, Nutritious, and easily digested. It is a wholesome, delicious article of diet for daily use. Eggs often disagree; BIRD'S CUSTARD never.

AS AN ARTICLE OF DIET
BIRD'S CUSTARD
is unrivalled for nutriment and delicacy of flavour.
BIRD'S CUSTARD is the one thing needed with all Fresh, Stewed, or Tinned Fruits. Practical housewives always keep a supply ready at hand.

NO EGGS! NO RISK! NO TROUBLE!

SHORT STORIES

1D

Two artists have painted a girl's portrait. She will marry the man whose picture she chooses. They await her choice.

KAPUTINE cures NEURALGIA equally as well as HEADACHE. NEVER FAILS. KAPUTINE is USED as well as recommended by MEDICAL MEN!

PACKETS OF 18 1/- FOR KAPUTINE THE SAFE REMEDY FOR HEADACHE NOTHING LIKE IT OR AS GOOD CURES IN 10 MINUTES.

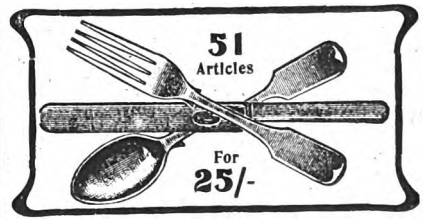
Packets of 18 doses 1/-. Samples 1d. of all Chemists and Stores, or post free from KAPUTINE Ltd., HUDDERSFIELD, for 12 stamps. Refuse dangerous substitutes. DEMAND KAPUTINE the SAFE Remedy.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Shakespeare

The "Enterprise" Parcel 25/-

Contents: 6 Table Knives, 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Knives, 6 Dessert Forks, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 1 Pair Sugar Tongs, 2 Table Spoons, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 1 Silver Mounted Bread Knife.

J. G. Graves is the only manufacturer who supplies the public direct, and the whole of the Goods are manufactured in the Firm's own Factory in Sheffield.



HOW TO PAY.

Send 2s. with order and complete purchase in six more monthly payments of 2s. and one of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment. If not satisfied return the Goods, and your deposit will be refunded.

Our No. 1 ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., etc., will be sent Post Free to your address.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 DIVISION STREET, SHEFFIELD.

FREE TO ALL

MR. H. STANSFIELD (from a photo).

A trial of an entirely new method of curing

RUPTURE,

the same method that cured Mr. H. Stansfield. No cumbersome steel truss, and no loss of time from work. Write to-day for free trial, and for interesting literature, including a book containing many testimonials.

DR. W. S. RICE,
57 Stonecutter Street, London, E.C.

INDELIBLE DYES FOR HOME USE WITHOUT TROUBLE

Maypole Soap

WASHES AND DYES ANY COLOUR

Curtains, Frocks, Blouses, Silks, and Satins made bright & beautiful as new.

COLOURS, 4d. BLACK, 6d.

Send for Free Booklet "THE PERFECTION of HOME DYEING" to the Maypole Co., 17 Cumming Street, London, N.

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN.

£7-15-0 Free Wheels. Carriage paid to all parts.

or 14/2 Monthly.

CASH or 12 monthly payments.

£7 15s.	14/2
£8 8s.	15/0
£9 10s.	17/1
£9 15s	17/6
£11 0s.	20/0
£12 0s.	21/8

Corsair Plate Lamp, 2/0; A1 Rim Brake, 6/6; Scorcher Brake, 1/-. Celluloid Mudguards, 3/9. Write at once for New Season's List of over 100 pages and over 500 illustrations of JUNO CYCLES and latest cycling accessories at lower prices than any other house. Sent Post Free. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd., S.Y. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street, Without, London, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

KEATING'S POWDER KILLS BUGS FLEAS FLIES BEETLES

TINS 3d. 6d. 1s- BELLOWS 9d.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 67 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2½lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SHORT STORIES

No. 712.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending August 23rd, 1902.

A NOVEL ENGAGEMENT.

Telling of a Girl, Two Men, and Two Pictures.

"WHICH do you think she will choose, Jack?"

Dick Halston turned from the two oil paintings as he spoke and looked inquiringly at his friend.

The latter raised his eyebrows and slightly shrugged his shoulders.

"Honestly, I never thought she would agree to our proposal," went on the first speaker, nervously.

Jack Steadman laughed.

"A woman's love of novelty, Dick."

A few moments passed in unbroken silence, then Halston spoke again.

"Hang it all!" he burst out. "I can't stand this suspense! It is only half-past two, and she won't be here until after four. I'll tell you what, Jack, I am going to run down to Richmond. This waiting is making me as nervous as a woman. I shall make a fool of myself if she chooses your painting. You don't mind?"

"No."

But the word was reluctantly spoken. However, Halston did not notice it. He caught up his hat.

"Good-bye, old chap. And you will let me know as soon as possible? If she chooses your painting, just wire the one word, 'mine,' and if the luck is with me wire, 'yours,' I shall understand it."

He wrung his friend's hand.

"Good luck to you, Jack—although that means the reverse to me, doesn't it?"

The door slammed behind him, and Steadman heard him bound down the steep stairs two steps at a time. He gave a low whistle, heaved a sigh, and then, thrusting his hands into his pockets, he fell into profound thought.

The two artists had long loved the same girl and she could not choose between them. The state of affairs between the trio grew from bad to worse, until there came a day when the two friends said that it was unendurable, that she was ruining their careers, and they implored her to consent to a plan which they proposed. Their proposal was that they should each paint her portrait from memory. No names were to be affixed to the pictures, and when they were finished she was to choose between them. The artist whose painting she chose was to be her husband. The girl demurred for a while, but in the end she gave her consent.

* * * * *

"I wish he had not gone," muttered Steadman. "It's awfully hard waiting here alone."

He rose and paced the length of the studio several times, coming at last to a standstill before the two pictures.

From the canvases a girl's lovely face looked out. In the actual painting there was little, if anything, to choose between them; yet, in looking at the one, you involuntarily waited for the girl to speak; in the other, you expected no such thing.

"How on earth did Dick get the soul into his?" exclaimed Steadman savagely. "It is splendid," he muttered. "Splendid!"

He turned abruptly, and fell to pacing the studio again. The girl's eyes seemed to follow him with a half mischievous expression, while the lips, half tender, half scornful, seemed to smile at his discomfiture. He threw himself into a chair with his back to the pictures. But soon, as if against his will, he had moved the chair so as to face them again.

"Why doesn't she come?" he cried fiercely, starting to his feet.

Then a demon rose up within him and whispered:

"What if she chooses his? You know it is the better. Look at that rose she holds so carelessly in her fingers; can you not fancy that you smell its fragrance? Don't you expect her to step out of the canvas and speak to you?"

Steadman drew his hand across his brow.

"No one would be the wiser," the voice went on. "Dick would go abroad at once. You know he swore he would. Then something could happen to the paintings—a fire—they would be destroyed. Better pluck the flower that he has run away from! He was not man enough to see the game out. Treachery?—Nonsense! They would never suit each other, but you—you could, you would make her happy. You feel that with her at your side you could do great things——"

He rushed across the studio to the paintings standing side by side.

"I must have you," he cried. "Ethel!" And the lovely eyes looked back at him, mischievously, alluringly.

* * * * *

There came a ring from below, followed by the light tread of dainty feet ascending the stairs.

Jack Steadman pulled himself together with a guilty start, and hurriedly drew a curtain before the two pictures. Then he went to welcome the anxiously awaited visitors.

"Oh, Dick has bolted," he said, with a somewhat forced laugh, in answer to Ethel's glance of inquiry round the studio.

"Bolted?"

There was surprise, anger and consternation in the girl's voice.

"There was scarcely necessity for that," she remarked coldly.

"You misunderstand me," interrupted Steadman. "Dick has only run down to Richmond until after your decision."

"Poor Dick!" murmured Ethel to herself.

"Indeed," she said aloud, with a contemptuous little pout.

Her good humour returned, and she chatted gaily.

"Now," said Jack Steadman, going over to the easels and

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

laying his hand on the curtain, will you choose between these two pictures? Ethel," he said, turning to her aunt, but looking at the girl, "has promised to marry the man whose portrait of herself she chooses."

The old lady bowed, and Ethel murmured an inaudible assent.

Steadman drew aside the curtain with a hand that shook, despite his utmost endeavours.

A simultaneous burst of admiration broke from both ladies.

"They are beautiful," cried the elder lady. "Look at that one, Ethel! My dear child, it is a living likeness of your own sweet self."

And Steadman's face grew grey, for she pointed to Halston's picture.

"Far too beautiful for me, auntie," whispered the girl, for once abashed.

But Steadman, looking at her, thought bitterly that it was not lovely enough, and his breath came short as the shadowy thoughts of a few moments since took shape.

"Which do you choose?" he asked her in a curious, hard voice.

There was a moment of awful suspense, then Ethel answered low and hesitatingly:

"I ought to choose that one," pointing to the unhappy artist's own painting, "for it is less beautiful, and, therefore, must be more like me. But, oh!" with sudden rapture. "I cannot help but choose this! It is lovely!"

"Lovely!" chimed in her aunt. "And look at that rose, dear! Have you ever seen anything so exquisitely painted?"

"It is like the one I gave Dick the other night," faltered the girl.

There was a flush on her cheeks and a light in her eyes.

"Yes, it is the same," said Steadman quietly, "I begged it of Dick to put in my picture. It's colour was so perfect."

"Your picture?"

There was a note of despair in the girl's voice.

"Yes; mine."

Had either lady looked they would have observed the ghastly pallor of Steadman's face and the tense set of his mouth.

But the old lady was still lost in admiration of the painting, and Ethel had turned aside to hide the sudden clouding of her eyes.

"Come, Ethel, we must be going," said her aunt, and she shook hands warmly with Steadman, saying: "I congratulate you heartily on your great success and also on winning so sweet a wife. And you, Ethel, are a fortunate girl to have won so gifted a husband!"

Age had dulled her eyes. She did not notice that anything was amiss with the girl, and neither of them noticed the man.

"Good-bye, Ethel!"

There was an exultant gleam in his eyes. Mechanically the girl held out her hand to her future husband. Her lips moved, but no sound escaped them, and with a slight inclination of her head, she followed her aunt.

* * * * *

"A telegram, sir."

"Thanks."

For a moment, Dick Halston held the flimsy envelope in his fingers, turning it this way and that, dreading to open it.

"What a coward I am!" he muttered, and with a sudden resolution he tore it open.

At first he was only able to grasp the one word: "Yours." Then he read further:

"Come to the studio at once. Important."

* * * * * *

"Jack, old man! Jack, where are you? Where are you?"

It was Halston's voice calling, as he looked round the empty studio. But he received no answer. Then his eyes fell upon a letter addressed to himself in Steadman's handwriting. He opened it, wondering what it meant.

"Dick," he read, "forgive me! The temptation was too great and I fell. I claimed your picture as mine. Your love for her will make you understand. But, thank Heaven! I repented before it was too late. Good-bye, and forgive me if you can. "JACK STEADMAN."

* * * * *

And Dick Halston did understand.

Arthur Hales.

KITTY'S SISTER.

A Pathetic Love Story.

WHEN Katherine Graham learnt that Winifred, her elder sister, had fallen in love with Robert Maitland, her first feeling was one of anger and indignation.

She would have felt angry and indignant whoever had been the object of Winifred's affections, but the idea of Robert Maitland was particularly distasteful.

Katherine had only met Robert once, and on that occasion had taken a violent, and, as Winifred insisted, quite unreasonable dislike to him.

"When you know him better, you'll be sorry you wronged him," said Winifred, with tears of mortification in her eyes.

"I don't want to know him better," replied her sister, shortly.

"But, Kitty, you'll have to now," protested Winifred.

To this Katherine made no immediate reply.

"How long have you been engaged to him?" she demanded, suddenly.

"Why, Kitty, only since to-day, of course! As if I shouldn't have told you at once."

"Oh, I didn't know. You've been in love with him longer than that, haven't you, and never told me?"

Winifred began to laugh through her tears.

"So that's why you're so cross!" she exclaimed. "You don't like my having had a secret from you. Darling, I couldn't help it. I hadn't the courage to confess till I was certain he cared for me, too. Besides, you were away, and it's so hard to tell that sort of thing in writing."

"You might have told me," cried Katherine, "but you never even allowed me to suspect. It was horrid of you. I shall never forgive you, and—and I hate Mr. Robert Maitland."

"Kitty, you don't know what you're saying!" remonstrated her sister patiently.

She was so patient because she had begun to realise the situation.

Digitized by Google

Katherine's outburst did not annoy her. In fact, if the truth be told, it pleased her not a little.

"Kitty's jealous," she reflected. And the thought that her sister was so fond of her as to be jealous of Robert made her forgive the unkind things Katherine said of him.

"Try and be nice to him for my sake, even if you do hate him," she pleaded.

But Katherine would promise nothing, and when, that same evening, Robert Maitland called to see them, she was so cold and repellant in her manner to him, that poor Robert thought he had never met a more unpleasant girl, and wondered how it was possible that two sisters could be so utterly unlike.

"She seems to lack everything that my Winnie has got," thought Robert. And few people, seeing the two sisters together, would have contradicted him.

Winifred Graham was by way of being a beauty, tall and exquisitely proportioned, the possessor of a perfect profile, limpid, childlike blue eyes, and hair the colour of ripened corn—as Robert, with pardonable lack of originality, was wont to describe it. Hers was a fair, sweet, lovable face, but not a clever one—decidedly not a clever one, said Winifred's detractors.

Some even went so far as to declare that they were bored by beauty without brains, and that Katherine's homely countenance was infinitely more attractive than her sister's.

It was usually ladies who made those remarks—ladies whose husbands and brothers did not share their opinion.

Katherine was not popular among men, not so much because of her want of beauty as because she had a way of saying cynical things which they considered a masculine prerogative.

"I wonder what her redeeming features are?" thought Robert, watching the girl curiously, as she sat, silent and sullen, in the remotest corner of the room, idly turning over the leaves of a book on her lap. "They say everybody has got some redeeming features, but, really, hers are not very obvious."

Perhaps it was just because Katherine's redeeming features were so very far from obvious that Robert felt a certain interest in their discovery. Besides, the girl was Winnie's sister, and Robert was prepared to do much for Winnie's sake.

He was not a fool, and he understood women better than most men.

It did not take Katherine long to discover that Robert Maitland was a man it was impossible to treat with that frigid politeness which was the attitude she had made up her mind to adopt towards her future brother-in-law.

Robert, apparently, was impervious to snubs, for the simple reason that he did not understand them. He ignored the most pointed rebuffs, and reduced Katherine to a state of indignant impotence by his calm and unruffled amiability.

He devoted himself to her so assiduously that Winifred laughingly whispered to him that she was getting jealous, and when at last he took his leave and Katherine held out two fingers, he bent forward and planted a brotherly kiss upon her cheeks as coolly and naturally as though he had been in the habit of thus saluting her for years!

Winifred laughed at Katherine's scarlet face, but Robert himself seemed quite unconscious of having done anything unusual.

"Oh, I was almost forgetting to ask you," he said, turning back in the doorway. "I got a box at the Lyceum for to-morrow night on the chance of your both being able to come."

"How delightful!" exclaimed Winifred. "Of course we'll come."

"I'm afraid I shall not be able to go, thank you," said Katherine stiffly.

"Kitty! Why not?" asked her sister.

"I don't think the servants should be left alone."

"The idea! Why, they've been left alone dozens of times!" cried Winnie.

"And I absolutely refuse to take 'No' for an answer," put in Robert.

"If you stay at home, Kitty, Bob and I shall insist on keeping you company," said Winifred.

"Then it's settled," declared Robert, firmly. "I'll call for you at half-past seven. Good-night and pleasant dreams."

Before Katherine could think of a suitable reply, he was gone.

"Isn't he an old darling?" said Winifred. "Kitty, you and I are going to have a lovely time!"

"I don't know what you mean," retorted Katherine, with an angry flush. "I shall not have a good time."

"Oh, Kitty, he's promised to take us everywhere!"

"He can take you. He certainly isn't going to take me."

"But you're coming to-morrow. You've promised, you know!"

"Did I promise?" asked Katherine uneasily.

"Of course."

"We haven't asked father whether we can go."

"As if that mattered! Of course he'll say yes. He always does."

This was true enough. Mr. Graham, a widower of five years' standing, troubled his head too little about his daughters to deny them anything. Wrapt up entirely in his business, he adopted the comfortable policy of ignorance in all domestic matters. Having satisfied himself that Winifred's suitor was desirable from a worldly point of view, he gave his sanction to the engagement, and there considered his responsibilities at an end.

He never shared in, and never interfered with, his daughters' plans. To him, paternal duties meant little more than the paying of dressmakers' bills, and, to do him justice, he did this cheerfully, and with unfailing regularity.

"Bob wanted to know whether we cared for the Opera," Winifred went on. "I told him we were dying to go, so he's going to get seats for the earliest possible date. Won't it be lovely?"

"Look here, Winnie," said Katherine gravely, "I am going with you to-morrow because there seems no help for it now, but that's the first and the last time I mean to inflict myself upon you two. You can reassure Mr. Maitland upon that point."

"Don't be horrid, Kitty! As if we always wanted to be by ourselves! And don't, don't call him Mr. Maitland, please. Just as if he were a stranger."

"He is a stranger to me," declared Katherine obstinately. "You forget, this is only the second time I've seen him."

"He couldn't help your being away when he got to know me," said Winifred. "And you must admit that he's doing his best to make up for lost time," she added, with a sly smile.

And Katherine, remembering that brotherly kiss, blushed but said nothing more.

On the following evening Katherine was forced to admit that if Robert Maitland had not committed the heinous crime of falling in love with her sister, she, Katherine, might possibly have learnt to tolerate him. As it was—well, he was really quite a pleasant person, but she could never forgive him, never.

By slow—by very slow—degrees, the girl's frigid politeness to Robert gave way to more cordial behaviour, until at last, almost in spite of herself, Katherine found herself on quite a friendly footing with her prospective brother-in-law, and one day she astonished that gentleman by remarking suddenly when they happened to be alone together—

"I want to apologise to you—Robert."

She had never brought herself to address him by his Christian name before.

"Apologise—to me?" asked Robert, in genuine amazement.

"Why do you look so surprised?" demanded the girl, and her grey eyes looked straight into his own. "You know that I have reason to apologise. I've behaved abominably. I daresay you hate me."

"Hate you—Winnie's sister? How can you think that?"

"Of course, for Winnie's sake, you put up with me," said Katherine, and something flashed up in the grey eyes. "If I were not her sister, I suppose you would think me detestable?"

"No," said Robert simply, and took her hand.

She withdrew it hastily.

Digitized by Google

"I'm going to be quite frank," she said, with a flush on her face. "I don't see how we two can ever be really friends. When I heard that Winnie had promised to be your wife, I hated you as I'd never hated anyone before. Winnie is the only person in the world I love, and—and—I believe you understand."

"Yes—I understand," he replied softly.

"I—I'm beginning to see how selfish and unreasonable I am," Katherine went on, speaking with difficulty. "I despise myself. I try not to feel as I do, and yet I—I can't help being jealous of you still, and I think I—I shall hate you a little," she ended, with a laugh that was almost a sob.

"I understand," said Robert again.

"And yet, how should you understand it really?" asked Katherine, almost piteously. "You have so many friends. You are good-looking, and successful, and popular. Everybody likes you, Winnie says. But I'm ugly, and disagreeable, and insignificant. Nobody cares for me. Winnie's love was all I had."

Robert seized her hand, and this time the girl allowed it to remain in his.

"Foolish little girl," he said. "You think I've taken Winnie's love away from you? Isn't it just possible that in her heart there's room for both of us? Isn't it possible even, that she may care for you all the more now?"

Katherine shook her head.

"Do you know," continued Robert, "I never realised that I cared much for my own sister till I met Winnie. One love doesn't necessarily drive away another. Kitty, I don't see why we shouldn't be friends!"

"After I've told you I hated you?"

"Oh," said Robert cheerfully, "that was when you still thought you had reason to hate me. Now you know better."

"Do I?"

"You see, we're not really rivals. We can flourish quite happily side by side. If you don't mind Winnie loving me, I shan't mind her loving you. That's only fair, isn't it?"

"I suppose so."

"Anyway, it's making the best of things, and one should always do that."

"Yes," returned Katherine thoughtfully, "only it's generally so much easier to make the worst of them. I began by making the worst of you."

"Did I seem so very horrible?"

"Well—yes."

"Oh!"

Katherine began to laugh at Robert's discomfiture.

"You asked, you know, and I couldn't tell a story, could I? Besides—I've changed my mind!"

"Sensible person!" said Robert, giving her a hearty kiss.

The blood leapt to Katherine's cheeks. Somehow, it always did when Robert kissed her.

Winnie, entering the room at that moment, looked from one to the other in some alarm.

"You two haven't been quarrelling, have you?" she asked.

Robert laughed.

"On the contrary," he said, "Kitty and I have never got on better. We've come to the conclusion, Winnie, that we like each other very much."

Winifred looked doubtful.

"Is this true?" she inquired suspiciously.

"My darling, your scepticism is not very complimentary to either of us," remarked Robert. "Of course it's true."

"Oh, I'm so glad!" said Winifred, with a little sigh of pleasure. "Then you're coming with us to-morrow after all, Kitty?"

"Not I."

"But why not?"

"Because," said Katherine, smiling.

"Oh, I know what you mean," cried Winnie. "But you're all wrong. Bob and I would simply bore each other to death if we went alone, wouldn't we, Bob?"

"Of course," assented Bob, a trifle feebly.

"Well, you'll have to risk that," said Katherine, "because I can't possibly go with you to-morrow."

"Why won't you come?" asked Robert.

"Business," replied Katherine mysteriously, and would say nothing more.

"They would rather be alone," she reflected, with a pang to which she would not have confessed. "They don't want me always with them. If I were in Winnie's place, I shouldn't——"

She stopped suddenly, and cast a startled glance at Robert.

"What's the matter, Kitty? Why do you look so frightened?" asked her sister.

"Do I look frightened? I was only thinking of something."

"Something dreadful, of course," said Winnie. "Kitty's always thinking of dreadful things," she added, turning to Robert.

The latter gave Katherine a searching look. There was a curious expression upon her face, he thought; something that attracted him, yet made him feel vaguely uneasy.

From that day Robert began to take a new interest in his sweetheart's sister. The girl puzzled him, but, mingled with his perplexity, there grew up a certain subtle sympathy with her, the reason for which he understood but dimly.

Perhaps it was Katherine's lack of beauty that appealed to him, and roused his chivalrous instincts. To him there was something pathetic in the contrast between the two sisters.

Nature had been so niggardly to poor Katherine. As Robert compared his sweetheart's fair, flower-like face with Katherine's plain, uncompromising beauty, his heart warmed with a strange tenderness towards the pale-faced girl to whom so little had been given.

By-and-bye, however, it began to dawn upon Robert that Nature had been a little less unjust to Katherine than he had imagined. He discovered what Winnie's detractors had discovered long ago, that Winnie's beauty and Katherine's brains were in the same proportion.

It would be hard to say at what precise moment he realised the fact that Winnie was not a clever girl. When the thought did come to him in definite shape, Robert felt, first startled, then angry and indignant with himself, for it seemed like disloyalty to the girl he loved.

"I hate intellectual women," he told himself, with an air of defiance that belied the truth of his assertion. "So long as they're good, and sweet, and lovable, like my Winifred, what more can a man want?"

In his heart of hearts Robert knew that there was something more—something that Winifred could never give him.

Robert was ambitious. Though possessed of an independent income ample for his needs, he did not live in idleness. He had devoted himself eagerly, at a very youthful age, to the study of philosophy, and had already written several works on philosophical subjects.

His writings and lectures were beginning to be talked about at the time when Winifred Graham came into his life.

Robert had never met anyone quite like Winifred. She belonged to a type that was almost unknown to the young student. She was so fair, and fresh, and simple, so unlike the bluestockings to whose society he was accustomed. Her very ignorance fascinated him.

Digitized by Google

A woman who had never heard of Kant and Schopenhauer! A woman who prattled charmingly of theatres, and concerts, and river picnics, of the latest song and the latest creation from Paris, a woman who never read anything more intellectual than a novel by Marie Corelli!

Winifred was a new sensation, a new delight to Robert. To him she seemed an embodiment of pure joy of living, of all that is bright, and fair, and innocent in life, and he succumbed without a struggle to the charm of her girlish presence.

Then, by slow and almost imperceptible degrees, what had attracted Robert so strongly to Winifred began to assume a different aspect, and presently he realised that the girl's light-hearted gaiety and careless enjoyment went hand-in-hand with a certain complete and, to Robert, astounding incapacity to appreciate the more serious issues of life.

At first Robert had attributed Winifred's want of interest in his own particular hopes and aspirations to simple ignorance. It should be his privilege to initiate his sweetheart into the mysteries of his beloved study.

He never regretted for a moment that Winnie was no blue-stocking, and he had no wish to make her one.

All he hoped for was that she might gradually come to understand and sympathise with the object of his labours, his strivings after truth, and reason, and the justification of things that from time immemorial have baffled philosophers and simple men alike.

But when Robert began to speak to her in this strain, Winifred opened her blue eyes very wide and stared at her lover in unaffected bewilderment.

"I know nothing about these things," she said simply, and began talking to him about the latest extravagance of the latest society actress.

Once or twice, Robert returned to the charge. Winifred became first perplexed and troubled, then reproachful, and even a little petulant. Robert, in his philosophical mood, alarmed and irritated her. She resented what she could not understand.

Those unknown, unexplored regions which her lover tried to open out before her, did not attract her. She had no curiosity, no desire to learn. Robert's learning worried her a little. It seemed to awaken a dim consciousness of her own limitations.

"I wish, I do wish, you were just an ordinary young man," she said to him, one day, after he had been engaged in a futile attempt to arouse her interest in certain extracts from a book of Professor Huxley's. "Robert, I sometimes think I ought not to marry you."

"Sweetheart," cried Robert, full of tender reproach. "What makes you say that?"

"I'm not clever enough for you, Robert. It's a pity you fell in love with me."

Robert laughed uneasily.

"Nonsense, darling," he said, "I'm the happiest man in the world, and I've no right to trouble your pretty head with things that can't interest you. I'm afraid I'm an old fogey by nature, but you'll have to teach me not to be one."

And he bent down and kissed away the wistful look that had crept into Winnie's charming face.

"You're quite sure you wouldn't rather marry somebody clever—somebody like Kitty, for instance?"

Robert started, and a deep flush suffused his dark face.

"What put that idea into your head, sweetheart?" he asked. With a sudden fierce movement, he took the girl in his arms and covered her face with kisses.

That was the last time Robert ever attempted to inspire Winifred with enthusiasm for his work. From that moment he never referred to it in her presence. He tried, with an earnestness that was almost pathetic, to keep within the narrow circle of his sweetheart's own innocent girlish interests, and he succeeded so well that Winifred's vague doubts were set at rest.

It was only to Winifred's sister that Robert spoke of his work now.

Not that Katherine had any greater pretensions to learning than Winnie. She was as frankly ignorant of the teachings of the great philosophers as Winnie herself, only there was this vast difference between them: That whereas Winnie was bored and miserable in the presence of superior knowledge, Katherine was fascinated by it, and impelled with the desire to make it her own.

Before long Robert had cause to marvel at the younger sister's keen intelligence, at the quickness of her perceptions, the ease with which she mastered ideas that were entirely new to her.

Katherine never did things by halves.

"It's to be friends," she had told Robert. And friends they became in more than merely name.

The girl never obtruded her presence on the lovers. She had an exaggerated horror of being "in the way," a feeling against which her sister was wont to protest with honest indignation.

But in spite of this morbid sensitiveness on her part, Katherine and Robert were thrown a good deal together, and the girl's ready sympathy, her genuine interest in Robert's work, was inexpressibly grateful to him.

Then it happened that Winifred received a letter from an aunt, an unmarried sister of her father's, inviting the girl to stay with her for a few weeks at her home in Edinburgh.

It was barely two months before the date fixed for the wedding, and Winifred was very loth to go.

"I can't understand aunt Kate inviting me now," she said to Katherine. "She must know how busy I am, and—and all that sort of thing."

"Perhaps father will let you decline the invitation," suggested her sister.

But Mr. Graham would not hear of this. It was one of those rare occasions on which he thought fit to exert his paternal authority.

"I have so much to do," pleaded Winifred.

"That's precisely why your aunt has invited you," said Mr. Graham, who knew his sister. "She wants to put you to the test. Remember, you are her favourite niece, Winifred. I can't allow you to ruin your chances. If you offend her now, she'll never forgive you."

Mr. Graham could be firm where his daughters' worldly prospects were concerned, and so to Edinburgh Winnie had to go, much to her own and Katherine's indignation.

Winifred's attempt at cheerfulness as she bade good-bye to Robert and Katherine at Euston was almost pathetic.

"You two are not to mope while I'm away, do you hear?" she said, furtively wiping away a tiny tear. "You're to go and see Kitty every day, Robert," she added, turning to her sweetheart with a pretty air of authority. "Kitty's promised to be so good to you that you won't miss me a bit."

Robert went home that night with Winifred's parting words ringing in his ears.

"I'm to see her every day," he said with a bitter smile that would have puzzled Winifred could she have seen it.

Robert kept his promise.

Katherine told him laughingly that she had no need of him. Her hands were full with preparations for Winnie's wedding.

"Now that Winnie's away I have to do double duty," she said. "You've no idea what a lot there is to be done. I don't know how I'm going to finish it all!"

"Can't the servants do it?" asked Robert.

"Now, isn't

Digitized by Google

that just like a man?" cried Katherine. "Fancy leaving Winnie's trousseau to the mercy of the servants! Robert, your ignorance is appalling. You don't deserve to be married!"

"I know that," said Robert, so seriously that the girl looked at him in surprise.

"I was only joking, of course," she remarked.

"Perhaps it was one of those true words spoken in jest."

For some reason Katherine chose to treat the reply with flippancy.

"What a dreadful mood to be in!" she exclaimed. "The idea of cultivating a conscience on the eve of your wedding!"

"There's plenty of time."

"Plenty of time! And Winnie with not a thing to wear!"

"I meant there's time for—repentance."

"Robert, you're quite unbearable this evening, and I don't understand in the least what you mean," said Katherine, angrily.

"Katherine—what would you say if I told you that it was impossible for me to—to marry Winifred?"

The girl turned white to the lips. Her grey eyes—the only beauty that Nature had given her—flashed ominously. With an effort she controlled herself.

"I should say," she replied, in a voice that trembled a little, "I should say that was the poorest joke I ever had heard."

For a moment Robert was silent. His own face was almost as pale as his companion's.

"Forgive me," he said, at last. "I spoke like a fool. I'm sorry I distressed you. Forgive me, dear."

She laid her hand on his arm.

"Perhaps I ought to have taken the jest in better part," she said, "but just for a moment, I believed—I believed it was not a jest, Robert, and—you frightened me. That you had deceived Winnie—my Winnie—who loves you so—it was too horrible. Oh, Robert, if you should ever be unkind to her—if you should ever forget that she loves you——"

The girl broke off suddenly, and, covering her face with her hands, burst into a passion of sobs.

And Robert, calling himself brute and blackguard, stood by, powerless to comfort her.

He could not understand the violence of Katherine's grief. At that moment it was well he did not understand.

Presently the sobs ceased, and Katherine lifted a pitiful face to Robert.

"What a weak, hysterical creature you must think me," she said, with a smile that moved him strangely. "After my promise to Winnie, too! A nice cheerful substitute she's chosen for herself. Don't be angry with me, Robert. I promise not to be so foolish again."

And Katherine was as good as her word. She had never seemed brighter and happier and more light-hearted than in the days that followed.

Robert, on the other hand, was moody and depressed. A great change seemed to have come over him since Winifred's departure—a change that almost frightened Katherine.

The girl tried to attribute his strange conduct to Winnie's absence.

"It's only natural that he should be silent and depressed," she reasoned. "He's pining for her. He can't bear to be away from her so long."

And yet, though she dared not admit it even to herself, she knew that this was not the truth. The truth she had read in his eyes that night when he asked her the question she had chosen to interpret as a foolish jest. The truth she dared not face.

Then, suddenly, without warning, she was called upon to face it.

One morning Robert came to her with a letter in his hand.

"In less than a week she'll be home again," he said.

"I know," replied the girl brightly. "I've had a letter, too. Robert, I'm very glad."

"I'm glad, too," said Robert. But there was no joy in his face.

Katherine answered nothing. She understood too well.

"Kitty, I shall not see you again till Winifred comes back."

The girl gave him a startled look.

"Why, there are five whole days, and we have seen each other every day till now," she said.

"Kitty, I can't come again," he cried. "I daren't come again—till she is back!"

The girl began to tremble. Slowly, almost reluctantly, she raised her eyes to his. For a moment they gazed at each other as though spell-bound. And in that moment there was revealed to each something that could never be recalled.

With a cry he came towards her. The girl shivered and put out her arms as though to repel him.

"Kitty," he whispered, "Kitty, is it too late?"

His words seemed to break the spell that held her. Almost fiercely she shook off the hand he had laid on her arm.

"Robert, are you mad?" she cried.

The sound of her voice softened him. With an effort that was almost physical pain to him, he controlled himself.

"Forgive me," he said, humbly. "I did not mean to frighten you, but—yes, I was mad for a moment, I had forgotten."

"Go," she said in a low voice, not daring to look at him.

He seized her hand and kissed it.

"Good-bye—little sister," he said, softly. And stole from the room.

Grete Hahn.

THIS WEEK'S COMPETITION.

For this week's competition I want my readers to make a sentence of seven words, the initial letters of the words to be C, Y, N, T, H, I, A, respectively. A Solid Silver Pencil-case will be awarded to the sender of the best sentence, and ten consolation gifts, consisting of rolled gold hearts and charms will go to the senders of the ten next best. Sentences should be written on the backs of postcards only, and should be addressed to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., to arrive not later than first post on Tuesday, August 26th. The Editor's decision is final.

Result of "Three Letters" Competition.

The first prize of a Solid Silver Pencil-case offered in this competition has been awarded to Mr. Fred Farr, Union Infirmary, Hampton, Evesham. Consolation prizes go to the following: Miss L. Thomson, 1 Church Row, Garratt Lane, Lower Tooting, S.W.; James M. Braidwood, 6 Gladstone Ter., Edinburgh; Miss Rose Lee, 24 Dorothy Street, Hightown, Manchester; Alexander Bruce, 4 Clarence Road, Handsworth, Birmingham; Miss Tucker, 293 Finchley Road, N.W.; Edwin Pearson, 417 Blackburn Road, Accrington, Lancs.; Miss Maggie B. Stuart, 12 Garnet Terrace, Mt. Florida, Glasgow; Mrs. H. J. Callander, 6 Brunton Terrace, Sunderland; Cecil J. Pearson, 140 Belgrave Road, Walthamstow; C. Buckley, 35 Walton Street, Heywood; John Connelly, 16 High Street, Dumbarton.

Result of "Cat" Competition.

Drawings of all sorts and conditions of cats were sent in, and the Silver Pencil-case has been awarded to Mr. Gilbert H. Dodd, 19 Talbot Street, Mauldeth Road, Withington, Manchester. The following have received consolation gifts: J. Thomson, 5 W. Montgomery Place, Edinburgh; F. N. L. Daubeny, Woodville, Alumhurst Road, Bournemouth; A. Bruce, 4 Clarence Road, Handsworth, Birmingham; W. E. Raymond, 8 College View, Bootle; Dorothy Griffiths, 186 Brighton Road, Croydon; J. McLay, 12 Burndyke Street, Govan, Glasgow; Mrs. E. Fisher, 63 Bold Street, Altrincham; R. Thomson, 5 W. Montgomery Place, Edinburgh; Mrs. Worrell, 3 Guy's Cliff Road, Leamington Spa; F. Peterson, 17 Oakfield Street, Altrincham.

TO THOSE WHO WRITE.

A Prize of One Guinea will be paid every week by the Editor for the best short story sent in by any of his readers. Contributions should not be less than 1,500 words in length, and not more than 3,000. The Editor reserves to himself the right to publish any contribution submitted. Stamped addressed envelopes must be inclosed for the return of the stories, but, while every care will be taken, the Editor does not hold himself responsible for possible loss of MSS.

Digitized by Google

POST THIS COPY TO A FRIEND!

THE GREAT "PASS-IT-ALONG" SCHEME.

First Award, £10. Second Award, £5. Third Award, £2. Six Awards of 10s. each.

(A)

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE COMPETITOR WHO SENDS THIS COPY.

When you have carefully read these rules, put an ink line round the instructions in the next column, write your name and address in the space at the foot of this page*, and in the next column; wrap up this copy of SHORT STORIES in a wrapper, fix a penny stamp on it, and post it to a friend of yours whom you think will help you. Then wait until the copy is returned to you.

All you need do is to send out your copy or copies of SHORT STORIES and wait until they come back to you with the names filled in.

The first prize will be awarded to the person whose copies of SHORT STORIES contain the greatest number of signatures of people to whom the copies have been sent, provided that the wrappers which carried the copies of SHORT STORIES through the post to each person accompany the list.

It is not necessary for you to know the people whose names you will find on your list when your copy comes back; they will, of course, be the friends of your friends.

There is no absolute necessity to write a letter to your friend explaining the scheme, but if you did so it would carry more weight.

HOW TO SEND IN.

Keep the wrappers as they are sent to you, and when this copy comes back send all the wrappers, together with this copy, to the Editor of "Short Stories," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., in an envelope marked "PASS-IT-ALONG," to arrive not later than first post Thursday, September 4th.

NOTE.—Competitors may send out at the same time any number of copies of this issue.

The Editor's decision is final, and readers may enter only on this understanding.

(B)

INSTRUCTIONS TO THOSE WHO RECEIVE THIS COPY BY POST.

This copy of SHORT STORIES has been sent to you by a friend who is interested in this competition and who wants to win one of the prizes offered. When you have read this announcement write your name down in the space provided, and then forward this copy at once in a penny wrapper to a friend of yours. If you have no friend to whom you can send it, return the copy of the paper, together with the wrapper in which you received it, to the original sender.

If the original sender of this paper (whose name and address is written at the foot of this page) wins the first prize, you will also receive a prize. The paper must be returned to the original sender on or before Saturday, August 30th.

You must at once return the wrapper in which this copy reaches you to _____

(Competitor must insert here his or her name and address.)

IMPORTANT.

Fill in your name at once and post it on the day this is received. If you keep it longer it will lessen the chance of the original sender securing the first prize, as the paper will not be able to get into so many hands within the time limit.

If you receive this copy on Saturday, August 30th, fill up your name and post it at once to the sender, whose name appears at the foot of this page.

Why Not Try Yourself?

If you want to enter for this competition yourself, and win one of the prizes, get a copy of SHORT STORIES from your newsagent at once, and follow the instructions marked "A."

Those to whom this copy is sent sign here.

	NAME.	ADDRESS.
1.
2.
3.
4.
5.
6.
7.
8.
9.
10.
11.
12.

Those who sign here will get a prize each if this wins first award.

*Name and Address of Competitor.....

Digitized by Google

THE GHOST OF AN OLD LOVE.

And a Man who Married the Ghost.

IF ever John C. Studley came near believing in ghosts it was on the second day of July, at half-past three in the afternoon.

On that day and at that hour he had made his way through the woods that fringe the sandy cliffs near Sealand Bay, and had come out where he could look down over the whole length of the shimmering bay—and it was then he saw the ghost.

It was a bright, sunshiny afternoon; the rattle of hammers came up from the little ship-yard below; three visitors in a boat were pulling three various ways—yet it was under these most prosaic signs of the realities of life that he saw the ghost of Agnes Thorpe sitting under a tree, sketching the scene he had known so well twenty-two years ago.

Twenty-two years ago he had lived in the neighbouring village of straggling Kilcombe, the only son of old Captain Studley, and had sat many, many times either under this very tree, or one very much like it, while Agnes had sketched, as she was sketching now. Then one day he had said something that was unjust. She had called it cruel; angry words had passed, and what might have been smoothed over by a syllable of explanation had ended as a violent quarrel. In the wild illogicality of the angry man, he had thought that by causing her pain he would alleviate his own, and so had shipped on his father's whaler, and had sailed to the ice-fields and the snow. But man's temper is rarely formative, it is never an arbiter of fate, and storm and stress followed close on his heels for ten years. Then, when 'twas too late for him to return home, Dame Fortune had wooed him as though he were the best man in the world, and he was rich. Rich, without a soul to share his riches, and, about three weeks ago, a wave of loneliness and homesickness had borne him back here.

He had not been nearly so sentimentally affected as he had imagined would be the case, and now, just as he had come to the conclusion that the old place was very stupid, all the old memories had been revived in this startling fashion.

For it was startling, and he felt his heart beat faster as he looked at the wraith of his dead love. Then, as he hesitated whether to turn and run or address the spirit, a little fox terrier bounded from beside her ghostly ladyship and ran with sharps barks towards him.

"Come here, Gyp," cried the ghost, and even then Studley could not forbear another shiver, for the voice was that of Agnes.

But having seen strange sights and mastered himself, and drawing near, said, though quite tremblingly:

"Is your name Agnes Thorpe?"

No woman could look on Studley's face without feeling that it was that of a man of which some men might be afraid, but of which no woman could be. So—and for another reason, as you shall hear—it was that the ghostly artist said, and smiled as she said it:

"No, but that was my mother's name."

Then it all came to him in that swiftness of light with which he had so often seen the dawn rush in down there in the tropics, and he knew that his old love lived again in her daughter.

"My foolish question will show you that that does not surprise me," he said, "for you look very like her—your mother, I mean."

"You knew her then?"

"Indeed I did," he answered, "as perhaps you might know and as perhaps you might not, if I told you that my name is Studley—John C. Studley."

"Of course, of course," the girl said, tilting back her sun-bonnet, the better to look clearly at him, "I might have known it, had not my mother told me many times that you were dead."

"I was," he said, "dead to her, a suicide of love. And she, of course, is dead to me?"

"She is dead as our lives go," said the girl, "but she was never dead to you as love goes, Mr. Studley. She lived and died loving you, and my father, who is also dead, knew that and accepted her duty and wifely affection as the sweetest substitute she had to offer."

"Wonderful, and wonderfully sad," said the man. "'Twas all my evil and wrong."

"She never said so," said the girl. Then added: "And you loved her, did you not?"

"Well," said Studley, "if I was cruel and harsh, at least I have been consistent in my penance—if you can call a penance that which it was no pain to do—for I have never bestowed a duty and affection on any other woman."

"That's good; that's right," said the girl; "that's as I would have a man love me."

"There are many strange things about this meeting," he said at length, pinching the dog's cropped ears, for man and beast were already friends. "One is that I had meant to go away to-morrow and now I don't want to go away at all."

"Well, must you?" asked the girl.

"No," he replied. "I am a fairly old man, with no encumbrances—except those of property hardly won."

"Now, as to being an old man," said the girl severely, "that is arrant foolishness. I have a picture of you at home that my mother gave me and you look exactly like it."

He laughed.

"That's the reason you didn't know who I was when I asked who you were," he said.

"Well, I did half know you then," said the girl, "but I thought you were dead, while you didn't know at all who I was, for you thought I was your old sweetheart come to life. So that really evens up our errors and," here she laughed too, "in a kind of whimsical way, it makes us of about the same age, doesn't it?"

"Do you know," he said, after a little while, "I feel exactly as though I was again playing court to Agnes Thorpe through you?"

"Yes?" she said quietly. "Then I suppose I ought to feel as though I were being courted as a reincarnation of my mother?"

"And do you?" he asked.

"Almost," she replied.

"I wonder," he said, with a quaver in his voice, "I wonder it could ever—possibly—happen—that you could feel so altogether?"

The new Agnes did not answer, but surely you can guess that as the time went by he found out what that silence meant.

T. J. Vivian.

The Little Chap Knew.

A CLERGYMAN was speaking to a Sunday-school class. "Now, can any little boy tell me," he asked, "what is grace?" There was a moment's silence. Presently a diminutive boy of not more than ten summers held up his hand. "Please sir, I know," said he. The minister was pleased. "Well, what is it?" he asked. "Why, please, sir," said the small boy, "he's the champion cricketer."

Digitized by Google

All's Right with the World.

By DAISY PENDER CUDLIP.

FIRST HALF OF THE STORY.

MRS. LESLIE is living with her two daughters, May and Nellie, at the fishing village of Porthtowan, near which are stationed two companies of the Royal Wessex Regiment. Captain Leonard Davies is one of her most frequent visitors, mostly on May's account, with whom he is great friends. Taking her out for a row one day, Captain Davies lands at a little sheltered cove, and, forgetting the fact that the tide is going down, gives himself up to the enjoyment of May's company. When too late they discover that the boat is high and dry between the rocks, and no amount of exertion will release it, and although they know what insinuations will probably be made against both the man and the girl, have to settle down to wait for the return of the tide. Meanwhile the seeds of calumny are speedily being sown at Porthtowan.

"For the sake of my daughter's good name I must consent."

MEANWHILE in the cottage above the village Mrs. Leslie, as the afternoon and evening wore on, began to feel anxious at the non-appearance of Captain Davies and the girls, for until Nelly casually strolled into the drawing-room at about seven o'clock Mrs. Leslie had no idea that the others had gone without her, and great was her annoyance at finding such to be the case, especially as it was getting late and the others had not come in.

"Why didn't you go with your sister this afternoon?" the mother asked querulously, so Nelly thought.

"Because it was so hot, and besides, they didn't want me, but they might have asked me nicely, I do think," went on the child in an aggrieved tone. "As it was, I just showed them I didn't care and let them go without me." Mrs. Leslie smiled at the child's pique, but found it wiser to refrain from saying anything, as she did not want to encourage this idea that the child was right in supposing her sister and Captain Davies were just as happy to be without her. As time went on and still they did not return, the mother's anxiety became keener every moment.

As May had rightly supposed, Mrs. Leslie guessed something of the state of affairs, but naturally her anxieties were all for the sake of her girl's good name. She felt very angry with Captain Davies for having exposed May to slanderous tongues, and more than half-inclined to drop his acquaintance for the future. As ill-luck would have it, after nine o'clock when she and Nelly had finished supper, and had returned to the drawing-room, a certain Mrs. Carroll, the widow of an officer who lived close to the Leslies', chose this particular evening to drop in at the cottage for a chat. She was a woman who loved gossip, a scandal was the joy of her life. During her husband's life-time she had made herself detested by every one of his brother officers, as the most obnoxious form of regimental woman who talks of "our regiment," and makes it her business to pry into the affairs of everybody.

Each subaltern as he joined the regiment fresh from Sandhurst was taken up by this woman, who, under the pretence of being kind, and "acting as a mother to the poor boy," gained from their guileless and trusting young lips many a family and personal confidence, which to their infinite surprise became miraculously known to everyone before very long.

At her husband's death she removed from the sphere of regimental mischief-maker. She had settled down at Porthtowan, far enough away from the garrison town of the former life for economy, but, alas, for her friends, quite near enough for gossip to reach her, and be made the most of by her foolish tongue, for she was more a fool than malicious. However, these are by far the most dangerous class, as unfortunately people believe them more readily because "they are so good natured."

In a very short time her lynx-eyes noted something was wrong from Mrs. Leslie's nervous, constrained manner. "Where is May?" she queried. Before her mother could answer Nelly chimed in with "She went out ever so early with Captain Davies this afternoon, and she hasn't come back yet."

"Not come back yet!" in tones of assumed astonishment. "My dear Mrs. Leslie, how shocking, and so compromising for poor dear May. But perhaps after all it is all right, and they are engaged. I saw them in the boat from my window this afternoon about half-past three, and certainly"—with a smile that was meant to be genial, but had the effect of looking spiteful—"and certainly they both looked very happy."

"I beg, Mrs. Carroll, that you won't run away with any impression of that kind," replied Mrs. Leslie with dignity. "Captain Davies is an intimate friend of ours, and I for one am most grateful to him for his kindness to my girls, seeing they have no brother, and as to your saying they looked extremely happy, surely your sight must be wonderfully keen to see the expression of a face at such a distance."

"You forget my telescope, Mrs. Leslie, you forget my little telescope." She said these words in a would-be playful and wholly exasperating manner, that made Mrs. Leslie long to shake the false smile out of her. Ignoring the remark, however, she said: "I can quite see what has kept them, they have been caught by the tide or something, and I can quite trust Captain Davies not to run any needless risk."

Poor woman, she did not know what to say, but she instinctively felt she must not appear anxious before this woman.

"Of course, of course, my dear, young people have a way of forgetting such trifles as tides and other disagreeables when they are together. I quite understand that, but the calm way in which you take it certainly surprises me."

Mrs. Leslie looked at her and did not answer, but that enfant terrible, Nelly, saw her advantage and took it with the remark, "That's just it, Mrs. Carroll, those two are simply awful, we should have been stranded in Smuggler's Cove heaps of times if it hadn't been for me. They never think of anyone but themselves, and t just serves them right for not taking me with them this afternoon."

Digitized by Google

There are times when a child's brutal truthfulness amounts to vice. Mrs. Leslie thought so now, and frowned at Nelly, who, unconscious of any wrong-doing, gave her mother away by asking "What are you frowning at? What on earth have I done?"

There being no reply to make to this Mrs. Leslie took refuge in silence, while Mrs. Carroll smiled knowingly, and said, "I thought so, you see I was right after all, these little things seldom escape me." Then finding she could gain no more information, she thought it wiser to withdraw with the parting shot that she should come over the first thing in the morning to hear the cause of May's delay.

It was with a sigh of intense relief that Mrs. Leslie saw her visitor depart; then, with an unwonted energy for her, she told Nelly to put on her things and go down to the beach with her to meet the others, as they would be sure to be back soon. Accordingly the two set out to watch for the truants. They had not long to wait, however, for by the clear light of the moon, which was now high up in the heavens, they saw a boat emerge from the shadow of the Cove known as Smuggler's Cove and come rapidly towards the beach.

As the boat crossed the silver pathway, they could easily recognise Captain Davies and May. In a few minutes the boat ran ashore, and jumping quickly out, Captain Davies hauled her further up the beach, and then lifted May out of the boat. "I am glad you came down to meet us," he said to Mrs. Leslie. "I'm awfully sorry that it should have happened, but the truth is we neither of us noticed how the tide was going out. I had asked your daughter if she would be my wife, and we were both too happy to notice anything of the sort. Mrs. Leslie, you will give her to me—I will try and be worthy of her." His voice took an imploring tone as he noticed the hard look of annoyance against him in her face.

"For the sake of my daughter's good name I suppose I shall have to give my consent," she answered coldly.

"May," she went on severely, "go home at once with your sister, I will follow with Captain Davies,"

Obediently she prepared to do as she was told, and with one look of love and confidence at her lover, she walked on with Nelly, her little head thrown a trifle higher than usual in indignation at her mother's suspicions. When they were out of ear-shot, Mrs. Leslie turned and in a low, concentrated voice, said:

"Now, Captain Davies, perhaps you will explain this business."

"Explain it!" he replied aghast, "have I not done so? I have told you exactly what happened, you surely do not suppose either of us guilty of such a piece of folly as to stay out there unless we could not possibly help it, do you?"

"I should hope not, at least I am sure my daughter is not the sort of girl to lower her dignity in that way, but how am I to know that you are not taking advantage of a girl who, having no father or brother to protect her, you think you can compromise with impunity?"

"You do me a great wrong when you imply such a thing, Mrs. Leslie," he replied. "I love your daughter dearly, and her honour is as dear to me as my own; surely the proof of this lies in the fact of my asking her to be my wife. Thank God I shall have the right to defend her good name now."

"You haven't then proposed to her from a mere sense of duty to protect her good name?" she asked doubtingly.

"Certainly not; we were engaged before we discovered that the tide had gone out, so no one can say anything, can they?"

"I hope not, I'm sure, but I'm afraid the majority won't believe it—however."

"We'll make them believe it, and don't you worry about it any more, Mrs. Leslie, you'll find a man a useful thing to have in a house—like a five-pound note or a Nasmyth hammer. People won't say disagreeable things so readily when there is a man to take up the cudgels on your behalf." And he laughed light-heartedly as he spoke.

"My dear boy, I sco

"Mrs. Leslie, you will give her to me—I will try to be worthy of her," he pleaded.
"For the sake of my daughter's good name I suppose I shall have to give my consent," she answered, coldly.

Digitized by Google

you are going to be a considerate son to me, and I shall rely on you entirely. As you say, a man is a useful thing to have in a house; no one realises that better than I do since my husband's death, because I know the want of it." And she took his two hands in hers. "I shall not ask you in to-night as it is too late, but you may come and see May any time you like to-morrow. In the meantime, good-night, and think yourself lucky at having escaped my wrath so easily."

"Good-night, Mrs. Leslie," and he turned to go, then, hesitating a moment, he said, "You'll make it all right with May, won't you?"

"Of course I will," and with a much lighter heart than had been her portion an hour before, Mrs. Leslie made her way back to the cottage.

"I Demand an Apology!"

Good as her word, Mrs. Carroll put in an appearance the following morning, and was greeted with the news of May's engagement by Nelly, who prefaced her remarks with the words, "Didn't I say so."

Mrs. Carroll, after effusively congratulating May, went on to say "How lucky it was that Captain Davies was such an honourable fellow, as some men would not have acted as he had done, but," she continued, "as it had all turned out well nothing more need be said," with many other remarks of a like nature.

May, not knowing what was in her mind, thought her rather peculiar, and then thought no more about it.

Time went on, and it was arranged that the young people should be married at Christmas, there being no reason why they should wait.

It must be confessed that the news of Captain Davies' engagement and approaching marriage was not well received by the unmarried portion of his mess. They deeply deplored the fact, for Leonard was voted by one and all a "thundering good fellow," and it was a thousand pities he should give up his bachelor freedom for any woman, let alone a chit of a girl who had apparently "tricked him into matrimony," from which it may be inferred that Mrs. Carroll had, as per usual, been giving her version of the case at various tea-fights, which version had circulated very rapidly, much to poor unoffending May's detriment.

Had Leonard known anything of this he would have been furious, but he was the last man in the world to whom anyone would repeat gossip, either about himself or anyone connected with him. Consequently he went on in blissful ignorance of the fact that he was being pitied for having been "caught" by a match-making mother, and a clever, though seemingly innocent daughter.

* * * * *

The wedding, which was to be a quiet affair, was fixed for the first week in January, so that the honeymoon should fit in with the leave season.

A few evenings before this, the bachelors of the regiment entertained Leonard at a farewell dinner, for on his return from leave he would be a Benedict, a married man, and then domestic life would claim him for its own.

They drank his health frequently, and finally with musical honours, shouting very much out of time and tune. "For he's a Jolly Good Fellow," but still no one proposed the health of the bride-elect. At length the youngest subaltern present, who had imbibed a good deal more champagne than was good for him, got up very unsteadily, and to the consternation and horror of all, delivered himself of the following words:

"Gentlemen, on an occasion of this sort, the health of bride-elect is usually proposed, and as junior subaltern present, that duty involves on me, I suppose I ought to say that pleasant duty, but I shall not, as I consider under the circumstances it is nothing of the sort." Here someone tried to stop him and pull him down in his chair, but the boy, hardly responsible for his actions, would not be stopped. "Shut up," he muttered, "I will say what I think, and what all of you think, only you haven't the pluck to say so, that Davies has been 'caught,' and I'm not going to propose the health of a girl who tricks a man into marrying her." He shouted out the last words so as to be heard above the noise, for at his insulting words every man sprang up from his seat, and several tried to pull the boy down. As for Captain Davies, he was white with rage, and utter blank astonishment.

The next instant he sprang at the offender and would have knocked him down, had not several others intervened.

"If you don't eat your words, you young cur," he muttered, "I'll break every bone in your body. What the dickens is the meaning of this infernal lie?" he asked, turning to the other men, and noting the fierce red light in his eyes, no one liked to risk a reply.

"Do you hear?" he went on. "I demand an explanation and an apology, on behalf of the lady who is to be my wife."

"We are all most heartily sorry for what has occurred, and I am sure when Barker is sober no one will be sorrier than himself," said Captain Hall, who was the senior officer present. Then, turning to one of the other men, he told him to take Mr. Barker to his quarters.

"Sorry! I should think he would be, the insolent young cad, but I shall expect something more than that; I mean to have some explanation of his meaning which doubtless some of you can give me. In fact, in justice to Miss Leslie, I demand an explanation."

"Since you demand it, Davies, I suppose I had better tell you, but I fancy Barker must have got hold of and believed the rumour about your engagement, I mean the way it happened." And Captain Hall looked very uncomfortable as he spoke. He liked Leonard very much, and it was a most painful task for him to be obliged to tell him what the rumour was.

"I don't understand; will you kindly speak more plainly, if you please?"

Leonard was speaking very calmly, and apparently unmoved, but anyone who noticed how the words came from between closed teeth, and how the red light of anger blazed in his eyes, would have known he was far from being unmoved.

"I hate having to tell you, old chap, but hang me, you must know, people say you proposed to her to save a scandal."

"What!" he exclaimed, starting up fiercely—all his apparent calm forsaking him, in the suddenness of the shock Captain Hall's words conveyed.

"It's a lie, and I'll horse-whip the fellow who started it within an inch of his life. The brute!"

"I expect you'll find some woman is the originator and unfortunately a woman cannot be horse-whipped, so thinks she may say things with impunity. But what course do you mean to take with Barker? Shall you have him put under arrest for insulting you?" Captain Hall asked anxiously.

"I should most certainly have done so had I alone been concerned," he replied; "as it is, I shall demand an apology and hush the matter up for Miss Leslie's sake, and also for the credit of the regiment. I think," he went on slowly, "Barker will probably find it advisable to exchange."

"Thanks, old fellow; I'm glad you look on it in that light, it would have been a ghastly disgrace to the regiment if this thing were known. Up to this point we have had no cads, and, as you say, Barker must go.

"You may look to me to help you in clearing up this affair, old chap," he went on, holding out his hand which Leonard shook. "I fear a good many have got hold of this rumour, and we shall have to clear it up before your marriage. By the way, it's to be on Saturday, isn't it?"

"Yes, Saturday, and to-day is Monday, and as ill-luck will have it, I'm bound to run up to town to see my people on business to-morrow, and can't possibly get back until Thursday. What on earth is to be done?" Leonard leant his head wearily on his hand. The two men were left alone, all the others having gone to discuss the affair elsewhere.

"If you will trust me with the facts of the case, I think I can make it all right for you, old chap, for when I know the facts I shall then be able to contradict all the rumours that are about."

Then Leonard told him exactly all that had happened. He also told how Mrs. Leslie had met them on the beach, and the subsequent interview he had had with her, but did not think of mentioning the interest Mrs. Carroll had taken in the affair.

Digitized by Google

Captain Hall listened attentively to all that was said; then, after a few moments, he asked him if anyone else in Porthtowan was likely to know of their having been caught by the tide at the time.

Then the riddle began to solve itself to Leonard's mind. He recalled things Nelly had let fall regarding Mrs. Carroll's visit on the eventful evening, and how she, Mrs. Carroll, had "asked mamma if Captain Davies and May were engaged, and when mamma said no, how Mrs. Carroll had seemed awfully amused, and then went home, chuckling to herself," as Nelly expressed it. None of these things had struck him at the time, but now he understood it all, and realised that Mrs. Carroll was at the bottom of all the mischief.

The next instant he sprang at the offender, and would have knocked him down had not several others intervened.

"I've got it all," he exclaimed, with more force than elegance. "It's that Mrs. Carroll, she must be made to contradict what she has said to everybody she has said it to. Do you think you can undertake the task in my absence?"

"I'll make her, my dear fellow. It's the least she can do. I'll get her version of the affair from her, show her what are the facts of the case and make her promise to set things right so far as she can by publicly acknowledging she was wrong."

"I don't see how you are going to do that—it isn't such an easy matter."

"I'll go with her to this 'At Home' at Government House on Wednesday; the conversation is sure to turn on Miss Leslie's wedding the following day, and then Mrs. Carroll shall contradict the rumours she has circulated. If she funks it I shall fix her with this gimlet eye of mine until she is forced to own up. This 'At Home' business is most lucky, as everyone in the neighbourhood will be there, and the truth will very soon spread."

This plan, being the best thing under the circumstances, was finally decided upon, much to Leonard's relief.

Whereupon the two men rose and left the mess together, to discuss the matter more fully in Leonard's quarters.

* * * * * *

Tuesday evening saw Leonard in town, where, awaiting him at his club, he found a letter from May, the contents of which staggered him beyond words. It ran as follows:

"You will doubtless be surprised at receiving a letter

Digitized by Google

from me so soon after our interview this afternoon"—the letter was dated "Monday night"—"But, fearing for the first time the real state of the case, I rejoice that I am not too late to release you from your engagement, and the prospect of a marriage that could only be irksome to you. I fully appreciate and thank you for the chivalrous motive that prompted you to act as you did, and in such a way, believe me, as to completely blind my eyes to the real state of the case. Knowing now, as I do, that you had never intended to ask me to be your wife, and only did so in order to shield my name from scandal that might have arisen owing to a mere piece of carelessness just as much my fault as yours, I cannot trade any longer upon your generosity, or risk having it said that I had done so. I hope you will as thoroughly understand and appreciate my motive in breaking off our engagement, as I do appreciate your motive in having asked me to marry you.—Good-bye. "MAY."

P.S.—Mother, Nelly, and I are going to travel for a time, we leave here on Saturday.

"Good God! And Saturday was to have been our wedding day," exclaimed the man, as he finished reading the letter. "This must be put right at once. I must let her know I am not going to be given my congé so easily."

And seating himself at one of the tables he wrote a long letter explaining the whole thing, how the malicious rumour had been set going by Mrs. Carroll, and pointing out how absolutely untrue it all was.

"There is only one thing I fear," he wrote, "and that is, that when you learn I asked you to marry me simply because I loved you, and wanted you with no thought of saving your name from any scandal, two great virtues with which you had accredited me will be found wanting, namely, chivalry and generosity. But, my darling, if you will be content with the proof of my love for you now, the privilege of acting chivalrously and generously to you in the future shall be mine, and you may be sure it is a privilege I shall rejoice in. Let me hear no more talk of travelling abroad with your mother and Nelly on Saturday. I am coming to fetch you myself, and then I mean to take you with me. I am writing to your mother. Till Saturday, my darling little wife that is to be, good-bye,

"Yours ever, LEONARD."

Having sealed, addressed, and posted the letters which should put everything right, Leonard then set about the business about which he had come to town.

* * * * *

Saturday dawned bright and frosty, the little village looking in the bright, winter sunshine almost as picturesque as it did in the summer. The sea was beautifully calm and blue, and in fact everything conduced to make the day an ideal one for a bride. At two o'clock in the afternoon, the time fixed for the wedding, the old church on the cliff was crowded with friends, and a large number of the fisher-folk with whom "Miss May" was a great favourite.

In spite of the wedding being a very quiet one, the excitement that had prevailed during the last few days about it, and the rumour that at the last moment Miss Leslie had broken off the match on hearing the rumours that were afloat, had made the wedding one of great interest in the neighbourhood.

And popular favour had veered round suddenly in favour of the girl who had been so terribly maligned, and had been so plucky about it. Captain Davies was at his post looking as most bridegrooms do, like a fish out of water, and being continually told by his best man, Captain Hill, "to bear up."

The officers of the regiment had turned up in full force to support him in the trying moment, and to make some amends for the unfortunate event of a few evenings before, all except Mr. Barker, who, after an abject apology, had applied for an exchange which was subsequently obtained.

At a few minutes past two a carriage was heard driving smartly up over the gravel, and murmurs of "the bride" ran through the church.

* * * * *

The ceremony was over, the registers were duly signed, and they were man and wife. The organ, as they left the vestry, pealed forth Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," announcing the fact that "they were coming" to those outside. Showers of rice greeted the unfortunate couple as they emerged from under the porch, thrown by the children and fisher-women, who, with the barbarity of their class on such occasions, were unsparing in the supplies.

"Good luck to you, Mrs. Davies," called out one of the Royal Wessex Subalterns who had gone round to the other side of the carriage, then, starting three hearty cheers, he waved his hat after them as they drove off, the cheering being vigorously taken up by the people, while Nelly, forgetful of her dignity as bridesmaid, joined in with the rest. Captain Hill, with mock solemnity, reminded her of the dignities of her position both as a bridesmaid and also as being Miss Leslie now her sister was married.

"It's all very well," she answered, "but how can I be dignified with these?" looking ruefully down at a pair of long black legs, and making everyone laugh.

A couple of hours later Captain and Mrs. Davies left for London en route for the south of France.

"Leonard," said the newly made wife, putting her little hand in his, "do you know I can hardly believe that I am really and truly your wife, it seems too good to be true."

"It's true enough, little woman, and I hope I may never cause you to regret the fact."

And drawing her gently towards him he kissed her tenderly.

THE END.

Digitized by Google

Love the Leveller.

The Romance of a Machine Room.

She threaded her way daintily through the great shop with its bewildering whirr of machinery and its roaring fires—its flying sparks and dirt and dust and smoke.

Now and again she stopped to watch some giant machine perform its almost human work. The men, with their splendid muscles and perfect skill, interested her immensely. But her companion was distinctly bored. The grime and sweat and dirt offended his aristocratic senses and the noise jarred upon his ears.

"What you can find interesting in this pandemonium I cannot imagine," he expostulated. "It is bad enough for those who have to be here and do the work; but to deliberately seek it when the sun is shining outside, the roads are hard and a motor car is waiting, is beyond me."

"Oh, Philip, can't you feel the thrill of seeing things done by real people?" she replied. "Just look at that man at the forge! See the great muscles stand out as he lifts the hammer. And see how skilfully he shapes the iron! The strength of a giant, the delicate touch of a woman—it is grand!"

"Well, I'm blessed if I can see it that way," rejoined the man. "Far from seeming romantic, it looks to me as though the fellow might as well be in prison as be compelled to spend his time doing that kind of work. Of course, I suppose they are used to this sort of labour—and somebody has to do it—but I can't say I care to see them at it—anyway, on a fine day with fresh air and a lively spin awaiting me."

Just the shadow of impatience crossed the girl's face at this speech, but she laughed merrily and continued her way through the shop.

It was Ida's first visit to the great works of which her father was the owner. She had been reared in the exclusive atmosphere of wealth, and her vision had not reached much beyond her father's palatial mansion, the theatres, the other palatial mansions in "our set," and the Continental tour.

Of course, she knew about the great mills, but heretofore to her they had been simply acres of gloomy, smoking prisons, from which there was wrested the money that brought all the good things.

On this pleasant day in the early Autumn, wearied with the conventional round of pleasures and pastimes with which she was surfeited, and somewhat aroused by a novel she had been reading, which dealt with the world of workers, she had determined to see the inside of those great smoky shops and find out just what was going on there and the manner of men who lived among them.

Her father had laughed at her whim, and as he had not time that day to go with her, Philip Hammond acted as her escort. Philip was her constant champion—her destined husband—the son of Mr. Norton's life-long friend, a successful banker.

It was but a moment after the conversation recorded between Miss Norton and Mr. Hammond that an accident occurred.

A man directly ahead of the visitors, carrying a heavy load on his shoulder, made a mis-step, fell against a great leather belt, and was carried off his feet and upward with the belt. As he realised his danger he gave a fearful shriek and his eyes met those of Miss Norton. The mortal terror in them burnt into her very soul and she shrieked—

"Philip, Philip, save him! Oh, save him!"

She saw the wheel to which the belt was dragging him and knew that he must be crushed.

Philip also saw the fearful danger, but stood as one paralysed.

He could have reached the man from where he was, but stood trembling with white face and horror-stricken eyes.

The attention of the entire shop had been attracted by the shrieks, and a score of men were running towards the scene.

"Pull that lever, you there with the white cap! The black one! Quick! Throw off the belt!" came in clear, commanding tones from behind. But Hammond did not stir. He threw up one hand to shut out the sight of the man being crushed.

In the meantime past the two visitors sprang the man who had shouted.

It was the blacksmith from the forge.

The man on the belt was right in the clutch of the wheel.

It seemed to Ida that she must surely faint.

At that instant the blacksmith made a lunge at a revolving wheel, caught two of the iron spokes and braced his stalwart legs.

It seemed as though he would be thrown against the machine beyond—but no, the wheel stopped with a jerk.

The muscles on the blacksmith's arms and chest stood out like whipcords.

"Quick, boys, quick!" he cried; "I can't stand this long."

He had no need to urge. Already two workmen had hoisted a third to their shoulders, and he pulled the victim from the wheel, with one arm badly crushed, but alive.

Then the blacksmith let go the wheel, and the machinery restarted to whirr and buzz. The men crowded about him, offering congratulations.

"Well, I'm blest, Joe. You saved Mike from bein' made into mincemeat that time. I didn't think it could be done. By Jove, Joe, I'd like to have your muscle."

These and similar compliments were fired at him as he turned with a broad grin to his forge.

Directly in his way stood a beautiful girl with blanched face, her great brown eyes swimming in tears.

"Oh, sir, I want to say that you are the bravest and strongest and quickest man I ever saw. I cannot thank you too much. I was afraid he would be crushed to death.

He flushed to the roots of his hair.

"It was nothing, miss," he said. "Any of the men would have done it."

That evening Ida went over the scene with her father. He knew all about it and told her that the rescuer was Joseph Madern.

"One of the best men we have," he said warmly. "A thorough mechanic and an inventor. We keep him at the forge because there is a particular part of a machine that has to be done by hand, and Madern does it better than anybody else. Few men have the strength and skill combined to do it. We pay him as well as though he were a foreman, but have to keep him at the forge. I have ordered that he be handsomely rewarded for his heroism to-day."

Digitized by Google

"Papa, I want you to invite him to dinner," suddenly said Ida, after some minutes spent in thought.

"Who?" asked Mr. Norton, looking up from his paper.

"Mr. Madern. I think it would be a much nicer way to show appreciation of his heroism than merely to give him money."

Mr. Norton smiled. He was not wholly undemocratic in his instincts.

"But your mother," he said.

She had an answer, and the result was that Joe Madern found himself with palpitating heart going up the steps of the Norton mansion one evening.

He was neatly dressed and bore himself with a demeanour that charmed the girl as much as his exhibition of strength.

Mrs. Norton absented herself from dinner with cold disapproval.

After dinner Miss Norton took her strange guest to the library, and was astonished at the wide knowledge he displayed of books and the strong opinions he held on economic topics.

He told her of their working-men's club and the discussions they had. "You should attend one of our open meetings; it would interest you," he said.

"I will," she replied, and she did, and was still more astounded to hear him in debate where he stood like a lion to fight for his opinions, using always the most forceful language and displaying the widest reading and information.

She invited him to call, and he did once or twice. As he was about to take his departure on the second occasion, he said—

"I think this is the last time, Miss Norton, that I will see you, and I want to tell you how thoroughly I appreciate your kindness and how much I have enjoyed the evenings I have spent here."

"The last time?" she repeated, the blood rushing to her face. "What do you mean? You are not going away?"

"No, but it is better that I should not see you. We belong to different worlds. They do not mix. The very keenness of the pleasure I feel in coming here warns me that I had better not."

"There is only one world for kindred spirits," she said impulsively.

"Do you mean that? Do you know what you are saying?" he demanded, coming close to her.

She stood with downcast eyes. Then, straightening his broad shoulders and throwing back his head, he said: "Miss Norton, I am a plain, blunt man of the people and not versed in the ways of Society. I have discovered that I love you and I know that it would be presumptuous to propose for your hand. I do not quite understand what you mean by your last remark. If you mean that you consider that we are on a social equality I want to say that I love you with a love as deep and as honest as man ever had for a woman. I can offer you nothing but that which my arms may earn, and that is not what you have been accustomed to. Still, if it should so happen that your exceeding kindness to me means that you love me, all that is nothing."

He stood looking at her as in a dream. She swayed, and fell into his arms.

"That's what it does mean," she whispered. "You are the only real man I ever saw."

There was a dreadful scene when Madern spoke to Mr. Norton, but he sturdily told his employer that he had been accepted by Ida and they were going to marry with or without parental consent.

Mr. Norton summoned his daughter, and she corroborated the statement of her plebeian lover.

Then Mr. Norton told them that the girl had not a penny in her own right, and if she married Madern she never would have.

To which Madern replied that that pleased him exactly.

They were married. Madern left the employ of the Norton works and found another position.

The Nortons were unrelenting until some three years later, Mrs. Norton being dead and a fine baby boy having been born in a certain rose-covered cottage in the suburbs, Mr. Norton softened.

Now Madern is superintendent of the Norton works and a still better position may shortly be his.

W. Wendham.

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have just secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

August 19.—A mixed year; business worries, and trouble with friends. Don't speculate. Clerks, teachers, and travellers will be in danger of losing their situations. Girls need care in love affairs, and must place very little confidence in male friends.

The day is bad to ask favours, travel, and sign papers. Good for dealing in property and land.

A child born to-day will be unfortunate and should work for others.

August 20.—An unfavourable birthday; have a care against mishap if using horses. Business and home affairs cause anxiety. Don't change residence.

Single girls will meet with disappointment in love, and must beware of false friends.

The day is evil and should not be used for marriage, doing business with governmental bodies, builders, or lawyers.

A child born to-day will be improvident, easy-going, and very unsettled. May become too fond of drink and pleasure.

August 21.—A good year for business; aged persons, speculators, and farmers benefit. Avoid law and guard against theft.

Girls will meet with some strange adventures in love matters, and will have attentions from married men.

The day is good for doing business with elderly people, but not with the young.

A child born here will be fairly fortunate. The mind will be active, cautious, and painstaking; the temper quick and strong.

August 22.—A successful year for business and finances. Friends can be made use of.

Many pleasant events for young girls; if engaged they will marry.

The day is good for marriage, making new friends, dealing with professional people and manufacturers of woollen goods.

A child born here will be generous, make friends easily, and will be fortunate in life.

August 23.—Beware of serious quarrels, law, and mishap. Much activity and little good fortune in business and domestic affairs.

Not a good time for love affairs.

The day is one to go steady; avoid speculation, and be careful against accident, especially if working underground or near water.

A child born here should keep in employ. It will be headstrong, quarrelsome, and sarcastic.

August 24.—Guard against loss in business and speculations. Those in employ are fortunate. Don't lend to friends or losses will result.

Girls will meet with disappointment in love; marriages are delayed through bad state of lovers' finances.

A child born to-day will be too generous and free. Will gain the respect of superiors and do best in employ.

August 25.—A good year for health, wealth, and business. Can enter into new premises, sign agreements, and buy property.

Young females receive attentions from widowers; if born near six a.m. they will have chances of marriage.

A child born to-day will be active, cheerful, and industrious, will be fortunate in employ or in business for itself.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.

Mr. Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia: Her companion.

FRANKIE DEFIES LASCELLES AND DEFEATS HOPE.

THE STORY STARTS HERE.

CYNTHIA HAMILTON, a young girl from a Bruges convent, comes to England in the capacity of companion to her cousin, Frances Norton, whom she has not seen since they were together at school. Mrs. Norton will never talk about her past, which she spent in Jamaica.

Cynthia discovers that Mrs. Norton is taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money are being lost and won. The climax is reached one night when Mary Vernon stakes her diamond ear-rings (a gift from Lord Kinross), and one of the on-lookers finds them to be paste. The diamonds, it appears, were stolen by Mrs. Norton.

A few weeks later, the notorious Mrs. Norton, with Fluffy's help, succeeds in stealing a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew at the Café Regal, by substituting for the millionaire's pocket-book one exactly like it.

Mrs. Norton now moves into her new house in Pont Street, and it is while here that Sir John Strickland, a poor baronet, proposes to her. She refuses, but hints to him that if he will consent to allow his name to appear on the directorate of certain companies he will be bound to make money, and then her answer might be different.

Mrs. Norton is next presented at Court by her friend, Lady Gaveston. For this function she wears some superb diamonds which have been lent her by Lord Kinross. The society papers declare her to be the most beautiful and best-dressed woman at the presentation.

The same evening Lord Kinross calls at Pont Street for a private interview, and it is during this interview that Percival Hope enters the room unannounced, and makes the startling statement that Mary Vernon has discovered the thief who stole her diamonds. Shortly afterwards Mrs. Norton leaves the room; Cynthia, however, stays, unknown to Kinross and Percival Hope.

While there she overhears Hope, who turns out to be Kinross' cousin, tell Kinross that in a fortnight's time he will prove to Kinross that Mrs. Norton is an adventuress living upon the proceeds of the robbery of her friends. Cynthia tells Mrs. Norton what she has overheard.

On the evening of the next day Lady Gaveston tells Mrs. Norton that she doesn't approve of her behaviour towards Sir John Strickland, and that unless she decides at once either to marry or refuse him, she will return to Scotland. Mrs. Norton asks for and obtains a fortnight's grace in which to make up her mind.

Mrs. Norton and Cynthia go to the Derby, where Mrs. Curtis Blount, instigated by jealousy, entices Cynthia to bet heavily, by which she loses £800. Mrs. Norton has also lost heavily, and to pay her own debts, she prevails upon a young fellow, by promising marriage, to sign his uncle's name to a bill for £5,000.

That same night, at the Duchess of Warminster's ball, Mrs. Norton comes face to face with a man from Jamaica who knows all about her past life. Percival Hope has brought him in. It is a critical moment, but once again Mrs. Norton scores. She persuades Cynthia to engage Hope's attention by making love to him, while she herself purchases the Jamacia man's silence. He agrees to be silent for the sum of £1,000 to be paid before noon on the following day. Cynthia is immediately dispatched to Fluffy's chambers to get the money. It is past midnight, and while she is negotiating with Fluffy, Percival Hope bursts into the room.

Digitized by Google

CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.
New Series of Stories.

THERE was that in Percival's face that made me wish to hide my own. I would not meet his eyes, but glanced appealingly towards Fluffy.

Mr. Thomson's self-possession did not fail him for a moment. He gently closed the door, walked quietly towards Percival, and offered him a chair.

"I'm very glad you happened to drop in just now," he said, as if it were quite an ordinary thing for Percival to call on him at midnight. "You've turned up just in the nick of time. Miss Cynthia," he smiled encouragingly at me, "is in a little difficulty. I'm sure you won't object to help her."

Percival ignored the chair, but schooled himself to listen. He even contrived to answer with an appearance of interest.

"No, not at all," he said.

But that was the breaking point of self-possession; with an abrupt movement he turned his back on Fluffy and leant towards me.

"What are you doing here?" he said fiercely, "at such an hour?"

Before I could reply, had I been able to do so, Fluffy interfered.

"Miss Hamilton came here to ask for my assistance," he said in a cold, level voice. As he spoke he laid his hand on Percival's arm, and swung him round, so that they faced each other.

"The child is in trouble," he continued, his eyes fixed steadily on Percival. "For the moment she is very worried, and—a little excited. With her permission I will tell you what that trouble is." He smiled kindly towards me, but I could make no answering sign.

Was it possible that Fluffy meant to give Frankie away? If not, what explanation could he offer for my visit? I waited in breathless expectation.

Percival was pale with rage. He bit his lips, and his hands trembled with passion. He was within an ace of losing once again control of tongue and temper, but something in the other's voice and manner, in the look of those small grey eyes, seemed to hold and master him.

For the moment Fluffy was the stronger man.

"Miss Cynthia was at the Derby yesterday," he went on slowly, "and, like the rest of us, backed Nestor. As a consequence she finds herself let in for some eight hundred pounds. More sensitive than the majority on the score of debts—gambling debts at any rate—she cannot feel happy till the bets are paid. Now, as you know, I am Mrs. Norton's man of business, and Miss Hamilton thought on this occasion I might act as hers. There are certain mining shares in Miss Cynthia's possession—they belonged, I understand, to her father—from the sale of which she hopes to raise the money for her bets. She looked to me to know what the shares would fetch, and to dispose of them for her. I am, however, leaving for the Continent to-morrow, or rather this morning. Miss Cynthia was aware of this, and realised that to-night was her only opportunity of seeing me. Ignorant of the value of the shares, and, failing me, at a loss for anyone to help her, she seized the opportunity. She came here to-night to bring these shares." He handed Percival some papers off the table. "You understand?" Fluffy tapped the papers as he spoke, but somehow I don't think his question had reference only to the shares.

I half expected Percival to show anger at the news that I'd been betting. I looked at any rate for some expression of displeasure. His attitude was very different, however. It seemed to me suggestive of relief!

"Yes," he said, with a little gasp, "I quite understand—mining shares I think you said, American aren't they?" Then turning towards me flushed and eager, he stretched out his hand.

I don't know what he was going to say, but I fancy it was something apologetic.

"Miss Cynthia," he commenced, "please believe me——"

Fluffy interrupted him.

"You're going to help us dispose of the shares, is that it, Mr. Hope?" he said sharply, and with a look I could not read.

"Of course, of course." Percival turned crimson and seemed positively abashed. "What can I do?" he asked, appealing to Fluffy. "I am most anxious to assist."

Fluffy calmly lit a cigarette, and took up his position on the hearthrug.

"The case stands thus," he said slowly; "the shares in my opinion ought to fetch a thousand pounds."

"I should say quite," remarked Percival, "their price fluctuates very little."

Fluffy nodded.

"If I were in town I could put the thing through to-morrow. As it is I shall have to commission a jobber, which will mean delay. There's nothing else to be done unless——" He paused. "Would you take the matter in your hands, Hope?" he said, "and dispose of the shares for me, or rather for Miss Cynthia?"

"With pleasure. But I think we might devise a quicker way of selling the shares than putting them on the market."

Fluffy looked embarrassed.

"It would, of course, simplify matters for me to give Miss Hamilton a cheque here and now for the amount," he said slowly. "But, unfortunately, I'm not a rich man. To be candid, I have not so large a balance at my banker's."

Percival smiled quite nicely, and remarked that he entirely understood.

"Perhaps you would allow me to undertake that part of the affair?" he said. "Suppose you hand the shares over to me, and let me draw a cheque for the amount. It would save Miss Cynthia trouble if she had the notes though, wouldn't it? I happen to have a fairly large sum on me this evening." He turned rather red and prodded a pocket book, from which he took two notes each for five hundred pounds. "I had a payment to make," he explained. (I wondered if the payment was to have been made to Casellis!) "You don't mind selling me your shares, Miss Cynthia?" he asked smiling.

"Thank you," I answered coldly, "but I prefer not to trouble you. I would rather Mr. Thomson commissioned the jobber that he mentioned."

Mr. Thomson shook his head.

"I never allow a client to interfere with the way in which I conduct their business," he said calmly. "I accept your offer, Hope, on Miss Hamilton's behalf, and thank you very much."

"Take the notes," he added, smiling at me, "and whatever you do, don't lose them. Are you sure they're safe? Then, that's all right. You won't bet any more, eh?"

I murmured faintly that I never would.

"I shan't be able to get round to Pont Street in the morning, I'm afraid," Fluffy continued. "I'm writing good-bye to Mrs. Norton to-night. She'll have my letter first post."

I longed to know if he intended sending the cheque Frankie had demanded, but there was no opportunity of asking him.

Fluffy accompanied us, Percival and me, to the Temple Gates, where my cab was waiting.

"You'll see her home?" he questioned Percival.

"Of course. Good night, Thomson, and good luck."

Fluffy waved adieu. I sat back in the cab, tired and inexpressibly weary.

It was a strange drive. Neither of us spoke a word, not because we had too little, but too much to say—infallibly a time for silence.

He saw me safely into the house and said good-night kindly, even tenderly.

I stumbled upstairs in the darkness and waited sleepless till Frankie returned.

She came back from the ball as fresh as when she went, and looking as young, indeed younger than I.

"You poor, tired thing!" she exclaimed. "Well, how have you got on? Did Fluffy send the cheque?"

"He's writing to-night. You'll have the letter in the morning. Frankie, I've got the money for my shares."

Digitized by Google

"Who from?"

"Percival Hope!" And I told her all that had transpired.

She heard me in silence, a smile flickering in her eyes.

"Here are the notes, Frankie, will you keep them for me?"

"Not I, Cynthia, it's much too great a responsibility; I won't even look at them. Take my advice, and don't let those notes out of your sight until you hand them to Lord Chesterton. Put them in a safe place, and don't tell anybody where it is. You're certain Fluffy is going to write to me to-night?"

"He said so."

"Then I can sleep in peace and so can you. Casellis will have his cheque, Ella will get her sweetheart, you will pay your bets, and I"—she paused—"I shall confute Mr. Percival Hope. Good night, dearie, sleep well."

I was too excited to hope for much rest. I did not indeed fall asleep until the morning, and then my slumbers were broken by strange dreams. I fancied I heard footsteps at my door, and the handle softly, cautiously turned. In my sleep I seemed to feel somebody pulling at the bedclothes as though seeking for my notes. Half waking I thought I saw a figure glide quickly from the room. But when fully aroused I carefully examined my surroundings. I found the door fast shut as I had left it, the notes still tucked in safety under the mattress, while the gliding figure proved to be the curtain which, caught by a breeze blowing through the open window, streamed full length across the room.

I returned to bed, and undisturbed by further fancies, slept until the afternoon.

Frankie called me in time to see Chesterton; she stopped and chatted while I dressed.

"Have you seen Casellis, Frankie?"

"Yes, my dear, and thanks to you and Fluffy I have settled him. He won't trouble me any more. As for Ella, she's going to marry Jim immediately. I've made a point of it. I shall give them a wedding breakfast and pay their passage to the States. They'll sail next week."

Chesterton was very pleased to see me, and had brought some flowers and a large box of chocolates. I gave him the notes and he promised to settle with the bookmakers that very day and send me on the change.

He stayed a long time, but said nothing remarkable until the end of the interview.

Just before he left, apropos of nothing and with great abruptness, he remarked—"I've entered myself for the Cynthia Stakes, Miss Hamilton, but before I make the running I should like to know how the betting stands. Is it two to one on 'Hope,' or can I look for a fair field and no favour?"

"Racing terms are very hard to understand, Lord Chesterton," I answered, "but so far as I can tell, I think you might put some money on—the field."

His lordship dropped his hat and made for my hand, but I thought all things considered it was time he went, so I just managed to evade him and got clear of the room, or, as Chesterton would have said, "the course."

The next two or three days passed much as usual, men called in the morning, women some of the afternoon, and poor Toby all day. He avoided me, but was otherwise unchanged, except a sudden taste he seemed to have developed for cognac. Frankie took little notice of him, but so long as he was in her presence the boy appeared content.

I worried greatly over the bill Toby had signed; indeed, there were many things I had to worry over. But however sorry I was for much that had happened I was powerless to alter any of it. Frankie would go her own way, and I, from force of circumstances and affection, had to go with her.

One morning while Frankie was out driving, I was summoned to see a caller. Skinner presented his card with a perfunctory cough.

"Nathan" was the name engraved upon the pasteboard, a name to me of evil omen.

I hastened to the drawing-room, fearful lest Lady Gaveston should see and interrogate the moneylender.

"Mrs. Norton is out," I explained, "if you can leave a message I will deliver it to my cousin."

Nathan, a tall, good-looking man of quiet appearance and good address, heard me out in silence.

"I am sorry, but my business can only be done with Mrs. Norton. It is of great importance that I should see her this morning. With your permission I will wait."

He bowed and resumed his seat, leaving me in a terrible state of apprehension. Suppose Chesterton should arrive, or Kinross, or Sir John. What would they think of such a visitor? Nathan was known to most of the smart set, but purely in his professional capacity. He did not care for society, and only called on fashionable folk in connection with his business.

To find him there would signify to most people that Mrs. Norton was hard up.

I instructed Skinner not to show anybody into the drawing-room, and to let Mrs. Norton know I wanted her as soon as she returned. I took up my station in the window seat, and tried to talk unconcernedly with Mr. Nathan.

He seconded my efforts, and we passed a conversational if not a comfortable half hour.

At one o'clock Frankie returned, and swept into the room, a vision in pale grey and amber roses.

Nathan came quickly to the point.

"Some ten days back you brought me a bill, Mrs. Norton, signed by yourself and Sir Edward Ffolliot."

"Exactly"—Frankie nodded calmly. "Infamous interest you charged me, too," she added smiling. "You've not come to ask for any more?"

"My call is on a matter of business, Mrs. Norton, that is all. My partner has asked me to make inquiries in connection with Sir Edward Ffolliot. It has come within his knowledge that the baronet left England the day before the date on the bill. When did he sign, Mrs. Norton?"

"Two or three days before I called on you," said Frankie promptly. "I filled in the date after."

Nathan paused, and glanced at her significantly. With a dim sense of what was going to follow, and with an awful fear of the questions Frankie might compel me to answer, I slipped through the curtains separating the drawing from the other reception rooms, and waited out of sight, but in hearing.

"Sir Edward wanted to lend me the money himself," said Frankie. "Of course; I wouldn't hear of that, but at his own suggestion, I consented he should back the bill. He signed it here in this house. I and my cousin, the young lady whom you saw just now, were present."

"You are both prepared to swear that you saw Sir Edward sign?"

"Most certainly. I will call my cousin. Cynthia!" she cried, "Cynthia!"

But with my face hidden among the sofa cushions, my hands pressed tight to my ears, I remained deaf to the summons.

Nothing should make me swear to such a thing, nothing; and yet if Frankie were in danger, if she should be involved, what could I do?

I waited in sickening anticipation. It was one of the most awful moments of my life.

When I lifted my head Nathan was speaking.

"I will tell my partner what you say, Mrs. Norton. Doubtless he will accept the explanation. But remember the bill falls due in little over a month, and under no circumstances whatever shall we renew it."

Frankie made some laughing answer, but the money lender did not respond to her lightness of mood.

Digitized by Google

"Frankie," I gasped, when he had disappeared, "how could you say such things?"

My cousin turned upon me wrathfully.

"Because I prefer to run any risk rather than let in my friends," she said. "If I had not said what I did Toby must have been involved. I will make any sacrifice rather than that should happen."

She looked quite beautiful as she spoke, and very heroic. I felt abashed—almost mean, without exactly knowing why.

Shortly after this Lord Kinross and his sister returned to town. And then there came the day—never by me to be forgotten—when Percival Hope had declared he would prove Frankie an adventuress.

He and Kinross arrived within a few minutes of each other, about three o'clock in the afternoon. Frankie and I went down to receive them. Lady Gaveston had gone to a flower show, and Skinner had received instructions that we were not at home to any casual callers.

Kinross looked somewhat grave, and seemed more than a little anxious. He shook hands eagerly with Frankie, and smiled pleasantly at me. Frankie nodded carelessly to Percival, who returned the salutation with a ceremonious bow.

"Mrs. Norton," said Kinross, with a touch of nervousness, "I have to ask your pardon for what I am going to say. My cousin Percival is here this afternoon on a peculiar errand. He wants to tell me certain things he has heard about you, but I decline to listen, save in your presence. Only on that condition will I hear him—now or ever. It remains for you to say whether or no Percival shall speak."

For a moment she faced them in silence. It was the crisis of her life, and even her indomitable courage and strong will quailed before it. If she refused to hear Hope, danger for the moment was over. But, and she realised it to the full, all chance of securing Kinross would end. He would leave her, never to return.

Her face went a shade paler, but her voice was steady as ever when she answered:

"I am glad to have the opportunity of hearing what Mr. Hope has to bring against me, and disproving it."

"Thank you," said Kinross softly, and stooping, kissed her hand.

"I have taken the liberty of bringing with me a person of the name of Casellis," said Percival, "I left him in the hall. With your permission, Mrs. Norton, I will call him in."

Frankie bowed, and Hope, marching to the door, summoned Casellis to enter. At the best he was an unpleasing-looking person, and on that afternoon he struck me as looking more than ever ill-favoured. He sat, or rather crouched, on the edge of a chair, blinking with narrow, half-closed eyes.

To this hour I cannot say whether or no Frankie was prepared for him; to this hour I cannot say whether or no he came determined, despite her heavy bribe, to sell her at the final moment.

Whatever her thoughts or his, their faces did not betray them.

"I gather that Mrs. Norton informed you that she was the widow of Richard Norton, who died some two years ago of malaria," said Percival to Kinross. "Furthermore, that with the assistance of Mr. Thomson she sold her late husband's estate to a company, and came to England on the proceeds."

"Quite so," said Kinross.

Percival paused.

"That man," he said at last, pointing to Casellis, "was employed as a clerk by Mr. Richard Norton. He tells me that his late employer did not die from malaria. His death was surrounded by most suspicious circumstances. It was believed in the island that he died from poison—you said this?" he asked Casellis abruptly.

"I did," said the man from Jamaica.

"Casellis further states that he overheard Mrs. Norton in conversation with"—Hope paused—"with a man whose name I will not at present mention. Mrs. Norton alluded to the rumours current as to the cause of her husband's death, and begged her companion to take steps to get rid of the body, and so avoid a threatened exhumation and inquiry. Shortly after Mr. Norton's grave was found to have been disturbed, the coffin opened, and empty. This outrage was put down to the natives, who, it was said, had a grudge against Mr. Norton. As a matter of fact, that gentleman was extremely popular with the natives. Furthermore, far from playing the part of a devoted wife, Mrs. Norton's extravagance practically ruined her husband. He signed bills to raise money for her jaunts to Paris, to meet which he had to mortgage the plantation to its full value. I may mention that the estate is not in the possession of a company, but at the present moment is devastated and deserted, save for a few wretched blacks. You are prepared to swear to all this?" he turned to Casellis, "as you have already sworn to me."

Casellis stood up, and gazed slowly round the room. Frankie, pale as death, looked straight at him, and her lips moved. A malignant smile twitched his mouth, he seemed to enjoy her terror.

Then a swift and sudden change came over him. Some thought, some memory, laid hold of him. He drew himself up, threw back his head. A light came in his eyes, a smile to his lips. He was transformed. No longer cringing, abject, he stood erect—a man, keen, alert, sinewy, lithe. So might he have looked years back, when to her island home Frankie first came. He was a half caste, quick to love, quicker to hate. What if it were revenge that prompted him to speak, revenge for all that he had suffered for the love of that proud, fair woman, who now so scornfully defied him?

Frankie's eyes still fixed on his, grew luminous, tender; a shadow of regret, reproach, stole into them. They filled with tears.

At the sight Casellis started, fell back as from a blow.

"I swore to it—yes," he cried, in a harsh voice; "but I swore falsely. I am guilty if you will, but she—she is innocent as Heaven!"

[What happens next will be told next Tuesday.]

She Objected to Exaggerations.

GUSHLEY: "Would you think of me if I were ten thousand leagues away?" His Fiancée (from College): "As the maximum diameter of the earth is only eight thousand miles, Claronce, your supposition is an impossible one."

She was Quite Proper.

"ELLA, you have been playing all the afternoon with these toy soldiers. That's not a proper amusement for a big girl like you," said her mother. "But, mamma, I was not playing with the soldiers. I picked out the officers and played with them."

The Modern Way.

SHE (as he finishes mending her tyre): "Oh, thank you so much. What should I have done without you?" He: "Don't mention it. I wish I could always carry the repair kit for you." Tenderly: "May I, Eleanor?" And the two bicycles continued to lean against the grassy bank.

Digitized by Google

Foretelling the Future.

Blushing Bride: "I want to get a present for my husband; but I hardly know what to buy." Clerk: "Why not get one of these nice silk mufflers to wear during the evening?" Bride: "Oh, dear, no; my husband never goes out at night." Clerk: "Well, you might get it for next year. He will then."

Same Thing.

Wife: "And did Mr. Gay really say I was positively dove-like?" Husband: "Something of that sort. He said you were pigeon-toed, I believe."

Nearer the Mark.

The Clumsy Man (coming from the ball-room): "How can I repay you for that waltz?" She (whose train has suffered): "Oh, don't pay me; settle with my dressmaker."

A Mean Revenge.

"I've got even with Blimmins at last," said the Society reporter. "How?" "You know how jealous his wife is? Well, I have alluded to him as 'a great favourite among the ladies.'"

Quite Another Matter.

Old Boy: "Thomas, if my wife asks you where I am, tell her I have gone to the office." Servant: "Certainly, sir! But where are you really going in case anyone else should want to know?"

Excellent Advice.

Pompous Author (to veteran Editor): "What would you advise a man to do whose ideas are in advance of the times?" Veteran Editor (promptly): "I would advise him to sit quietly down and wait for the times to catch up."

The Badge of Poverty.

Mrs. de Rich: "The Society Chitchat is edited by a woman, isn't it?" Mr. de Rich: "So I've heard." Mrs. de Rich: "I should say she wasn't making much money out of it. She says 'a lavish display of diamonds is vulgar.'"

Extremely Awkward.

Blanche: "Isabel, what has put you in such a bad humour?" Isabel: "Why, I've just had a communication from Jack, and he writes such a horrid hand that I can't tell whether it is a proposal, an ode to Autumn, or that cure for chilblains he promised to send me."

Quite Correct.

Mrs. Youngwife: "You know those lovely thirty-shilling dining-room gongs we saw the other day? Well, to-day they were marked down to 12s. 6d. each, so I got three." Her Husband; "What did you get three for?" Mrs. Youngwife (sweetly): "Why, one for each meal, of course."

What Papa Said.

"George, dear," said the girl, "do you ever drink anything?" "Yes, occasionally," George reluctantly admitted. "But, dear," she went on anxiously, "what do you suppose papa would say if he should discover that the future husband of his only daughter drank?" "He discovered it this morning." "Oh, George, and what did he say?" "He said, 'Well, George, my boy, I don't care if I do.'"

No Joke There.

Mrs. Smith (who is reading a humorous paper): "I don't see any fun in these jokes about bigs bills for ladies' hats." Mr. Smith (with feeling): "I don't either."

The Blessings of Knowledge.

Little Girl: "Mamma says I must study grammar this term." Little Boy: "What's that for?" Little Girl: "That's so I can laugh when folks make mistakes."

Two Points of View.

Wife: "How people gaze at my new dress. I presume they wonder if I've been shopping in Paris." Husband: "More likely they wonder if I've been robbing a bank."

Liked Her Cheek.

Maud: "Did George kiss you last night when he left?" Ethel: "Certainly he did not; why do you ask?" Maud: "Nothing; only he just told me that he liked your cheek."

When the Sermon Doesn't Act.

When a man's collar gets unbuttoned in church and begins to climb up the back of his neck he might as well get up and go out; the sermon will not do him much good.

That Dreadful Father-in-Law.

Her Young Man: "I—I—I, sir, would like——" Her Father: "Well, what is it, young man? What have you got in your mouth?" Her Young Man: "I—I'm afraid it's my heart, sir."

But it Didn't Work.

Briggs: "Just for a joke, I told Miss Elderly the other day that when she laughed it was all I could do not to kiss her." Griggs: "What happened?" Briggs: "The next time I saw her she had hysterics."

A Complication.

"What's the matter, Parker? You look blue." "I am. I asked Miss Morrison to be my wife." "Ah! Rejected?" "No. Referred me to her mother, and—well, her mother rejected me herself last September."

The Retort Courteous.

Mabel: "Yes, I give you my hand with my heart in it." Jack: "You cannot do that." Mabel: "Why not?" Jack: "Your hand is too dainty and small to hold such a large heart." That made the engagement irrevocable.

A Long Wait.

Child: "Grandpa, how old are you?" Grandpa: "I am eighty-seven years old, my little dear." Child: "Then you was born eighty years before I was." Grandpa: "Yes, my little girl." Child: "Law, what a long time you had to wait for me!"

Squeezed Through It.

Mabel (to young bride who has just returned from her wedding trip): "But were you not frightened, Marion, dear, going through that awful tunnel?" Young Bride: "I should have been dreadfully without Charlie, but with him I managed to squeeze through it."

Songs and Songs.

Petted Bride: "Here is the bill for that fur cloak I told you about. It's lovely." Indulgent Husband (looking at bill): "Great Scott! You said you could get that cloak for a mere song." "So I did." "Do you mean to say that amount represents a mere song?" "Yes, a Patti song."

A Reasonable Request.

Husband: "My dear, I want to ask you one favour before you go off on that long visit." Wife: "A thousand, my love. What is it?" "Don't try to put the house in order before you leave." "It isn't hard work." "Perhaps not; but think of the expense of telegraphing to you every time I want to find anything."

Digitized by Google

A Book-worm's Love Story.

In the British Museum Reading Room

DAY after day, for some months, I had sat in near company of a young girl, who, without being beautiful, was the possessor of infinite charm. Whether she worked so energetically for the mere love of the thing or from necessity I could not tell. I chose, however, to fancy her the help of a widowed mother who on slender means had perhaps still younger lives than my fellow-worker's to give her anxieties. Suffice it to say, on this point, my near fellow-worker laboured with zest, and often her example inspired my own somewhat flagging efforts. I found myself possessed of an unconquerable desire to make her acquaintance, yet I could not summon the necessary courage to address her. I have known many pleasant ties of friendship which had their origin in the Reading Room of the British Museum.

I am not going to give a glowing description of the "infinite charm" already referred to, much preferring to remain possessed alone of a fact, the remembrance of which adds a degree of extra pleasure when I indulge in retrospect.

On many occasions, while endeavouring to bring my wool-gathering brains into a state approximate to order, I had remarked troublous expressions spread over her intelligent face, as though some difficulty beset her in her work, and thought came to me to offer assistance, but my nerve always failed me. My triumph came later, away from "musty tome" and "giant dome." Such an opportunity as I could not let slip.

A cold but bright day in January of a certain year in the recently dead century, found me on my way to interview a notable member of Parliament, with the hope to secure through his aid a ticket for the House of Commons, where an important debate was on, and I was desirous to hear the "immaculate Joe," and then—well, not die, exactly, but feel myself acquaint wi' him.

I had proceeded as far as the top of Charing Cross Road, when I bethought me to take a 'bus. I became an "inside." There was but one other occupant—a lady—whose face was turned towards the front window of the vehicle. She appeared to be on the look-out for someone coming from the direction in which we were travelling.

Presently the conductor's voice startled us both, the lady turning about revealed to me the well-known face of "my lady" of the Reading Room.

The conductor's call upon us for "Fares, please!" together with the suddenness of my recognition, had rather flustered me. I began fumbling in my coat pocket for the needful copper coin, and was sensible enough to notice that the lady was doing likewise—not in my pockets, but her own—for her purse. Presently a vivid blush spread over her face, as she plaintively gave the conductor to understand she had left her purse and money at home.

The collector of fares—bless his ignorant and unappreciative vulgarity—was somewhat inclined to be coarse and inoffensive, as he remarked:

"Ho, I dessay! that's a tale wot ain't good enough for me. I've bin 'ad that way afore to-day. Wot are yer goin' to do?"

At this juncture I deemed it advisable to expostulate with the ruffian, warning him that it was no part of his duty to be uncivil. As I am somewhat herculean in build, my words had the desired effect. Then I begged the lady's permission to settle so trifling a matter, at the same time pointing out to her that the fact of our being fellow-workers at the British Museum would at least privilege me in so small a service. This announcement reassured her of the perfect propriety of the thing for she at once replied:

"That is fortunate. Thank you so much. May I ask your name?"

I gave it. "Richard Athelstane."

"Thank you so much, Mr. Athelstane. I am Eunice Frith."

After delivering herself of this gracious bit of information she departed on her way, leaving me in a seventh heaven of delight. For was not the ice now broken?

In the matter of years I am no longer a fledgling, and I have never been overburdened by the weight of worldly goods. This latter fact, no doubt, has been a main factor in keeping me from straying into pastures beyond those wherein I cropped my week to week end needs.

At the period of my first interest in Eunice Frith I was busily engaged in efforts to graft in some manner the American family of Shoddee upon the parent stock in England. It was a work of great wearisomeness, inasmuch as without the license used by the average genealogist, I had begun to experience considerable doubts as to whether the millionaire mill-owner from the other side of the herring-pond would respond so heartily as I could have wished to my views as to what a "reasonable and just" honorarium should be.

On the next occasion of my meeting with Miss Frith the merest form of greeting followed. As she handed me the bronze coin which annulled her self-conceived obligation, her renewal of thanks was accompanied by the faintest change of colour, but her words, "You were very kind to help me out of my dilemma" left no opening for extension of an acquaintance so auspiciously begun. Our sittings were within one of each other. We took them, and thus far there was the end. She evidently knew full well the existence of the rule of "silence" which the superintendent for the time ever strives so energetically to enforce, but which the many officials themselves do not consider it worth while to act up to. For it is noticeable that whenever Lord Bluffe or Sir John Bounder have occasion to visit the room they are far too important for the official cicerone to venture to check in their thoughtless loud-spokenness.

Eunice Frith, whether or no she divined that I desired a closer acquaintance, never bargained for the catastrophe, which though it brought fear and trembling for awhile to her, won for me the "Open Sesame" I had so longed for

Digitized by Google

Having occasion to turn to a somewhat unwieldy volume, from which she was proceeding to make extracts, she had, in ignorance of rules, taken an ink-glass from its stand, for handiness' sake; a reader hurrying by her seat—a corner one—caught the edge of the volume, jerking it sufficiently to overset the ink-glass. The face of the volume at once presented a map-like appearance, where oceans and rivers seemed to be like empires on their westward march. Such a contretemps is calculated to stir the most phlegmatic of readers, but to the fluttering, bird-like Eunice Frith it was a veritable cataclysm. In her distress she turned her eyes around as if to see if the executioner were at hand. Those somewhat sad-looking eyes seemed to me full of woe. The opportunity was not to be lost. Jumping up, I went to her aid, and with sundry wisps of blotting-paper from a neighbouring pad remedied the mischief as well and quickly as possible, the disfiguring distilment not having had sufficient time to soak in and render the printing matter illegible.

She never forgot my prompt action in this matter. In a week's time we were on speaking terms, within a month an acquaintanceship had ripened marvellously. Gradually we came to understand each other. We sat side by side, the dividing chair separated us no longer.

It was all very nice, and, to use an Americanism, I felt "real good."

Then the time came when she assented to my invitation to drink tea with me in the gallery room. Over that delicious Souchong we chatted freely. She spoke to me of her mother—an invalid; of her brother—a clerk in a banking house. I gathered that the united earnings of these young people represented nearly the whole of the wherewithal of their otherwise happy little home. I know there are many similar cases. That is so, but, believe me, there could be but one Eunice Frith.

My work of pedigree-creating had palled sadly upon me for some time, and I began to think living among the bones—so to speak—of departed nobodies, far from exhilarating.

Once it happened Eunice's mother accompanied her to the establishment in Bloomsbury—the British Museum. As they were descending the stairway from the galleries, I was passing through the hall. Eunice introduced me to her mother, and we remained in conversation for the best part of an hour, when Mrs. Frith suddenly remembered her doctor's instructions not to "try herself too much," and pronounced for home. To her alarm, on our arrival at the vestibule of the Museum, it was raining smartly. Once again luck favoured me. My umbrella, a property which nine days out of ten I left at home, proved a ready friend for once. Under its shelter Mrs. Frith reached her 'bus in comparative dryness. As it looked as if the downpour would be continuous, I insisted she should retain it.

"Oh, no, Mr. Athelstane, I won't deprive you."

But my insistence carried the day, and suggested that Eunice might find it useful in the morning. That young lady, however, declared she "had one of her own."

Mrs. Frith settled the question by saying—

"I will take it, Mr. Athelstane, on condition that you will bring Eunice home this evening, and join us at our little tea-dinner, and then, you see, you can take possession of your umbrella."

To this I consented with covert rapture.

A Chapter of Accidents.

After leaving Eunice and her mother, I returned to the Reading Room, intending to put in an hour or two of work, but in this I was frustrated, by the receipt of a telegram, which announced the serious illness of my father and desired my early attendance at his side.

Here was a call that brooked no inattention. I showed the wire to Eunice, and begged her to express to her mother my regrets, and bidding her what was intended to be an impressive "Good-bye," left for my home at Wells, in Norfolk.

Little did I think that two long years would elapse before I again set eyes on Eunice Frith.

I was away in Norfolk for some three months, my father's condition varying to such an extent, owing to frequent relapses, as left me no alternative but to stay with him. I was his second son, my brother Christopher being two years my senior; our mother had been dead many years.

Christopher, somewhere about the early seventies, had shipped himself off to South Africa to seek fortune on the diamond diggings of the Vaal River. That good luck had been attendant upon him we had every reason to believe, but to what extent had nothing tangible to help us to an idea. His letters had been few and far between, neither lengthy nor graphic, but warm enough to show us that fraternal affection still existed in his breast, though perhaps in a very limited form.

My father had been dead some six weeks, during which period I had been busying myself in the administration of his little estate and winding up my enforced rest from pedigree-hunting and other such trifles, when the great change in my life began. The African mail brought me a letter from my brother Christopher, or rather from a friend of his, acting as amanuensis. Christopher had met with a very serious accident in the mine. Most of his ribs had been broken, and the doctors feared that much internal laceration had also taken place. Chris was anxious to see me, fearing a fatal ending. Would I come at once to Kimberley? He had also inclosed a draft for £100 to cover travelling expenses, and in case the world had not used me kindly. I was not to let the "old man" know of the accident, and suggested all sorts of other precautions.

To pack up my traps was but short work, and the old home I left in charge of a maiden aunt.

After I had booked my passage, I had a few hours to spare. These I spent in a vain search for Eunice Frith. I could hear no tidings at the house where they had lived. The landlady only knew they had left—gone, she thought, into "unfurnished" rooms.

I did not feel easy on the matter, but I hoped for the best, and made my way to a hotel near Waterloo whence I had to start the next morning on my first venture beyond the white cliffs of old England.

The Castle liner on which I had taken my passage did her voyage well and rapidly. The succeeding day to that on which I landed in Cape Town saw me being transferred, as rapidly as a South African Railway can manage it, northwards. In less than forty-eight hours from my start from the Cape, I knew I had arrived too late. Poor Chris had gone to the bourne whence none return.

His lawyer interviewed me soon after my arrival, condoled with me, and eulogised poor Chris' many virtues. He said that my brother had been a most successful man up to a certain point. But lately owing to—to—er—scruples, he had been placed at a disadvantage. Still, he remarked,

"Still, Mr. Athelstane, your brother died pretty warm. His personalty, I should say—well—let me see—er, well—is quite seventy thousand pounds."

I explained that my brother had never confided either to his father or myself the degree of success which he had attained.

"Indeed, sir," I added, "we know very little about his South African career. I presume he has a wife and—children?"

"Not so, sir. Your brother lived a very retired life, rarely joining in any of the many functions our citizens delight in. He was a good man, and a charitable one."

"Charitable?" I questioned. "Then I presume he has left large sums to your local institutions and hospitals."

"No, sir, not a penny."

"Then to whom does his money revert? Surely he did not die intestate?"

"Not a man in the world less likely to do so. No, sir, you are the happy man. By will—here it is, sir, in black and white—'all that I die possessed of I leave to my brother Richard Athelstane to be by him used and disposed of as may appear best to his own good and charitable disposition.'"

I was not inordinately puffed up by this sudden acquisition of wealth. One thing flashed first upon my mind, and that was that I should be for ever done with my old occupations. No more grinding out paragraphs, no more pulling about the dead and gone ancestors of mighty present-day pork butchers.

Digitized by Google

No more of ill-ventilated reading-rooms, whether under red-tape rule or otherwise. I should live in Utopia. To do this, I deemed it wisest and best to return to England. In due course, I arrived in London, and at once went back to the scene of my old struggles, the British Museum. It seemed as if I could not keep away. "Why did I go there?" you ask. To look for Eunice, or, maybe, get some news of her. But no, I could learn nothing; and it came into my mind that I had seen the last of Eunice Frith.

I had been home a month. Most of my time had been spent at my little place in Norfolk; still even there I had a restless feeling, as of some unaccomplished work to be looked after. What it was I could not divine. Then I betook myself to town again.

I had been one evening to King's Cross station to inquire after a package I had transmitted, but of which I had since received no acknowledgment. I made a short cut back in the direction of Russell Square, when my attention was drawn to a knot of children on the pavement. At first I could see nothing, but as I drew near I noticed one or two articles of furniture with a box or two corded over.

"One of those hateful cases of distraint—some poor lone, aged widow," I thought to myself. Even as I looked, a poor, worn woman, yet neat and tidy withal, looked up, her face by its pained expression telling a tale of woe. Where had I seen that face before? I had not gone on my way many steps before my recollection cleared. I hastened back to the forlorn creature, and pushing my way to her side, asked in an undertone:

"Are you not Mrs. Frith—Eunice's mother?"

"Yes, oh, yes! But you—who are you?"

Before I could make reply, another figure appeared on the scene. Eunice herself—but, great Heavens! how changed that face had become. In its thinness and wanness even the mother's sank into nothingness, as in heart-rending tones she gasped—

"O, mother, mother! have they turned you out like this? I came as soon as I knew the state of affairs."

Then she caught sight of me, knew me at once, as I could see, and drew shyly back.

I held out my hand to her, saying—

"You know me, Miss Frith. You are in trouble. Your mother cannot remain here, you must come with me."

Just then a heaven-sent growler, drawn by a horse which, positively, had four legs, and, what is more, could use them, appeared. I hailed the driver. He proved a smart man. In the twinkling of the dog-star's eye, I had put Mrs. Frith and her daughter inside, and jumping on the box told cabby to drive to King's Cross station.

In one of the waiting-rooms I heard the painful story my friends had to tell. Eunice's brother had lapsed from the direct course. In their endeavours to rescue him, their small capital of hardly-earned savings had melted like snow before the sun. Remorse so affected the brother's mind that to escape moral suffering he put an end to his life. Why is it the young are so forgetful of the sufferings of the old? However, affairs went from bad to worse, till Eunice by overwork broke her health, and went into hospital. The poor old lady hung on as long as she could, until an inexorable landlord called in the assistance of a bailiff.

A new home was soon found for them. Money can do that. I begged them to let me be their banker until such time as Eunice's health was completely restored. Their common sense was equal to the occasion, and they showed it by accepting my offer. A month's perfect rest in town, another at the sea-side, soon mended the health of these broken ones, more than ever dear to me. My old home in Norfolk forms a peaceful haven of rest for Mrs. Frith. At present Eunice is with her. No longer does she run danger of damaging the volumes in the Reading Room at the British Museum. I do not intend she ever shall, for next week I am going down to Norfolk. If I am lucky, there will be a bridal ceremony in the village church before I return to town.

F. Eliot.

Your Editor Chats.

The chief item of interest this week—to me, at all events—is the increasing enthusiasm of readers concerning "THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA."

For example, ADA expresses the hope that Frankie comes to a bad end. She likes "Fluffy," and thinks Kinross good fun. Percival Hope she regards as "a darling," and supposes that Cynthia marries him. Although ADA, to use her own expression, "is only a school-girl herself," she thinks she would have seen through Frankie sooner than Cynthia did.

Another correspondent, JOSEPHINE, does not seem to have much of an opinion of Cynthia as a woman. She says: "I am interested in her and, indeed, up to a certain point, feel sorry for her, but I cannot help thinking she is much to blame. She should have refused to have even faintly allied herself with Mrs. Norton's schemes. Please do not think me hard, but I am convinced that Cynthia could have retarded, if not stopped, Mrs. Norton's downward career if she had only been true to her principles."

Now, to deal with ADA first. I am sorry that I cannot very well arrange matters to meet her views, for the articles are true to life, and the young lady who has written them has simply stated plain facts. No doubt they could be made more exciting if romance were introduced; but I think you will agree with me that if this were done the whole idea of the series would be spoilt. Of course it is easy for the reader to see through Mrs. Norton and her ways, but, at the time, it was practically impossible for Cynthia to discover her true character. If this adventuress hoodwinked clever men like those whose names appear as Kinross and Sir John Strickland, how much more easy must it have been to hoodwink a simple girl like Cynthia Hamilton? I consider these articles are most cleverly written, for the reason that the little lady's companion, who is responsible for them, has treated them in such a way as to show the persons dealt with in their true light, without being influenced by after events.

JOSEPHINE'S criticisms are, perhaps, justifiable in a certain measure, but it is one thing to know for certain that Mrs. Norton was an adventuress (as JOSEPHINE now knows) and quite another thing for Cynthia to prove that fact to herself at the time when the incidents recorded were actually happening. Cynthia was just an ordinary simple-minded girl; Mrs. Norton was a woman of strong passions, a quick thinker, and a great schemer. Cynthia was passionately fond of Mrs. Norton, and convinced herself against her suspicions that nothing radically wrong was going on. Moreover, she was practically under the influence of this woman, and did not care to question her actions to any great extent. Had Cynthia been very strong-minded, she would, of course, have had a row with Mrs. Norton in the early stages of her position as companion, and then, not only would she have left, but "THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA" would never have been written!

Finally, a man—"A. H. C."—writes: "In the capital series which you are running—'THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA'—there is given this week a very vivid description of Derby Day. I have a bet on the subject that this was written by a man. Every line of it suggests the masculine experience rather than the feminine intuition. Am I right? Have I won my bet?" Alas! "A. H. C.," you are wrong! The whole of the articles have been written by the young lady whose name is given as "Cynthia Hamilton," and, on showing her your letter, she said that she thought that it was quite a feather in her cap that anyone should have regarded her description of the Derby as the work of a man!

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

OUR THRILLING SERIAL.

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

By HENRY FARMER.

The Thread of the Story.

A BELT full of diamonds has been stolen from a safe belonging to Mr. Mansfield, a wealthy banker, by Seaton Revelle (who is a friend of the banker's) and an accomplice named Benjamin Beard. Revelle accuses Alec Scarsdale, who is in love with Esther, Mr. Mansfield's daughter, of the crime, and he is sentenced to sixteen years' penal servitude.

Mr. Crump, late Chief-Inspector at Scotland Yard, feeling sure Scarsdale is innocent and Revelle is guilty, determines to prove the latter's guilt.

Mr. Mansfield as fully believes in Scarsdale's guilt as does Esther in his innocence, and his friendship for Revelle increases. Revelle constantly visits the banker's house in an endeavour to win Esther's love, but so far has not prospered at all. While talking with the girl one day, Mr. Mansfield's new maid, Vance, enters the room with a tray bearing cups of coffee. No sooner does she catch sight of Revelle than she drops the tray, and, pointing to Revelle, screams: "That—that man is my husband!" But Revelle, by sheer force of will, compels her to acknowledge her mistake.

At about this time Esther and Mr. Crump are walking together when they observe Vance about to throw herself into the reservoir. Crump stops her just in time—he and Esther taking her back to The Woodlands. Later on she is placed in the county asylum.

The great balloon incident now approaches. There is to be a grand fête in Lord Normanhurst's grounds, the chief and closing event being a balloon ascent by Mr. Seaton Revelle. Everything goes well till two horsemen arrive with the news that Vance has escaped from the asylum.

Acting upon Crump's advice they go straight to the reservoir, but fail to find the missing girl. The search is given up at nightfall. Shortly before nightfall Revelle makes his ascent. A storm, however, compels him to come down, the anchor touching ground on a neighbouring common just where Vance is waiting for him. The girl clings on to the anchor, and Revelle, quickly making a terrible resolve, throws out a number of sandbags, and the balloon again rises and continues its flight till Warham reservoir is reached. Just as the balloon is passing over the water Revelle cuts the anchor rope.

Vance's dead body is found next morning, Mr. Crump being informed of the discovery while walking with Esther.

Mr. Crump examines the body and finds that a leg is broken, evidently by a fall. The coroner's jury return a verdict of "Found drowned." Mr. Crump next takes a walk on the common, and discovers some sand-bags.

Mr. Mansfield thinks it best that Esther shall leave Warham for a little holiday. It is while changing at Roxeter Junction en route for Gurlston Bay that Fate brings about a meeting between Esther and Alec, who is on his way to Wrackam. An impassioned scene takes place on the platform. Before many days are passed Seaton Revelle also journeys to Gurlston Bay, and it is while there that they hear of the plucky rescue from drowning of a warder at Wrackam Prison by Alec Scarsdale, and, subsequently of his rumoured escape from prison.

The rumour proves to be true. Alec had indeed managed to escape from the prison, and taking a boat had pulled down the river, after purloining some sailors' clothes from an empty barge. Just when he is thoroughly exhausted, however, he is run down by a sailing barge. His boat is smashed, but Alec is rescued and taken on board. The barge proves to be the Mary Ann, bound for Gurlston Bay. Arrived at its destination, it is hardly moored to the pier before Esther, who is taking a walk, arrives at the pier to watch the unloading.

Shortly afterwards Revelle saunters up, when suddenly Esther catches sight of Alec in the barge. With great presence of mind she leads Revelle away from the spot before he discovers whom she has seen. Late that night, after everyone has gone to bed, Esther contrives a meeting with Alec in the drawing-room of the house in which she is staying. The two lovers are clasped in each other's arms when a man's footsteps are suddenly heard outside the door, and a minute after Revelle rushes into the room. He passes Esther without seeing her, and gives chase to Scarsdale. Shortly afterwards he returns with a sprained ankle; he has missed his man.

Crump now decides to burglarously enter Revelle's house at Warham and search Revelle's belongings. Aided by his nephew, Police-constable Wilton, who engages the butler's attention, Crump gets into Revelle's dressing-room and begins his search. Suddenly he discovers a portmanteau with a false bottom.

SIGNOR BALDERINI'S LETTERS.

CRUMP'S patience looked like being rewarded. Quickly, yet methodically, he emptied the trunk of its contents. It did not take him long to find out the secret of the false bottom. A slight lump in one of the sides proved to be a spring. Pressure upon it caused the flap to fly up.

"Now," said the little man, "we shall see what we shall see!"

He first turned his attention to a couple of wigs that lay in the recess, one grey-coloured, the other a dark auburn. He examined their insides, and having noted the name of their maker, produced pencil and paper, and jotted something down. A flat tin box was the next object examined. It contained a number of grease-paints, some crêpe hair in various colours, and a small bottle of spirit gum.

"Quite a theatrical outfit!" said the little man to himself, "This is interesting, and suggests disguises to me rather than amateur theatricals. It admits of speculation on the past, and suggests possibilities in the future; but it does not throw any light on the two matters that are uppermost in my mind."

Next he picked up what looked like a scroll of paper. It was discoloured with age. He unrolled it.

"Ah, indeed! This, again, is interesting, quite interesting! Dear me! Signor Balderini!"

Digitized by Google

The paper, unrolled, had proved to be a small picture-poster representing a man in tights and spangles in the act of making a descent through mid-air, holding on to a parachute with one hand, in the other a lighted cigar. Beneath the picture the announcement in German, that at a certain date and at a certain place, the famous Signor Balderini would make a parachute descent. The poster was more than ten years old. Crump knew sufficient German to translate the letter-press.

For some three minutes Crump was busily employed scribbling on his piece of paper.

"H'm!" he muttered, "I have been able to trace Mr. Seaton Revelle's life back for the last ten years, then a blank wall confronted me. But now I wonder if I am jumping at a rash conclusion in venturing to believe that prior to that time there was no Mr. Revelle, but rather Signor Balderini? Does Seaton Revelle, the gentleman amateur balloonist, represent the apotheosis of Signor Balderini, the professional parachutist. It is curious, too, how this picture fits those words spoken by poor Vance, that early morning by the reservoir. 'Don't you hear the crowd cheering—cheering Jim! Only holding on with one hand, his cigar in the other, cool as brass, that's Jim!'".

Crump was reasoning as calmly and as deliberately as if he had been comfortably seated in his armchair at Woodbine Cottage, instead of being engaged upon an unlawful operation. There was absolutely no signs of flurry about the little man.

"Thanks," he went on, "to the date and names on the poster, there should be no difficulty in finding out all about the Signor, though this descent must have taken place more than ten years ago. Will investigation, I wonder, reveal the fact that the Signor's Christian name was James or the foreign equivalent? That, some ten years ago, he was supposed to have met his death by drowning? And was he married at the time? And to whom?"

The little man carefully rolled up the poster again and replaced it in the trunk. On his strip of paper he had scribbled down, amongst other things, the name of the printer.

"And if—allowing myself for once to jump headlong at a number of conclusions—I could obtain proof that the Signor and Mr. Revelle are one and the same, and that the Signor was a married man, and that his wife, believing him to be dead, entered into domestic service under the name of Vance—would not this constitute another link in the chain of circumstantial evidence that I am endeavouring to forge. If this poor creature was murdered, it will be very essential to be able to point to a motive. Miss Mansfield, God bless her! can prove that Mr. Revelle made a proposal of marriage to her, and at that time poor Vance was living. But a truce to conclusions!"

He dived a hand down into the trunk and brought up a bundle of letters bound together by a faded ribbon.

"Two games of 'a hundred up' should give me plenty of time!"

He untied the ribbon and glanced at the first letter. He gave a low whistle when he caught sight of the signature at the end. It was that of a married lady, occupying a high position in Society. In the second letter the surname was dropped.

"Oh, you vile scoundrel!" whispered Crump, the last letter read, "so this has been one of your sources of income—blackmail! And a woman, too!"

A second bundle of letters revealed another case of the same kind.

"You infamous blackguard, you!"

Then, a moment later—

"Hullo! This letter has got in here by mistake!"

It was written in a woman's hand, but different from the others. And the date proved it to be much older. Crump's eyes brightened; he screwed up his mouth.

"Dearest Jim," it ran, "to-morrow! I feel afraid, miserable, yet happy! You can perhaps understand. To-morrow we shall be husband and wife, and Alice Vince will be Mrs. James Balder. Oh, Jim, I am blushing as I write this. And yet I can't help feeling miserable. The dear old dad is sitting in the chimney corner, smoking his pipe, mother is peacefully knitting. I can't help crying a little. What will they say when they find me gone? It seems so wicked to deceive them. Oh, Jim, you will have to love me ever so much to make up for the love that I am leaving behind me. But they have always been against you, and I daren't tell them; but perhaps, when we are married, they will forgive us, knowing that it is too late to undo what is done, and it will all come right in the end. And when I think this, I don't feel quite so miserable at the thought of leaving them.

"Good-night, dearest Jim! This will reach you only a little time before I shall. Yours, most lovingly, ALICE."

Crump's expression was one of sadness and sternness mixed, as he folded up the letter and put it away in a pocket.

"I must certainly steal this. Jim Balder—Signor Balderini Alice Vince—Alice Vince—professional parachutist—amateur balloonist! A most pathetic letter, that, to me—the first act of the tragedy!"

He read through the other letters, then tied them up again, and replaced them in the trunk.

"With regard to the mystery of the reservoir I have made some little headway, but, in the other matter, I am afraid that I am no forrader. I had hoped, but no matter!"

He had exhausted the contents of the secret recess, but had encountered nothing to throw light on the manner in which the diamonds stolen from John Mansfield's safe had been disposed of. It was a disappointment to him. He started to replace the contents of the trunk, mostly clothes, taking care to search the pockets of each garment. He was essentially thorough in his methods, but his thoroughness was not to be rewarded on this occasion. He had closed down the lid of the trunk, and had just locked it again by the aid of one of the skeleton keys, one time property of Cully Scott, alias the Smasher, when a sound caught his ears—the sound of someone whistling. It was very faint, but he was just able to distinguish the air—"The Honeysuckle and the Bee!" It was the tune that he had arranged that Fred Wilton should whistle when he and Tomlinson passed to the billiard-room.

The little man sprang to his feet. The tune was no longer being whistled, but being sung in a hilarious voice that was not, however, free from an underlying note of strain.

Crump had realised. The unexpected must have happened. The handle of the door of the bedroom beyond was being turned. There was no way out of the dressing-room but through the bedroom. Crump was caught like a rat in a trap. One comprehensive glance round, then having turned out the light, he sprang to a cupboard filled with wearing apparel, that he had already examined. He crept in and drew to the door even as the door of the room beyond opened.

Railton, followed by Fred Wilton, the latter looking exceedingly uncomfortable, entered. Railton lighted the gas.

"But look here," expostulated Fred, "that was a most excellent cigar you gave me in the billiard-room. Nobody could wish for a better!"

"But I insist!" answered Railton in his suave voice, "The cigar that I'm about to offer you is of a far superior brand. It is quite the finest that it has been my lot to smoke. We keep them in the dressing-room. You want to treat your cigar as carefully as you do your wine. They are at present in a superb condition."

The cigars in question belonged to his master. Fred Wilton was suffering silent agony; yet he was powerless. The perspiration was beading out on his forehead when Railton passed into the dressing-room and lighted the gas.

"This," explained Railton, "is the governor's dressing-room."

Fred Wilton's heart was in his mouth. There was no sign of his uncle, but he felt positive that he must be concealed in one of the two rooms.

"This cupboard," said Railton, "is admirably suited for keeping and getting cigars into good condition. The hot water pipe running at the top insures a nice warm temperature. If you wished to purchase such a cigar as the one I am about to offer you it would cost you three shillings at least."

He pointed to a cupboard—the one in which Crump had taken refuge. Every word had been audible to the little man. He was absolutely self-possessed. The cupboard was a roomy one, and admitted of a certain amount of movement. Quickly he took down a garment from one of the pegs. It happened to be a frock-coat. He was in an exceedingly awkward predicament, but he was full of resource, and he did not despair of extricating himself. The cigars were on the shelf above his head. There was not sufficient depth to the cupboard to enable him to conceal himself completely behind the clothes.

Railton opened the cupboard. A cry of terror, shrill as a woman's, burst from him. He had caught sight of the lower half of a man's body, the upper part shrouded by some dark garment. He was an arrant coward, Railton, and his master was quite correct in telling Benny that his nerve was absolutely gone.

Before he could step back, Crump had sprung, and had wrapped the frock-coat round Railton's head. It was a masterly manœuvre and beautifully executed; then, with a natty back-trip, he sent him flying backwards, still hopelessly enveloped in the coat.

Fred Wilton was standing motionless and open-mouthed. Crump sprang upon him with a hoarse, blood-curdling cry!

"Out o' my way, or I'll do fur yer!"

Then, instead of dealing him a murderous blow, he gave him a gentle shove, and with a jerk of his thumb indicated Railton as he lay on the floor, screaming and tearing frantically at the coat that still hooded him most effectually. Fred had recovered his self-possession. He understood. It was all over in far less time than it takes to describe. With a cry as if he had been struck a severe blow, the young constable reeled back and fell heavily on the top of Railton.

"Murder!" howled Railton.

The light went out. Then Fred winced from real pain. Railton had succeeded in getting free his hand, and, mad with terror, had fastened his teeth into the young constable's wrist.

Crump had gained the grounds. He was panting a little; but he was also grinning. That young rascal Fred had thoroughly entered into the spirit of the thing. His promptitude to grasp the situation and act augured well for his future career.

"To forget my boots," thought the little man as, silently and with a speed that would have done credit to a young man of twenty, he darted away, "would be an act of criminal folly. I can rely on Fred to keep my old friend Tomlinson very busy for the next ten minutes or so. But it was indeed a very near thing. Phew!"

It was past eleven o'clock when Crump, properly shod and the now superfluous pair of woollen socks tucked away into a pocket, admitted himself into Woodbine Cottage.

"Quite an escapade," he muttered with a chuckle. "And I must confess that I have enjoyed the excitement of it. And I'm proud, very proud of that young rascal Fred. I am very hopeful about his future. I do so want to see that lad get, if not to the top, very near to the top of the tree in his profession!"

Then he wagged a finger at an imaginary occupant of a chair opposite him, and shook his head.

"I know, my dear fellow, that, at my time of life—over sixty—I ought to be ashamed of myself! I know that my conduct to-night may seem very reprehensible; but I must ask you to wait before blowing me up. I confess that I had hoped for a better result; but my effort has not been utterly fruitless!"

He pulled out his notes, and the letter purloined from the trunk's secret recess.

"I am a step nearer the solution of the tragic mystery of Warham reservoir. I am grieved to say that, with regard to the other matter, I stand where I stood before!"

He shook his head sorrowfully. What news would the morrow bring of Alec Scarsdale? His kindly heart ached for Esther. Then he lighted his pipe. He was not in the least degree anxious about Fred. He felt quite confident in that young man's ability to see things through to a successful conclusion. He opened the letter. In the right hand corner was an address and a date. The letter was nearly thirteen years old.

"I must endeavour to obtain possession of a copy of the certificate of the marriage of James Balder and Alice Vince, also as much information as possible about Signor Balderini, the parachutist. I am very lucky to have friends abroad as well as at home."

Crump in the days of active service had done a considerable amount of continental work. He had fetched his writing materials, and was engaged upon a lengthy letter, when someone tapped on the window.

"That rascal Fred!" chuckled the little man.

When admitted, the young constable was in uniform. His right hand was bound up.

"Fred, my lad," said Crump quickly, "I hadn't realised that you had to go on duty so soon. I wouldn't for worlds be the cause of taking you off your beat. Duty's duty, my lad! Off you get. I'll overtake you in a minute; but I can't bear to think of your being off your beat. It's my fault, I know; but off you get!"

The little man hustled him out; then, having hurriedly locked up his papers, started out after him.

"Now, Fred," he said, having overtaken him, "you and I can talk, and at the same time it won't be interfering with your duty. Ah, my lad, you mustn't think me an old fidget, will you. But I remember a case of murder. If the constable hadn't been off his beat, murder would not have been done. I'm not blaming you, I am the cause. And now let me tell you that I am very pleased indeed with your conduct and presence of mind. Tell me what happened after my hurried exit?"

The young constable's story was quickly told. Railton, believing it to be the burglar upon him, had, for some time, continued to bite, kick, and howl for mercy simultaneously, and Fred had been in no hurry to undeceive him. Then at last he had been made to realise. Fred had explained that a blow below the belt had incapacitated him; that he had obtained a glimpse of the burglar before the light was extinguished—a hulking, murderous-looking fellow!

At that Crump chuckled.

"But," continued Fred, "though he was in one of the bluest funks, when I suggested that I ought to report at the station, he didn't fall in with the idea at all. Seemed to think it was too late; that no good would come of doing so."

"Exactly!" said Crump. "I can quite understand that."

"He implored me to search the place thoroughly, which I did. He seemed much relieved to find nothing missing. When I left him, he was still in a blue funk, hugging a revolver that he had unearthed from his bedroom. He begged me to keep quiet on the subject. I suppose one of the reasons being that he doesn't want the story of his little supper party to reach his master's ears."

When, on the following morning, Mrs. Cobb, shortly after six o'clock, entered Mr. Penworthy's room, she was surprised to find the little man busily engaged in writing letters.

"Gracious me, Mr. Penworthy," she exclaimed, "you don't mean to tell me that you've not been to bed!"

"Well, yes, Mrs. Cobb. I had a tremendous amount of correspondence to get through, and I am anxious to get it off by the first post."

The stack of letters beside him gave evidence of a busy night. He himself was looking a little heavy-eyed.

"Then let me get you a cup of tea, Mr. Penworthy!"

"That, Mrs. Cobb, would be most refreshing."

When later Crump returned from posting his correspondence, a number of letters were awaiting him. He sorted through them quickly, and selected one addressed in Esther's handwriting. He began to read; then gave a little start. His face lit up with a radiant beam. It was the letter Esther

Digitized by Google

A Society Lady on Society Ladies and Corpulency.

"Il faut souffrir pour être belle," according to the well-known French saying, and if we may judge from the following statements of Lady Violet Greville in a recent number of The Graphic, verily "suffering to be beautiful" seems to be the order of the day amongst our pretty society women. This charming critic of her sex writes:

"The discomfort and severe self-restraint practised in diet by smart society women, who take a pride in their figures, would astonish those people who regard them as living a life of ease and luxury. They rise early, they take a breakfast of certain biscuits and hot water, they dine on meat and vegetables, of which onions form a prominent feature, they deny themselves tea, sugar, and spice, and all things nice, take no drink with their meals, eschew wine, and practise tiresome and fatiguing exercises twice daily. This is the regimen of an acrobat or an ascetic, yet it is cheerfully undertaken by pretty, young and happy women. Soon there will be no need of cooks."

Whether the cook is so soon likely to vanish into the ewigkeit we do not know; but of this we are fully assured, that all the distressing and disagreeable restrictions and the "tiresome and fatiguing exercises" are quite unnecessary, even when symptoms of obesity become more than usually alarming. A carefully considered dietary and a reasonable amount of healthy and enjoyable outdoor exercise are in all cases excellent; but to carry the regimen to the extremes described by Lady Violet Greville is not only absurd, but detrimental to health.

Amongst all the systems of reducing the body to normal proportions and keeping it in a perfect condition of beauty and symmetry, what is now widely known as the stands supreme, not only on account of the permanency of its results, but because it involves no unreasonable restrictions whatever, no violent exercise, no weakening carminatives, and, moreover, the liquid compound which is, so to speak, the keynote of the treatment, is so pleasant to the palate that even a child might take it without a grimace. The "Russell" treatment does not interfere in the slightest degree with the ordinary avocations and pleasures of life, and where ordinary sanitary and hygienic conditions are observed, it cannot be otherwise than eminently beneficial.

"RUSSELL" TREATMENT FOR THE CURE OF CORPULENCY

ITS GENERAL EFFECTS.

These are two-fold; for whilst all superfluous adipose tissue is being steadily and radically eliminated from the system in a manner quite consonant with the natural functions, the entire body is being revitalised and strengthened. A healthy, normal appetite is promoted, and the digestive organs, freed from internal fatty accumulations, act with increased vigour, so that the system, hitherto clogged with excessive adipose, is now enabled to assimilate a larger quantity of nourishing food; new healthy blood is formed, and new muscular tissue replaces the flaccid and unwholesome tissues ejected. Think of the immense benefit to body, brain and nerve, brought about by this admirably rational system of restoring the lost lines of physical beauty!

FOR FURTHER DETAILS

of the famous "Russell" regimen we must refer our stout readers to the fountain head, viz., to the originator of the system, Mr. F. Cecil Russell, who has devoted the best years of a long life to the study of the causes and the cure of corpulency. Mr. Russell is the author of the book "Corpulency and the Cure," of which our readers have doubtless heard. His lucid and authoritative treatise of 256 pages is already in its eighteenth edition. It contains most exhaustive information on the subject under discussion, and must be of immense service to persons of both sexes who, to quote Lady Violet Greville, "take a pride in their figures." The recipe of the principal compound employed by Mr. Russell is given in order chiefly to show the harmless character of its ingredients, which are purely vegetable, without the admixture of any deleterious substance.

To obtain a gratis copy of "Corpulency and the Cure," you have but to enclose three penny stamps (for private postage) to Mr. F. Cecil Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., and you will receive a copy by return. We would especially point out the large number of extracts from laudatory letters received by the author from ladies and gentlemen who have had cause to be thankful for the permanent result of "doing Russell."

Digitized by Google

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

Our Powerful Serial.

had written after her return from Gurlston Pier and her glimpse of Alec Scarsdale.

"Ah!" ejaculated the little man, "a very great load has been lifted off my soul!"

He rubbed his hands together, and smiled gleefully.

"But what an extraordinary coincidence!"—then his face assumed a grave look—"but if by any chance he should encounter Mr. Seaton Revelle it might be very serious indeed! Miss Mansfield, in her note, does not say whether Mr. Scarsdale recognised her. If he did, I'm afraid from what I know of human nature that he will throw caution to the winds, and endeavour to see her, and that will mean recapture. I must write to her at once. Scarsdale's chance of keeping his freedom is to get abroad at once! But, in any case, a great load has been lifted from my soul! And though it would be heartrending should he be retaken and go back to prison, it might not be for such a very long period after all. He is alive, that's the great thing!"

ALONG THE CLIFFS TOWARDS THE CAVES!"

The investigations of the police had thrown no light on the identity of the mysterious man who had entered the drawing-room of Gurlston Hall. The servants had been severely cross-examined; but one and all had stoutly denied having left their rooms, and it was impossible to prove otherwise, whatever suspicions might be afloat. When the household had been alarmed, John Mansfield had been one of the last to be awakened. He had at once sought his daughter's room, to find Esther in bed. He had not dreamt of questioning her; but, having told her what had happened, had remained with her. But after a while, when she had assured him that she was not frightened, he had left her to join the men and Miss Bullivant in the smoking-room. Seaton Revelle, lying on the couch, Miss Bullivant close to him, had inquired after Miss Mansfield, expressing the hope that she had not been unduly alarmed. The banker had remarked proudly his daughter was exceptionally plucky, and that he had just left her. When Esther had appeared at breakfast, the police investigations were over, and Revelle had been driven over to his friend's place. One thought only was in her mind. Alec had not been recognised. So far he had evaded recapture. And she thanked God for this! The horribly compromising position in which she had been placed on the previous night was only brought home to her when, after breakfast, she met Gerald Phipps on the lawn. A flush brightened her white face. The young 'Varsity man looked painfully embarrassed. Nobody was near them.

"I want to thank you," said Esther in a low, tremulous voice, "for sparing me!"

He looked more embarrassed than before. For the life of him he could not think of anything to say.

"And," went on Esther, "think what you will of me; but you won't—won't forget your promise, will you?"

He found his tongue at last.

"Look here," he stammered, "I'm not—I don't want to think anything. I should not think of—giving you away!"—he used the expression for the want of a better one—"I have a sort of an idea that—well—that, don't you know, there was more in it than met the eye—and if you cared to trust me—won't you?"

Esther knew him to be a gentleman. Her instincts served her in good stead. She acted on the impulse of the moment.

"Yes," she whispered, "I feel that I can trust you. And I feel if I tell you, you won't regret having done what you did. In screening me, you screened an innocent man. It was the man whom I am engaged to marry whom I met last night!"

So it had been the convict fellow, after all!

"I say, look here! I don't want to know any more! You're a most awfully plucky, brave sort! If at the time I—well—I thought things, I ask your pardon now a hundred times. Will you—er—shake hands?"

Esther took his outstretched hand. The flush had deepened on her face. Stammering, halting, and incoherent his speech might have been, but it had been genuine.

"Thank you!" she whispered simply.

"And look here, don't you know, if in any way I could help you, please say so. I should be awfully glad to, if I could in any way, I mean to say that the fellow who, with chains on his legs, could go to the rescue of a drowning man, must have an awful lot of good in him!"

It was very bluntly put; but the words came straight from the heart—a gentleman's heart. Further conversation was put an end to by the appearance of others on the lawn. The mystery of the night before was for some little time the chief topic of conversation; then plans for the day were discussed. It was finally decided upon to make an excursion to Reefe Castle—a fine old ruin some distance inland. Mr. Mansfield asked to be excused. The morning post had brought him in a budget of business letters that required immediate attention.

"But you'll go, Esther. I'm afraid that I've got a morning's work before me."

"I'd rather not, father; I don't feel quite up to a long day yet. I think I'll stay here. Perhaps we can go somewhere together this afternoon."

"Mansfield," said Mr. Walters, "there's a thick sea-mist rolling up the channel at present; but if it clears by this afternoon, make use of the yacht, if you feel so inclined!"

Immediately overhead the sky was a cloudless blue, giving no indication of the low-lying mist that veiled the sea, and was slowly rising, presently to mount the crest of the cliffs and creep inland.

After the others had gone, and her father had retired into the house, Esther sat in a deck chair on the lawn, her shapely head bent forward, her eyes shaded by a hand. Where was he now? For a long while she did not stir; then a feeling of restlessness came over her. She rose up and made her way into the library where her father was busy with his correspondence.

"Father, I think I shall go for a little stroll."

"Very well, my dear child. Which way are you going? I might take a break presently, and come along to meet you."

"Along the cliffs towards the caves, though I don't suppose I shall get as far as the caves."

"Be careful, Esther—not too near the edge!"

She stooped down and kissed him on his forehead.

"You're such an anxious old daddy," she said, with a little smile, "where I am concerned!"

A few moments later Esther was ascending the steep road that only the night before Alec Scarsdale had traversed. When she reached the crest of the cliff she glanced down at the mist that, like a great grey cloud, veiled the sea from her. The distant hootings of steamers reached her, now and again the dull boom of the lighthouse gun, yet overhead the sky was cloudlessly blue. But the breeze was blowing from off the sea. She did not take the road, but moved pensively along the foot-path, marked at intervals by white stones, that ran parallel with the edge of the cliff.

For some time the banker continued to wrestle with his correspondence; then he leant back in his chair with a sigh.

"He's a charming fellow, well-connected, and a man of means. I do hope that in the fulness of time that it will come about!"

He was thinking of the possiblities of Seaton Revelle becoming his son-in-law. He put away his papers.

"Yes, I think I'll go and look for Esther now."

He was crossing the lawn when he caught sight of a figure, walking with a stick, limping up the drive. The man uppermost in his mind!

"Hullo, Revelle!" he cried, "this is better. I was afraid

Digitized by Google

EIFFEL TOWER

THE FINEST MESSINA LEMONS are used in the manufacture of 'EIFFEL TOWER' LEMONADE.

Dr. A. B. GRIFFITHS, the famous Food Analyst, says:—
"I can conscientiously state that it is impossible to produce Lemonade of a higher standard of excellence."

LEMONADE

2 Gallons for 4½d.

Also use Eiffel Tower Jellies.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS, Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

SHAW'S GIFT Free

This Handsome Blouse

In order to clear out the Remainder of a Bankrupt Stock of Costume Cloths, we will send a tailor-made Costume Skirt in Navy or Black for the small sum of 5/0, or two for 9/6, carriage paid on all goods, and we will include with each skirt free of all charge, a handsome

5/- Two for 9/6. carr. paid.

Patterns sent if desired.

Sizes: 38, 40, 42.

SILKETTE BLOUSE with a Detachable Collar, equal in appearance to silk, and wearing twice as long. These skirts are cut in the very Latest Fashion.

SEND AT ONCE, in order to secure this great bargain, as after present stock is exhausted this offer cannot be repeated. Money returned if not satisfied. Address—

SHAW & CO., The London Tailors, (Dept Sh. S.), 6 LOVE LANE, WOOD ST., LONDON, E.C.

If Symonds' Cycles were not sound, handsome, easy riding mounts, do you suppose we would be sending out hundreds weekly on the easy payment system, allowing people to pay us while enjoying the use of the machines? Over 20,000 in use, with never a serious accident. Write for our circulars and learn how we can sell you a warranted "bike" at £4 to £8, cash or instalments.

Symonds' London Stores, 124-128 City Rd., London, E.C.

CYCLES

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. Room 81, 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

From 1s. weekly. Special Offer. £12 15s. 0d. Sample for £6 6s. Carriage paid. PLATED RIMS, FREE WHEELS, RIM BRAKE FITTED FREE. Agents wanted. — DEREHAM ROAD CYCLE CO., NORWICH.

You must try

E. & T.

PINK'S JAMS

they are

Absolutely Pure

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

"ALKAN" CURES IN ONE MINUTE

by inhalation, HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, FACIAL NEURALGIA, NEURALGIA OF THE EAR.

PRICES 2/9 AND 4/6 PER BOTTLE.

Of all Chemists and Stores, or of the Proprietors,

The "ALKAN" Ltd., General Depot, 150 STRAND, LONDON, W.C

Digitized by Google

HOW A HYPNOTIST MADE A FORTUNE.

The Secret Methods by Which Dr. X. La Motte Sage, the Greatest Hypnotic Scientist of the Age, Created a Tremendous Sensation.

He Firmly Believes Hypnotism a Public Benefit. Has Donated 10,000 Dollars Towards the Free Distribution of a Handsomely Illustrated Book Containing His Views and Suggestions on How to Acquire This Mysterious Power and Use It in Business, in Society, and in the Home.

While the Special Edition Lasts a Copy of This Remarkable Book Will be Sent Free to Any Interested Person.

Dr. X. La Motte Sage made a fortune out of Hypnotism. He probably knows more about the subject than any living man. His methods are radically different from any ever before presented. By his new system he hypnotises people instantaneously. He tells you how to exert tremendous silent influence without making a gesture or saying a single word. He gives the only real, practical methods for the development of the power of Personal Magnetism that have ever been published. During all the time that Dr. Sage was before the public he made it his business to note carefully the effect of hypnotism upon the human mind. He became convinced that this mighty mysterious power could be utilised to the advantage of ambitious men and women who wished to better their condition in life. To demonstrate the correctness of his ideas when he retired from public life he founded a college where Hypnotism, Personal Magnetism, Magnetic Healing, etc., might be taught along the definite lines he had laid down. The result is that the college has grown to be the largest of its kind in the world. Thousands of successful students in all parts of the globe are living witnesses to the wonderful power and the great practical benefits to be derived from Dr. Sage's methods. The Doctor has recently written a book entitled "The Philosophy of Personal Influence," in which he tells in plain, simple language just how to acquire hypnotic power and the various uses to which it may be put. Among the many interesting things upon which the book treats are: How to develop magnetic power and influence people without their knowledge; how to cure bad habits and obstinate chronic diseases, when medicine and everything else in this line fails; how to implant a command in a subject's mind that he will carry out in every detail a month or a year hence, whether the hypnotist is present or not; how to hypnotise people at a distance; its value in business; marvellous scientific tests how to prevent people from influencing you; hypnotic power more fascinating than beauty; the use of hypnotism in the development of the mental faculties; controlling children; removing domestic troubles, etc.

The college which Dr. Sage has founded proposes to give away 10,000 dollars worth of the above books absolutely free so long as the special edition lasts. Any person who is in earnest can get a copy merely by writing for it. This book is handsomely illustrated by the finest half-tone engravings. It tells you how the marvellous power of hypnotism has been used to cast a secret mystic spell over people without their knowledge and how they have been for months, and in some cases even years, obeying the royal will of another. It gives you the secret of the development of what Senator Chauncey M. Depew calls the money-making microbe. Don't think because you lack a fine education and are working for a small salary that you cannot better your condition; do not think because you are now successful in life that you cannot be more successful. Dr. Sage's book has been read, and his methods are to-day being used by many of the richest men in the world. They know the value of personal influence, of hypnotic power. If you are interested, write on a penny post-card to-day to the New York Institute of Science, Dept. VA, 23 Rochester, New York, U.S.A., and a copy of Dr. Sage's book will be sent you by return mail absolutely free. This is a rare opportunity to learn the uses and possibilities of the most wonderful, marvellous, and mysterious power known to man. The book is enthusiastically indorsed by the most prominent business men, ministers of the gospel, lawyers, and doctors. It should be in every home; it should be read by every man and woman in the country who wants to better his condition in life, who wants to achieve greater financial success, win friends, gratify his ambitions, and get out of life the pleasure and happiness which the Creator intended he should enjoy.

Digitized by Google

that you would have to give that ankle of yours complete rest for two or three days."

"No, it's not sprained as I thought—only a bit of a twist or a rick or something. I can hobble along quite famously with the aid of a stick. Where's everybody gone to?"

"Gone over to Reefe Castle, all except Esther and myself,"

"And where—er—is Miss Mansfield?"

"Gone along the cliffs towards the caves."

"'Pon my soul!" said Revelle, with a little laugh, "I believe that I'm capable of hobbling as far as that."

John Mansfield changed his mind about going to meet Esther. Under the circumstances he preferred not to make a third party.

"Well, I shall be seeing you again before very long."

Revelle waved his hand, and started to limp back along the drive.

His destination was along the cliffs towards the caves!

'TWIXT LIFE AND DEATH.

For all the hardness of his bed of rock and sand, Alec Scarsdale slept long and heavily. When at last he opened his eyes, a faint light filled the cave wherein he lay. At first, when the rugged outlines of the cave shaped themselves before his eyes, he fancied that he must be lying in the quarry at Greystone Prison. It was the sound of breaking waves that helped to bring back everything to his mind.

He passed out on to the ledge. It was a dull, grey morning. A mist fringed the horizon; but immediately about him the atmosphere was clear. He stood, drawing in deep breaths of the invigorating air, and taking stock of the wild, romantic surroundings. The ledge upon which he was standing, with its precipitous, burrowed background, was bay-shaped, inclosed at each end by towering white cliffs, their bases set in deep water. Atop the cliff to his left, the brow of which was overhanging, stood a withered, barren-looking tree. Beyond this, invisible to him, ran the footpath, set with stones, that led to the tunnel-like mouth that gave access to the caves.

He had no idea what the time was. He felt the better for his long sleep, refreshed by the invigorating air. He made a meal off the bread and meat supplied him by the kindly-hearted skipper, washed down by some fresh water that trickled from a crevice in the rocks. He thanked Heaven for the kindly forethought that had supplied him with pipe and tobacco. He sat himself down in the shadow of a great boulder to smoke, to think. What had happened after his flight? Had Esther been discovered? The thought made him writhe. He bitterly accused himself of selfishness. He had brought so much misery into her life. He stared mechanically at the horizon. The sea-mist was rolling nearer. Those moments with Esther had been so cruelly brief. If only he could see her again. He told himself that it was selfish; but he could not master his hunger.

He was still wrestling with his thoughts, when the mist crept up over the ledge, stealing round him insidiously like a damp shroud, and went onward and upward, topping the brow of the cliff and creeping away inland. The distant hoots of steamers mingled with the screechings of the circling gulls. Then the lighthouse gun boomed out heavily. To Scarsdale the mist seemed like the physical embodiment of the gloom that was stealing over his soul as he tried to solve the problem of the future. He must be going, somewhere—God alone knew how it was all going to end. If only he could see Esther once again!

"Help!"

He sprang to his feet.

It was a scream—a woman's scream, coming from out the mist, from somewhere above!

"Help!"

From somewhere above, but the baffling mist distorted sound. He glanced wildly up and round. As he did so, the mist lifted from the top of the cliffs.

"Oh, my God!" he breathed out sharply

Below the brow of the cliff away to his left, a woman was clinging to what seemed the white sheer side. Her feet were on a narrow, crumbling ledge, all that was between her and the water, more than a hundred feet below!

It was horrible! It seemed as though every moment she must fall. So narrow was the ledge, there was no room to turn upon it. She looked as though she were nailed to the side. And even as Scarsdale, horror-stricken, stared, a fragment broke away from the ledge, and crashed down. A moment later, and he was speeding like the wind. To reach the cliff above he had to ascend the tunnel leading up from the ledge. Once through, he darted to the edge of the cliff, went down on his hands and knees, peered over. The mist was rolling away inland. All was clear around, above, below!

Oh, God! His brain reeled.

For the grey, terrified, appealing face staring up at him, was that of the woman he loved!

Esther!

A deathly feeling of sickness swept over him, an icy hand seemed to have gripped on his heart. He saw her eyes dilate with a look that told of recognition—of hope.

"For God's sake, hold on!" he breathed out.

He dug his toes into the turf, stretched down his hand. Esther relaxed her hold with one hand, stretched up. There was a gap of two feet or more between the two hands. A fragment broke away from the ledge and crashed down. There would be no room for him upon the ledge below, if it bore the strain of the extra weight. If there had been room, and it had borne him, he could not have raised her into safety. the distance was too great.

"Oh, God! For a rope, a rope!"

And those mute, staring eyes were bent upon him, beseeching him to save her!

A rope! Oh, for a rope!

He thought of his coat. It would reach her; but without support he could not drag her up. There was nothing to give him a grip, a hold. The tree that stood behind him was too far away.

He cast a wild, despairing glance behind him. Some forty yards away stood a small barn. Outside, a horseless cart, a load of hay upon it. A thought flashed through his brain.

"Esther," he whispered down, "hold on, for the love of God, hold on a little longer! Can you, beloved, can you?"

Oh, the agony of it all—the life-and-death agony!

"Yes—but—only—a—little longer!"

"I'm coming back to you!"

He sprang to his feet; then raced like a madman to the cart. Yes, a rope was there, bound round the load of hay.

He tore at the knots. Heaven, for a knife! Then he used his teeth. At last. Only a few seconds in reality; but it had seemed to him an eternity of fiendish torture.

"Courage, beloved! I've got a rope. Just a little longer!"

It was a long, stout rope.

He lowered down one end.

"Make it fast round your waist!" he hissed.

With one hand she gripped it, wound it round her waist, knotted it. He darted back, wound the rope round the tree. There was yet plenty to spare. He made the end fast round his own waist. He had support now.

* * * * * * *

"Thank goodness, that confounded fog has passed over," muttered Seaton Revelle, as he rose up from one of the white stones beside the foot-path on which he had been sitting, "you don't catch me doing any walking near the edge of a cliff when there's a fog about—far too risky!"

He started to hobble forward again. Then suddenly——

"Good God!"

(To be continued.)

Splendid Serial Story Coming.

We have arranged for a magnificent serial story to follow the present one. The first instalment will appear in a few weeks.

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

A LETTER FROM RUSSIA.

I have received a letter in German from a correspondent in Russia. Let me say it is no small pleasure to me to know that evidently Short Stories is read in the land of the Tsars. My correspondent is anonymous, and asks me if I could help him to find a wife. He is thirty, of good character and means, possessing some property. He is musical, good looking, fond of sport, but does not care for the girls of his own country. If he could meet a pretty foreign lady who spoke French, and could play and sing, he would be happy. Can I help him?

NOT A MATRIMONIAL AGENCY.

I should be most happy. But I fear such girls as my Russian friend seeks would readily enough find suitors of their own nationality. I cannot undertake to help him in finding a wife, as I would not like to be in any way responsible for sending an English girl to live in so uncongenial a country as Russia, unless there were a very strong love motive in the case. However, I place his statement on record.

I AM WILLING TO HELP.

While I cannot agree to be the medium for exchanging names and addresses, if any lady correspondent would willingly undertake such a mysterious alliance, it would be interesting to know it. If there are English girls so inclined, I shall be happy to make a statement to that effect in a week or so, when my Russian friend may think it worth his while to endeavour to find an English wife through mutual friends, or, if he can afford it, a visit to this country.

SAME QUESTIONS ASKED.

"F. K. B."—You will see that I answered a very similar question to your own last week, and the advice then given may absolutely apply in your own case. I hope that other correspondents who do not see answers to their own inquiries in this column will take it that the same ground has been covered in an answer to some other inquirer. The reason is, of course, that among my hundreds of clients, very many of them ask me practically the same questions.

A TYPINE'S DIFFICULTY.

"In Despair" is a typine, and for some time received the attentions of her employer. After a while she learnt that he was married, but was already herself in love with him, and continues to be in spite of this knowledge. She does not believe he is very happy with his wife. The situation is a very good one, and she cannot afford to lose it.

KEEP STRICTLY TO BUSINESS RELATIONS.

"In Despair" is in a very difficult position. Let her keep her situation as long as possible, but let her relations with her employer never go beyond those of strict business. It will require a great deal of tact and strength of will, but only in this way will it be possible to save herself from ultimate trouble.

LEAVE YOUR SITUATION IF POSSIBLE.

At the same time, if she knows of another place, or could get one easily, it would be very advisable to take it. By admitting that she is in love with this married man, and that he is paying attentions to her, she enters upon very dangerous ground. It would be better to at once place herself out of the way of temptation, which may sooner or later befall, and perhaps ruin both of them.

THE WIFE'S SCHOOL FRIEND.

"H. G." has a wife who, nine months out of twelve, is all that he could desire. But at intervals she is visited by an old school friend, whom "H. G." does not at all like. When this young lady is there, all matrimonial bliss disappears, and "H. G." and his wife are continually quarrelling. If he stops the friend's visits his wife will make it an eternal grievance. How is "H. G." to arrange the matter?

HUSBAND'S FRIENDS ARE USEFUL.

Has not "H. G." himself got an old school friend he can run to earth and invite to his house? If he has, and can manage the necessary entertainment, the best thing he could do would be to invite him to stay whenever his wife's friend appears. An Englishman's house is his castle, and if "H. G.'s" wife requires a friend to visit her, surely her husband can claim the same privilege. Ask him next time, "H. G.," and if your wife gets unmanageable, try what spending a few nights at the theatre or elsewhere with him will do to bring her to a proper frame of mind. Husband's friends may be made enormously useful assets in "taming shrews" if properly employed.

GRETA AND THE GARDEN PARTY.

"Greta" was out at a garden party the other day, and spent rather a long time with a certain young man who, she tells me, interested her. Later on, it appeared that her mother had been watching her, and she was subjected to a severe scolding, because it was "very improper for a girl to be seen so long in the company of a young man." Do I think "Greta" was really doing wrong, and if not, how can I advise her to defend herself against such troubles with her parent?

CONVENTIONALITY IS NECESSARY.

I sympathise very much with "Greta." It is not at all unnatural that if a young man's conversation proved interesting she should wish to prolong it as long as possible. At the same time "Greta," with the rest of our sex, is compelled to bow to little conventionalities. Nothing has given me more annoyance often than to have had to suddenly break off an interesting conversation because by doing so I was acting in a selfish way. "Greta" was invited to a party, and as she was the guest of another, obviously it was her duty to make herself as generally amiable to everybody as it is possible to be.

WHAT I SHOULD HAVE DONE.

I should, had I been "Greta," have contrived to enjoy instead of one prolonged and noticeable conversation, several little ones. After, say, five minutes' chat with the young man, she could leave him for awhile on the understanding that they would see each other later on, and that she could have made as soon as possible, repeating the meetings at intervals. There is a gentle art of mild flirtation which has a very difficult technique, and is not easily acquired. But let "Greta" always remember that whatever her own inclinations may be, when she is another's guest, politeness must always be the first consideration.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

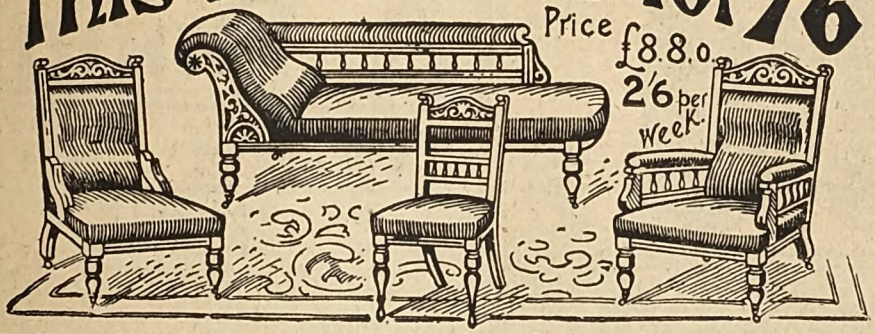
Digitized by Google

THE "MAXEYMUM" IDEA.

"The Highest Quality at the Lowest Cost."

WRITE FOR CATALOGUE OF FURNITURE AND OTHER GOODS FOR WEEKLY OR MONTHLY PAYMENTS.

This Suite Sent for 7/6



Price £8.8.0. 2/6 per week.

EASY TERMS.

—:o:—

Send us 7/6 deposit, we then forward the Suite at once, carriage paid to any railway station in the United Kingdom. The price is only £8 : 8 : 0, and you pay 2/6 weekly, or 5/- fortnightly, until paid for.

SPECIFICATION.—It is a very strong and substantially made Leather Cloth Suite of 7 pieces, in walnut or mahogany colour, consisting of Couch, Gent's and Lady's Easies and 4 Small Chairs, every one of which is spring seated.

GUARANTEE.—We absolutely guarantee every article, and being our own manufacture, we endeavour to give best possible value throughout during the construction.

SPECIAL CASH DISCOUNT.—The price for cash with order is but £7, and we undertake to give complete satisfaction. If, however, you would prefer one month's credit to be able to test the Suite, we will take £7 : 7 : 0, payable 25/- down, and the balance at the end of the month.

MAXEY & CO., MEADOW ST., SHEFFIELD.

AGENTS WANTED.

"TATCHO"

Gets the Hair Back.
Puts the Hair Right.
Keeps the Hair Right.

WHO SAY SO.

COMMANDER T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.

"Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902.
"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair."

MAJOR-GENERAL KEATE.

"High Croft, Winchester
"I find the Renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time."

LADY SYKES writes:

"Mayfair, W.
"I can honestly recommend 'Tatcho.' It has really entirely renovated my hair."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFORUS PALŒLOGUE writes:

"Belvedere Hotel, Kensington, W.
"I would not be without it on any account."

MRS. BROWN POTTER.

"I use only 'Tatcho.'"

A 4/6 FULL SIZE BOTTLE of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' "Tatcho" is supplied to enable you to test its value at the NOMINAL PRICE of 1/10 at all Chemists', Stores, and Hairdressers', or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, 81 Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn, London.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the world, in bottles at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/-.

Digitized by Google

FREE TRIAL 2/6

MASTERS' "TOURIST"

Description.

New Sun Eyepieces.

Ormolu Gilt Telescopic Slides.

Ebonised Adjusting Screw.

Crocodile Leather Covered Bag.

Nickle and Gilt Lens Mounts.

16/- ONLY

A PAIR OF FIELD GLASSES which can be focussed to suit anybody's sight (old or young) for 14/6 cash, or 16/- on monthly payments. See below.

Creigfrim, Obarth, Llangollen, N.W.

Dear Sir,—I received the Glasses safe this evening; they are beyond my expectations. I am well satisfied with them. I enclose P.O. to pay for same out and out. Thanking you for your prompt attention, I conclude, yours, &c.,

M. EDWARDS.

Will send Post Paid to any reader of Short Stories, on receipt of 2/6, one pair of these handsome Field Glasses, price, complete with True Compass, Pocket Knife, Reading Glass, Cedar Pencil, Pocket Book, Mirror, all fitted in Crocodile Leather Case, with sling to match, 14/6 cash; 16/- on monthly payments. FIRST send 2/6, and Outfit will be sent you on approval.

IF you approve of them, you send us 1/6 on receipt, and 3/- each month for four months—equal 16/-.

BUT when you have seen the Outfit, should you prefer to send the balance at once, send only 12/- more, as we allow 1/6 discount to those who Pay Cash.

IF you do not approve of them, we will return your deposit in full.

OR you may send 14/6 at once, and if you do not approve of the Outfit we will refund the money in full if Outfit is returned in 7 days.

CATALOGUE of Watches, Glasses, &c., POST FREE.

AGENTS WANTED, write for Terms, &c., to

MASTERS LTD., 157 HIGH STREET, RYE, SUSSEX.

MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

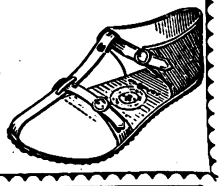
A very Large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

A Boon

FOR SEASIDE AND COUNTRY WEAR.

"AMPHIBIAN" SANDALS.



THE only Rubber Sandals. Children can wear them while paddling. The only healthy footgear. Develop and Preserve the natural beauty of the foot.

ALL CHILDREN SHOULD WEAR THEM

"MENE" SANITARY TOWEL FOR LADIES.

Ladies say these Towels are superior to all other makes for cleanliness, comfort, and economy. May be obtained from all Underclothing Houses and Chemists, or 2 doz. No. 1, 1/-; 1 doz. No. 2, 1/-; 1 doz. No. 3, 1/6; post free. A Free Sample of No. 1 sent post free to any lady mentioning this paper.

MISS HAYNES, 55 Fann St., London, E.C.

THE PRINCE OF WALES' says:

"WAKE UP, ENGLAND."

Don't purchase foreign polishes.

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH.

By purchasing this Polish you are supporting British Trade. Polish, Tins, and Boxes are all made at our own works in Liverpool. Should you have any difficulty in obtaining supplies, two 6½d. Tins will be sent post free (with address of nearest dealer) on receipt of 1s.

MANUFACTURERS:

THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH Co. LTD., LIVERPOOL.

"KKOVAH"

FLAVORED ONLY WITH RIPE FRUIT JUICES.

BUTCLIFFE & BINGHAM Ltd No. 'KKOVAH' WORKS MANCHESTER

JELLIES

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 713.) Week ending August 30th, 1902. (Price One Penny.

"Oh, forgive me!" she cried, "I was mad!"

Digitized by Google

A KODAK for 5/-

The No. 1 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2½ by 2½ inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 BROWNIE is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK

The No. 2 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3½ by 2½ inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Everset time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of

KODAK LTD., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, W.C.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES'

Shakespeare

THE "ELEGANT" PARCEL,

Lady's Complete Outfit.

36/-

Elegant Design.

Style and Fit.

CONTAINS:
Pretty Black Sateen Cloth Sailor Blouse, with detachable front, Black Costume Skirt with deep fashionable flounce and 9 rows of cording, Pair Model Corsets, Underskirt with check or stripe in different colours, Pair Black Cashmere Hose, Cream Lace Scarf, and Black Velvet Belt with Fancy Clasp.

TERMS.

Send only 6s. with order, and if the parcel meets with entire approval, complete the purchase in five more monthly payments of 6s. each. If you are not perfectly satisfied, return the goods and your deposit will be promptly refunded in full.

IMPORTANT.

When ordering please state Length of Dress Skirt in front from below waist band, also size of corsets worn, or waist measurement over dress.

Please send a Post Card for our No. 5 Catalogue of Drapery, Costumes, Men's and Youths's Clothing, Boots and Shoes, etc., etc., sent to your address Post Free.

Good Agents Wanted in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

PEARSON'S WEEKLY.

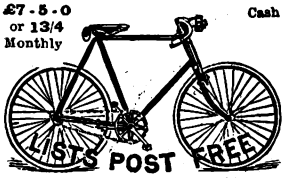
1d.

WEEKLY.

JUNO CYCLES

ARE THE VERY BEST FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN.
Free Wheels. Carriage paid to all parts.

£7-5-0 or 13/4 Monthly



Cash or 12 monthly payments.

£7 5s.	13/4
£7 15s.	14/3
£8 8s.	15/9
£9 5s.	16/8
£9 15s.	17/6
£11 0s.	20/0
£11 11s	21/0
£15 0s.	28/0

Corsair Plated Lamp, 2/9; A1 Rim Brake, 6/6; Scorcher Brake, 1/-. Cyclist Poncho, 2/9. Write at once for New Season's List of over 100 pages and over 500 illustrations of JUNO CYCLES and latest cycling accessories at lower prices than any other house. Sent Post Free. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd., S.Y. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate St. Without, London, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence,

Mrs. C. H.
(Room 8),
195 OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors
66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 67 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1¼ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street London, W.C.

Short Stories

No. 713. ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending August 30th, 1902.

HER RIVAL.

The Powerful Story of a Broken Masterpiece.

CLARE HARDING looked out across the square at the wind-tossed trees and the leaden sky, and the rain that had been pouring down in torrents all day long.

It was a dreary, desolate prospect, but the girl's mood was in harmony with the weather. She knew it and took a morbid pleasure in the comparison.

Yet, truth to tell, Clare had no business with dismal thoughts. If she had only known it they were of her own making. But she did not know this, and her misery was very real to her.

To Clare's friends it seemed that she possessed everything the heart of woman could desire—health, youth, beauty, and the love of "the best fellow in the world."

Well, that was their point of view; Clare's was different, and so it happened that when, according to the judgment of her friends, she should have been happiest, she was often most miserable.

There is tragedy as well as farce in such a situation, and a hair's breadth divides the one from the other.

Clare was no less in love with Dick Stanton than he with her. Yet there were occasions when her love meant only unspeakable wretchedness to her.

Dick was poor, but it was not his poverty that troubled Clare. She believed in the young sculptor's genius, in his ability to climb the ladder that led to fame and fortune. She knew that sooner or later the day was bound to come when Dick would be rich, respected, his name a power in the world of Art.

Already he had taken the first firm step upon that ladder, and soon he would be able to offer her the modest home that would content them.

There was no false prudery in Clare. She loved Dick, and she made no secret of her desire to become his wife.

The strange thing was that, though the girl realised that it was by means of Dick's genius that her dearest wish would be fulfilled, she looked upon that very genius as her greatest enemy.

From the very first, almost ever since she had known Dick, a fierce unreasoning jealousy of the sculptor's art and his enthusiasm for his art, had tormented her.

Many a time in the days before he had confessed his love for her, she had watched him when he spoke of his beloved work. With a strange pain at her heart she had seen the light leap to his eyes, and the colour to his cheeks, and even in those days she vaguely hated the curious, intangible power that could move him thus.

And now—now that she had a claim upon him—she had learnt to look upon Dick's art as upon some dangerous rival to herself that was for ever threatening to come between her and his love.

For a time he had succeeded in lifting her very near to heaven by the ardour of his wooing. He had thrilled her with his eager, passionate words.

"I love you with all my soul, with every beat of my heart," he had said. "There is no thought of mine that does not belong to you."

She had listened in an ecstasy of happiness, and for a time she was content.

Then, one day, she realised that the great love he professed for her was not the all-absorbing passion of his life of which she had dreamt.

She saw that his art still occupied a cherished place in his affections, and the slumbering demon of jealousy once more awakened in her bosom.

She tried to stifle the pitiful, contemptible thing, but it was too strong for her. The fear of it haunted her day and night.

And all the while Dick was absolutely unconscious of its presence. He made no secret before Clare of his devotion to his work. He gloried in it, and manlike he took it for granted that his sweetheart shared his enthusiasm.

And she, ashamed of her weakness, did not dare to undeceive him.

Once or twice she ventured to remonstrate with him, playfully, for some trifling neglect of her, but he little guessed the real bitterness of spirit that was hidden beneath the jesting words.

"You're late, Dick," she would say to him lightly, "I've been waiting for you a whole hour. Think of that!"

"My darling, I'm all regrets, but that Cupid of mine was a ticklish business, and had to be finished!" Or—"Psyche wouldn't let me get away," he would tell her gaily. "I had a model who won't be able to sit for me again, and so I was obliged to make the most of her, you see."

Then he would begin to talk to her fondly of his work' of his hopes and fears, of the difficulties he had succeeded in overcoming, and of those that were yet to be conquered.

There were moments when his ardour kindled hers when.

Digitized by Google

she was carried away in spite of herself by the sheer force of his enthusiasm.

At such times she would listen eagerly, with shining eyes, to his eloquent description of some beautiful work of art, to his dreams of some bold, half-formed conception of his own brain that was to make his name immortal.

Then suddenly the hateful thought would come to her that in all this she had no actual part, that she was listening to the story of another love, a love that had supplanted hers, and then she would set her lips and clench her hands in a kind of hopeless rage because it was not she who had brought that look of adoration to his face.

Except when some business that was unavoidable called him away, Dick never allowed a day to pass without seeing his sweetheart. But his visits were often but a few moments' respite from work, when he would come to her only to snatch a kiss and a few hasty words of endearment.

Sometimes it was a pressing commission, or a capricious model that claimed his time; at others it was some sudden inspiration that had to be embodied, lest it should escape again.

"I'm sorry, dearest," Dick would say, regretfully enough, "but you understand, don't you, little girl? It's my duty, and it's got to be done."

His duty! How she hated the word!

But she only smiled back at him, nodding her fair head, and telling him she understood.

On rare occasions he would explain to her tenderly that, in the midst of all his work, he thought of her, and of the happy time to come when he could ask her to redeem her promise.

"It's only by my work, sweetheart, that I can hope to win you," he told her. "It's my work that is bringing you nearer and nearer to me. No wonder that I love it!"

The girl said nothing, but in her heart she thought—"It is a pretty pretence, but he can't deceive me. I know that he loves his work, not for my sake, but for its own. He loved it long before he ever knew me. If I were to die he would find his consolation in it. It is a joy to him, apart from me."

Dick's studio was but a stone's throw from the square in which she lived, but Clare seldom entered it.

Now and then she paid a brief visit to the place to inspect some piece of sculpture that he wished to show her, but she never came to him there while he was at his work.

At first he had reproached her with the fact.

"Why do you despise my poor workshop?" he demanded. "Think of the beautiful hours we could spend together! With your presence to inspire me, I could work twice as well."

"I'm not so sure of that!" she retorted. "I'm afraid my presence would only disturb you. And if it didn't," she added, with a little laugh that hid the tremor in her voice, "if it didn't, I shouldn't like it! You see, it would be so humiliating to be ignored in favour of clay and marble chips."

He smiled at this way of putting the situation, and he little guessed that the girl's words, so flippantly spoken, might be taken seriously as expressing her whole attitude towards himself and his art.

One day Dick came to Clare with a radiant face.

"My darling! Here is good news for you!" he cried joyfully. "More work has come to me—important work. A rich American has bought my Amaryllis, and he wants a companion to it. He came to the studio just now. Only think—he says he's going to discover me! If I satisfy him, my fortune's made! That's his way of putting it, not mine. Dearest, think of it! Our time is coming!"

He drew the girl towards him, and clasped her to his breast, and for one brief moment she was happy. His first thought had been for her!

"Tell me," she asked presently, "what is to be your subject?"

"Phyllis and Corydon," he returned, with a little grimace. "Hackneyed, isn't it? But I can't help myself. Mr. Van Martin chose it. He's left the treatment to me, though. That's a great deal to be thankful for. I must think of something new, and then hunt for suitable models. I have my eye on Corydon, but the lady puzzles me. None of my present models would do at all. Now, for instance——"

He talked on excitedly, half to Clare, half to himself, and soon he appeared to forget the girl's presence altogether. Drawing out his note-book he threw himself into the nearest chair and began to cover sheet upon sheet with rough pencil sketches, as idea after idea chased each other through his restless brain.

Clare watched him in angry, rebellious silence. The tears of humiliation and disappointment rose to her eyes, but she choked them back with a desperate effort of her will.

Presently, when the light within the room grew faint, she rose quietly, lighted the gas, and began to pull down the blinds.

Dick looked up from his work as a man who had been suddenly roused from a dream.

"My dearest, forgive me!" he exclaimed penitently. "What an ill-mannered brute I am! I'm afraid I quite forgot where I was!"

"Don't apologise, Dick," said Clare, in her quiet voice. "It's an absorbing business, I know."

When he had left her, she burst into a storm of jealous, passionate tears.

Some days later he announced, with an air of triumph, that he had discovered a model for Phyllis.

"She's an absolute treasure!" he told Clare enthusiastically; "as near physical perfection as anything I've ever seen. I was afraid I should have to do the usual patchwork business—taking an arm here, and a nose there, and a chin from somewhere else, you know. But with this girl it's all plain sailing. She's a beautiful creature in every way. I shall want no other model at all. The curious part is, she's not a professional, and yet she's as easy to work with as any woman I've ever had. Her limbs seem to fall quite instinctively into the right poses."

From that moment Phyllis and Cordyon were never out of Dick's thoughts or Clare's.

The young sculptor took an unaffected pride in his own creation. He was in excellent spirits.

"We're progressing more quickly than I had hoped," he told Clare one night. "Another day or two of good steady work, and my clay model will be finished. Alice gives me her last sitting to-morrow."

Alice; that was the name of his beautiful model. Her Christian name. He always called her by that. Clare supposed it was customary among artists, and yet—even so insignificant thing as this could trouble her when she was in a morbid mood.

She felt unreasonably angry with this girl—this Alice—who was the most perfect creature Dick had ever seen.

He had never called her perfect. But then, it would have been untrue, and Dick was never that.

He had often told her she was charming, or pretty, but he had never rhapsodised over her as he had rhapsodised over the discovery of Alice.

Of course, Alice was only a model. At least, was she only a model? No; Dick had mentioned something to the contrary. She could not remember exactly what it was. He had never told her anything definite, she thought. She, Clare, did not even know how he had made Alice's acquaintance. Since that first rapturous tribute to Alice's perfections, he had been a trifle reticent, she fancied. But she had asked no curious questions, lest he should think—what Clare would not have had him think for worlds.

Digitized by Google

Jealous of an artist's model! The thing was preposterous. She could never stoop so low as that. But why, why need he have cast this creature's beauty in her teeth?

* * * * *

Clare turned away from the window with a strange expression in her grey eyes.

"Dick is late—later than usual to-day!" she murmured.

Then she remembered that this was Alice's last day. "That is what is keeping him," she thought. "He will want to make the most of his last opportunity. I wonder—I wonder——"

She stopped suddenly.

"Shall I?" she whispered to herself; and the next moment she had hurried from the room.

Ten minutes later she was standing outside the door of Dick Stanton's studio.

For an instant she paused, in breathless hesitation, with her hand on the latch.

Ought she to have come? Would it not be better to go back and wait for Dick at home? She had once made up her mind never to disturb him at his work. But that was just what she was going to do now.

Why had she come? Really, she was not quite certain. Was it to see Alice—the perfectly beautiful Alice, whom Dick——

Clare hesitated no longer. She threw off her dripping cloak in the narrow vestibule and knocked at the studio door.

"Come in!" cried an impatient voice. It was Dick's; evidently he was by no means well pleased at being thus disturbed.

Clare obeyed the somewhat ungracious invitation.

Dick was standing with his back to her at the far end of the long room, in front of the revolving table upon which "Phyllis and Corydon" had sprung into being.

He did not turn his head at her entrance.

"What is it? What do you want?" the girl heard him say, in a curiously absent voice.

Somehow, it never occurred to her that the questions could be meant for her, and she made no reply, but stood and waited until he should turn his head and see her.

But Dick seemed already to have forgotten the interruption. Unconscious of his visitor, he continued his absorbing inspection of "Phyllis and Corydon," giving a touch of his sensitive fingers here and there, until, satisfied at length, he took a long step back, and then, with a sigh of contentment, threw himself into a chair, the better to contemplate his handiwork.

"Dick!" said Clare softly; but the sculptor did not hear her.

"Dick!" she repeated, and still there was no reply.

She took a step towards him, moving so that she could see his face. At the sight of it all the colour left her cheeks.

She hardly recognised the Dick of her everyday experience.

His face was changed, transfigured by an expression of such absolute rapture as Clare had never seen on any man's face before.

Instinctively her eyes followed the direction of his own.

"Phyllis and Corydon." Two images modelled in cold, dull clay. Clare's blinded eyes saw that, and nothing more. They did not see the exquisite grace and beauty of the work, the poetic delicacy of its conception, the masterly skill of execution.

They only saw—Clare's rival. The apotheosis of all she feared and hated, the thing upon which Dick lavished that measure of his love which he denied to her.

A wild, senseless fury took possession of her.

She flashed one glance at Dick. That was enough. It was "Phyllis and Corydon" who held him enthralled; it was "Phyllis and Corydon"——

A mallet lay among the débris of implements, blocks of marble and plaster casts that littered the floor of the studio.

It came within Clare's line of vision.

Then, for one mad moment, the girl lost her self-control.

She seized the mallet, and, with a little inarticulate cry of rage, leapt forward.

There was a dull, soft thud, and the next instant a broken mass of clay lay scattered upon the ground.

The mutilated stumps of "Phyllis and Corydon" stood, calm and impassive, upon their pedestal.

* * * * *

"Why did you do this?" he demanded in a lifeless voice.

"Forgive me!" she cried. "I was mad! I didn't know what I was doing. Oh, forgive me!"

"I don't understand," he said, and shrank from her touch.

She fell on her knees at his feet and covered her face with her hands.

"I was mad—mad!" she sobbed. "And I hated it so!"

"I don't understand," he said again.

"I hated it because—because it had robbed me of you!" cried the girl. "I was mad with jealousy, and—and, Dick, I love you so!"

"And that is how you showed your love," he returned, and the simple words stabbed her like a knife.

"For God's sake, Dick, don't speak to me like that! Don't look at me like that!" she moaned.

"Get up, Clare," he said, not roughly, but in the cold, passionless voice that sent a chill to her heart.

She obeyed him, trembling with remorse and fear, and sank into the chair he placed for her.

"Tell me again what you said just now," he commanded. "I am dull of comprehension to-night, or else——"

He passed his hands across his eyes.

"I think I have never really known you, Clare," he said. "So you came here to-night for the purpose of destroying——"

"Oh, no, no! Not that!" she cried. "Not that! It was no deliberate act of mine. Dick, Dick, you can't believe that of me!"

"Why did you come?" he asked.

"I came because—because—oh, shall I ever make you understand? I was miserable, Dick, and sick for the sight of you. I have been jealous always, though you never guessed it—jealous of your art, your work. Then—that woman—Alice; you said she was beautiful, and I—oh, I didn't understand myself. I think I came to—see her—to see—oh, Dick, you will despise me!"

Eagerly, hurriedly, her voice broken with sobs, Clare stammered out her pitiful confession.

He listened patiently, and, in a measure, he understood, because he loved her.

"Clare," he said slowly, "Alice, at least, can be no rival of yours."

Even as he spoke they could hear the shuffle of clumsy footsteps outside in the vestibule, and a woman's voice raised in shrill declamation.

"I tell yer 'e won't mind, silly owl! Knock an' then trot in; that's the way with 'im!"

"Steady on! Don't you be in such a bloomin' 'urry, my dear!" a male voice protested in a lower key.

Dick hurried to the door, but before he could reach it, the owners of the voices appeared within the room.

"Alice!" exclaimed Dick, "what are you doing here? Haven't I told you——"

"All right, guv'nor," interrupted the male visitor apologetically. He was a short, thick-set young man, with a stupid, good-humoured face. "We're off in a minute. She would bring me."

Digitized by Google

"'E wanted carryin' in, 'e did," remarked Alice, contemptuously.

Clare looked at the speaker in a kind of dazed wonder.

Was this really Alice, this young woman in the dirty blouse and patent-leather boots, whose language and demeanour savoured of gin shops and the Borough Road? Even to Clare's unpractised eyes, it was clear that the girl had been drinking. Her face was flushed, her utterance thick, and as she stood, she swayed slightly from side to side.

"And yet Dick is right," was the swift thought that followed the first shock imparted by Alice's condition. "In different clothes, and under different circumstances, she would be a lovely creature."

"I can't have you here like this," said Dick shortly. "Take her away at once," he added, turning to Alice's apologetic companion.

"You 'ear that, old lady?" demanded the latter; whereupon Alice remarked that she heard, right enough, and volunteered to push the young man's face in for him if she had any more of his sauce.

In the altercation that followed, it transpired incidentally that Alice had brought "her bloke" to the studio in order that he might inspect her counterpart, glorified by the costume of an Arcadian shepherdess.

When Alice's unsteady eye caught sight of the ruins of her glory, she burst into helpless, foolish tears, and was with some difficulty led from the scene by her faithful admirer. And so Dick and Clare were left alone together once more, with the shattered remains of "Phyllis and Corydon" between them.

For a while neither spoke. For her part terrible remorse and anxiety mastered every other thought. But for him the veil had been drawn, and as never before he understood the power, the intensity, and the madness of a strong woman's love.

* * * * *

"Phyllis and Corydon" were never remodelled, but the next year the artistic world was thrilled by an exquisite masterpiece which had been executed by a hitherto unknown artist; a masterpiece which brought more fame than ever "Phyllis and Corydon" could possibly have done, because inspired by both love and genius. Its title was "Love's Remorse."

Grete Hahn.

FOR ONE MAN'S SAKE.

A Story of Love Triumphant.

"Harold! Harold!—you love me, don't you?"

"Love you, Ella!—what a question to ask."

"Well, they say, you know, that perfect love begets perfect confidence. Now, it is because I feel that you are keeping back from me, something which closely concerns both of us, that I ask you the question."

"My dear Ella!—all that you say is very right and true—within limits, but it does not, I think, necessarily follow that because a man withholds anxiety and trouble from the girl he loves, he is, as towards her, wanting in perfect confidence; in the truest and best sense, that is."

"Then it is some trouble!" she said quickly.

"I did not say so."

"Ah!—but I know it, Harold. My heart tells me that you are engaged in some desperate undertaking, of which you well know I should not approve."

"Ella!—I assure you that you are needlessly worrying yourself. By this time, surely, you must be aware, that in my business the risks are more than equal to the advantages."

"Yes!—Yes!—but why won't you let me know of and sympathise with your risks, as well as, by and by, share your advantages?"

"Can't you see, dear, that it is kinder to keep you in ignorance of the risks?"

"Not, Harold, if they are avoidable, and will not bear discussion."

"Well, dear, I will go so far as to say that this matter which seems to be troubling your little heart so much, is connected with the note robbery at the Occidental Bank—more I cannot tell you."

There was something in Harold Baxter's manner, something which told of conscious concealment, and which belied the apparent frankness of his partial statement.

It angered the woman who would have laid down her life for him; who had no thought, no hope, no desire, that was not bound up in his life and welfare.

"It is not fair to me!" she cried. "It is cruel to trust me as you would your pet dog!—a piece of sugar now and then, and for the rest—nothing!—I tell you that it is unjust!"

"But Ella!—you misunderstand me!—you——"

"No, I do not, Harold. I understand you only too well, and I warn you, that in spite of your refusal to enlighten me with regard to what I know you intend doing, I will find it out, even though it be to my own sorrow."

Ella Rayne was no ordinary girl; being high-minded, and whole-hearted far beyond the average woman of to-day. From her earliest years she had known the pinch of poverty, and but little of the brightness of life. It was only since she had supported herself, and had met with her fate, in the person of Harold Baxter, the smartest young detective of the Criminal Investigation Department, that her way had become more sunny and pleasant, and that the future broadened out with the glory of inexpressible happiness.

A fairer girl, too, it would have been hard to find. Tall, shapely, and with big dark eyes, that, in the liquid, dumb devotion of them, told of a nature as nearly perfect as it was possible for anything human to be, she gave one the impression of absolute trust and truth.

Harold Baxter had in him all that goes to make a fine man, save one thing—a will of his own.

This was extraordinary, considering his profession, for a detective's duties demand as much as skill, strength of will and purpose. But so it was, Harold Baxter's will was as weak as water. He could not easily say no. Obstinate, as we have seen, he could be on occasion, and it was this trait in his disposition, which, in this present instance, was to bring him perilously near to total life-shipwreck and ruin.

Digitized by Google

For more than a week, the public mind had been full of the latest criminal sensation, viz.—the theft, by some person or persons unknown, of notes to the value of £60,000, from the Occidental Bank, Lombard Street. The thing had been barefaced, having been effected in the middle of the business day, during the luncheon hour.

Clue to the perpetrator, or perpetrators, there was absolutely none, but it was generally held, when the case was put into the hands of Detective Inspector Baxter, that the chances of clearing up the mystery were increased a hundredfold.

As yet he had nothing of importance to report to headquarters. Then a strange thing happened.

This absurd coincidence is what the thief in the bank note robbery of Parr's Bank actually did.

Going home after her interview with her sweetheart, Ella found that since the morning a new inmate had arrived at the boarding establishment of which she was a member.

When she saw him at table, he proved to be a pretentious young fellow of the cuff-and-collar type, and uninteresting to a degree. He went out in the morning about nine, and returned regularly at six, but what his occupation was, nobody had the slightest idea or conception.

To Ella's great annoyance, the newcomer, almost from the first, persisted in favouring her with his particular attentions. Did she run out in the evening for a shopping expedition, or a breath of fresh air, close in her wake sailed Mr. Francis Iles (the name he had given to the proprietress of the establishment), who, with self-assumed impertinence, pestered her with his unwelcome and vulgar chatter.

On the fourth day after his arrival at the house in Brent Street, she had been compelled to make a stand, and to tell him plainly that she did not in any way desire his acquaintance.

It was in the neighbourhood of Oxford Street that the incident occurred.

"No?" he replied, with an abominable leer and wink. "That's bad—for you; for if you only but knew, I could cover you from head to foot with bank-notes, and still have a big lot over."

The word "bank-notes" sent a curious thrill through the girl. She knew of course of her lover's charge of the Occidental Bank case, and, though the connection seemed remote, and even improbable, she felt that, in some way, as yet unexplained, the man at her side was intimately concerned with the crime, and would be eventually unmasked.

Thinking thus, she suddenly resolved to keep friendly with the braggart, with the dim notion that it would be for the ultimate benefit of the man she loved.

"Mr. Iles," she said, "perhaps I was over hasty, and unreasonable just now; I did not mean to be rude to you, and if I said anything which in any way hurt your feelings, I must ask you to forgive me!"

"There!—I knew you didn't mean it when you said it. Of course I'll forgive you. Why shouldn't I? You're such a nice girl, you know, that a fellow would take a lot from you, and think nothing of it."

It was as much as she could do to keep calm, and to persevere in her policy of deception, the man's coarse familiarity was so utterly distasteful and repugnant to her. She braced herself, however, to suffer his company back to Brent Street, and to listen by the way to talk which did not interest her in the least.

Harold was to meet her the following evening, so that she was both surprised and disappointed at finding on her return a note from him, to the effect that business of the most urgent nature would prevent him from keeping the appointment.

Possibly, she might not have attached so much importance to the circumstance, but for the fact of a strange coincidence.

Mr. Francis Iles also received a letter at the same time as did Ella. That in itself was of no great significance, but when, at breakfast the next morning, the new boarder notified the mistress of the house that he should not be home until the small hours, and perhaps not until the next day, Ella's woman's wit saw a gleam of light through the darkness; felt instinctively that she was on the eve of a great discovery, and, with regard to her lover, a great deliverance.

Still, therefore, keeping up a semblance of smiling ignorance, she resolved to follow her new admirer from the moment he left the house in the evening on his mysterious business.

* * * *

On the northern heights of London, between the top of Haverstock Hill and Cricklewood, there is a mean street, left of the main road, and known as Neville Street.

The houses in it are of the broken-down, seen-better-days order, not by any means small, but, on the contrary, of fair size.

It was towards one of these houses that, about half-past eleven on the night after that upon which Ella had received George Baxter's letter, a man, wearing a long, dark inverness cape, and a broad, soft felt hat, made his way, with a caution that showed he feared recognition.

Within the shadow of a builder's gateway crouched a woman, whose ever low-voiced cry was, "Will he come?—Pray Heaven he does not come!"

As she saw the cape-wrapped figure advancing up the street, her heart almost ceased beating, and, as it passed her, she glided out, and noiselessly followed in its make.

It was only when the man had actually mounted the steps of the house he sought, that Ella Rayne awoke to the vital necessity for arresting his further progress.

To her lips sprang the cry that had been choked down in her heart all through the time of weary watch and waiting.

She had not time to stop him.

"Harold! Harold!" she cried. "Harold! stay, for your own sake, and for mine!"

But the net was spread for the bird; the door was on the jar; and even as his love's despairing appeal broke on the still night air, Harold Baxter passed rapidly in, without so much as hearing the voice of her who would have saved him, and—the door was shut.

For the moment she was the woman only, as she leant, broken in spirit, and weakened of limb and brain, against the railings of number nineteen Neville Street, and she sobbed as though her heart would break.

Then, the power in her nature re-asserted itself, and she began to ask herself, how she should gain entrance into this mysterious conference-house.

She could not gain admittance by the front door, so sought some other and surer way of getting in.

It suddenly occurred to her that perhaps, at the bottom of the builder's yard, there might be access to the end garden walls of the houses on that side of the street.

She had already noticed that one of the yard gates had negligently been left unfastened, so that she was free to pass through to the rear of the place.

Once possessed with the idea, she did not hesitate, but gently pushing open the gate, and as gently closing it behind her, she sped lightly up between the stacks of wood, and other building material, to find that the yard at the bottom turned to the left, running along the end garden walls, right up to the houses in the main road.

It was the selection of the right garden that at first puzzled her; things looked so different from the back, than they did from the street, that she realised the danger of scaling the wrong wall. For this was her aim and intention; though what she would do in the moment of emergency, in the face of some peril, terrible, because unknown, she knew not, and did not stop to think.

At last she decided that the seventh garden from the gate.

Digitized by Google

way was the one she was in search of. There was not much difficulty in getting to the top of the wall, a small, light ladder lying near at hand affording the means.

It was then she saw a light in the first-floor back; but the blind was down, so that if she made no noise, there was little fear of her being prematurely discovered.

Silently, but with evident effort, Ella drew up the ladder, and lowered it down the inner side of the wall. Descending she found herself in a tangle of neglected vegetation.

There being no moon, she had to feel her way towards the house, her only visible guide being the illuminated window of the first-floor back.

Across the blind she now saw, more than once, human shadows pass and repass. This but stimulated her to renewed exertions, though as yet she had not formed any definite plan for entering the house.

Presently, she came to a door—it was locked. Then she tried the window of the back kitchen, which to her joy she found unfastened.

Now everything seemed clear and straight before her. Softly slipping up the lower sash, she crept through into the room. A few red embers in the grate gave just sufficient light for her to steer her way to the door without displacing the furniture, and so making a noise.

Out in the passage, and at the foot of the stairs, she made out a faint light at the top of the latter, proving conclusively that the conspirators, if conspirators they were, had, for some reason, the door of the back room open.

What should she do? Had those above heard her movements? But her course was settled for her, and on the instant.

A heavy step moved across the upstairs room, and came out into the passage.

"Who's there?" called a harsh, deep voice.

Hearing no word in reply, the speaker called again, louder, and with greater peremptoriness, and insistence, "Who's there? If you don't answer, I'll come down and shoot you like a dog!"

Trembling in every limb, Ella cowered by the side of the kitchen stairs, her stock of nerve and sustaining power well-nigh exhausted.

Down the stairs came the heavy tread. Had the man turned to the right on reaching the bottom, he must have, of a certainty, discovered the intruder. What he did was to move in the direction of the front area door.

This was Ella's opportunity. Without sound or cry, she darted up the stairs and into the room above, to come face to face with Detective George Baxter, and—Mr. Francis Iles.

On the table was a heap of notes and gold, the ultimate destination of which was only too clear to the horrified girl.

"Ella!"

"Harold! don't hesitate!—I know what you were about to do! But I have been strengthened to save you."

"But Ella! how——?"

"Quick!—I charge you, do your duty—quick!—seize that man and handcuff him! You will then have only one to deal with. Quick!—here he comes!"

The craven Iles was soon under steel, Ella's presence seeming to have an instantaneous effect for good upon her weak-minded, tempted lover.

As the greatest danger of all neared him, he felt himself possessed of a lion's strength.

"Get into that corner, Ella!" he said, with the words flinging there the manacled bank clerk.

It was not a second too soon. The man who now appeared in the doorway, was of gigantic build, and though grizzled, was evidently possessed of enormous muscular powers.

Then began a struggle, which to this day is famous in the annals of the "Yard."

"Jim Riley!" said the detective, watching warily, meanwhile, every movement of his adversary, "drop that revolver and surrender yourself as my prisoner."

With literally a howl of rage and disappointment, the big "crook" rushed at George, trying to bear him down by sheer weight.

But quickness of eye and adroitness count for something in such cases, and the detective succeeded in evading the onslaught.

Then, shaking himself free of his opponent, Riley raised his revolver and fired point blank at him.

That had surely been Harold Baxter's last moment on earth, but for a hand, the hand of a woman, that knocked up the weapon, causing the bullet to find its billet in the ceiling.

Swift as lightning Harold saw his advantage, and taking his enemy on the surprise, felled him to the ground with a chair; stunning him, and rendering him incapable of immediate further mischief.

It was the work of an instant only to clap a set of handcuffs upon the temporarily insensible man.

"Ella! run to the street door, and whistle for the man on the beat. Here, take my call!"

A sleepy policeman soon appeared on the scene, and when he had returned with a four-wheeler, the two prisoners were without further trouble soon on their way to Cricklewood police station.

* * * * *

Next day the papers were full of the marvellously clever capture of the Occidental Bank thief and his accomplice by Detective Inspector Baxter. Not a word, however, was said as to the nearly successful bribing of that officer by the prisoners, or of the leading part played by a certain young girl.

Once and once only did he and she talk about it, and that but briefly.

"How did you guess, dear," said he, "that these scoundrels were trying to bribe me from doing my duty?"

"By a sight which I caught of the letter received by Francis Iles—or rather Pacey, the bank clerk—at the same time I got yours postponing our meeting. He dropped it when he left the table, and—and I saw that——"

"What an opinion you must have had of me, Ella!"

"Never mind, now, dear," she said, tenderly, "we will forget it."

"I'm afraid," said Harold, as he held her face between his hands and looked down into her eyes, "I am not worthy of all you went through, dear, for me."

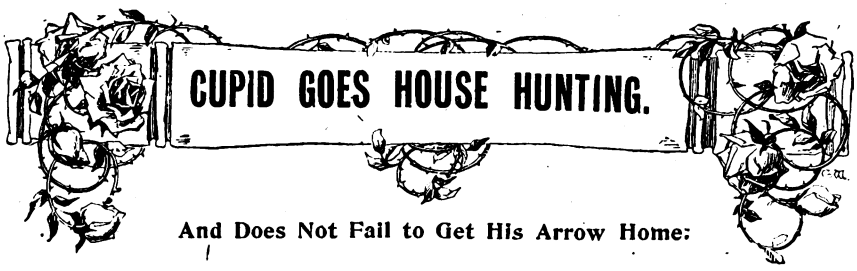
"Will you believe me," she answered him, "when I say that I would do it again, and yet again, with the same object—to save you."

"Ella! you are an angel!—and I——"

"You!—you are just the man to whom, through the future, the angel looks for all the happiness an angel can reasonably expect on earth."

Ralph Enderby.

Digitized by Google



CUPID GOES HOUSE HUNTING.

And Does Not Fail to Get His Arrow Home.

"Just when I'm looking my best," declared Florence Donaldson, "there's nowhere to go and no one to see me!"

Her sister-in-law laughed amusedly at this fearless avowal. "One of the cruel fatalities of feminine existence," she observed.

Florence, dressed in her new spring dress, had just run across from the flat opposite to see if she could not inveigle her relative into an afternoon's outing. Young Mrs. Donaldson, however, was too absorbed in the making of a dainty blouse to be lured from the sewing machine.

Flushed and bright-eyed, she was working with an ardour that brooked no interruption.

"Fred wagered that I wouldn't have this finished when he came home to-night, and I'm determined I shall," she informed Florence, pausing just long enough for a swift smile and glance.

"Oh, these young wives!" sighed the girl. "I wonder if I'll ever be so crazy for my husband's approval that I'll stay cooped up indoors on such a radiantly beautiful day as this?"

"Of course you will, Florrie—and you'll take delight in it, too. Love transforms labour, you know."

"So I've heard," remarked Florence, with a grimace; "but that doesn't alter the fact that there's nowhere for me to go this afternoon." She cast a look of mingled vanity and bitterness upon her jaunty self as reflected in the mirror.

"I'm really sorry, dear," murmured the sister-in-law. Then, glancing up suddenly, she beheld Florence fully for the first time.

"Why, you do look lovely, Florrie, I declare! I believe I never saw you look so charming."

The girl made a mock obeisance. "Thank you, Mistress Mabel. I've succeeded at last in wringing a compliment from you. Now, perhaps, you can sympathise." She turned disgustedly from the mirror. "If," she pursued, scornfully, "it happened to be one of my off days, when my hair wouldn't wave, my belt refused to dip and my collars choked me, and if I had decided for once to be miserable and had thrown on the easiest, and consequently the ugliest, dress I could find, every friend I possessed would be dropping in to see me, begging me to go for a drive, or a call, or a pleasure trip of some sort."

"That's usually the case," laughed Mrs. Fred Donaldson. Then she seemed to recollect something. "I declare, Florrie, if you are really anxious for an outing, I can suggest one. Oh, if you just could go it would be such a help. Do you suppose——"

"Let's hear about it," encouraged Florence.

"Well, would you care to combine a business and pleasure trip, and at the same time do me a great favour?"

"Delighted," answered the girl. But her tone was neutral. She would await particulars.

"The matter really ought to be attended to this afternoon. I was going to try somehow to make time for it at the last moment, but you see how impossible that will be."

"Well?"

"You know, Fred and I have been looking up a house for the summer——"

"Oh, for pity's sake!"

"Thank you, my dear, for your readiness to help me."

"I beg your pardon, Mabel. But of all things—house hunting! It's the last thing I imagined."

"I suppose so—but, listen, Florrie. There's only one house to go to—it belongs to one of the university professors. I've already corresponded with him about it, and he is anxious for me to come out and have a look at it. You will be able to tell whether it will suit or not."

"I thought," remarked the girl, "that you said the trip would combine business and pleasure?"

"Now, Florrie, how unkind! Won't it be a pleasure to meet the genial professor?"

"Well, that depends. Is he old or young?"

"Oh, you incorrigible! He's a settled man with a family. They're all going away for the summer, and he wants to let the house for that period. I imagine from the tone of his letters that he is a most amiable gentleman."

Florence meditatively adjusted her hat. It was pretty and creamy, and it had pink roses under the brim.

"If I thought," she mused, "that there was any possibility of there being a nice grown up son in the family——"

"Florence Donaldson, aren't you ashamed! Do take a sensible interest in the matter, for my sake at least. I really wish you would go out and see what the house is like. Of course, if the chief requisites are lacking, we won't consider it. However, I imagine it is just what we want. You know Fred and I are expecting our various relatives to visit us this summer, and we will need a roomy place. The situation is ideal—out near the park, you know, and——"

"Oh, I'll go," laughed Florence, good-naturedly. "Of course I'll go, sister, dear, if you feel that you can trust my judgment. But you must be sure to enumerate all the 'chief requisites' before I go, and not recollect them afterwards."

"Well, there should be a nice lawn—you know how Fred glories in a lawn—and, let me see now—there are three or four other very important items. Sit down while I think."

Florence obeyed. She listened patiently while Mrs. Donaldson recounted the necessary requirements. The "three or four" important points had developed into at least twenty before the interview was ended.

Florence was smiling when she started out on her mission. It was not just the sort of adventure her buoyant spirits craved, but it was at least diverting.

"Shady trees," she repeated to herself, "large verandah, roomy kitchen, gas range, sunny bedrooms," and so on.

She had it all well fixed in her mind when she reached Selborne Street and turned east.

"Yes, the situation was most desirable." So thought Florence when she walked along the pretty avenue, with its rows of comfortable dwellings and its borders of well-kept lawns. All about her was the radiant freshness of awakening summer. The trees had that joyous look which the bursting of new leafage brings, and the grass glowed with the emerald brightness of young and springing green.

Young Mrs. Donaldson's surmise as to the professor's amiability proved correct. He was certainly a genial man. But he was also extremely hard of hearing, so that, in spite of his affability and the charming way in which he made Florence feel at home, there was the immediate drawback of an imperfect understanding between them.

This began when Florence introduced herself, mentioning the fact that there had already been some correspondence concerning the house.

"Ah, certainly, Mrs. Donaldson—I remember quite well. Indeed, I hoped you would come to-day, for there have been other parties looking at the place, and I wanted you to see it before I considered any other proposition."

"I intended to come earlier in the day—that is, my sister did, but she was too busy. It was she who wrote the letters. I am Miss Donaldson."

Digitized by Google

"Eh? Oh, yes, yes—so I understood. You and your husband——"

Florence raised her voice. "My brother and my sister," she corrected him, "are the ones who wish to take the house. I came in my sister's stead, as she was too busy. She wished——"

"Eh? Brother and sister coming? Yes, I remember—the letter mentioned that there would be relatives to visit you, and that you desired sufficient room. Well, the house looks big enough, doesn't it? Come and I'll show you through. Mrs. Powell and the girls are out, or they would be glad to assist. However, I think I am well enough acquainted with my own domicile to explain its various merits. Just a word, Mrs. Donaldson, before we go any further. Since writing you something has occurred which makes our plan of leaving for the summer not quite so definite as it was. There will be some uncertainty for at least three or four days. Then I can let you know. Meanwhile, you might as well see the place."

Rather than struggle further to correct his mistaken impression of her identity, Florence let the matter drop. There was no use being particular about it, especially as the affair was so uncertain. There was time enough for him to discover his error when circumstances should make it necessary.

So she followed him through the rooms, taking mental note of the important features and smilingly answering to the name of Mrs. Donaldson. She herself talked very little, for she felt disinclined to exert herself sufficiently to make him understand her.

"And now you must see our back garden. Pardon me if I say it, but it's the pride of the family. We flatter ourselves that the rear of our home is quite as attractive as the front."

They passed from the dining-room upon a broad, shaded verandah. A beautifully kept lawn stretched before them. Adjoining it was a tennis court, where two young men were at play.

Florence had so completely forgotten her jest regarding a possible grown-up son that she was genuinely taken by surprise when Professor Powell exclaimed: "Ah, there's my boy Will at the game again. Pretty good player, eh? That Ellis fellow's a good one, too. They're both fiends when it comes to outdoor sports."

Florence judged as much from the appearance of both young men. They were well tanned and muscular. The taller of the two had a really handsome face, but Florence liked the other countenance better. There was something decidedly winning in its expression, and the eyes were clear and direct in their glance. She noticed that young Powell looked more than once towards the verandah where she stood with his father.

The girl expressed herself as delighted with the grounds. "I'm sure my sister will be pleased," she assured the Professor. Of course he did not catch the real significance of her remark, and she felt the same hopelessness in regard to enlightening him.

Indoors once more, Professor Powell had a sudden recollection.

"I declare! The Seymours are going away for the summer. There's no uncertainty about that. Suppose you go over and look at their place? They wish to let it furnished, the same as we do. I think it would be wise, for in case we don't go, you might be able to arrange with them. Come to the window, I'll show you the house."

The sound of a screen door closing rather noisily in the next room caused both to turn. A glimpse of tennis flannels was visible in the shaded dining-room.

"Hallo, Will—is that you?"

"It is," answered a masculine voice that tried not to seem embarrassed.

"Will, will you show this young lady where the Seymours' house is? She came to see about our place, you know, and——"

Young Powell needed no urging. He emerged very readily from the dining-room.

"It seems to me that you left that game rather suddenly," observed his father, with a mischievous twinkle in his eye. "But the joke is on you, young man, for it's Mrs.—and not Miss, as you no doubt imagined it would be."

Florence felt the stirring of her feminine vanity as she saw the unmistakable disappointment in the young man's face.

"My son, Will—Mrs. Donaldson."

Oh, that wretched blunder? But how was she to explain it now? The professor would think it strange that she had allowed him to go so far uncorrected. It was too late, evidently, for such an explanation. Further words would only complicate matters.

On the way to the Seymours', young Powell was very attentive. When a young woman has dancing brown eyes and wears a hat with pink roses under the brim it is difficult for a young man to act otherwise, even when he is aware that she prefixes Mrs. to her name.

The Seymour residence was fully as attractive as the Powells'. Florence was sure it would prove satisfactory, in case the latter family decided to remain in town.

"And now," said young Powell, as they retraced their steps, "we've got things ready for any emergency. You and your husband——"

Florence could stand it no longer.

"Oh, don't please!" she burst forth. "I haven't any husband!" And then she explained it all to the amazed young fellow.

He laughed with her over the ridiculous mistake. His laugh sounded particularly light-hearted.

"I've taken you so far out of your way," he apologised; "we're a long distance from the station. It is much nearer now to go across to Cottage Grove avenue. The walk will be pleasant. If you don't object, I'll accompany you."

Florence did not object.

"You live with your sister?" he inquired, as he swung along by her side.

"No; but I'm in the same building. We live in a flat."

"You—you see her often then, don't you?"

"Y—yes; I presume so."

"I hope father will stay in town. People are foolish to leave this pretty place for the summer. I tell you, it's all bosh, this rushing off to out-of-the-way places where one doesn't find the conveniences and pleasures that he could enjoy at home. Think of the parks, and the drives."

Florence agreed with him. Never before had anyone presented the matter to her quite so convincingly.

The walk seemed a very brief one, after all. Will Powell could not but remark it.

"We'll let you know in two or three days about our decision," he told Florence as they stood waiting for her car. "I hope your sister will like the Seymour place."

Then, as he put her on the car: "Good-bye, I'm glad I met you. And, do you know, I'm awfully glad you're not—Mrs. Donaldson.

Florence could not be angry with him, somehow. She tried to frown, but the attempt broke up into a merry laugh.

Will Powell had his wish. The professor decided to remain and Mrs. Donaldson—the real Mrs. Donaldson—was delighted with the Seymour residence.

Young Powell called personally to make known his father's decision. And he managed to see Florence, although his business was with her sister-in-law.

"What in the world did he talk about all that time?" inquired the latter suspiciously, when at last he had gone.

"Oh, lots of things—tennis, and golf, and outdoor sports. I shall take them up this summer, Mabel. You know it is just what I need."

Mrs. Fred Donaldson smiled knowingly. "There's nothing like having an incentive," she observed. And Florence blushed.

Angela Morgan.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.
CASELLIS	A man from Jamaica who knows Mrs. Norton's past history.

Mrs. Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia: Her companion.

THE RETURN OF PETTIGREW.

THE STORY STARTS HERE.

I arrive in England from a Bruges convent to be companion to my cousin, Frances Norton, whom I have not seen since we were together at school, and discover that my cousin is taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money are being lost and won. The climax is reached one night when Mary Vernon stakes her diamond earrings (a gift from Lord Kinross), and one of the onlookers finds them to be paste. The diamonds, it appears, were stolen by my cousin.

A few weeks later, my cousin, with Fluffy's help, succeeds in stealing a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew, an American millionaire at the Café Regal, by substituting for the millionaire's pocket-book one exactly like it.

We next move into a house in Pont Street, and it is while here that Sir John Strickland, a poor baronet, proposes to Frankie, and is refused.

Frankie is next presented at Court by her friend, Lady Gaveston. For this function she wears some superb diamonds which have been lent her by Lord Kinross. The society papers declare her to be the most beautiful and best-dressed woman at the presentation.

The same evening Lord Kinross calls at Pont Street for a private interview, and it is during this interview that Percival Hope enters the room unannounced, and makes the startling statement that Mary Vernon has discovered the thief who stole her diamonds. Shortly afterwards Frankie leaves the room; but I stay, and, unknown to Kinross and Percival Hope, overhear Hope, who turns out to be Kinross' cousin, tell Kinross that in a fortnight's time he will prove to Kinross that Frankie is an adventuress living upon the proceeds of the robbery of her friends. I tell Frankie what I have overheard.

On the evening of the next day Lady Gaveston tells Frankie that she doesn't approve of her behaviour towards Sir John Strickland, and that unless she decides at once either to marry or refuse him, she will return to Scotland. My cousin asks for and obtains a fortnight's grace in which to make up her mind.

We now all go to the Derby, where Mrs. Curtis Blount, instigated by jealousy, entices me to bet heavily, by which I lose £800. Frankie has also lost heavily, and to pay our debts, she prevails upon a young fellow, by promising marriage, to sign his uncle's name to a bill for £5,000.

That same night, at the Duchess of Warminster's ball, my cousin comes face to face with a man from Jamaica who knows all about her past life. Percival Hope has brought him in. It is a critical moment, but once again Frankie scores. She persuades me, much against my will, to engage Hope's attention by making love to him, while she herself purchases the Jamaica man's silence. He agrees to be silent for the sum of £1,000 to be paid before noon on the following day. I have to go to Fluffy's chambers to get the money. It is past midnight, and while negotiating with Fluffy, Percival Hope bursts into the room. Fluffy saves the situation by telling him that I have come to get money to pay my debts, whereupon Hope immediately forwards me £1,000.

The next day marks the end of the fortnight, during which Hope was to obtain proofs of Frankie's guilt. He and Kinross arrive with Casellis at Pont Street, and Casellis is asked to say what he knows of Frankie's dark past, but, instead of disclosing any unpleasant facts, he swears that she is a perfectly innocent woman.

Digitized by Google

THIS WEEK'S INSTALMENT.
The Return of Pettigrew.

For a moment the half-caste faced Percival's steady look unmoved, his dark eyes, flashing with passion, fearlessly met the challenge in that steel cold concentrated gaze, but—it was only for one short, silent moment.

The next, he had collapsed. He was once more a cringing, servile specimen of yellow-skinned humanity, bowing before the storm of execration, threats and menaces that broke over his head.

He attempted no excuse, offered no explanation for his conduct. He had sworn falsely, and if needs be, must suffer for so swearing.

"His object in making such infamous charges?" This last from Kinross.

"He had none," with a shrug. "Men were evil sometimes—in Jamacia, at all events—without an object."

"Let him go," said Frankie, "I don't blame him, he was only the tool of another and more unscrupulous man." She pointed the remark with a contemptuous glance at Percival, without, however, at all disturbing that inflexible person.

After his first outbreak against Casellis he remained quite calm. From playing a prominent part in the proceedings he relapsed for the time being into a spectator. He made no demur when Kinross insisted that Casellis should sign a confession of false witness, and smiled in an easy fashion when the half-caste declared he had been bribed to speak.

Cool and impassive, Percival waited till the confession was duly signed, and the door closed behind the man from Jamaica. Then with a terrible persistence he returned to the charge.

"My first witness has broken down," he remarked. "I will call the next."

Kinross quickly interposed.

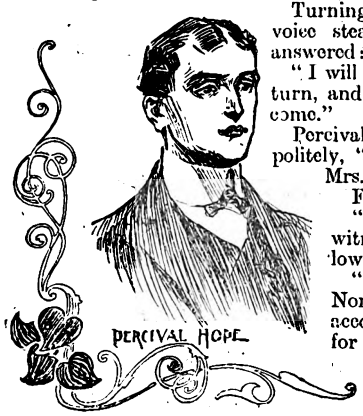
"No more, thank you," he said angrily. "I don't propose to subject Mrs. Norton to further insults."

"It is not for you to decide whether we shall go further into the matter this afternoon," said Percival. "I have three points against Mrs. Norton. One only has been raised. It remains for her to say whether the other two shall be heard now or later."

He spoke without a tinge of temper or bitterness. He might have been a judge, I thought, or a state executioner.

Frankie could not restrain a nervous shiver as she listened. He was so strong, so implacable, untouched by her charms, indifferent to her beauty, superior to all her arts—ruthless and indomitable as Fate.

From him she glanced to Kinross with a touch of appeal. There was no reassurance in his Lordship's face. He was indignant for her and against Hope, but behind the indignation the old doubt, the old suspicion rankled still. She must go through the ordeal to the end.



Turning to Percival, in a voice steady as his own, she answered:

"I will hear your witnesses in turn, and confute them as they come."

Percival bowed and asked politely, "if he might ring for Mrs. Norton's maid."

Frankie smiled sweetly.

"Certainly—are all your witnesses culled from the lower classes, Mr. Hope?"

"By no means, Mrs. Norton. I have taken account of your predilection for the aristocracy."

With an exclamation Kinross started to his feet.

"This is too much!" he cried, glaring at Percival.

Frankie leant forward, clutching his arm.

"Bear with him patiently a little longer," she said quietly, "for my sake." She still held his arm as though fearful of his powers of self-restraint. Kinross flushed, faltered, and finally sat down.

Ella Martin entered the room in a tearful and terrified manner. Much confused, she glanced from Percival to Frankie, twisting her apron in many and divers shapes,

"Listen attentively, please," said Percival, "and answer my questions slowly and carefully."

The girl trembled and remained quiet only with an effort.

"You told me last week that you had reason to suspect a certain person of stealing the photograph of Miss Vernon's diamonds from your box?"

"I did, sir."

"Who is the person you suspect?"

"My mistress, Mrs. Norton. Please, Mr. Hope——"

He stopped her with an imperative gesture.

"Don't interrupt! You can say anything you wish later. You told me, I think, that the day after you showed Mrs. Norton the print you missed it from your box, and that you afterwards saw it——"

"Oh, Mr. Hope, I must speak. I—I—" she paused, red and white by turns. "It's quite true," she went on with a gasp, "I said all that, and I believed it every word, but——"

Percival Hope remorselessly cut her short.

"Since then you have discovered how kind and generous a mistress Mrs. Norton can be?" he sneered.

"I have discovered something else besides," said Ella, with spirit. "I have found the missing print," and she held up the photograph of Mary Vernon's jewels.

"I found it in my box this morning, not an hour ago. It had got pushed among a packet of letters, and in going through them I discovered it."

"Most satisfactory and extremely interesting," sneered Percival. "Was there any special reason for searching your box this morning?"

"I am leaving Mrs. Norton to-morrow, sir. I am going to be married."

Percival smiled.

"That explains many things," said he. Then, with a sudden change of manner, he turned to Frankie.

"Can you explain this?" he asked abruptly. "This letter from Messrs. Newland, the jewellers in Oxford Street? Listen—and, if you can, explain.

"'We are in receipt of your letter and photograph of earrings, but regret we are unable to execute a replica of same in paste. Please find print duly inclosed.'

"Well," he jeered, "can you answer that?"

"The letter was never sent to me," said Frankie firmly.

Percival flashed a look at Ella.

"You found this letter?" he demanded.

"Yes——"

"In Mrs. Norton's room at Lady Winchin's, some few days after you missed the print?"

"Yes, sir."

"Fairly conclusive evidence, I think, Mrs. Norton."

"That the letter was found in my room, or to be exact, in my desk, yes, but not that it was addressed to me. Look"—she pointed to the sheet of paper, "a piece has been torn off the bottom. The name and address of the person to whom the firm were writing is missing. When you took this letter from my desk to sell to Mr. Hope"—she turned quickly to Ella—"what name was written there?"

Her attitude was full of menace, and her voice cut like a knife. But the girl made no haste to answer, while she grew whiter and whiter, and her lips seemed unwilling to shape the words.

"Miss Mary Vernon," she said hoarsely, "that was the name."

"It is not true," cried Percival, roused at last. "Upon my soul, I swear it is not true."

"It is your witness, not mine, who speaks," returned Frankie. "If you challenge a part, you must challenge all

Digitized by Google

she says. Would you like to know how and why I came to take charge of the letter—Mary's letter—or have you heard enough?"

It was some moments before Percival replied. He was very pale, and had, I think, hard work to master himself. When at last he spoke it was in his usual quiet tones—

"For the present 'yes.' For the future——"

Frankie passionately interrupted him.

"I shall never again refer to Mary's connection with the matter," she said indignantly, "and if at any time you state what has been disclosed concerning her, this afternoon, I shall declare such statement to be a malicious invention on your part. If I can help it neither you nor anyone shall breathe a word against her—I have your promise?"—she turned to Kinross—"to be silent?"

"Not a word shall pass my lips," he answered gravely.

"Then"—she faced Percival with superb assurance—"I can defy you, Mr. Hope. Mary's reputation is not likely to suffer from your unsupported testimony."

My cousin's challenge passed unnoticed. Percival, eyeing her steadily, held his peace. But he pocketed the letter from Messrs. Newlands.

Ella's dismissal in a flood of tears was hastened by a sharp ring and a thundering knock at the front door.

"For me—I think," said Percival, colouring slightly.

A moment later and there entered, unannounced and in great haste, Hiram Pettigrew!

His greetings were general and effusive.

"My dear Mrs. Norton, this is a pleasure. Percival, my boy, how are you? I came up this morning from Southampton, drove to your rooms, and found your note requesting me to come here straight away. Miss Cynthia, you're looking blooming. Fit as ever Kinross? That's right, I'm glad to see you all."

At this moment Lord Chesterton made his appearance. He listened to the millionaire's oration, then made his way quietly to Frankie.

"I got Hope's note," he said, "and came along at once. What's up?"

"Mr. Hope's giving a surprise party, I should say," laughed Frankie. "I didn't know you or Mr. Pettigrew were coming, Lord Chesterton, though of course I'm charmed to see you both."

"It's about that pocket-book of mine," said Hiram, shaking hands. "I gather that Percival has got hold of a clue to some of the contents. He rather thinks you can help him."

Percival nodded. "Yes," he said, "Chesterton can be of great help. I should perhaps apologise for conducting investigations here, but as Mrs. Norton was present when the robbery took place, I thought she might like to assist at the recovery of some of the stolen porperty."

"Charmed," murmured Frankie, with a self-possession equal to his own. "Most thoughtful of you."

Chesterton looked puzzled and a little annoyed. He scented a disturbance in the social atmosphere, and resented his inclusion therein. Of all things he disliked "a scene."

"I have unfortunately been unable to trace the majority of the missing notes," continued Percival. "Those that have reached the Bank of England have been presented by apparently respectable people, who were able to account for their possession in a legitimate manner. The notes would appear to have been taken to the continent and there distributed. Some few, however, changed hands on a race-course. Of these I have been able to trace two—each for £500."

He glanced sharply at Frankie, but she never moved a muscle.

"The notes were paid in by a bookmaker in a large way of business. He informs me that to the best of his recollection he received them, with others, from Lord Chesterton in settlement of bets on the Derby. You would assist me greatly Chesterton if you could recall how those particular notes came into your hands?"

Chesterton smiled in a large, tolerant fashion.

"Same way as most notes—from my bank, I suppose," he said.

"Pardon me, most distinctly not from your bank. No concern could or would pay over to a client a note stopped by the Bank of England."

"Then," said Chesterton carelessly, "I'm afraid I can't help you. I've a terrible memory."

"Let me assist it. The bookmaker tells me you paid these notes on behalf of a lady. Possibly the lady herself gave them to you?"

"Possibly," returned Chesterton, unmoved.

Percival began to grow impatient.

"I am determined to thrash this matter out," he said. "If you will not give up the information privately, you will have to do so in public."

"No power on earth can make me say anything I do not choose," replied Chesterton.

"I admire your chivalry. Believe me it is misplaced. The lady will not thank you for your reticence. She does not court publicity."

Hope spoke with a determination that frightened me. I did not understand why he wished to find out the name of the woman whose bets Chesterton had paid, and I could see no possible connection between the notes handed to his lordship and those stolen from Pettigrew's pocket-book. It was no business of Percival's, and yet——

Chesterton's eyes met mine in a steady and scrutinising fashion. I don't know what he read in them, alarm or perhaps appeal.

"Look here, Hope," he said, "you're going too far. Take my advice, keep the lady out of the question." There was the suggestion of a threat in his voice, but Percival, an ugly look on his face, sneered in reply.

"Thanks, I don't stand in need of your advice. I want something of more value—the truth. You paid that money to Bell on behalf of Mrs. Norton, from whom you got the notes. Deny it if you dare?"

"I do. Mrs. Norton did not hand me the notes."

"Who then?" asked Percival, jeering in open disbelief.

For a moment there was silence, to me an awful silence. Then with a great fear at my heart, I forced myself to speak.

"I gave Lord Chesterton the notes. He paid them to Bell for me a day or two ago."

"You!" cried Percival, dismay and horror depicted on his face. Then pulling himself together he laid his hand on Pettigrew's shoulder.

"Ask her," he said. "I can't."

Chesterton, who had made his way over to my side, smiled reassuringly.

"Good little girl," he said softly. "Don't be afraid. Buck up and tell the truth. Where did you get the notes from, Cynthia?"· said Hiram. "Did—did your cousin give them to you?"

In a flash I understood what it all meant. Percival was trying to prove that Frankie was a thief. Frankie, when all the time——

"My cousin," I said in a loud voice, "No, it was you," and I pointed straight at Percival, "you bought my shares the night I was at Fluffy's for £1,000. You gave me two bank notes each for £500. Those same notes I handed to Lord Chesterton."

There was an instant and an indescribable confusion.

Digitized by Google

Every one seemed to talk at once. Frankie, I remember, laughed at Hope in an insolent and triumphant manner, and Kinross glared at him defiantly.

Pettigrew's voice hushed the others into silence.

"What did you do with the notes when you came home, Miss Cynthia?" he asked.

"I asked Frankie to take care of them, but she refused. She told me not to let them out of my sight. I had the notes under the mattress that night, and carried them about with me next day, until I gave them to Lord Chesterton."

"Did you look at the numbers of the notes?"

I shook my head.

"No, I only saw they were for £500."

"Perhaps somebody came in your room during the night, and—and interfered with the notes," broke in Percival. "Did you hear anybody?"

The recollection of that fancied step outside my door, the gliding figure at my bedside returned to me. What if they had not been fancy after all? I hesitated. Percival eagerly noting the pause, urged me again.

"Think," he said, "for Heaven's sake think. Don't you understand?" He came quite close to me in his agitation. "The pocket-book—you found it under your chair. These notes were in it—these notes——"

"You gave them me," I cried. "You gave them me."

Percival shook his head.

"They are not the same," he said. "I entered the numbers of the notes I handed you, here in my pocket-book. They do not correspond with those you gave Lord Chesterton."

"Then, then," I said bewildered, "oh, you don't think I stole the notes, you can't think that? I never touched the pocket-book, I never saw—" I broke off in dismay. The green and silver book that I had found hidden in my box rose up before me. I was speechless.

Once again Pettigrew intervened.

"Have you any reason to suppose that the notes were tampered with during the night?" he asked.

I shook my head. I could not tell this keen-faced man of figures that had resolved themselves into window curtains, steps that had proved themselves a dream.

"When did you enter the number of the notes you paid my cousin, Mr. Hope?" asked Frankie. "At the time, or the next day?"

He seemed positively pleased at the question.

"The next day," he said.

"You might perhaps have remembered incorrectly."

He passed over the sneer and answered gravely: "Perhaps."

"It seems to me," said Kinross, "that there's a mystery in connection with the notes, and the sooner we recognise it as such the better—eh, Mr. Pettigrew?"

"Certainly," said the millionaire. He smiled very kindly at me, patting my shoulder.

I did not dare lift my eyes, but stood the picture of guilt before them all.

"I propose a vote of confidence in Cynthia," continued Kinross, laughing.

"I second that," said Chesterton.

They all said nice things to me, but there was a sense of constraint about them all the same. Pettigrew left soon after, and Chesterton accompanied him.

Percival turned deliberately to Kinross.

"Are you coming?" he said slowly.

For a moment Kinross hesitated. He knew all that the question meant. He had signified his intention of proposing to Frankie should she come scatheless through the afternoon's ordeal. She had done so, had vindicated herself and her position. Why then should he pause? By all the laws of honour his place was there beside her, beside the woman who had gone through so terrible an hour to win his love.

Frankie drew a hard, deep breath. The suspense seemed more than she could bear.

Kinross turned, and, with his usual grace, lifted her hand.

"I am staying, Percival," he answered, "always!"

"I congratulate you—both!" was the quiet reply.

And then the door closed behind him. Frankie had won.

I followed close on Percival, leaving my cousin and Lord Kinross to themselves.

I met Lady Gaveston on the stairs just returned from the Flower Show. She had captured a bargain in the way of pelargoniums, and was eager to show off her purchase. She dragged me to her room in triumph, and I had to listen to a long and rambling account of the warfare that had raged between her and a "painted creature" relative to their price.

"That reminds me," her Ladyship fixed me with her glasses, "I met young Ffolliott this afternoon. He had taken far more strong drink than is good for any Christian. I testified to him upon the evils of intemperance, I trust with good results. I can't think what's come to him, he used to be a decent laddie. Can you imagine, Cynthia, he spoke this afternoon of marrying your cousin? I could have boxed his ears. Such impudence! A child like that without a penny! Frances must be careful, gossip so soon gets spread! She must stop the boy."

I nodded, and, making an excuse of fetching water for the pelargoniums, escaped from the room.

My head was splitting, I felt unutterably humiliated and disgraced by all I had gone through, and milady's news of Toby came as a fresh blow.

My mind for the moment was more full of Toby's worries than my own.

The affair of the notes seemed too hopeless a mystery ever to be fathomed. In despair of finding a solution I turned to other things, but all the time, like the strain of some haunting melody, the memory of those midnight footsteps coming and going at my door came back to me.

I felt no surprise at meeting Toby in the hall, and milady's words had more or less prepared me as to the condition he was in.

The boy was very excited and extremely obstinate. He declared he would not leave the house without seeing Frankie. He was engaged to her, going to marry her, had every right to see and speak to her.

"Every right!" he repeated, holding tight to the dining-room door.

I felt infinitely distressed and ashamed for him. At any moment Kinross or Frankie might emerge from the drawing-room. I trembled to think of what might follow.

"You can't see Frankie now," I urged. "Come later, there's a good boy!"

No; he would stay and wait till she was disengaged.

It was no good to argue with him, the chances were that further opposition would result in an unpleasant scene.

"Will you be quiet if I let you wait? Promise me you will stay in the morning-room till I fetch you?"

He promised, and I pioneered him safely to Frankie's cosy nest.

"Not here!" he said abruptly. "No, I can't stay here. I'll wait in the dining-room if you like, though I don't see why she can't come to me now."

I looked at him reproachfully. He flushed and moodily retraced his steps.

Finally he retired into the dining-room and collapsed into a large arm-chair.

I shut the door carefully, conscious of having overcome a great danger—if not to me to my cousin. Somehow, I felt myself more than ever identified with Frankie.

I wished Lord Kinross would go, that I might learn the result of the all-important interview. He must, I thought, have proposed, and she of course would accept him. Surely her success was assured, nothing stood in her way save Toby.

Close on the thought came a knock at the door. A minute later I heard a man's voice in the hall—a voice that sent all the castles I had built for Frankie toppling to the ground.

It was Sir John! In a flash I remembered that the fortnight was over, the fate of the mine was sealed. He had come for Frankie's answer.

What would that answer be?

[Frankie's answer, among other things, is recorded in next Tuesday's issue.]

Digitized by Google

A Case of Exchange.

Telling of a Red Sunshade, a Bull, and a Picture.

"THIS," said David Musgrave, R.A., as he sat, his battered straw hat cocked over his nose, and the smoke curling up in blue spirals from his pipe—"this is what one may call real enjoyment, with nobody to know one and come bothering round."

He was sitting just where the uplands slope away from the plantation—sketching. Presently, with a few last finishing strokes, he closed his book, and raising his eyes, looked about him.

A girl was approaching across the green slope of the meadow, a dainty figure in white, with a red sunshade upon her shoulder.

As he watched her, thinking how well the note of colour told against the green background, he saw her suddenly pause to look behind her, and then come flying towards him, dropping the sunshade as she ran. She was close upon him when she tripped and fell, and looking beyond her David Musgrave became aware of a great black bull that had checked its furious career to gore and worry the red sunshade.

Without hesitation, therefore, he leapt forward, and catching up the girl in his arms, fairly ran with her towards the gate, nor did he stop until they were safe on the other side, and looking back saw the bull stroll complacently off with the wreck of the red sunshade upon his horns.

David Musgrave turned to where the girl stood trembling beside him, and laughed reassuringly.

"Rather lucky for us that he stayed to pay his respects to your sunshade."

His companion was silent for a moment, and then stretched out her hand to him.

"Oh, thank you," she said earnestly, "thank you more than I can ever say. I don't know how I came to fall, but I was so frightened I thought I should have died when I heard him thundering behind me. He is a prize bull, you know," she continued, "they usually keep him tied up, he is so dreadfully fierce."

As they walked Musgrave had leisure to note the masses of sunny hair that had escaped their fastenings, the big grey eyes that peeped at him beneath dark lashes, and the lithe activity of the graceful, girlish figure.

"Don't you think we might sit down for a little while?" he said, seeing how her hands still trembled. "You see," he continued, "I feel quite—er—quivery, don't you know!"

"You hardly look it," she said with a smile, her eyes upon his bronzed face, "but still, as you say so, and as I most certainly am, why——" As she spoke she sank down at the foot of a tree and rested her back against the bole.

"Do you know," pursued Mr. David Musgrave, seating himself beside her with a matter of fact sort of air, "that really and truly I have a kind of affection for that bull?"

"I'm afraid I don't quite understand!" she said with a note of indignation in her voice.

"Well, you see," he explained, "if it had not been for him I should not be sitting here with you, for which alone I shall owe him the gratitude of a lifetime!"

"Then your gratitude is easily earned."

"I don't know," he demurred, "if you knew how fearfully—er—lonely—yes, lonely I felt sitting there all by myself."

"You are a stranger to this part of the country?" she asked after a pause.

"Yes!"

"And an artist?"

"Yes," he repeated, "that is, I paint things, you know, and that reminds me, I should like to paint you."

She glanced away across the meadows, all golden with the afternoon sunshine.

"Father collects pictures," she said irrelevantly, "he has a lot of David Musgrave's."

"Really!" said her companion.

"Yes, and he's awfully proud of them," she continued, "though I can never understand why, because I think Musgrave's pictures are awful things, so—so—splashy—don't you?"

"Well—no," he replied, "to be perfectly candid with you, I rather like them—splashes and all."

"Oh, I suppose he's clever enough," she admitted.

"Undoubtedly!" said Mr. David Musgrave.

"Still, I don't like his work one bit. 'Impressionism' doesn't appeal to me."

"I'm rather sorry for that, you know," he said, with covert smile.

"Why?"

"Oh, well, you see, I paint rather like him—in a way."

She flushed suddenly.

"But you—you are not—who are you?" she demanded.

"Brown is my name," he replied mendaciously, "and," he added, stretching out a sunburnt hand and wrist, "brown is my nature."

For a moment she doubted, until seeing how calmly his glance met hers, her fears were allayed, and rising presently they strolled on together over the golden meadows.

"I was rather afraid I had 'put my foot into it' just now," she said at length, pausing beside a creeper-covered gate.

"Which after all wouldn't have been a very serious matter—it isn't so very large, you know," he replied, glancing down at the little tan shoe, which immediately hid itself. "No," he continued, "my name is Brown, and I want to paint you."

"And mine," she said, "is Gwendoline Bladon, and—and—if you want to, so very much——"

"When?" he asked quickly as she paused, "and where?"

"Oh!" she answered lightly, "that is for Chance and the Fates to decide," and with an airy wave of the hand she turned and was gone up the path.

"Fresh as the morning," he said to himself as he walked slowly back to the inn where he had taken rooms under the name of "Brown"—"with wonderful eyes and glorious hair, most certainly I must paint her!"

Thus it was he haunted the lanes all next day—but without success.

Digitized by Google

However, on the third day, chancing to pass the paddock-gate, he spied her in the orchard beyond, and paying small heed to the notice warning off trespassers, approached her, unheard upon the grass. She was sitting in a low chair beneath a great, gnarled old apple tree, reading. Upon her head was a big white sunbonnet that was pushed back so that he could see the red glory of her hair.

He paused a moment with an eye only for the delicate colouring and wonderful harmony of the tints.

"Just the thing," he said to himself, "if I only had a canvas here!" Then he stepped forward and lifted his hat.

"Good morning, Miss Bladon," he said.

The girl started and looked up.

"Oh, good morning, Mr. Brown!" she replied, "How you startled me, and what are you doing here, of all places?"

"Chance and the Fates have sent me to claim your promise."

"But"—she hesitated—"in this old sunbonnet?" and she made a gesture as if to remove it.

"No—no!" he cried, laying a restraining hand upon her arm—"it is just perfect—just as I want you."

"But supposing anyone sees us—what will they think?"

"Pooh!" he answered, "just let them think what they like—only promise to sit and wait until I fetch a canvas and things, and I'll begin at once—now promise!"

Gwendoline promised, whereupon without more ado he turned and fairly ran back to the village in his eagerness.

In less than a quarter of an hour he was back again, yet as he laid his hand upon the gate he paused, for a tall young fellow clad in immaculate flannels was lounging upon the grass beside the low chair.

Mr. David Musgrave seldom let anything interfere with him, thus it was that his pause was but momentary. The next he had opened the gate and approached them, an easel and canvas under one arm, and a much-battered paint-box beneath the other.

"I'm very sorry, but I—I really can't come," she was saying.

"But you promised to come to the regatta," returned her companion, "and besides"—here he paused as his eyes encountered the figure of David Musgrave.

The girl's cheeks flushed as the two men exchanged glances, and she rose.

"Let me introduce you," she said—

"Mr. Brown—Mr. Wilson."

"Delighted!" said Musgrave, R.A. alias Brown—"lovely weather we're having!"

The tall young fellow bowed stiffly without answering, while Musgrave ran on pleasantly about the crops—the long-continued drought, and the possibility of rain, busying himself the while upon settling his easel.

"What does all this mean?" asked Mr. Wilson at length, looking from the severe face of the artist to the flushed cheeks of the girl.

"I told you I was going to have my portrait painted," she replied, with a note of hesitation in her voice.

"Which was perfectly true," said Musgrave, unstrapping his stool.

"But you promised to let me row you to the regatta?" continued Mr. Wilson, paying no heed to the last remark.

"My dear sir," put in Musgrave again, squeezing some rose-madder upon his palette, "if I may answer for Miss Bladon, I should say—with pleasure—upon some other occasion!"

The tall young fellow in boating flannels scowled for a moment, and opened his lips as if to speak, then, raising his hat, turned upon his heel and left them.

"I should not be surprised," said Musgrave, as he began painting with strong, firm strokes, "if our friend has gone away with his soul possessed of a bitter anger towards me, because, you know, it certainly was rough on him."

The which surmise was quite correct, for Mr. Wilson, having reached his house, was at that precise moment busied upon a letter to Sir George Bladon, in which the words "low artist fellow" occurred with a singular frequency.

Mr. David Musgrave was a quick worker while the fit lasted, and it was upon the third evening of the "sitting" that he sat putting on the last few finishing touches to the wonderful face that looked out from his canvas.

"Yes, I think it will do, you know," he said, looking at it through half-closed lids.

"And what shall you call it?" asked Gwendoline.

"Well, I think of naming it 'The Long Sought,' or something of that kind."

"'The Long Sought,'!" she repeated, "what a very strange title!"

"But a very true one," he answered.

"But what does it mean?" she asked.

"Ah! that is what few will understand," he answered, and there was a long silence, during which his brush hovered lightly here and there.

"Our friend, Mr. Wilson, is an excellent young man," he said at last.

"You think so?" she answered listlessly.

"Yes; but he has one fault—jealousy."

"Nonsense!" she said, glancing at him with heightened colour.

"Perhaps you are right," he answered, "in which case it is surprising how very different we are—he and I."

"Of course you are," she said decidedly; but how do you mean?"

"Oh, well, I am jealous—fearfully jealous, you know!" Somehow as he spoke her eyes drooped, and she changed the subject abruptly.

"I—I think if you let my father see your picture—he would buy it," she said.

"But it is not for sale," he answered.

"Not for sale!" she repeated.

"Certainly not!" he said decisively. "Nobody shall ever possess that picture but myself, because—as I told you—I really am fearfully jealous, you know."

There was a long silence.

"This is my last night in Bramblemere," he said, at last.

"I am afraid I can never express all my gratitude to yo for saving me——"

"Pardon me," he interrupted, "it would be the easies matter in the world."

"How?"

He had risen and stood beside her; for a moment he hesitated, and then lightly touched the great red rose on her bosom.

"Give me this!" he said.

He watched the little foot tapping the grass nervously, and then very slowly her hand crept up, and with a half-shy gesture she drew the rose from its resting-place and held it towards him.

"Gwendoline," he said softly, as his fingers closed upon hers, "I want the picture, but, Heaven knows, I want you a thousand times more—much more than I can ever tell you!"

Her head drooped, and her face was hidden in the great sun-bonnet; but he lifted it, and reading the look in the shy eyes he guessed her answer, and stooping, kissed her.

A moment later a voice reached them, an authoritative voice, at the sound of which Gwendoline started.

"Why, there's father!" she exclaimed, and surely enough he appeared, walking towards them with his hands beneath his coat-tails—a sure sign that he was put out.

"Father," she cried gaily, "I'm so glad you have come in time to meet Mr. Brown."

Sir George bowed coldly. "My dear, I should like a few words in private with—ah—Mr. Brown."

"But I want to tell you——" she began.

"I said in private, my dear," he interrupted.

She turned to Musgrave and held out her hand. "Good-bye!" she said, softly, and left them together.

"Now, sir!" began Sir George; "what the dickens is all this, eh?"

"Well, some people might call it a portrait, Sir George."

Despite himself Sir George's eyes wandered to the easel, and, fixing his glasses, he examined it for a moment in surprised silence.

"By gad, sir!" he exclaimed excitedly, and then remembering himself, coughed, and turned his back upon it.

Digitized by Google

"Now, sir," he repeated, "what the dickens do you mean by painting my daughter—you—an utter stranger?"

"My dear Sir George," replied Musgrave easily, as he collected his "goods and chattels," "why do people paint at all?"

"That, sir, is no answer; and are you aware besides, that you are trespassing?" cried Sir George.

"If my address would be of any service?" began Musgrave.

"Certainly not; ah, of course not—I have no wish for any unpleasantness; ah, I suppose," he hesitated, as Musgrave turned away, "that you would—ah, that is—you are willing to sell that picture?"

"I'm sorry, but it is not for sale, Sir George."

"Then, sir, permit me to wish you a very good evening."

"A cool, self-possessed young rascal!" said Sir George, as he watched the artist out of sight; "but, by George, sir, the fellow can paint, all the same. Brown," he repeated; "now I wonder?"—and he hurried to the gate; but Musgrave had vanished.

* * * * *

The Academy was crowded as, a week later, Sir George led his daughter round the rooms.

"Not much of a show, my dear!" he was saying; "seems to me they get worse and worse every year—hey! though—stop a minute, there's a fine bit of colour, and, by Jove!—surely—turn it up—No. 287," he cried, in sudden excitement.

Gwendoline glanced casually at the picture alluded to, and then stopped suddenly, as she saw her own face looking back at her from beneath a great white sun-bonnet.

Sir George snatched the catalogue from her unconscious fingers, and turning over the leaves, read:

"No. 287. 'The Long Sought,' by David Musgrave, R.A."

"By Jove!" he exclaimed, "and Wilson called him a 'low artist fellow'—the idiot!" So saying Sir George stepped up to the picture to view it more narrowly.

Gwendoline stared after him for a moment, and then turned and sat down in a quiet corner to think. Her hand, lying upon the seat-back, was clasped suddenly by strong fingers, and looking swiftly up, she found the subject of her thoughts beside her.

"Are you angry with me?" asked Musgrave softly.

"Well, I don't quite know; why did you deceive me about your name?"

"Oh, it was just a fancy of mine while I was in Bramblemere, and then—well, I fell very much in love, and thought it would be best to keep up the idea—'love for love's sake,' and all that. I meant to tell you all along, but Sir George came too soon, and after that, I thought I would just let him find out for himself."

"But, you know," she said, after a little while, "I don't like David Musgrave's pictures a bit."

David Musgrave laughed. "What does that matter," he answered, "so long as you love David Musgrave?"

As he spoke Sir George joined them.

"Father," said Gwendoline, smiling, "I think you have met Mr. Musgrave, and—and I have promised to marry him!"

"Why, then," cried Sir George, shaking hands heartily, "you had better come down with us to Bramblemere, Mr. Brown, and don't forget to bring your picture, and we will make it a matter of exchange, eh?"

Jeffery Farnol.

"Is it true that your bride is very hard of hearing?" "It is. Why, when I proposed to her I had to shout so loud that all the neighbours ran out and congratulated me."

FATHER (to son): "My father never gave me money to spend on horses, opera tickets, late dinners, and the like." Son: "Oh, yes, but you forget that I come from a more aristocratic family than you did."

MRS. DE JAR: "Is there a lunatic asylum near here?" Mr. De Jar: "I believe so." "Do they take people on their own recommendation?" "My stars! How should I know? Why?" "Oh, nothing; only to-day I got hold of a package of my old love letters."

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

August 26.—To-day's children will have a favourable year for business; should speculate and advertise; a better year for health.

Young girls will find love affairs very interesting, they become engaged or marry.

The day is good for buying and selling, dealing with jewellers, visiting, and for marriage.

A child born here will be industrious and persevering, it should go into business on its own account.

August 27.—An unfavourable birthday; much travel and change. Beware of law.

Girls need care in love affairs; long journeys separate lovers.

The day is evil for letter-writing and signing papers. Defer travelling, and beware of thieves.

A child born here will be unsettled, crafty, and unfortunate. Will be very extravagant, and difficult to manage.

August 28.—A quiet year. Those in employ may expect promotion. Changes in the home affairs.

Not a good year for love affairs, and girls born between noon and 1 p.m. will have trouble and anxiety.

The day is one to keep quiet on. Ask favour near 2 and 5 p.m.

A child born to-day will be best in the employ of others.

August 29.—Trouble in business and domestic circle. Clerks and teachers are rather fortunate.

Girls born between 4 and 7 a.m. are rather favoured in love matters, but those born near 10 p.m. meet with disappointment.

The day is good for entering examinations, and dealing with literary people.

A child born this day will be unfortunate in business; will be clever, and have an active brain, but lack self-confidence.

August 30.—A doubtful year for business; keep cool, and beware of mishaps and law; insure against fires.

Young girls born from 6 to 8 p.m. must place little confidence in lovers.

The day is unfavourable for most things; guard against accident in the early morning.

A child born here will be persevering, but headstrong and hot tempered; rather fortunate in business.

August 31.—Business will need close attention this year. Do not lend to friends. Pleasant events in domestic affairs.

A favourable time for love affairs; girls born near 10 p.m. become engaged, or marry.

A child born to-day will be free and generous; unfortunate with a business of its own; the mind will be quick and original.

September 1.—A quiet year to those whose birthdays occur to-day.

Young girls must have a care in love affairs; attentions from married men; beware of strangers.

The day is good for letter-writing, visiting doctors, and military men, and for dealing with shipping agents.

A child born here will be fairly successful; will attract the opposite sex, and be fond of the water. Asturel.

Digitized by Google

The Line of the Heart.

By R. Norman Silver.

"You'll Have Heaps of Clients."

"If anyone gets me to read another palm to-day, Phyllis, dear, I'll be—I'll be bothered! I'm sorry I ever learnt. But there, what's the use of threatening? Not a soul can take my place, unless we send round to Bond Street for a professional and pay an extortionate fee; Mr. Carteret—your brother—says probably ten guineas for the evening. That would be a pity, wouldn't it?"

"It would, indeed, Lady Grasmere," was the shy response, "especially when the bazaar is nearly over and you have made such a lot of money with your readings. Three hundred pounds, Diana was telling me."

Lady Grasmere, a tall, smartly-dressed woman in early middle life, smiled with a certain cheerful gratification, as she looked out across the small tea-table by which she and her companion sat, into the broad gallery of her historic town house, with its lofty painted roof and high windows on either side. Through the latter there streamed the yellow sunbeams of a radiant London afternoon, to fall upon dainty spring toilettes, fair faces, open purses, and unimpeachable masculine costumes, hemmed in by rows of gay booths, laden with costly trifles, rare flowers, delicate antiques, cobweb laces, and all the wonderful and expensive fripperies of a West-end charitable bazaar.

"They've a deal left in their pockets yet, Phyllis," she observed, "so I suppose I'd better forget I've a headache and go back to my sybil's sanctum."

Phyllis Carteret hesitated: "I'm—I'm not sure if I could help you in any way, Lady Grasmere," she said, "but I know a little of palmistry. One of dad's gamekeepers married a gipsy, and she taught me, as she called it, to tell fortunes—the line of life, the line of the head, the line of fate, and, above all, the line of the heart. I'm afraid, though, I should be dreadfully nervous."

"My dear," cried Lady Grasmere, "you are a treasure, and I'm only sorry that Mr. Carteret didn't bring you before our last day. But I'll tell you what I'll do—I'll whisper it about that a real and expert palmist, a lady of Eastern birth, has consented to give, incognito, a few consultations. You'll have heaps of clients, every other person in Society believes in palmistry. Even Ernest—you remember my cousin Ernest Merivale, the explorer—owned to me recently that he wasn't quite a sceptic, and he's not superstitious by any means. I must send you some of my special friends and we can laugh at them afterwards."

The amateur palmist recoiled. "Oh, please, Lady Grasmere," she begged, "I'd rather you didn't let a soul know. If I felt that I was going to be laughed at or—or get someone else laughed at—I don't think I could do it."

"Then I'll keep the secret most religiously," she was promised hastily; "and now, you stay here a while before joining me at my den. You recollect it? The tiny Oriental tent at the top of the gallery; slip in quietly at the back. I will rake up a wrap or two to disguise you with; half an hour hence you will be quite a sensation."

A twinkle in her shrewd grey eye, Lady Grasmere hurried away, just as a youthful figure, dark, boyish, slender, dropped into a seat by Phyllis Carteret. The resemblance between them was pronounced, save that Phyllis' sensitive features bore an expression merely of gentle gravity, those of the new-comer being both proud and melancholy.

"I'm dashed if I can stand it any longer, Phil," he murmured; "fancy, Diana and I had planned—that is, I had planned and Di had practically agreed—to have a cup of tea together as soon as the crush was over. Well, it is all over, and who do you imagine carried her off from under my very nose—Ernest Merivale, confound him!"

"My dear Austin," was the decisive answer, broken, however, by a deep, though girlish sigh, "they are engaged—you are only a very ungraceful and persistent intruder."

Her brother winced and evaded the point.

"I wish Di hadn't taken the bookstall with me now," grumbled Austin Carteret. "Merivale has been acting as a volunteer assistant, and of course because he was nearly eaten by cannibals in Central Africa and wrote it up in two fat volumes, everyone crowds to see him. I hope he goes back to Africa and that the cannibals polish him off in reality!"

Phyllis flushed. "Austin," she said, "Mr. Merivale doesn't in the least deserve such a horrible destiny. He is very kind and clever, and, if people don't flatter him, as brave as he is handsome. But I'm sorry for him, all the same."

"I like that!" retorted her brother; "isn't he going to marry Diana Urquart, and isn't he as rich as Crœsus? Poor Di, I grant you, not poor Merivale."

"He is going to marry someone who doesn't love him," replied Phyllis slowly; "any man who does that is to be pitied."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed Austin; "it's a brutal thing to do, and I sincerely trust he may suffer for it!"

His sister paled. "You are not fair, dear," she protested; "you know Di won't let him guess the truth. They have been almost betrothed since childhood; there had been a cruel old feud between the families and their fathers wanted it healed. It was a shocking mistake, but Mr. Merivale cares for Di, and she keeps silence out of pity."

Austin clenched his fists impotently. "And all the while she loves me," he muttered; "she can't say she doesn't. Phil, Phil, why didn't Merivale fall in love with you? He used to be no end fond of you when he came visiting us on his college vacations, though you were in short frocks and the nursery. You'd have been far more suitable for him; Di's too quiet, too reserved—he doesn't understand her, really; I do. Now you'd have been an ideal wife for Merivale; you'd have coaxed him, petted him, bullied him, interested him—why, Phil, Phil!"

Phyllis Carteret had turned away her head and was twisting intently a simple ring or two on a finger of one slender hand. Austin had caught a betraying sound, low and suppressed, yet strangely suggestive of a sob. He drew closer to her, confused and startled.

Digitized by Google

"I—I say, Phil," he stammered; "I'm—I'm awfully sorry, I am, indeed; I didn't dream that you—you——"

His sister pushed back her chair and rose.

"Lady Grasmere is waiting for me," she said, and her voice quivered; "do get some tea, there's a good boy—because you're crossed in love, you needn't starve yourself, need you?"

She laughed—a little faintly—and slipped into the thronged gallery without, before he could gain a glimpse of her face.

"Beware of Silence."

"Is it quite true, Lady Grasmere, or are you only hoaxing everybody?"

The querist was young, blonde, graceful, exquisitely gowned. She had slipped across from a picturesque stall—a lath-and-plaster copy of an eighteenth century bookseller's shop, designed for the Grasmere House Bazaar by a famous scenic artist—to the Oriental tent in which, for three days, Lady Grasmere had officiated as an unprofessional exponent of the fashionable craze.

"I am a diplomatist's wife, Diana," was the laughing reply; "and you won't get a syllable more out of me than I think proper. As for my substitute, she consented to act on the express condition that she was allowed to remain unknown. But this I will tell you, she learnt her palmistry in the true gipsy school, and not from any of your modern professors. Go and consult her yourself, if you're all that curious."

Diana Urquart hesitated on the threshold of the shadowy little place. Bright as was the late afternoon, it was closely draped with heavy, incense-scented stuffs and lighted dimly by lamps whose ruby and orange facets winked like jewels in its recesses.

"I don't say that I believe in palmistry the least bit," she rejoined, with affected indifference, "but I surrender to the foible of my sex—inquisitiveness; the bazaar funds will profit, that is one comfort."

She shrugged her pretty shoulders, raised a curtain, and passed into the tent. Lady Grasmere smiled mischievously.

"That was a splendid idea of mine," she murmured; "it is wonderful what charm a scrap of mystery has for human nature."

Unconscious of this philosophic reflection, Diana had entered the screened sanctum of the unknown palmist. Upon a species of divan, vaguely illuminated by the hanging lamps around, and swathed concealingly in silken wrappings, sat Phyllis Carteret, so veiled and transformed that not her most intimate friend could have recognised or even suspected her. Her fingers had been deprived of their rings, and, together with her wrists, slightly browned. Lady Grasmere was an excellent stage manager.

Diana laid a sixpence and a half-sovereign upon a low Moorish table before the divan.

"You—you are our new palmist, are you not?" she said, embarrassed in spite of herself, by the seriousness of her surroundings; "do you mind reading my hand for me? I don't usually attach much importance to such things, but Lady Grasmere tells me you are not an ordinary authority."

Phyllis gasped silently beneath her veil.

"Good gracious! Diana!" she whispered; "what am I to say to her?" She started involuntarily—a strange and arresting thought had sprung into her brain. She had no time to reconsider the idea—Diana was holding out a dainty jewelled hand; Phyllis pretended to examine it.

"I—I see," she said, rendering her fresh, girlish tones hoarse and quavering in order to suppress the one remaining clue to her identity, "that you are passing through a serious crisis—a crisis in which your heart is conscious of a divided duty. Beware of silence—silence towards one who loves you but whom you do not love. You may yet be happy—your heart-line is clear and even, except at the beginning. You seek to love where you deem you should, your heart pities yet rebels. Have a care lest you ruin three lives, your own, his who loves you, and his whom you love."

Phyllis was amazed as the words fell from her lips. Like many other women who do not dream of it, she was a born actress, and her excitement lent her inspiration.

Diana Urquart stood as if she had been turned to stone. A superstitious awe seized upon her, she felt chilled and alarmed. The subdued light, the swathed figure, the mystery surrounding the palmist—all increased the impression that had been made upon her. She laughed, struggling to regain her equanimity.

"I—I—how quaint!" she faltered; "really, you have given me quite a delightful thrill. You won't object to my not taking it too seriously, will you? Thank you, and good-bye."

She scarcely knew what she was saying, but the words served to cover her hasty retreat. Lady Grasmere glanced at her quizzically as she emerged, but could ask no questions—she herself was the centre of a chattering group, intending visitors to the unknown palmist.

Drawing a deep, almost convulsive breath, Diana went back to her own stall. There was a throng in and about it, partly attracted by the mimic shop, with its small-paned windows and hanging sign, partly by the chance of seeing Ernest Merivale, the Central African explorer and Society "lion." Chattering good-humouredly to his persecutors, the latter was busily autographing copies of his own book for one purchaser after another. As her eyes fell upon his spare, athletic frame and tanned features, an idea came to Diana Urquart. If the Sybil's warning were true for her, it must be true for Merivale—it must be written in his hand also.

Reaching the side of her betrothed, Diana motioned the explorer out of the group. He extricated himself tactfully—Diana was wondering how she might get him to try the necessary experiment, yet her heart misgave her as she realised what a blow disillusionment would be to the gay, contented man before her.

Austin threw his arms about her, and would have spoken, but checked himself, and stood up stiffly. Instinctively Diana followed his gaze—it had fallen upon Ernest Merivale.

Digitized by Google

"Ernest," she said, "I want you to do something for me—and at once."

Merivale looked at her questioningly. "I am all obedience, dear," he replied; "issue your commands—you will find me, as ever, your slave and adorer."

"Don't be foolish," interrupted Diana, almost coldly; "listen, you must go and have your hand read by the new palmist your cousin has unearthed. She is supposed to be a real sorceress, and I was induced to patronise her, with somewhat puzzling results. Consult her yourself, and then come and tell me what she says."

Ernest Merivale knitted his brows. "I am not sure, Di," he responded, "that I wish to pry into the future or to be made a fool of, according as one believes in palmistry or not. However, I will go and consult the oracle and inform you of her pronouncements."

He nodded, smiled, and strolled off. Diana gazed after him, half-inclined to recall him. A voice spoke to her suddenly—a voice pleading and reproachful; it was that of Austin Carteret.

"Di," he said, "aren't you tired of all this bustle? Let us have a breather in the conservatory, and I will get you an ice or some claret cup. You were going to have some tea with me, you know, only Merivale cut me out."

Diana looked at him, but lowered her own eyes under the boyish ardour of his glance.

"You are incorrigible, Mr. Carteret," she murmured; "very well, I should be glad of a moment's respite—my head is in a whirl."

She laid her hand on his offered arm, and they left the gallery together.

"I am Enlightened at Last."

"Di, Di, don't you understand that you are condemning yourself to a life of deceit? You, who are as honest as the day!—You won't be able to keep it up, Merivale will find you out, and break his heart over it. That will be three hearts broken—yours, mine, and Merivale's."

Austin Carteret flung the end of his cigarette on to the warm, damp, tiled floor of the Grasmere House conservatory, and stamped upon it viciously. The white fingers that lay in Diana Urquart's lap were interlacing themselves nervously, and her head was averted. A sudden shiver ran over her, and she looked quickly at the boyish figure lounging by her on the garden-seat.

"How strange!" she exclaimed, "do you know, I have heard almost the very same words within the last ten minutes—from a mysterious palmist Lady Grasmere has discovered. She warned me against spoiling three lives—my own, that of the man who loves me, and that of the man I——" She checked herself, blushing deeply.

Austin seized her hand. "Diana!" he said, "what a wonderful thing. But you might have finished it—you were going to say, 'The man I love.' Yes, you were, Di, and it's true—you do love me, though you are promised to Merivale."

His companion strove to rise, but he clasped her fingers appealingly.

"Forgive me, Diana," he murmured; "it's the last time I shall dare to tell you so. You've drifted into this engagement and drifted on in it till you daren't face disillusioning Merivale. You're making a frightful mistake—your palmist was right, though how she managed to read it all in your hand, I can't guess. But since you've decided to see it through, you must. I shall get abroad as soon as possible."

Diana's red lips set abruptly, and she freed her hands with a despairing gesture, to cover her wet lashes. Austin sighed.

"There," he said, "I've driven you to tears—I am an unlucky beggar. I'm sorry I raised the old question over again. You won't be bothered with me much longer, that's a comfort." And he sprang up with a certain masculine irritation. Diana clung to him.

"Austin!" she sobbed, "don't talk about going away, I can't lose you, I can't. Oh, you know I love you, but I have been a coward to Ernest all this while, and I daren't confess to him now."

She stopped, struck by a thought. "I—I forgot!" she added; "I sent him to the palmist, the one that warned me. I wanted to see what she would say to him, Austin, if she would only tell him that he is living in a fool's paradise, that the woman he is to marry doesn't love him! Oh, but he wouldn't believe it, if I told him so myself he would think I was jesting. Austin, Austin, what shall I do?"

She hung upon him with a kind of desperation—beneath her cold, proud exterior Diana Urquart concealed both the simplicity and the inexperience of a girl.

Austin threw his arms about her, and would have spoken but checked himself, and stood up stiffly. Instinctively Diana followed his gaze—it had fallen upon Ernest Merivale. Gravely, a trifle scornfully, he surveyed them.

"So," he said, "there is something in palmistry, then, unless the mysterious lady in question was bribed to tell me a particularly unpleasant truth. In any case I am enlightened at last, though I admit I should not have credited certain ominous hints had I not happened to come in search of my betrothed wife, and find her, in the embrace of—a friend."

Austin Carteret stepped forward. "Merivale," he answered huskily, "Di and I have always cared for one another—she—she tried to do as—as her dead father wished, and was going on trying. I—I had just made a last and practically futile appeal to her. I—I was really saying good-bye; I propose leaving England shortly.

Merivale's face changed, and he laid a hand on the speaker's shoulder.

"I beg your pardon, Carteret," he replied; "I have been a blind fool. Diana—Miss Urquart, I very nearly did you a great wrong. And yet you might—you ought to have told me the truth! However, you are free—employ your freedom as you choose."

Diana bowed her head, wounded and confused. "I—I was cowardly," she faltered. "But I happened to see the palmist out of curiosity, and she—she warned me against spoiling three lives by silence. I asked you to see her, wondering what she would tell you. It is very, very strange, and yet——"

"Yet she has done you a singular service," said Ernest Merivale, somewhat bitterly. He paused, a subdued hubbub had penetrated to them, and the conservatory was rapidly filling with a thin smoke.

"Fire!" he exclaimed; "Heavens, and among all that flimsy stuff." He took a rapid stride in the direction of the gallery, but halted—a thicker cloud of smoke had rolled in.

"Get Diana out by the door on the further side of the conservatory," he said, authoritatively; "it leads directly to the hall—there is danger this way." And before they could stay him he had disappeared in the pungent haze.

The atmosphere of the gallery beyond was increasingly dense, yet he could perceive that it was apparently empty, except for a leaping medley of flame and smoke. The fire had darted from stall to stall with lightning speed—visitors and stall-holders fleeing before it to the exits at the bottom of the gallery. As he stood a wall of flame sprang up behind him, cutting off his departure through the conservatory, and sweeping round on his right to hem him in. Already the room was roaring like a furnace.

He made for a window that stood in a bare recess, clear of the stalls, and smashed it open. The current of air drove the smoke back, and he saw that a feminine figure lay prostrate in the recess. He caught it up (noticing that it was slight and girlish, and wrapped in voluminous silken folds) and climbed through the sash on to the stone sill. Below him was a drop of twenty feet, down a narrow well of almost windowless walls, to a glass roof, over some hall or courtyard. A disappointed ejaculation burst from his lips.

The girl in his arms was reviving—a fold of the wrap blew aside and he beheld her face.

"Little Phil Carteret!" he cried, "she here—poor child, what a fate!" He steadied her on the shallow ledge as she sought to stand erect. She recognised him and comprehended their position at the same time.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, Mr. Merivale," she murmured, "how terrible! And you have risked your life for mine. I did try to escape, but suppose the smoke overcame me."

"Not at all," he told her calmly, "I discovered you when I was bolting for my own. And a bad bolt I seem to have made for both of us, Phil. To fall or jump on to that roof would mean death, and the gallery itself is a furnace. Let us try to attract attention."

They joined their voices in a resolute summons, but the crackling of the wooden fittings in the long room behind drowned them.

"Courage!" said Merivale calmly, "we will hold on as long as we can. We will pretend it is only birds-nesting—you and I went nesting once, Phil, we used to be good chums before I took to running about the world."

"I'm not frightened—very," faltered Phyllis; "but, oh, Mr. Merivale, I wish you'd forgive me the meanest thing I ever did; I can't bear to think how you'd hate me if you knew."

She raised an end of the silken wrap she had around her, over her ordinary dress, and showed it to him. He saw that her hands were stained a conspicuous brown.

"I was the palmist," she said, "the palmist who told D. that she mustn't marry you, and that you mustn't marry her."

Ernest Merivale gasped. "You!" he exclaimed; "you! But why—why—?"

Phyllis looked away. "Austin and Diana have loved one another for years," she murmured, "and I—I knew it."

Merivale sighed. "You only tried to play the good fairy Phil," he rejoined, "and my eyes needed opening. A moment ago, before Austin, I set Diana free. Circumstances conspired to drive home your hints. You have nothing to reproach yourself with."

The girl at his side made a regretful gesture. "I can't let you believe that," she said, "not—not now. I wasn't acting from any noble motive—I wanted to part you and Diana—I—I was jealous."

He stooped and kissed her gravely, then allowed her to swing off, and lowered gently.

"Phyllis!" cried Merivale, amazed, "my dear little girl—" He broke off to change places with her, gleaming, tawny tongues were licking towards them from the windows on their right. In doing so he trod on the loose extremity of her silken wrap.

"Eureka!" he ejaculated, and released it from her shoulder—it was wide and long—some six or eight yards of oriental stuff. With skilful fingers he knotted it here and there to contract it into a species of cable, tied a loop in it, and slipped it round her waist.

"I will lower you carefully," he said, "to the ledge below. Quick, there is no time to lose." He helped her to swing over the sill—their heads were close together for an instant.

"Poor little Phil," he whispered, "listen, the rope may not bear my weight. Let me tell you something in—in case of accidents. When I was a stripling about your father's house I used to promise myself that when you were old enough I would try to win your love. You were only a child then in reality, but I loved you. I proved false to my boy's love. Phil, if I live I will let you come back to it!"

He stooped and kissed her gravely, then allowed her to swing off, and lowered gently. Phyllis' feet touched the ledge below—she loosed the impromptu cable and he drew it up—aflame at the middle. One of the licking tongues of flame had ignited it, a moment later half of it dropped into the well beneath.

A scream burst from Phyllis' lips—his last chance of escape had gone. The scream was interrupted by the crash of glass and the sound of hatchets busily plied. The end of a red and double ladder appeared through the shattered panes and splintered beams of the roof below—a brass helmet, a manly visage, and the end of a hose-pipe followed it. Fate had changed her mind—Ernest Merivale was saved.

* * * * *

The stalwart heroes of the fire brigade never knew at how critical a period in a certain romance they had decided to make a flank attack on the blazing gallery, and with that object in view had broken through the courtyard roof, to find a distracted young lady on the ledge of a cornice, and a distinguished African explorer on a lofty sill above.

But Phyllis Merivale can never forget their timely arrival or cease to be one of their most generous patrons. Twice a year, on the anniversary of her wedding, and on that of a certain eventful day in May, the men of a particular fire-station near Piccadilly, dine with Ernest Merivale and his wife. Two of the latter's friends are usually there—Mr. and Mrs. Austin Carteret.

Digitized by Google

No Wonder.

A young woman married a man who told her he was an "architect's assistant." She became disconsolate upon discovering next day that he assisted the architect by carrying bricks up a ladder in a hod."

Splendid List.

Parke: "Have you got a good list of names to select from for your new baby?" Lane: "Rather! My wife has kept a record of all the servant girls we have had during the past twelve months."

Quite Gratis.

Irate Parent (catching his clerk kissing his daughter): "Now, now, young man, I don't pay you for that kind of work." Clerk: "N—no, sir. And I don't propose to charge anything extra for it."

No Disadvantage.

Gentleman (to house agent): "The great disadvantage is that the house is so damp." House Agent: "Disadvantage, sir? Advantage, I call it. In case of fire it wouldn't be so likely to burn."

The Way of Some Women.

"Grace and Minnie have quarrelled, and are both miserable." "No, they have made friends, and are perfectly happy again." "How do you know?" "I saw them both crying together."

A Necessary Question.

Fond Father: "In giving you my daughter, Mr. Wildwed, I pass into your keeping the dearest thing I have on earth." Mr. Wildwed (anxiously): "How much does she cost you a year, may I ask?"

Complimentary.

Servant: "Oh, miss! The grocer's young man chucked me under the chin and kissed me!" Mistress (indignantly): "What impudence! I'll go to the door myself next time he calls." Servant: "Oh, miss, it'll be no use you going!"

It Would Have Been Good.

The little ones will keep on saying things. Six-year-old Mabel is industriously engaged in "cleaning out" a preserve jar which her mother has just emptied. Four-year-old Bobby looks on at her a while, and then blurts out: "I say, sis, don't you wish you could turn it inside out, so's you could lick it?"

Anticipating Troubles.

"Why do you order ten dozen handkerchiefs? What use can you have for them all?" asked a married lady of a young friend who was buying her trousseau. "There is no telling. Perhaps my husband will turn out badly, and then I'll want them all to dry my weeping eyes. Men are so unreliable nowadays," was the sad response.

A Much-needed Institution.

Mrs. Rusholme (of Lonelyhurst): "I'm so glad that the village council have decided to have a regular uniformed police force, like the city." Mr. Rusholme: "Quite an unnecessary thing, my dear, in a quiet, rural place like this." Mrs. Rusholme: "How can you say so, George? You know how impossible it is now to get a cook to stay with us!"

Making Certain.

"Great Scott! what are you writing your name in indelible ink on the cat for?" "Going to send her to the laundry, and I want to be sure she won't come back."

The Test.

Mrs. Workday: "Oh, I do like to see a strong, determined man." Mr. Workday (straightening): "So do I, my dear." Mrs. W.: "John, the coal scuttle is empty."

Then the Shopman Collapsed.

"Yes, sir," said the assistant, briskly, "we have lace of all kinds. Would you like to see Valenciennes or point lace?" "It's a shoe-lace I want," explained the customer.

A Guilty Conscience.

Teacher: "You have named all domestic animals save one. It has bristly hair, it hates a bath, and is fond of mud. Well, Tom?" Tom (shamefacedly): "That's me."

The Terrible Printer.

A dancing-master, in renewing his solicitations for patronage, wished to express his obligations for past favours, when the printer, by mistake, made him say, "Most respectfully offers his shanks."

Infant Solicitude.

A little girl, who had great kindness of heart for all the animal creation saw a hen preparing to gather her chickens under her sheltering wing, and shouted earnestly: "Oh! don't sit on those beautiful little birds, you great, ugly thing!"

A Little Mistake.

He: "You say there are no flowers for the dinner table. Where are the chrysanthemums I sent home?" She: "Oh, George, don't speak so loud, you might hurt Bridget's feelings; she didn't understand what they were, and has cooked them in milk."

The Modern Servant Girl.

She: "The play was excellent, except for one thing." He: "And what was that?" She: "The time extends over three months, and it shouldn't have been more than a week." He: "I'd like to know why?" She: "Because the same servant girl stays through it all."

The Innocent Girl.

"What nonsense all this is about men getting on their knees when they propose," said Mrs. Parslow to her dear friend. "My husband didn't do any such absurd thing when he asked me to marry him." "He did when he proposed to me," said the dear friend, without thinking.

A Different Matter.

She: "Oh, I am in an awful fix! I lost my diary in town yesterday. Just fancy some horrid person getting hold of it and reading it through." He: "Ha, ha! Well, that is a good joke. Had it your name in?" She: "No; but it had yours." He: "Great Scott! You had better advertise for it at once."

Could Prove a Lullaby.

"My wife will bear witness," said the prisoner at the bar, "that at the very time I am accused of entering Mr. Smith's premises I was engaged in walking the floor with my infant child in my arms, endeavouring to soothe it by singing 'Rock-a-bye, baby.'" "The prisoner is discharged," remarked the magistrate. "He can prove a lullaby!"

Height and Depth.

"Do you ever think, George, dear," she said, and her voice was soft and low, as befitted the perfect beauty of the night, "how closely true happiness is allied with tears?" "I don't believe I ever do," replied George. "Yes," she went on, looking up into his face, "when one is truly and wholly happy there is but little to divide a smile and a tear." "That's a fact," said George, "but I never thought of it before. There's nothing but the nose."

Digitized by Google

WINNIE'S FAILURE.

A Charming Little Story of a Hospital Probationer.

"I SHALL know the result of my probation term to-day," said Winnie Thompson to herself. And a chill of fear crept over her at the same moment.

She felt that the verdict would be unfavourable. She had tried hard to fulfil her duties as a nurse-probationer, but she was conscious of many shortcomings. Yet it might be that she had just scraped through, as some of the nurses phrased it, and she would be allowed to continue, with a chance of realising her ambition.

She had longed to live a life of helpfulness, and the career of a nurse appeared to her as the only one in which that ambition could be fully realised. What scope was there in the sleepy little country place where she had lived since birth? Only the humdrum duties of household work.

The summons to the matron's room came about eleven o'clock in the morning, and Winnie's heart gave a great jump when she received the call, although she had been expecting it all the morning. She could picture the calm, inscrutable countenance of Miss Halifax, the matron; she had tried to read that face several times, in the hope of gaining some clue to the judgment which Miss Halifax was forming of her capabilities, but she had not succeeded. She imagined the quiet voice, without intonation expressive of the least emotion, telling her that the decision was—what?

Winnie entered the matron's apartment in response to the formal invitation that followed her own timid knock. Miss Halifax was seated at her table, writing imperturbably; she glanced up at the probationer's face, finished the sentence which she had begun to write, and then turned her attention to Winnie.

"It is my duty, Miss Thompson, to inform you of the result of your probation term," she said in her clear, cold voice. "I do not think that you are the kind of girl who need to be led to the main point through a lot of useless preliminaries, so I propose to waste no words. You have not satisfied our requirements."

She knew it at last; the verdict which she had expected had now been pronounced, and there was nothing left to be done but to return to the humdrum life of her home at Midfall and try to forget her ambition. The blow was a hard one, even although anticipated, and Winnie's face went a shade paler.

Perhaps Miss Halifax observed this, for a more gentle look came into her grey eyes.

"It is not usual to give to probationers a full explanation of the reasons that have led to their rejection," she said, with just a trace of warmth in the ordinarily cold voice, "but I feel that something is due to you, exceptionally. You have not failed as many others have, through sheer incapacity; we recognise that you have worked hard and have shown ability to a fair extent. The fact is, your physical qualifications are not sufficient; you are not strong enough for the life you would choose. That life is a hard and very wearing one, and you would break down under the strain. It is better to recognise the fact now, than to go on and collapse at the very time when great reliance was being placed on you. It is easy to conceive that such a contingency might mean disaster in some serious cases."

It was quite a long speech for Miss Halifax, and Winnie understood that the matron was unbending to her as she never did to others.

"It is very kind of you to put it in that way, Miss Halifax," she succeeded in saying. "But I fear that I have been only a great failure. It is hard for me, as I—I did so hope to be——"

A lump in her throat prevented the utterance of the rest of the sentence. The tears came to her eyes and she could not see distinctly, so perhaps she was mistaken in thinking that Miss Halifax gazed at her with pitying sympathy. The impulse of the moment caused Winnie to sink on her knees and bury her face in Miss Halifax's lap, where she gave vent to her feelings in tears. Had anyone glanced into the room at that moment, the intruder would assuredly have refused to credit the evidence of her senses.

"Come, come, my dear, you must not think that all the world is a blank because a cherished ambition has not been realised. Only by experience do we mortals learn that every failure brings in its train fresh duties and responsibilities—that is, fresh opportunities. If you have failed in this, your failure will open up other paths of work."

"Oh, I'm not afraid," rejoined Winnie, rising and drying her eyes. "I have looked at you, Miss Halifax, and have so desired to follow the career which you have chosen and in which you have succeeded."

Just the trace of a flush appeared on the countenance of the matron at these words, and a slight quiver of the lips was visible for a second; then she was calm and self-possessed again.

"This life was not the one I had chosen," she replied in the same quiet voice. "It was adopted as the result of a failure. You say that I have succeeded in it. That proves what I have been trying to tell you!"

"If my task here is ended—as it is," said Winnie sadly, "I had better leave as quickly as I can. I have not much to pack, and there is a train at 2.30. Can I leave in time for that, Miss Halifax?"

The matron bowed and extended her hand for a farewell salutation. Winnie went to the dormitory and packed her things. After a hasty dinner and an equally hurried leave-taking, she departed to catch the train for home. The nurses were sorry to lose her, but none were able to spare the time to accompany her to the station.

She sent a telegram to her father to announce her home-coming, wondering how he would take it. And what would the people of the village think of her as a failure?

She sank into deep thought as the train sped along and was oblivious of all that was going on about her. She gradually became conscious of the fact that a baby was crying rather a lot in the corner; arousing herself from her meditations, she discovered that the only other occupant of the compartment was a young countrywoman, of weakly appearance, who was endeavouring to pacify the cross child.

Winnie's fondness for children was a matter of common comment, both at home and in the hospital, and she had spent the last week of her probation in the children's ward.

Digitized by Google

She saw that the mother was looking tired and ill, and physically unable to keep the infant quiet.

"Let me have the baby for a little while," said Winnie. "I think I can manage the young gentleman. You don't feel well, do you?"

"No, miss," answered the woman. "I always feel giddy and sick when I go anywhere by train. And I don't think I am very good at managing babies yet. He's my first, and I haven't had any experience of children, never having any little brothers or sisters. Oh, dear!"

The poor traveller, relieved of her burden, placed her hand to her forehead and looked like fainting. Winnie held the baby in her lap by means of one hand, while she drew a small packet from her bag with the other.

"Put one of these lozenges into your mouth, it will do you good. That's it. Now try to have a sleep in that corner and you will be refreshed when you wake up. I'll undertake to amuse the boy."

With a few words of thanks the poor woman lay back in the corner and closed her eyes; she was satisfied that Winnie knew something about children, and she marvelled at the fact that the boy was as "good as gold" with his new friend.

When Winnie's fellow passenger awoke she felt very much better, but she willingly permitted Winnie to hold the baby till she reached her destination. Winnie, who was going further, relinquished the baby with a feeling akin to regret.

"It was very good of you, miss," said the mother from the platform. "I'm thinking you'll be making some home very happy!"

Winnie laughed a trifle sadly, and the train moved out of the station. Her own home would not be a very happy place for her or through her; for was she not returning as a failure? Her father met her with the dog cart. She felt a little awkward, expecting to find him somewhat angry at her rejection, but he appeared much pleased to see her.

It was rather cool and a drizzling rain was falling. Winnie noticed that his cough was worse than it had been while she was at home.

"Yes, Winnie," he said, in reply to her question, "my cough is more troublesome than it was. Can't seem to shake off this bronchitis. Oh, yes, they do pretty well at home for me, but you see Carrie is only a girl, and she can't do things as you used to, or like your poor mother did when she was alive. Oh, I don't say as the cough is anything much!"

"I'll make you some of that broth, you know, dad," she cried, a peculiar pang going through her. "We'll soon have you all right."

How she blessed that dry course of lectures on bronchitis! Then there came into her mind a vague thought that she was to find her sphere of helpfulness in filling up these gaps, here and there, where no one else was handy; it did not appear to offer much scope, but it was better to be useful occasionally, as with that baby, than not at all. Occasionally? Why, the world was full of such occasions, they were always presenting themselves, and she would find enough to do!

"You remember Alec Royce?" said her father, interrupting her reverie. "Well, he's back again in the village—you know we are agitating for a charter, because Midfall is big enough to be a town now. Where was I? Oh, Royce! Well, he is back now; passed his legal examinations and taken up his father's business. The old gentleman intends to retire and hand it all over to Alec."

She had temporarily forgotten Alec Royce; they had been good friends before he went away.

Arriving at the old homestead, she was welcomed with delight by her younger sister and the two boys, younger still. She was soon "at home" in all senses of the expression.

It was past eight o'clock when Winnie sat down by the small fire that had been lighted in order to make the apartment more comfortable on this chilly autumn evening. Her father sat on the other side, enjoying his pipe after the bowl of broth made by Winnie, and his cough was certainly less troublesome. Carrie came to Winnie with a book in her hand.

"I'm so glad you've come back, Winnie. This algebra has worried me and I can't get the solution of this problem. I suppose it ought to be easy, but I don't see through the things so well now I haven't get you to help me."

"But you have got me to help you now!" laughed Winnie, and it was a happy laugh.

She soon had the problem neatly set down on paper so that Carrie could do it and understand it. Then the brothers wanted assistance. And the home itself had a more cosy appearance owing to the embellishing touches she had given it. By her side, on the table, was a note from Alec Royce, saying how glad he was to hear that she was home again, that he hoped she was home for good, and that he would give himself the pleasure of calling upon her the following day.

Winnie toyed with her pencil and meditated. She had been told that she was capable of making home a happy place; she looked about her and a new joy filled her heart. Like many others, she had failed to recognise that home offered quite a large field for the scope of usefulness and helpfulness. Failure brings fresh duties and responsibilities—that is, fresh opportunities. The words came back to her very vividly now, and she realised the truth contained in them. Taking up a half-sheet of paper she wrote—

"First failure × opportunities."

"Whatever is that?" inquired Carrie in surprise.

"That," replied Winnie, laughing and kissing her sister, "is an equation I have worked out this very day!"

Before Carrie could ask the meaning of this remark, enigmatical to her, there came a knock at the door, and Winnie saw the tall, handsome figure of Alec Royce enter.

"Hallo, Mr. Royce!" exclaimed Mr. Thompson heartily. His tone betrayed mild surprise, but that passed unnoticed. "I'm pleased to see you here again," he went on, shaking the young fellow by the hand. "I thought you were coming to-morrow, but the sooner the better. You haven't outgrown the room since you used to come—how long is it ago, Winnie?"

But Winnie was glad to evade answering that question by shaking hands with the visitor and offering him a chair. And the visitor was equally pleased to slip out of a reply to the remark about his not making his visit till the following day.

"It seems like old times to see you here once more—Winnie," he said earnestly, as he took the proffered seat. He hesitated before pronouncing her name; he was going to say "Miss Thompson," but he chanced it, and said "Winnie" as in the old days. "How are you getting on? Your father, when I met him on the way to the station, told me you were coming home for—for good, I think he said."

He wondered if she would think more of him now that he had passed his exams, and had taken up his father's business; he had had rather ambitious notions at one time, believing that there was not enough scope there for real usefulness. Winnie, on her side, was wondering if he would think less of her when he heard that she had been a failure.

"I intend to stay here," she mustered up courage to tell him. Then, gaining more courage as she looked into the honest, kindly eyes, she continued—"I have learnt, by failure in one direction, that there are opportunities in plenty everywhere, even in the most unlikely places, for useful work if one looks for it."

Alec Royce gazed at her intently, and her eyes dropped

Digitized by Google

"How warm you have made it here!" exclaimed Alec. "I have had rather a heavy day, and my head feels a trifle confused; let us have a look round the garden."

He rose and held out his hand. Winnie accepted the invitation without clearly understanding the reason. The younger chilldren looked amused at the notion of looking round the garden in the dark, but their father, trying to appear very grave, told them—when Alec and Winnie were gone—that they would be able to see a great many things in the dark which they couldn't see now, as soon as they were as old as Winnie.

"Seems as if that portrait of Winnie that I showed him the other day has made him want to see her before to-morrow," mused Mr. Thompson, a smile gradually spreading over his countenance.

"Winnie," said Alec Royce to his companion, "I must call you by the old name. Winnie, people who are in earnest, as you are, only fail when they try to do something for which they are not fitted. Winnie, isn't it possible to find a suitable occupation here? Is it not a worthy occupation to fill the position of helpmeet to——"

"I thought—that you were not coming—till to-morrow!" cried Winnie in desperation.

She guessed the avowal that was coming; she could not decide whether she desired to hear it or not, and, in her attempt to put it off, she made the very observation that hastened it.

"I couldn't wait till to-morrow, Winnie!" he declared, halting and standing in front of her. "I couldn't wait! And if you had not returned soon, I should have gone to London to tell you that I want you! You must come to me!" He took her in his arms. "Tell me," he pleaded more gently, "that you want me, too!"

Winnie opened her lips to say that she was not sure about it, but a sudden thrill told her that she would be speaking falsely. She laid her head on his shoulder and murmured:

"Yes, I want you, Alec!"

"But what about father and the children?" asked Winnie suddenly, as they were retracing their steps to the house.

"We shall live next door to them, which means that you will find so many opportunities for usefulness in the two houses that you yourself will require some assistance. Isn't that sufficient for you?"

And they both laughed joyously.

"I am glad I went away, though," said Winnie, "for it taught me to understand and secure the happiness within my grasp, but unrecognised till now."

G. Merriam.

A Riddle and its Answer.

He: "Why is justice represented as a woman?" She: "Because her work is never done."

Could Give Testimonials.

"Have you ever loved another, Tom?" said Miss Gush to her intended. "Certainly," replied he. "Do you wish written testimonials from my previous sweethearts?"

Clearing Weather.

Tramp (to buxom farmer's wife, standing in the porch and looking up at the sky): "How's the weather this morning, ma'am?" Farmer's Wife (turning suddenly and catching up a pail of suds): "Clear." And the tramp cleared.

What the Penny Saved Her.

Mother: "I gave you a penny to be good yesterday, and to-day you are just trying to show how bad you can be." Willie: "Yes, but I am just trying to show you to-day that you got the worth of your money yesterday."

Fatal Handwriting.

"Do you believe in this talk about discovering a man's character from his handwriting?" "I do," replied Mr. Hasbin Swift, with a sigh. "Ever know of its being tried?" "Yes, and with fatal efficacy. The experiment is most successful when the handwriting is read aloud in court."

Your Editor Chats.

A large number of those who are now readers of Short Stories were not readers when the present serial started, and possibly did not think it worth while picking up the story half way through. Such readers will be interested to hear that another serial story will begin in the course of a few weeks.

This story is one which I have had some little difficulty in securing. Of course, every Editor believes that the serial story which he has got is better than anybody else's, and that a story like it has never been written before. I won't go so far as to say this in my case, but I will say that all my readers who anticipate a treat in the way of fiction when they look forward to this new serial story, will not be disappointed.

A new serial story depends for its success upon two things—1. That the incidents depicted shall be of such nature, and in such quantities as to hold the attention of the reader and arouse his or her interest from the first to the last. 2. That the story shall be written in such a simple and concise way as to enable the reader to see clearly the dramatic incidents which the author himself sees in his mental pictures.

In both these respects our new serial is very striking. It is crammed with incident, but not in such quantities that it cloys or tires the reader, and it is written in a bright, clear, fresh manner, without being so sparkling that it unduly exhilarates.

It is, in point of fact, a mental feast—a feast of fiction.

When you have had an opportunity of dipping well into it, you will agree with me that your little favourite, Short Stories, is not only keeping up its standard, but is even improving!

And now, as to this week's competition. Once again I am going to ask you to get your wits together, and to construct for me a sentence of not more than twelve words, each word containing only such letters as can be found in the two words "Short Stories." The reader who sends me in the most sensible sentence on some topic of the day, under these circumstances, will receive one of our well known solid silver pencil-cases. As is our custom, we will award ten consolation gifts, which shall consist of pretty little rolled gold hearts, and rolled gold charms. Post-cards only please, marked "Topic," and addressed to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, W.C. These must reach us not later than the first post on Tuesday morning, September 2nd.

Below will be found the names of the prize-winners in the "Reverse" competition. The first award of a silver pencil-case goes to Donald Pope, 5 Vernon Place, Birkenhead, while consolation gifts go to the following—J. Jones, 5 Worcester Place, Swansea; Miss M. Ryan, 21 Abbott's Road, East Ham; T. R. Morris, 27 Richmond Road, Oxford; J. J. C. Robinson, 60 Sherrard Road, Forest Gate; J. S. Ryan, 21 Abbott's Road, East Ham; H. Barnes, 2 Vauxhall Walk, S.E.; Mrs. Robinson, 60 Sherrard Road, Forest Gate; D. G. Jelley. 85 Ermine Road, Ladywell; D. E. Jones, 69 Beechfield Street, Mount Pottinger, Belfast.

Digitized by Google

OUR THRILLING SERIAL.

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

By HENRY FARMER.

The Thread of the Story.

A BELT full of diamonds has been stolen from a safe belonging to Mr. Mansfield, a wealthy banker, by Seaton Revelle (who is a friend of the banker's) and an accomplice named Benjamin Beard. Revelle accuses Alec Scarsdale, who is in love with Esther, Mr. Mansfield's daughter, of the crime, and he is sentenced to sixteen years' penal servitude.

Mr. Crump, late Chief-Inspector at Scotland Yard, feeling sure Scarsdale is innocent and Revelle is guilty, determines to prove the latter's guilt.

Mr. Mansfield as fully believes in Scarsdale's guilt as does Esther in his innocence, and his friendship for Revelle increases. Revelle constantly visits the banker's house in an endeavour to win Esther's love, but so far has not prospered at all. While talking with the girl one day, Mr. Mansfield's new maid, Vance, enters the room with a tray bearing cups of coffee. No sooner does she catch sight of Revelle than she drops the tray, and, pointing to Revelle, screams: "That—that man is my husband!" But Revelle, by sheer force of will, compels her to acknowledge her mistake.

At about this time Esther and Mr. Crump are walking together when they observe Vance about to throw herself into the reservoir. Crump stops her just in time—he and Esther taking her back to The Woodlands. Later on she is placed in the county asylum from which she escapes, only to be murdered by Revelle. "Accidental death," however, is the verdict returned.

Mr. Mansfield thinks it best that Esther shall leave Warham for a little holiday. It is while changing at Roxeter Junction en route for Gurlston Bay that Fate brings about a meeting between Esther and Alec, who is on his way to Wrackam. An impassioned scene takes place on the platform. Before many days are passed Seaton Revelle also journeys to Gurlston Bay, and it is while there that they hear of the plucky rescue from drowning of a warder at Wrackam Prison by Alec Scarsdale, and, subsequently of his rumoured escape from prison.

The rumour proves to be true. Alec had indeed managed to escape from the prison, and taking a boat had pulled down the river, after purloining some sailors' clothes from an empty barge. Just when he is thoroughly exhausted, however, he is run down by a sailing barge. His boat is smashed, but Alec is rescued and taken on board. The barge proves to be the Mary Ann, bound for Gurlston Bay. Arrived at its destination, it is hardly moored to the pier before Esther, who is taking a walk, arrives at the pier to watch the unloading.

Shortly afterwards Revelle saunters up, when suddenly Esther catches sight of Alec in the barge. With great presence of mind she leads Revelle away from the spot before he discovers whom she has seen. Late that night, after everyone has gone to bed, Esther contrives a meeting with Alec in the drawing-room of the house in which she is staying. The two lovers are clasped in each other's arms when a man's footsteps are suddenly heard outside the door, and a minute after Revelle rushes into the room. He passes Esther without seeing her, and gives chase to Scarsdale. When he returns he has sprained his ankle and missed his man.

Crump now decides to burglariously enter Revelle's house at Warham and search Revelle's belongings. Aided by his nephew, Police-constable Wilton, who engages the butler's attention, Crump gets into Revelle's dressing-room and begins his search. He discovers a portmanteau with a false bottom. In this he finds a paper showing that Revelle and a parachutist named Balderini are one and the same man, also some letters from his wife, Vance, but no trace can he find of information regarding the stolen diamonds.

The morning after Esther's meeting with Alec, she is strolling by herself along the cliffs towards the celebrated Gurlston caves. It is here that Alec has taken refuge. Suddenly she loses her footing in the fog and slips over the edge, just managing to stop herself falling to the bottom by clinging to a ledge. But Alec has heard her scream, and rushes to her assistance. He has just secured a rope round her waist and round a tree on the edge of the cliff when Revelle arrives on the scene.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE CLIFFS.

REVELLE had caught sight of a man lying half-way over the edge of the cliff, the rope about his waist made fast to a tree behind him. For the moment, his face was invisible.

Another step forward, and the whole situation was revealed to Revelle. He could see a woman on the crumbling ledge below, a rope about her waist also. Her grey face upturned. He caught his breath with a sharp hiss, and reeled, momentarily unnerved.

Esther Mansfield!

She had become more to him than he himself had realised. Godless selfishness was the key-note to his character; but, after himself, she represented more to him than anything else in the world. An overmastering passion for her had grown up within him. His damaged ankle was forgotten. He sprang forward, meaning to go to the assistance of her rescuer; yet, for all the intensity of the moment, conscious of a feeling of jealousy. His eyes were fixed staringly on the would-be rescuer, who, at that instant, shifted his position a little, as he strained down with his outstretched hands.

Alec Scarsdale!

With telegraphic speed the explanation of the mystery of the previous night flashed through his brain, and with it a wild wave of hate. It was followed by a horrible inspiration—an inspiration how to be quit of his rival for ever, and how to put Esther under a lasting obligation to him.

It had been a matter of seconds, all this. The devil had been at Seaton Revelle's elbow to prompt him, as he had prompted him that stormy night when the balloon was skimming over Avesham Common.

And action followed hard upon the inspiration. Revelle's hand sought a pocket, whipped something from it. Limping, but moving swiftly, he reached the tree to which the rope was made fast.

Digitized by Google

"One moment now, beloved!" whispered down Scarsdale. Then a hoarse cry.

The rope that held Esther's rescuer had been deliberately cut!

Scarsdale shot headlong forward, over Esther, down!

A piercing scream of agony from Esther; then oblivion—merciful oblivion! But the rope round her waist held fast, and a moment later, went strainedly taut. Slowly, jerkily she was being dragged up to the top of the cliff; but it was more than one man's task, and the rope was beginning to fray against the sharp edge.

Revelle glanced wildly round. A couple of coastguardsmen were racing along the cliff towards him.

"For mercy's sake, hurry up!" he shouted.

What had been impossible for one man was possible for three. A few moments later, Esther, unconscious, was lying on the turf, Revelle bending over her.

"Get to Gurlston Hall, one of you," he cried. "Tell them to send along a carriage. Don't alarm them! Say that all is well now!"

One of the men hurried off. Then Revelle, supporting Esther in his arms, turned to the other man.

"Good Heavens!" he whispered. "Awful! There was another fellow—he had made himself fast to the tree by a rope—he was straining over, trying to reach down to her when I sighted him—then, before I could get to him—awful! the rope broke—he went over headlong. Oh, my God!"

He dashed a hand across his eyes as if he were trying to blot out some horrid sight.

"He can't have had a chance. The rocks——"

"It's an awful drop," cried the coastguardsman, hurrying to the edge and going down on his knees, "but it's deep water below."

He was peering down; but he could see nothing.

"Look here," he cried. "I'll get down to the caves, on to the ledge."

He hurried away. The moment he had disappeared, Revelle's arms tightened round the unconscious Esther. He pressed a burning kiss on her white lips; then, having laid her gently on the ground, sprang to the tree. A swift glance round, then he had whipped out a pocket-knife, and was fraying the end of the rope, the end that had the appearance of having been cut through cleanly; but when he had done, he had altered all that.

When the coastguardsman returned, Revelle was again supporting the still unconscious Esther in his arms, a strained expression on his white features. The man shook his head.

"I'm afraid that it's all up!" he said, in a low voice. "There was just a chance; but there's no sign of anybody. Who was he? What was he like?"

"A stranger," answered Revelle hoarsely. "I didn't even catch a glimpse of his face. Thank Heaven, at last!"

A carriage was rolling over the turf towards them. It came to a standstill. John Mansfield sprang out.

"Oh, my child!" he sobbed. "My Esther!"

It was only as they were bearing her to the carriage that she opened her eyes. There was a wild, strange look in them.

"Alec!" she whispered. "Alec! Oh, the mist, the gathering mist!"

Then she gave a low cry, and started to babble incoherently. There was a look of mute agony in her father's eyes as he glanced at Revelle.

Would her reason survive the frightful shock?

Revelle helped to bear her to her room. She was in a high fever when the doctor arrived, and raving deliriously. Again and again she cried out that he was innocent. Then she seemed to be living through those frightful moments on the crumbling ledge. Then she pleaded to those who watched beside her not to keep Alec from her.

It came as a stunning shock to the laughing merry party that came back from Reefe Castle, the news of the ghastly accident, the news that Esther Mansfield was suffering from brain-fever, hovering between life and death. It was only when the men were gathered together in the smoking-room, talking in whispers, that Revelle, looking a broken man described what had happened. Who was the man who had gone over the edge of the cliff? If it were someone who lived in the neighbourhood, surely he would be missed before long, and his name known?

One man in the smoking-room knew his name well enough. And a suspicion of whom perhaps it might have been had flashed through another man's brain.

Gerald Phipps knew that Alec Scarsdale had been in the neighbourhood. Was it possible that he was the unknown man? If so, what a ghastly tragedy! It was only a surmise, a suspicion; but it haunted him.

A great gloom was over the house. Presently the men melted away out of the smoking-room, all but Revelle. He sat in an easy-chair, his head resting on his hands, his attitude that of a man broken down by grief. Nor was it acting! Something akin to remorse was gnawing at his heart; but he was not thinking of the man whom he believed that he had sent to his death, but of Esther. And with remorse, there was a leaden feeling of failure. In her delirium, it had been Alec, Alec, always Alec! His white, refined hands opened and shut. Passion had made a slave of the man who had prided himself on his self-control and his mastery over his emotions. It was passion, jealous passion, that had mastered him, momentarily carried him away on the edge of the cliff, an almost mad longing to be quit for ever of his rival. And he was quit of him now, he told himself, and yet—again the white hands opened and shut. He seemed to hear again those delirious babblings. Alec, always Alec!

And his white hands went on opening and shutting, those murderous white hands of his!

You may murder a man, you may murder a woman, but you cannot murder love!

Revelle looked up as the door opened. John Mansfield entered with tottering footsteps. He sank down in a chair, and clasped his forehead.

"Revelle," he whispered, "she keeps asking for him in her delirium. Is it only the wanderings of her poor mind? But she says that it was Scarsdale who saved her? This—this is more than I can bear!"

And the old man broke down utterly. There was a long silence. Revelle's hands were still opening and shutting.

"'Only let me know,' she cries," choked the grief-stricken father at last, "'only let me know that he is not dead! I can bear it if they take him back to prison. He is innocent, and we are going to prove his innocence—but only tell me that he is not dead!'"

A grey shadow stole across Revelle's white face.

"We are going to prove his innocence!"

He had been telling himself that she was forgetting. Had she been living a lie all along? Was he no nearer to her now than when he started? The thought was a knife-stab into his vanity as well as into his heart.

"We are going to prove his innocence!"

Proof of Scarsdale's innocence meant proof of his guilt.

And "We!" Was there another or others?

The white hands continued to open and shut. Perhaps what had happened that day had unnerved him. It was not often that he was conscious of a sense of fear. But it was upon him now, inspired by that one-syllabled word "We."

"I had hoped," he said, in a low, strained voice, "that she was beginning to forget him!"

"I had hoped so," choked out John Mansfield, "but she hasn't, and, for her sake, I'd give my right hand for proof of Alec Scarsdale's innocence. Oh, God! Her life is hanging in the balance, Revelle. It might make all the difference!"

Revelle rose to his feet rather unsteadily, shook the banker's hand in silence, then left the room. He made his way back limpingly to his friend's house. Letters, that had been forwarded from The Firs by Railton, awaited him. Mechanically he opened them, one after another—they were, most of them, rather pressing demands from creditors for money.

"Yes," he muttered irritably. "As soon as my ankle's really better, I shall have to bring that matter of the Normanhurst jewels off. Confound it all, worries never come singly!"

Digitized by Google

CUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

Our Powerful Serial.

Then he lapsed again into a state of gloom.

* * *

Had he struck the water aslant, the life must have been knocked out of him; but in that awful drop Scarsdale had circled completely round, and plunged into the water feet foremost. He reached the surface, half-stunned, more dead than alive. It was instinct rather than consciousness that made him strike out towards the rocks at the base of the cliff. An in-rolling wave lifted him up and carried him forward on to a rock. He clutched hold. The water receded. He dragged himself up a little, too numbed, too battered even to think. Presently a stone, crashing down and striking the rock to which he was clinging, seemed to awaken him. He glanced up, still panting frightfully for breath. High above him, dark against the whiteness of the cliff, he saw an indistinct figure being drawn up, then disappear over the brow.

He knew that Esther had been saved!

How, by whom, he did not attempt to reason. She was saved! He closed his eyes, still too numbed for any acute sensations. For a few moments he clung on to the rock, still panting as though he would never recover his breath, the upper half of his body rising and falling convulsively. The rock to which he was clinging was close up to the base of the cliff, and some little way from the ledge of the caves. When the coastguardsman had approached the edge and glanced about him, the clinging, dripping figure had been invisible to him, screened by the rock that was unapproachable from the ledge, except by boat.

She was saved! An indistinct voice seemed to be murmuring the words in his ears. He opened his eyes and glanced dazedly about him, still panting. To reach the ledge meant a swim. He closed his eyes again. He felt weak, helpless as a child, as if all the strength had been battered out of him. The rope must have broken. Well, that mattered not now. Esther was saved! His brain for the time was incapable of grasping, realising more than that, and, for the time, it sufficed. He shifted his position, turned over on to his back. The rock slanted. He fixed his feet against a projecting crag. There was no need to cling on now with his arms. The position was more restful. Then, gradually his brain began to work more normally, and, with that, came agony. He lived through those awful moments atop the cliff again. Yet still the thought that Esther was safe was paramount. Someone must have come along the cliff, almost at the moment that the rope broke. God be thanked for that! But what of the shock? Oh, Heaven, what of the shock?

He opened his eyes again. There was a glare in them.

Then it occurred to him that he must have been seen. Men would be coming to look for him. He glanced across at the ledge. It was precipitous save in one place where steps had been roughly hewn, work of the old-time smugglers. The rope was still wound about his waist. He untied the knots. The rope must have broken; but he mechanically glanced at the end. The strands had all the appearance of having been severed cleanly through with a knife!

A curious, thoughtful expression passed over his ashen face. He wound the rope round his waist again. An unnatural calm seemed to have come over him. He slipped off the rock into the sea, and struck out for the ledge. When he gained it, he clambered up and made his way into one of the caves. Having unwound the rope, he concealed it beneath some small stones in a corner. Scarcely had he done so, when the sounds of voices reached him. It must be searchers—coming to look for him!

But did they realise that they were looking for an escaped convict?

Since his escape from Wrackam prison, he had seen no newspaper, or he might have known that it was generally believed that he had been drowned in the Thames. The voices were those of searchers who were coming to look for a dead, not a living man.

Scarsdale glanced round the cave. It was not the one in which he had spent the night. There was no tunnelling leading to caves beyond. He was in a trap. Footsteps were sounding on the rock. It was too late to slip out, and in elsewhere. He took advantage of the only place of concealment the cave afforded, a fragment of rock, once part of the roof, that had fallen near the entrance. He crouched down behind it. The search-party, composed mostly of coastguardsmen, halted just outside the cave.

"Mr. Revelle—that was the gentleman's name; he's staying along with Mr. Winter—said the rope gave before he could get to him. He didn't have time to see much of the poor chap; but his clothes gave him the look of a seafaring man. He went over head first. He must have struck the water with a force enough to knock the life out of him. You see, the cliff hangs over a bit, and he'd fall clear of the rocks at the base. No, we'll have a look round for form's sake; but I'm afraid we shan't learn anything till the tide's run out, even if we do then—poor chap! He saved the poor young lady's life—at least, we hope it is saved. I'm told that she's terrible bad!"

Then the party scattered. No one thought of looking in the caves for the body of the man who had fallen from the cliff into the sea.

Scarsdale still crouched in his place of concealment. Revelle, always Revelle! So he had been the eye-witness of the "giving" of the rope!

"Giving!" It had been cut through! A fierce, mad hunger for revenge had seized Scarsdale when the words had reached him; but it was only momentary. What had followed had driven it from him. Revelle, revenge were forgotten.

"He saved the poor young lady's life—at least, we hope it is saved. I'm told that she's terrible bad!"

What was revenge, what was freedom compared with the life of the woman he loved!

And her life was in danger. Oh, but he must know more. And yet—he thought of his freedom now! To endeavour to find out meant risking it. To be captured meant to be torn from her irrevocably, dragged back to prison, where no news would reach him for months.

How was he to find out how it fared with Esther, and convey to her the news of his salvation from death? He was experiencing an agony more acute than he had ever previously suffered!

After the searchers had left the ledge he crept out, his wet clothes clinging coldly to his limbs, a wild, strange-looking figure, on the haggard, unshaved face the expression and the lines of an old man. The frightful experience that he had been through had strained every nerve fibre in his body. Time only would tone down the memory of it all.

He told himself that he could do nothing till after nightfall; then, somehow, he would, must find out how it fared with the woman he loved!

A FRIEND IN NEED.

When Gerald Phipps left the smoking-room, he had sauntered out of the house. He was—to use his own expression—feeling frightfully cut up about Miss Mansfield. He alone knew the solution of the mystery of the previous night, and since his interview with her that morning he had conceived an immense admiration for her. As he made his way up the road leading to the cliffs, he was again wondering if by any chance the unknown man who had saved her life could have been the escaped convict of the clandestine meeting of the night before. Had they perhaps arranged some subsequent meeting? He shook his head.

Digitized by Google

"By Jove, but, if that were so, it would be most frightfully tragic!"

When he reached the scene of the disaster, a group of men and women was gathered round the tree, from which the rope had been removed. One or two folk, who counted not giddiness among their physical failings, were standing on the brink of the cliff, staring down. The young 'Varsity man paused for a moment, then passed on, and made his way down to the caves. The wind was rising. Seeking shelter behind a boulder, he sat himself down, and lighted a cigarette.

"By Jove!" he muttered, staring thoughtfully in front of him. "But this has cut me up awfully. Awfully splendid of her to stick to that fellow through thick and thin, good and bad report, and carry herself so pluckily. There must be a tremendous amount of fine stuff in him. I wish to goodness that I could have done something more to have helped her, I do, 'pon my word! And now this ghastly business! It's too ghastly for words!"

The grey shadows of evening were creeping up above the level of the horizon. The boulder that gave him shelter shut out all view of the caves behind him.

"She's a most awfully sweet girl, and I hope to Heaven that she will come through all right. Well, I suppose everybody will be clearing off to-morrow?"

A strange-looking figure was creeping out of one of the caves behind him. It moved towards the edge, and came to a standstill beside the boulder.

"Oh, God! Only to know!"

The words were spoken aloud in a strained, hoarse voice.

With a start, Phipps leant forward, and glanced round the boulder.

Not two yards away stood a man, hatless, his rough clothes shrunken. His hair was streaked with grey, his emaciated features furrowed like an old man's. His hands were clenched. He was staring out at the sea, all unconscious of anybody's near presence. There was a world of unmistakable tragedy in the man's attitude, in his expression. For many a day after, that figure haunted the young 'Varsity man.

"Esther!"

With the utterance of the name the brown hands had come together in a convulsive clasp.

A thought had already flashed upon Gerald Phipps, and he now knew, felt as certain as if the man himself had told him, that this was convict 35, Alec Scarsdale! And this actual glimpse of him had revealed to him in a moment, far more realistically than any newspaper account could have done, what the man had, and was suffering! He meant to help the fellow, do for him all that lay within his power.

"I say—er——"

Scarsdale started at the sound of the words spoken almost at his elbow. He took a backward step, a hunted, desperate glare conjured up in his eyes. His hands were clenched and ready to strike. Phipps had risen to his feet. He thrust his hands into his pockets by way of assuring the other of his pacific intentions.

"I say," he went on, "you needn't get flurried, don't you know. I—well—er—I mean to say that I haven't the slightest intention of giving you away!"

The sincerity of the rather incoherent speech was obvious. Scarsdale's hands relaxed.

"You know me?"

"I fancy so. You're Scarsdale!"

"Yes!"

"Was it you who saved Miss Mansfield's life—who went over the cliff?"

"I went over the cliff!" answered Scarsdale hoarsely. "You know her! For God's sake tell—tell me how she is? Quick, don't look at me like that, man! Tell me!"

"She's ill, very ill," was the low, quickly spoken answer, "but bear up, man! Not so ill that there's not hope."

Scarsdale reeled.

"And," went on Phipps rapidly, "and, as soon as she's—she's able to understand things, I'm going to see that she

All Colours and all Classes.

It is really amazing how far and wide an article travels when once the British public sets upon it the seal of merit. It appears from an interview with the manager of the Bile Bean Co., that orders are now daily received from the cold wastes of Siberia, from the burning plains around Khartoum, from the icy north, and from Equatorial Africa; from parched lands, and from the cool sea shore. Only yesterday orders were received and executed from the following widely distant places: Boulogne, Bombay, Trinidad, Barcelona, Morocco, Essequibo, Calcutta, Madras, Allahabad, Assam, Constantinople, Middleburg (Cape Colony), Foxton (New Zealand), Belgium, Malta, Ontario, Lucknow, Jamaica, St. Johns (Antigua Island, West Indies), Cape Town, and Lausanne.

As an example of the widely removed races and classes who daily use Bile Beans, the manager pointed out that two boxes drawn indiscriminately from those about to be posted were addressed—one to a poor native worker on the Slave Coast of Western Africa, and the other to a member of the British Government's Intelligence Department at Khartoum.

This world-wide and well-deserved reputation has, of course, only been won by Bile Beans after many years trial, and because they have proved themselves the greatest household medicine of modern times.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. Mrs. Conyers, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

Digitized by Google

learns that you're safe. I'll see to that! But, look here, people may be coming down on to the ledge at any moment. It's not safe to talk here. I know my way about the caves. Let's get into them!"

But Scarsdale had not heard the last part of the speech.

"As soon as she's able to understand—what do you mean?"

"She was delirious—when I left Gurlston Hall. But come into the caves. Don't give way, man; while there's life there's hope!"

"And I can't go to her!" whispered Scarsdale. "Can't be with her!"

He struck his forehead in his agony. Phipps took him by the arm.

"Come into the caves."

Scarsdale had found a friend—a friend who had been won over to his side by Esther.

It was quite dark when Gerald Phipps returned to the Hall. Under his buttoned-up coat, wrapped round his waist, he carried the portion of the rope that Scarsdale had taken with him over the cliff. His boyish face wore an expression of suppressed excitement. His first act was to ask after Esther. He was told that the fever still raged, that she recognised no one. Then he hurried away to his room, and locked away the piece of rope. Dinner, that evening, was a silent, sad meal. John Mansfield was not present. Most of the guests had already arranged for their departure on the morrow. When the gentlemen retired after dinner to the smoking-room, Phipps did not join them. He retired to his bedroom for a short time. When he emerged, he was wearing a loose "Raglan" overcoat, the pockets of which had rather a full look.

When he left the Hall, he again made his way up the hill towards the cliffs, a cigarette between his lips, endeavouring to bear himself unconcernedly. Between his bedroom and the front door he had encountered no one; but had anybody witnessed his departure and his return, some hour and a half later, he might have remarked upon the fact that, whereas Gerald Phipps had left wearing an overcoat, he returned without one.

Some quarter of an hour after his return a man, wearing a "Raglan" overcoat remarkably like that worn by the young 'Varsity man—when he left the Hall, passed down the road leading from the cliffs. When he reached the gates of Gurlston Hall, he slackened down, quickened again, as if undecided between two courses.

She was lying there, hovering between life and death. Only a stone's throw away, yet he must not go to her!

Scarsdale, wearing the clothes that Phipps had smuggled out of the house, money now in his pocket sufficient to carry him to London, came to a standstill.

It was folly, mad folly, to stop!

For Esther's sake—so the young 'Varsity man had told him—he must not refuse money; must get away and try to keep his freedom. It was right, theoretically, but when it came to the carrying out, terribly hard!

Scarsdale still stood motionless, as though a magnet riveted him to the ground.

To have to leave, not knowing!

He was moving again now; but not forward—across towards the gates.

It was madness to linger in that neighbourhood after what had happened only the night before. Phipps had begged him to go direct to the station. He was in the right; but the carrying of it out was terribly hard!

He reached the gates. Only the night before he had held her in his arms. He seemed to feel again her burning, loving kiss on his lips, and now she was lying in there——

He reeled like a drunkard! Dying perhaps, dying!

FACE TO FACE.

"It's been an eventful night and day, Revelle; but in both cases you've figured as the hero. It's most grievous about poor Miss Mansfield!"

Dinner was over. Winter, the friend with whom Revelle was staying, was a bachelor. Coffee and liqueurs had been served, cigars lighted.

Revelle was not looking himself as he stirred his coffee listlessly.

"Sympathy," went on his host, "is always hard to express in words; but you know that you have mine. We must hope for the best, old chap!"

Like many others, he had believed that an engagement between Revelle and Esther was only a matter of time.

Revelle drank his coffee and rose up.

"I know you'll excuse me," he said, "if I go round to the Hall; but the suspense is almost more than I can bear. I can't endure to be away from the place for long."

"Of course I should come with you, but I asked some fellows to drop in to-night for a game of billiards after dinner."

Not long after Revelle was walking limpingly towards Gurlston Hall. He had spoken the truth when he said that he could not bear to be away from the place for long. His suffering was real.

As he neared the gates he caught sight of a shadowy figure leaning upon one of them, its back turned to him. There was something indefinably suggestive of strain about the figure. He knew that, in consequence of the affair of last night, the police were keeping watch on the place, and it occurred to him that the man might be a detective.

It was only when Revelle was close upon him, so close that he was about to ask him to allow him to pass, that the man turned round with a little start as if just at that moment he had heard the sounds of Revelle's approach.

As he was in the act of moving away quickly, Revelle stared curiously into his face.

Simultaneously both men stopped dead.

Recognition had been instantaneous and mutual.

It was not often that Revelle exhibited signs of fear; but a look of terror flashed from his dilated eyes.

He was staring into the face of the man whom he believed he had removed from his path for ever.

Esther had driven all other thoughts from Scarsdale's mind, but there had been many a moment in the past, on the parade ground, in the cell, in the quarry, when he had prayed that it might be granted him to meet face to face the man who had so irreparably wronged him. That moment had come! His face was white and rigid as marble.

After having been torn from the woman he loved, degraded in the eyes of the world, after more than a year's soul and body breaking imprisonment, after what had happened, only that morning a-top of the cliff, Alec Scarsdale at last stood face to face with Seaton Revelle.

A moment of motionlessness and silence that seemed an eternity, then all the passion and hate, so long pent up, burst their dam, and, flooding the soul of the man who had been so frightfully injured, made him mad!

With a snarl like that of some animal, Scarsdale flew at Revelle's throat. The impact almost bore Revelle to the ground.

"Help!" he gurgled out, as a grip of iron tightened round his throat.

The two men seemed to become one.

But the gurgling cry had penetrated through an open window to the ears of a number of men who were smoking and talking together in low voices.

"That sounded like 'Help!'" cried one of them, springing to his feet.

There was a rush from the room.

Outside, when they reached the gates, they could see two figures in the middle of the road swaying together. They

Digitized by Google

ASTHMA

WHY ? ? is it generally thought that there is no cure for ASTHMA, CHRONIC BRONCHITIS, SHORTNESS OF BREATH, EMPHYSEMA, BLOOD-SPITTING, HAY FEVER, and other Lung Complaints.

BECAUSE ! ! the usual treatments only confine themselves to combating single symptoms instead of attacking the root of the disease.

BE SURE THERE IS ONE

ABSOLUTE LASTING CURE.

Sufferers will receive post free,

FREE OF CHARGE,

particulars of the famous WEIDHAAS HOME TREATMENT when applying to THE PAUL WEIDHAAS HYGIENIC INSTITUTE, 16 T.A. Buckingham Rd., Brighton.

Mr. Weidhaas has tried the Treatment on himself, after having been given up as incurable, and cured himself, and had them practised it for over 19 years in many thousands of special cases. Many having suffered for over 40 years have been cured by his Treatment (in some instances even at the age of 70 or 80 years), after having been GIVEN UP AS INCURABLE.

No interference with daily occupation if you suffer from COLD FEET. Send description of complaint, and mention this paper. Read the following Testimonial, one out of thousands received:

ASTHMA (8 Years' Standing) CURED.

Mrs. A. Buck, in applying for the Treatment for her son, said: "My boy, as a child, had croup, and when he was about 6 years of age he had whooping cough very bad. When the fits of coughing came on, sometimes blood used to spurt out of his mouth and nose, but since there has never been any blood in any way. When he was about 8 years of age he began to notice there was a tightness and wheezing if he ever exerted himself or got excited. From 12 to about 13½ years he had Asthma very bad. No sleep all night. I used to have to sit up with him. He could not lie down. Sometimes I have had to take him to the window to get breath, for he seemed at times as if he must be suffocated. The doctor used to give him some medicine, but nothing seemed to do him much good. Sometimes it comes on now if he gets a cold or over-exerts himself, or through a sudden change of weather from cold to heat. It comes on like a cold and he goes to bed and goes to sleep for about two or three hours, and then wakes up feeling very tight on the back and chest, and wheezing and shortness of breath."

W. BUCK (From a photo).

After a full course of the treatment, the patient writes, with a letter of thanks from Mrs. Buck: "I have been a great sufferer at times from Asthma. Often when attacks come on I could get no sleep for two or three nights, and often could not lie down, but had to be propped up with pillows. But I am very thankful to say that I am quite cured after 6 months of your wonderful treatment. I am sure I do not know how to thank you enough for all you have done for me in restoring me to health.—W. BUCK, 19,083 F., South Nutfield."

(Full address on application.)

The Director is prepared to pay to any Charitable Institution if the above is not a genuine extract from the patient's own letter. The original may be seen at the Paul Weidhaas Institute by any bona-fide enquirers.

£1,000

CURABLE

KAPUTINE cures NEURALGIA equally as well as HEADACHE. NEVER FAILS. KAPUTINE is USED as well as recommended by MEDICAL MEN!

PACKETS OF 18 1/- FOR KAPUTINE THE SAFE REMEDY HEADACHE CURES IN 10 MINUTES.

NOTHING LIKE IT OR AS GOOD

Packets of 18 doses 1/-. Samples 1d. of all Chemists and Stores, or post free from KAPUTINE Ltd., HUDDERSFIELD, for 12 stamps. Refuse dangerous substitutes. DEMAND KAPUTINE the SAFE Remedy.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

MACKINTOSH'S

1s DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very Large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee — it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money, and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment.

EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

KEATING'S POWDER KILLS BUGS FLEAS FLIES BEETLES

TINS 3d. 6d. 1s-BELLOWS 9d.

HERE'S MONEY.

SEND us your name and address, and you will receive Free on approval 24 of our Silver Aluminium 1903 Novelty Thimbles. Each one is prettily embossed with the inscription "Remember Me," "Forget-me-not." They are lighter and tougher than silver, never tarnish, and will last a lifetime. One million sold already.

WE TRUST YOU—
NO MONEY REQUIRED.

Sell the thimbles at 2d. each, making 4/- altogether, which forward to us, and we will send you at once the Guaranteed Timekeeper or other Presents of High-class Jewellery you have earned, and which you can select from our list sent with the "Sell-at-Sight" Thimbles, and we will also tell you how you can make a regular income of £2 10s. per week. Write to-day and we send to-morrow.

GOLD & Co., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE
Delamere Crescent, London, W.

Digitized by Google

GIVEN AWAY

With this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 450)

PAPER PATTERN

of this

ETON COAT.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

From 1s. weekly. Special Offer. £12 12s. 0d. Sample for £6 6s. Carriage paid. PLATED RIMS, FREE WHEELS, RIM BRAKE FITTED FREE. Agents wanted. — DERBHAM ROAD CYCLE CO., NORWICH.

"ALKAN"

Cures in One Minute By Inhalation

HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE,

FACIAL NEURALGIA,

NEURALGIA OF THE EAR.

THE "FAMILY DOCTOR" writes:—

"From investigation of the constituents, we have confidence in saying that the good results are not only rapid, but lasting and free from danger."

Price: 1st size, 2/9; 2nd size, 4/6 per bottle

THE ALKAN LTD.,

General Depot:

150 STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

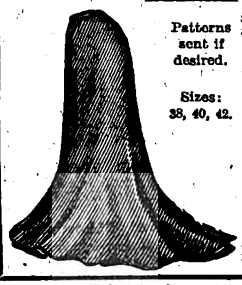
SHAW'S GIFT This Handsome Blouse Free

In order to clear out the Remainder of a Bankrupt Stock of Costume Cloths, we will send a tailor-made Costume Skirt in Navy or Black for the small sum of 5/0, or two for 9/6: carriage paid on all goods, and we will include with each skirt free of all charge, a handsome

5/- Two for 9/6. carr. paid.

SILKETTE BLOUSE with a Detachable Collar, equal in appearance to silk, and wearing twice as long.

These skirts are cut in the very Latest Fashion.



Patterns sent if desired.

Sizes: 38, 40, 42.

SEND AT ONCE, in order to secure this great bargain, as after present stock is exhausted this offer cannot be repeated. Money returned if not satisfied. Address—

SHAW & CO., The London Tailors, (Dept Sh. S.), 6 LOVE LANE, WOOD ST., LONDON, E.C.

PAY 2 PENCE DAILY

Any respectable person, male or female, can obtain one of our fully warranted cycles, on easy payments of 1/- or more weekly. Thousands are doing it. No guarantors required Mutual trust between our patrons and ourselves. Nobody need know you are buying on instalments. Catalogue Free. — SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128 City Rd., London, E.C.

"TATCHO"

Gets the Hair Back.

Puts the Hair Right.

Keeps the Hair Right.

WHO SAY SO.

COMMANDER T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.

"Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902.

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair."

MAJOR-GENERAL KEATE.

"High Croft, Winchest

"I find the Renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time."

LADY SYKES writes:

"Mayfair, W.

"I can honestly recommend 'Tatcho.' It has really entirely renovated my hair."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFORUS PALŒLOGUE writes:

"Belvedere Hotel, Kensington, W.

"I would not be without it on any account."

MRS. BROWN POTTER.

"I use only 'Tatcho.'"

A 4/6 FULL SIZE BOTTLE of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' "Tatcho" is supplied to enable you to test its value at the NOMINAL PRICE of 1/10 at all Chemists', Stores, and Hairdressers', or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, 81 Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn, London.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the world, in bottles at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/-.

Digitized by Google

could hear their fierce panting for breath, the scuffling of their ever-shifting feet.

It was a short, but frightful struggle. As they darted out through the gates, they saw one of the two men forced down on to his knees, the whiteness about his chest proclaiming him to be in evening dress.

"Murder, help!" cried out one affrighted man, as a sickening thud told of a merciless blow driven home.

The man on his knees rolled over, the other plunged away into the darkness—Alec Scarsdale! His brain was reeling; he knew not what he was doing. He seemed another being, something beyond, outside himself. He was temporarily a madman! It was not cowardice that made him run. It was all inexplicable. In after years he could never quite recall all that had happened on that terrible night. The events were veiled in a hazy mist.

Some darted off in pursuit; others bent over the unconscious man in the road.

"Great Heaven!" gasped out a voice, "Seaton Revelle!" The cries of his pursuers rang out behind Scarsdale; but he seemed endowed with the strength of madness. The cries were becoming fainter; he was outdistancing his pursuers.

But, in consequence of the mysterious affair of the previous night, a couple of constables had been especially told off to patrol the neighbourhood of Gurlston Hall. They were stolidly tramping up the high-road when distant cries reached them, to be followed by the sounds of footsteps racing towards them.

"Quick, mate," cried one of the constables, "there's something up. Look out! Here he is! Stop him!"

Scarsdale bounded out of the darkness.

One of the constables flung himself upon him. Scarsdale shook himself free, and sent the man flying to the ground. But the other constable was upon him. He had whipped out his truncheon. It whirled through the air and descended with a crash.

Scarsdale rolled over on the road, stunned!

It had been but a brief spell of freedom—a tantalising, maddening glimpse of light about to be followed by a darkness more hopeless, more opaque, than before.

The evening papers of the next day blazoned forth the news that the notorious convict 35 had been recaptured, telling how by an extraordinary coincidence he had encountered the man who had originally unmasked his villainy, and had savagely attacked him. And the world read and wondered. But there was nothing in the papers, as yet, of how the recaptured convict had saved a woman's life, for it was not yet known, except to three persons, that it was convict 35 who had fallen from the cliff through the "giving" of a rope.

CRUMP THE CONSOLER.

"Will you please give this card to Mr. Mansfield, and ask that I may be allowed to speak with him on a matter of great importance!"

The footman glanced at the name on the card. It was "Penworthy."

"I don't suppose," he said, "that Mr. Mansfield will see you. Perhaps you don't know that Miss Mansfield is lying here terribly ill with brain fever!"

"Oh, but I do!" said the homely, sad-faced little man, who was standing in the porch of Gurlston Hall. "Oh, but I do! Will you please do as I ask you?"

"Well, just wait here, please!"

Crump sat himself down on a chair in the hall.

"It is all very dreadful!" he said to himself sadly, "very dreadful indeed!"

He took out a coloured pocket-handkerchief and wiped his eyes.

"It is, I know, presumption on my part to intrude myself on an occasion like this. The dear child has her father with her—may God bless her—may God be pleased to spare her life!"

The coloured handkerchief failed to intercept a tear that fell to the floor.

John Mansfield was crossing the hall. Crump rose to his feet.

"Penworthy," said the banker, in a broken voice, "you can't have got my telegram—I have wired for you. My poor child in her delirium called for you. When she recovered consciousness she asked for you. You—you are a great favourite with her!"

"She is conscious now?" whispered Crump.

"Yes!"

(The sequel to Scarsdale's fight is recorded next Tuesday.)

OUR NEW SERIAL.

"Out of Great Tribulation" is now nearing its close, and we hope to announce particulars shortly of the extraordinarily novel and striking story which is to be its successor.

Your Old Friend Captain Kettle

RELATES STILL MORE OF HIS MARVELLOUS ADVENTURES IN THE FURTHER ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE.

Price 6d., post free 8d.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Further Adventures of Captain Kettle," for which I inclose the sum of 8d.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Lovers' Quarrel.

"HOPELESS" has been in love for three years with a girl, and up to three months ago she appeared to return it. They then, however, had a quarrel, since which there has been coolness. She has now become very friendly with a girl, and never gives him an evening. The other day she told him that "she had not the same feeling for him as previously, though she still felt a little liking towards him."

* * * *

"HOPELESS" had better leave the girl alone for a few months. This will soon show whether the attitude she has taken up represents what she really feels towards him. Such affairs as this are often settled after the parties have consented to refrain from seeing each other for a while. What has happened is evidently that the quarrel has removed from "HOPELESS" the glamour he once enjoyed in the eyes of his sweetheart. Quarrels too often have that effect. That she still confesses to liking you suggests that there is really some hope for your getting back to your old relations. But let a month or so elapse and re-enter the fray armed with your most attractive demeanour, and watch for yourself whether or not your reappearance is a happiness to her.

A Pitched Battle.

"H. T. E. B." is in love. He does not claim this as an original situation, because a friend of his is also that way inclined. The curious part of it is that both are in love with the same girl. But while the girl always smiles sweetly upon, and talks intimately with "H. T. E. B.," she does not appear to care particularly for the other fellow. He (the other fellow), however, appears to regard himself as a sort of Lord Protector of the girl, and severely jumps on her (metaphorically—they are not yet married) if she shows any partiality for anyone else.

Between all this the girl does not get much amusement, for while "H. T. E. B." has not as yet dared to ask her out because of the other fellow, the other fellow never takes her out anywhere. All the while the girl wants a holiday badly. Should "H. T. E. B." offer his services as escort?

* * * *

Seeing that the other fellow is not engaged to the girl, and apparently does not stand very well in her estimation, "H. T. E. B." would seem to have as clear a field for operations as is given to most men. He should certainly offer to take her somewhere, if she really is in need of it, and the refusal should be in her hands. A man cannot lose anything by showing himself anxious to please a girl. If the other fellow has anything to say in the matter, he is open to the obvious reply that she is not in any way bound to him, and can accept any invitation she likes. As to the final assault and capture of the position by "H. T. E. B.," he should proceed on the ordinary rule that "all's fair in love and war," and if he sees any way by which he can outdo his rival, it is his affair to see to it. As I have said many times before, there is an old proverb about "faint heart," which "H. T. E. B." should repeat to himself when in doubt.

The Old Love.

"T. R. F." fell in love with a certain girl two years ago. They then had a misunderstanding, and parted. A few months back they met again. He thought she would have been cold to him. Instead of this she greeted him in the most friendly way, and was most agreeable. He saw her often afterwards, and she was always amiable. But try as he may, he could not get her to renew his previous intimacy. When he suggested it, she told him not to speak of such matters. Do I think her love is the same as before, or that it has died away?

* * * *

Probably "T. R. F.'s" friend is a sensible girl with a nice disposition, who simply feels friendly towards him, in spite of their old misunderstanding. Evidently she no longer feels deeply towards him, or would have shown it by some renewal of their old relations. He had better cultivate her simply as a friend, and in time will soon learn whether or not she has any love remaining for him.

Arms and the Girl.

"F, S." writes: "On which arm should you escort a lady?"

* * * *

This all depends where you are. If on the left-hand side of the street in which you are walking, give her the arm furthest from the kerbstone. If you are taking her downstairs to supper, give her the arm nearest the wall, as the lady should walk on the inside. At a dance, give her your left arm, as most ladies like to cling on with their right arm. If you are in a remote country lane or by the silent sea shore (and are on pressing terms with the lady) I believe the right arm generally goes round the waist best.

America for the English Girl.

"ENA" is, she tells me, an attractive and accomplished girl, but as yet has not met any man in a position to make her happy. She has two brothers in St. Louis, U.S.A., who are doing well in business. They want her to go out and join them there. Do I think it would be a good place for an English girl to reside in, from the point of view of matrimony, or, failing that, for making an independent living?

* * * *

I certainly think "ENA" might with advantage go out there. An attractive English girl is certainly likely to be appreciated by the natives of the Southern States, and possibly "ENA" would soon meet with the right man. As to her making an independent living, the opportunities for women in America are supposed to be much greater than in England, and with brothers already there, probably "ENA" would find the task of getting work much easier.

The Young Lover.

"M. N." is a young man of eighteen earning a very small salary. He is, however, greatly enamoured of a young lady about three or four years his senior. Shall he declare his love now or wait till he is in a position to marry the lady of his heart?

* * * *

If "M. N." is sufficiently philosophical about the matter to ask my advice upon it, he should certainly see that it is far better to postpone any proposal of marriage. As to whether or not he should declare his love, that must depend on how he feels. Most men would find, that, if they were really in love, they must declare it, let the consequences be what they may. "M. N." is evidently not one of these men, for he has the good sense to hesitate. Let him carry that good sense further, and devote his mind to getting on in the world. That is the main problem for a youth of eighteen.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

2/6 CYCLE OFFER.

£1,000 if untrue, or if any other firm in Great Britain is supplying to-day as high grade a machine, including all extras and accessories, as specified below, at a similar rate of payment, and at an equally advantageous mode of delivery.

HIGHEST GRADE CYCLE FITTED WITH
DUNLOP (1902) TYRES
ON WESTWOOD RIMS,
INCLUDING
BEST FREE WHEEL
AND
FRONT RIM BRAKE,
COMPLETE WITH
LAMP, WALLET, BELL,
And all Accessories.

The bicycle is made in COVENTRY AND BIRMINGHAM
and built to your order,
AND FULLY
GUARANTEED TWO YEARS.
No charge for crate, wrapping, packing, &c., &c.

Inclusive of everything mentioned

2/6

a week.

No further payment till after delivery.

If we are too full up with orders when we receive yours we will refund the 2/6.

NO EXTRAS. £1,000. NO EXTRAS.

We will also forfeit this amount if we cannot prove that identical machines have been sold from £15 to £19 cash through cycle agents.

SEND CROSSED P.O. 2/6

and we will forward you catalogue, and if we are able to accept your order we will send on the machine at once, or as soon as it can be built, without a penny more. Machines can be seen at the address below, where critical inspection is most cordially invited. All communications must be addressed and remittance made out to—

MANAGER, ALPHA COMPANY LIMITED,
Est. 1886. Cycle Manufacturers, Reg. 1900.
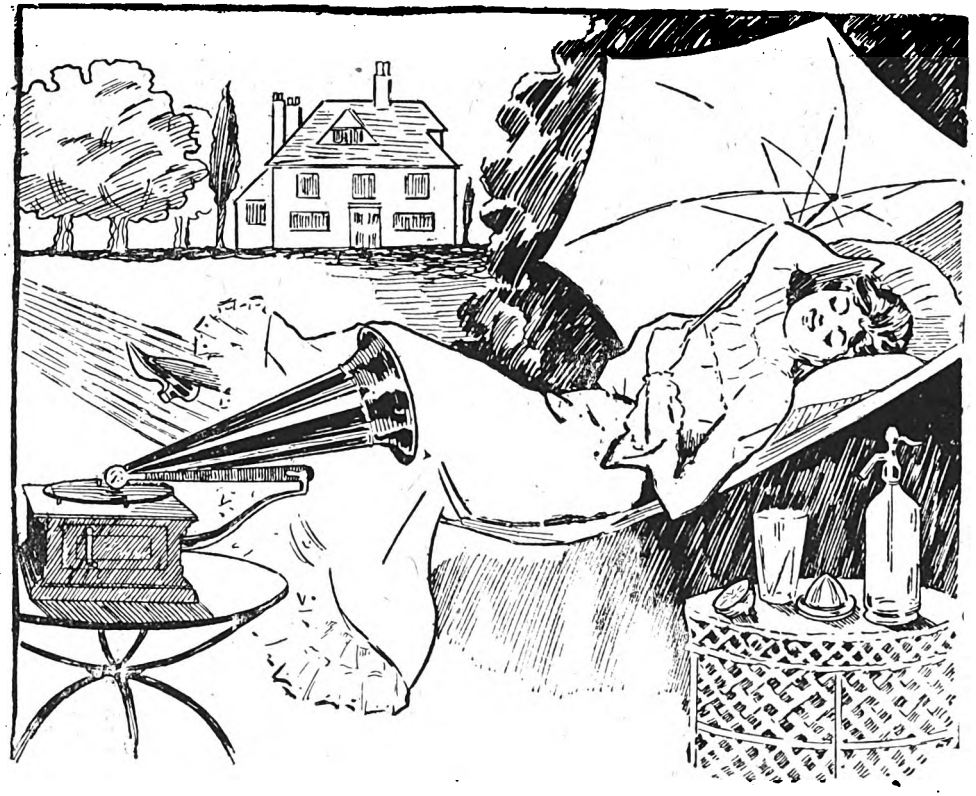
London Office: 59 CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

The above firm is well-known to the Proprietors of "Pearson's Weekly," "Short Stories," and the Pearson publications.

Digitized by Google



The GRAMOPHONE in the GARDEN.

Which is your favourite music? Who are your favourite singers?

PERHAPS SOME OF THESE RECORDS WOULD HELP YOU TO SPEND MANY HAPPY HOURS.

MAURICE FARKOA.
"Kitty Grey."
"Nini Ninette Ninon."
"The Honeysuckle and the Bee" (in French).

BEN DAVIES.
"I'll Sing Thee Songs of Araby."
Schubert's "Serenade."
"My Pretty Jane."

CHURCH CHOIRS.
"Emmanuel."
"Hark! The Herald Angels Sing."

LOUIS BRADFIELD.
"Hello, Babby."
"I may be crazy, but I love you."

THE MEISTER GLEE SINGERS.
"Dinah Doe."
"Massa's in the cold, cold ground."

Write for our Catalogue which includes nearly 10,000 Records.

AGENTS IN EVERY TOWN.

There are many Talking Machines, but there is ONLY ONE

GRAMOPHONE

Which is made in various styles from £3 3s. to £12 10s. by the GRAMOPHONE & TYPEWRITER Ltd., 21 CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories.

THE DAINTY HOME FICTION PAPER. 1D.

At headlong, ghastly speed, the car tore over the grass to the cliff's edge, tottered, swayed for an instant, and then vanished for ever into the depths below.

Digitized by Google

You Can Dress Better and Save Money By using

MAYPOLE SOAP

Colours 4d. per cake — WHICH DYES ANY COLOUR — Black 6d. per cake

BRILLIANT—DURABLE—FAST—ECONOMICAL.

Curtains, Blouses, Frocks, Silks and Satins made to look like new.

NO MESS—NO TROUBLE.

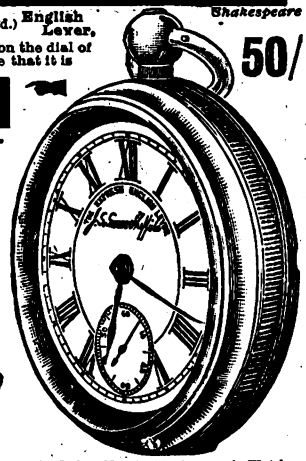
Send for Free Booklet "THE PERFECTION OF HOME DYEING" to the Maypole Co., 17 Cumming Street, London, N.

"LET'S TALK OF GRAVES"

'EXPRESS' (Regd.) English Lever. That word "Express" on the dial of a watch is a guarantee that it is

BRITISH

Shakespeare 50/



Manufacture throughout, and NOT a foreign-made movement in English Cases.

TERMS. Send 5/- and the watch will be forwarded to you. If satisfied, complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of the same amount.

If not satisfied, return the watch, and your deposit will be refunded.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Electro-plate, Fancy Goods, etc., etc., Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

FREE TO ALL

MR. H. STANSFIELD (from a photo).

A trial of an entirely new method of curing

RUPTURE,

the same method that cured Mr. H. Stansfield. No cumbersome steel truss, and no loss of time from work. Write to-day for free trial and for interesting literature, including a book containing many testimonials.

DR. W. S. RICE,
57 Stonecutter Street, London, E.C.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager

VICTORY CYCLES LISTS FREE £10-10

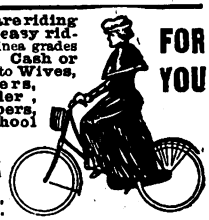
From 1s. weekly. Special Offer. £12 12s. 0d. Sample for £6 6s. Carriage paid. PLATED RIMS, FREE WHEELS, RIM BRAKE FITTED FREE. Agents wanted. — DEREHAM ROAD CYCLE CO., NORWICH.

FREE 1/- FREE 1/-

We guarantee these teapots to be Real Silver Electro-plated on pure white metal, holding 2½ pints. If you want one, write to us without delay, and send us 1s. (P.O. or stamps) for one of our Beautiful Presentation Real Silver-Plated Teaspoons. Our Free-Gift Teapots are catalogued at 20s. each, but in order to get your custom and circulate our Price Lists we will send you one FREE if you take advantage of our marvellous offer, which we send. After you receive our Beautiful Teapot—a veritable work of the silversmith's art—we shall expect you to show it to your friends and call their attention to this advertisement. Colonial orders 1s. extra.

(Dept. 8) THE SILVER PLATE CO.
32 Delamere Crescent, London, W.

Thousands of ladies are riding our beautiful, strong, easy riding cycles. 12 to 15 guinea grades are sold by us at £4 to £8. Cash or easy payments. We sell to Wives, Daughters, Teachers, Nurses, Clerks, Cashiers, Typists, Bookkeepers, Factory Workers, School Girls, and others in all grades of wealth and all occupations. Write for circulars and learn how easy you can gain a reliable mount. SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128 City Rd., Lond., E.C.



FOR YOU

You must try

E. & T.

PINK'S JAMS

they are

Absolutely Pure

ARE THE VERY BEST FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN

JUNO CYCLES

Free Wheels.

£7-15-0 or 14/2 Monthly.

Carriage paid to all parts. CASH or 12 monthly payments.

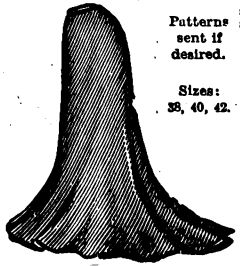
£7 15s. ... 14/2
£8 8s. ... 15/0
£9 10s. ... 17/1
£10 15s ... 17/6
£11 0s. ... 20/0
£12 0s. ... 21/8

Corsair Plated Lamp, 2/0; A1 Rim Brake, 6/6; Scorcher Brake, 1/-. Celluloid Mudguards, 8/9. Write at once for New Season's List of over 100 pages and over 500 illustrations of JUNO CYCLES and latest cycling accessories at lower prices than any other house. Sent Post Free. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS Co. Ltd., S.Y. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street, Without, London, E.C., and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

SHAW'S GIFT Free This Handsome Blouse

In order to clear out the Remainder of a Bankrupt Stock of Costume Cloths, we will send a tailor made Costume Skirt in Navy or Black for the small sum of 5/0, or two for 9/6, carriage paid on all goods, and we will include with each skirt free of all charge, a handsome

5/- Two for 9/6. carr. paid.



Patterns sent if desired.

Sizes: 38, 40, 42.

SILKETTE BLOUSE with a Detachable Collar, equal in appearance to silk, and wearing twice as long. These skirts are cut in the very Latest Fashion.

SEND AT ONCE, in order to secure this great bargain, as after present stock is exhausted this offer cannot be repeated. Money returned if not satisfied. Address—

SHAW & CO., The London Tailors. (Dept Sh. S.), 6 LOVE LANE, WOOD ST., LONDON, E.C.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street London, W.C.

Short Stories

No. 714.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending September 6th, 1902.

The Mystery of Trebarven House.

"Help! help! help!" The cry rang out upon the still night air, and I reined up my horse sharply and listened intently. For hours I had been driving across what seemed in the darkness an almost interminable expanse of moor, and the silence of the night had been absolutely unbroken until that cry fell across it. The sound was blood-curdling, fearful, coming as it did upon the stillness and loneliness of the great moor, and I could not refrain from shuddering a little as I sat listening intently for what was to follow.

My horse pawed the ground impatiently; the sound of his hoofs upon the road seemed positively thunderous in the surrounding quietness that could almost be felt.

No glimmer of light showed from the sky, the day had been heavy and sultry, black clouds covered the heavens, and a storm brooded over the land. The air was breathlessly warm, and the moisture it contained made me realise that I could not be far from the sea, though for many miles I had been aware that I had lost my bearings, and was driving on in the vague hope of coming upon a human dwelling-place before the storm broke.

"Help!" The cry rang out again, and I strained my ears to catch the direction from which it came.

"Help!" Once more the word was borne to me, but more faintly, and coming from a little further to my left than I had at first thought.

The voice was that of a woman, and a woman evidently in great fear or danger, and, without a moment's delay, I scrambled from my dog-cart, tied my horse (as well as the darkness and my lamps would allow me) to the rough fence that bordered the road, and then dashed off in the direction from which the cry had proceeded.

Striking across the fence, I stumbled over the broken ground, my progress necessarily slow because of the holes and mounds, not to mention the clumps of gorse and tussocks of heather with which the moor abounded.

Presently there struck upon my ears a sound which made me pause in my headlong career. The muffled thunder of surf upon rocks far below brought me to a sudden standstill, and I confess that I was bathed in cold sweat from head to foot, as it flashed across me that I must have been rushing pell-mell towards the edge of a cliff.

This moorland, I knew, ran parallel to the sea, and to the awful black cliffs which made the coast a terror to mariners, but I had not realised until this moment how near the road went to the edge of the cliffs, and I stood for an instant in horror-stricken dismay, listening to the terrible booming of those unseen waves hundreds of feet beneath.

"Oh, help!"

All rights reserved.]

The voice seemed nearer to me—much nearer, and it appeared to come from that black gulf which, now that my eyes had grown more accustomed to the darkness, I saw yawning only a few yards ahead of me.

Could any human being possibly be there—over the cliff edge, in the yawning chasm which had the sea for its bottom? Could the cry really have come from those depths? I crept cautiously on; and, just as I was nearing the verge of the abyss, a flash of lightning illuminated earth and sky and sea.

Yes; and sea!

Far, far below, almost at my very feet, I could see the black water tossing and foaming over the blacker rocks, and fretting itself against the smooth, black cliff that went sheer, sheer down into the churning waves.

Beyond, stretched the wide expanse of ocean; above, was the stormy midnight sky; around me on every hand the dreary moorland; and on a tiny spar of rock, that jutted halfway down the precipice, I saw, in that moment's flash of light, a woman's form.

Throwing myself flat down upon the short grass on which I stood, I peered down into the blackness.

"Tell me what I can do to help you," I shouted. "I am a stranger, I do not know the country hereabouts; are you far down?"

In spite of the roar of the waves, my voice carried to that jutting rock, and a woman's voice replied:

"I cannot hold on much longer! I could reach a rope; I am not too far down for that."

A rope? I did not go for a driving tour carrying ropes with me, and on all that great moor I had not passed a human habitation since seven in the evening. An idea suddenly struck me.

"I will come back quickly!" I shouted down again. "Wait for me."

Then, I tore back over the moor, told aright by my horse's pawing hoofs, snatched my carriage rug from its place; by the light of the lamp knotted my coat to the rug, and was preparing to tear open my Gladstone and find other articles of clothing to lengthen the chain, when I heard the rumble of wheels, saw the gleaming of lights, and a second later a motor car was rushing by. I hailed its occupants loudly, almost screaming to them to stop, and they pulled up, with what struck me was evident reluctance.

"Come and help me!" I panted. "A woman has fallen over the cliff; there is not a moment to lose!"

"Woman over the cliff!" snarled a man's voice; whilst a feminine shriek chimed in, and a gruff bass exclaimed:

Digitized by Google

"Well! we can't let a woman stay out on the cliffs, even though there is a storm coming on!"

The last voice was plainly that of the driver, and I heard the first speaker snap out:

"You're a fool, John!" Then the trio emerged from the darkness into the circle of light thrown by their lamps, and I saw a gentleman of perhaps forty-five years; a singularly handsome woman ten years or more his junior, and a man-servant—whose appearance I liked best of all.

"I've got a rope here!" he said, "come on, mister!" and, leaving the other two beside their snorting carriage, he and I ran across the moor, and this time I took the precaution of carrying with me one of my lamps.

At the edge of the cliff both the coachman and I lay flat down and peeped over the dizzy height, and I again called to the woman below.

Her answer was very faint, but her voice was quite audible, and the man beside me exclaimed in horror-stricken accents:

"Why, 'tis Miss Mamie! Good Lord deliver us!".

There was no time to ask who Miss Mamie might be; we dared not risk a second's delay, but immediately lowered the lamp and the rope together in the direction from which the cry for help had come. Around us all was black darkness; the only relief to it in the whole wide horizon, that speck of light travelling slowly, slowly down the side of the cliff.

Our end of the rope we attached to the bent, gnarled stump of a tree against which our feet had struck; and when, after what seemed long ages, a voice from the gulf below called: "Pull me up, now!" The coachman and I tugged at the rope for all we were worth.

Never had I experienced such moments of sick suspense as those that followed, before at last we lifted the form of the woman we had rescued over the edge of the cliff, and laid her on the grass at our feet.

She was young and very lovely; these two facts at once revealed themselves to me, as I lifted the carriage lamp and looked into her face.

Her eyes, though wide with terror, were of a wonderful blue; her hair that had come unbound, fell round her in rippling waves of gold; even the whiteness of her face could not detract from her great beauty.

"Why, Miss Mamie," my companion said, "whatever has happened?"

"Don't ask me," she moaned, "it was too awful! He—— But don't ask me!" and her eyes closed wearily.

Lifting her gently from the grass, my fellow-rescuer and I carried her as well as we could over the broken ground to the road, where the owner of the motor and the lady with him were in earnest conversation.

As we bore our burden into the light, both the man and woman uttered a cry of horror.

"Mamie!" they exclaimed simultaneously, and apparently in overwhelming amazement. "What can have happened? Mamie—here?"

I glanced at the face of the man as he spoke, and I could have sworn that a look of disappointed malice shot out of his eyes. Yet I assured myself the next moment that I must have been mistaken, for he came forward and wrung my hand warmly, saying:

"How can I ever thank you enough, sir? This girl you have saved from an awful death, is my wife's sister—her half-sister, to be correct. How could she have fallen over a cliff on such a night? How was she here at all? Whatever the explanation is, I thank you deeply, sir, for your help!"

"Yes, indeed," put in the lady eagerly; "we cannot be grateful enough to you—Mr.——"

She paused, and I said:

"My name is Renshaw—Brian Renshaw."

"Then, Mr. Renshaw, you must come home with us at once, and allow us to offer you what hospitality we can," she cried.

Was it fancy, or did a look of annoyance, even of anger, cross her husband's face? I could not decide, but I determined on the instant that I would accept their invitation and probe a little further into the mystery of Miss Mamie's accident.

She, meanwhile, had been laid in the motor car and covered with a rug, and in a very few minutes we all set out for the house of my new acquaintances, the motor leading the way, and I following in my dog cart.

To my surprise we did not go in the direction in which the motor had been going, but in one exactly opposite, and I wondered what these strange people could have been doing on so stormy and dreary a night, apparently driving aimlessly across the moor.

My speculations came to an abrupt conclusion when, after driving for about a mile, we reached a house standing quite alone upon the moor.

Here we all descended, and it was my privilege to help the coachman carry the senseless form of Miss Mamie into the building. A little involuntary shiver ran through me as we entered the stone hall, there was something so sinister, so forbidding, so grim in the whole aspect of the place.

A woman servant came forward and conducted us upstairs to a bedroom, where we laid our burden on the bed, and left her to the charge of the servant, a harsh-featured creature, to whom I took an instant dislike.

In the passage outside the room I whispered to the coachman, who struck me as being the most friendly and kindly person I had yet seen belonging to the establishment, "What is the name of this house, and of that young lady?" I nodded towards the room we had left, "and of the master?"

"The master's name is Jones—plain Jones," he said with a grim smile, "but Miss Mamie, her name is Trebarven—she's a Cornishwoman. The house——" He broke off abruptly, as a step sounded on the stairs, adding hurriedly under his breath:

"I wouldn't stay here long if I was you, mister."

* * * * *

"And now that you have had a night's rest, Mr. Renshaw, would you like to see our queer Cornish abode?"

It was my hostess who spoke, smiling down the breakfast-table at me, and looking wonderfully handsome in the morning sunshine that flooded the room.

"I should immensely like to see it," I answered. "You are most curiously situated here. I seemed to look sheer into the sea from my window."

"Yes—yes, sheer into the sea—sheer into the sea," chimed in my host, a smile creeping over his features, that gave me a most unaccustomed and unpleasant sensation down my spine. "Overbalance yourself there and you'd never be heard of again," and he laughed so strange, so diabolical a laugh that I glanced at him nervously. I noticed a look of apprehension in his wife's eyes, and the thought shot into my mind that the man could not be quite sane.

However, the next instant he was talking easily and pleasantly, and I derided myself for my ridiculous fancies. No one could have had a more kindly and attentive host and hostess than were Mr. and Mrs. Jones, and yet I had an uneasy sensation of being constantly under supervision, and of living in an uncomfortable, almost weird atmosphere.

My inquiries for Miss Trebarven were met by polite assurances that she was recovering from the shock, that she had explained that the accident had happened because she missed her way in the darkness and fell over the cliff—that their anxiety about her was diminishing—and so on, and so on.

But I did not feel altogether satisfied, though why, I could not explain even to myself, and I fear I took but scanty interest in the tour of the place upon which my host insisted on taking me.

There were evidences of wealth and luxury in the house and its surroundings, but the whole establishment gave me a sensation of dreariness and remoteness which impressed me unpleasantly.

Digitized by Google

We seemed to be at the very end of the earth—as indeed it was, for the house was actually built on a promontory of land surrounded by the sea on three sides, whilst on the fourth stretched the boundless moor.

I was longing to see again the lovely girl I had helped to rescue on the previous night, and it was this longing alone which prevented me from bidding the Jones farewell and taking my departure. But something stronger than I was impelled me to remain, and Mrs. Jones cordially urged me to do so.

I did not like Mrs. Jones. Handsome as she was, gracious as were her manners, hospitable as she appeared to be, she reminded me too much of some kind of beautiful reptile to be altogether congenial. For her husband I entertained a mingled feeling of repulsion and fear, of which I was heartily ashamed, yet which I could not shake off.

It was late in the afternoon of the day after my arrival when I at last saw Miss Mamie Trebarven again, and then I met her by chance upon the stairs.

She looked like some pale and beautiful ghost as she came slowly down, dressed in a soft, white evening gown, her big eyes full of an indefinable fear, her cheeks as white as her dress.

When she saw me a tide of crimson flamed over them, her eyes dilated a little, she put out her hand and touched my sleeve.

"God bless you!" she whispered, "you saved my life. God bless you!"

"I hope you have recovered from the shock?" I said. "How did it all happen? It was a merciful thing I was driving by. Did you slip over?"

"Hush—don't let them hear you talking to me;" she whispered again, looking fearfully round her. "You must not stay here. Go—go at once—why did you come?"

Her manner was so strange that I began to think that I had come into a household of lunatics, but the earnest gravity of her eyes forbade the thought, and making up my mind that she was overwrought after her accident, I replied:

"I came because your brother-in-law and sister kindly invited me. I am taking a driving tour, had lost my way, and was thankful for shelter last night. I am doubly thankful now for having lost my way, and found you!" My voice dropped as I said the words. How could I help saying them, with that lovely face so close above me—those beautiful eyes looking wistfully into mine.

"Hush!—Oh, hush!" she cried, "You must not stay here. Go away soon. Last night was no accident—it——"

Before the sentence ended she had left my side and sped up the landing again, and I heard my host's voice in the hall speaking to his wife.

They had just emerged from the library, and were talking in low, earnest tones, quite unconscious of my proximity.

"If that failed there are other means," Mr. Jones was saying, "but why did you ask this infernal, prying fellow, Renshaw, to stay on? He may see too much!"

"Not he!" his wife's voice answered. "I think I am clever enough to—do as I have done before," and she laughed a low laugh that made my blood run cold, "and I intend to help you get rid of her!"

I heard no more, but turned and ran swiftly upstairs again, and as I stood in my room looking out over the sea, a strange resolve took possession of me.

"I shall stay here for a few days," I said to myself. "Here is some mystery, and I believe she is in danger."

There was only one "she" in the world for me at that moment. I had always hitherto scoffed at those who spoke of love at first sight, but now I knew that they only spoke truth, for my whole heart had gone out to Mamie Trobarven. I loved her better than my life.

She was one of the party at dinner that evening, and both Mr. and Mrs. Jones were assiduous in their inquiries about her feelings, and questioned her closely as to the cause of the accident.

"How came you out so late, dear?" her sister asked, fixing her gleaming eyes upon the girl's white face.

Mamie's blue eyes dilated, her lips quivered.

"I—you knew I went to see poor old Granny Hale," she said.

"Yes, of course I knew that"—Mrs. Jones' voice was very smooth—"but I thought you would have been home earlier. Hubert and I were so anxious at last that we drove out to find you."

Remembering the pace they were going when I met them, and their apparent surprise at recognising Mamie when we carried her up from the cliff, I doubted this statement.

"And you missed your way and slipped over the cliff?" Mr. Jones here interrupted, in so authoritative a tone, and with such a glitter in his sinister eyes, that I could not wonder when the girl faltered out—whether it was the truth or no:

"Yes—yes, that was it, I—I missed my way and slipped over."

The subject was then changed, but throughout the meal I noticed how often my host's eyes seemed to hold Mamie's as a cat's flame holds a fascinated bird, and a deadly fear appeared to oppress the poor girl.

When dinner was over we returned to the drawing-room, through whose open windows we could see the sea stretching up to the moonlit sky.

My hostess talked to me—talked as I have seldom heard a woman do—brilliantly, charmingly, gracefully, with a fascination of manner and voice as delightful as it is rare.

A man would not be human who had not yielded to its subtle charm and to her rich beauty, and I felt that I had greatly misjudged her in supposing that she could possibly have a hand in any mysteries or nefarious schemes. Besides, was she not Mamie's sister? The sister of my fair, sweet love, who sat a little apart, looking out upon the moonlight, which threw an unearthly radiance over her loveliness.

What then was my amazement when, as I handed her a bedroom candlestick before she went upstairs, she whispered under her breath:

"For God's sake go. Danger is all round you!" There was no time for more. Mrs. Jones was beside us again, and Mamie was saying "Good night," with downcast eyes.

But what did her warning mean? What was the secret of the strangeness I felt all about me, yet could not define? And what danger could possibly lurk here for me?

* * * * * * *

The next day passed without incident, though I was over on the watch; but for what I was watching I had no idea. Only I was convinced that some mystery wrapped me round. I had an uneasy conviction that Mr. Jones was not altogether sane, and I observed two other facts which did not tend to reassure me. One, that I was never allowed to be alone with Mamie for a single instant; the other, my friend the coachman had disappeared from the scene, and that all my inquiries about him failed to elicit any but the vaguest replies.

My hostess became daily more fascinating to me, but though I involuntarily admired her, she repelled me, the more so that I saw she, in some way, frightened her sister.

With the latter I was more and more deeply in love every day, and the bare thought of leaving her was impossible to contemplate. My host and hostess daily pressed, nay, urged me to remain, and sometimes I dared to hope that my feeling for Mamie was returned. Her eyes would occasionally meet mine with a wistful expression in them that seemed to mean more than mere friendliness.

One night as I was preparing for bed, a faint knock sounded on my door, and the next moment a note was thrust under it. The note read as follows:

Digitized by Google

"Please be warned. Go to-morrow, for my sake. Beware of my sister.—Mamie."

This extraordinary document I at first put down to my poor love's over-wrought nerves, then I began to believe that something serious lay beneath it, and to ponder upon the advisability of acting on the warning it contained.

But I have never been a coward; I could not flee from an imaginary danger, and, above all, I could not leave the girl I adored! And, after all, I reflected, what possible harm could come to me—a strong, vigorous man in the prime of health and youth?

I was soon to know the truth.

Before dinner that evening, as I sat alone in the library, Mrs. Jones entered, dressed in one of her most superb evening gowns, and with a charming smile, said to me:

"Mr. Renshaw, I have an immense favour to ask of you. I have heard you say you are accustomed to handling locks; the lock of my bureau has suddenly gone wrong. Would you help me with it?"

I willingly followed her, and she ushered me into a tiny octagonal room in which I had never been before.

A bureau stood in one corner, the rest of the furniture consisted only of a chair and table. Hardly was I inside than I heard the door shut sharply behind me, and looking round I found I was alone! Almost at once a small panel was slid back in the door and Mrs. Jones' beautiful face appeared at it, full of a mocking malice and diabolical wickedness.

"Never was a fly so easily caught!" she said, laughing fiendishly. "Did you think we kept you here, and pressed you to stay, for your pleasure? We have found out since your coming that you are rich, Mr. Renshaw. You are not the first man who has sat in that room, and waited for his doom. The floor is a sliding one; presently I shall touch a spring, the floor will slide from under you, and you will find yourself dropped quietly upon the rocks three hundred feet below—unless——" she paused, whilst I looked round me blankly—"you sign that paper on the bureau, promising never to say a word of what has occurred here, and unless you write a cheque, payable to me, of ten thousand pounds. Your cheque book is there, you have fifteen minutes to decide."

The panel was closed. I was alone. Like a caged beast I glared round me. The door was locked; of the four windows in the room three looked out across the sea, from the fourth I could see the gate, the drive, and the road over the moor. Means of escape there was absolutely none. The room jutted out from the rest of the building, and was built directly over the seething water and sharp rocks, hundreds of feet below. It was easy enough to believe in the sliding floor—the deadly fall—and then——

Yet to lend myself to this hideous system of blackmail went against every instinct.

I paced the floor restlessly, revolving scheme after scheme in my mind, to reject them all.

Five minutes passed! I looked at the paper on the table, and at my cheque book, evidently purloined from my room. Then I heard a low sobbing breath outside the door.

"Are you there?" Mamie whispered.

"Yes, my darling," I said with unfaltering voice.

"I tried to warn you," she answered, "I tried——"

Her voice died away, I could hear her descending the stair and in another moment Mrs. Jones' face appeared at the panel in the door.

"Have you decided?" she said, with again that awful smile.

"I will not sign your paper nor the cheque," I said firmly.

"Very well," she sneered, "in a few minutes more you will know what those rocks feel like. You——"

She broke off suddenly, I heard her steps descending, and then she returned swiftly.

"There is a pleasure in store for you," she cried. "My husband is going to give my sister a treat. He is going to send her for a drive in the motor car, and—and you will see what you will see. Perhaps she will join you on the rocks. Watch."

With fast beating heart, and in an agony of terror at her sinister words, I rushed to the window overlooking the entrance, my own danger forgotten in my horror at the ominous tone in Mrs. Jones' voice.

There, drawn up at the door, I saw the motor, snorting and puffing impatiently, and there beside it, her face ashy white, stood Mamie. Mr. Jones was tying her arms with cords, talking rapidly the while, and gesticulating wildly. I could see that Mamie was pleading with him unavailingly, and I tore impotently at the wooden sill craving to go to her help.

Next I saw Mrs. Jones come out upon the drive, and join her husband in taunting her sister. Some of her words of hateful jeering were wafted up to me.

And then a most unforeseen thing happened. Without a second's warning Mr. Jones began tearing from Mamie's arms the cords he had placed there, and rapidly transferring them to his wife's. Madness gleamed in his eyes, madness rang in his laugh, madness was in his voice, as he cried:

"Not Mamie, but you! We will see—we will see. Come along!" Heedless of her cries, her remonstrances, her shrieks, and of Mamie's endeavours to prevent his action, he forced the wretched woman into the car, fastened her in securely, mounted himself, and in another moment they whirled away along the road. My eyes watched them with a stare of fascination, and what was my horror when, a few yards from the gate, I saw the madman turn the vehicle sharply over the grass and in the direction of the cliff. In his wild efforts he overbalanced himself and fell headlong to the earth, but the machine dashed on, on, on, and I could see how the woman inside it shrank back and shut her eyes, that she might not see her awful advancing fate.

At headlong, ghastly speed the car tore over the grass, to the cliff's edge, tottered, swayed for one instant, and then vanished for ever into the depths below!

* * * * * * *

Mamie rescued me from that awful doom, fetching a man to batter in the door and let me out; and Mamie has been my wife for a year, but I cannot even now let her speak of all these horrors. Trebarven House, it transpires, had been hers, as also a large sum of money, coveted by her sister and her sister's husband. They had made more than one attempt on the girl's life, one of which had been to thrust her over the cliff, from which I rescued her. They had also tried to use her as a decoy for their nefarious schemes, but in this they failed, and Mrs. Jones put forth all her own fascination to entrap rich men to the house, and rob them, as they had tried to rob me. Without a doubt long years of wickedness had rendered Hubert Jones insane, and his sudden fall from the car in that culminating moment of madness brought what was the merciful release of death.

John, the coachman, who had been skilfully convoyed away lest he should help Mamie and me, is now in our service; the grim place by the sea and moor was sold, after we had pulled down the octagon room and its sliding floor. The woman who lies beneath the rolling waves, the man who is buried in a distant churchyard, can trouble us no more—with them has died, too, the mystery of Trebarven House.

L. G. Moberley.

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Major.

The Girl who Loved a Grey-haired Soldier.

"Did you notice how well and happy Mrs. Major looked?"

That question rose to the lips of many of the people of the village of Saxton as they wended their way homewards from the church after the morning service. The carriage containing the Major and his young wife had passed the straggling groups of church-goers one by one and had been lost in the direction of Hatley Manor.

"Mrs. Major?" queried a relative from another part of the country, turning to his sister-in-law, who had made the remark. "Do you mean that lady who has just passed us in the carriage? The girl—I mean the young woman—who sat in the pew by the side of that elderly, military-looking gentleman with the grey hair? Why do you call her that? She isn't——"

"Yes, she is!" interrupted the other. "She is his wife, and a happier couple you couldn't find all over the Eastern counties, or anywhere else. That's as true as the gospel you've heard preached this very morning. They say it's curious how they came to be married, and I'll tell you what they say when we're having dinner."

The good woman's brother was not the only person who was surprised, interested and moved by the story of the marriage of Beatrice Davenport and Major Hatley, the distinguished officer, now on the retired list. Some people had said, on hearing the announcement of the forthcoming wedding, that snow and roses did not go well together, but time had falsified their predictions in this instance, and had those people known more of the inner mystery of the match, they would have refrained from making the gloomy prophecy.

Major Hatley and Mr. and Mrs. Davenport had been friends together before the marriage of the Davenports, so the Major was a welcome visitor to their house whenever he chanced to be in England. During the first two years of their married life they saw very little of him, as the young lieutenant was away on active service, but he came to see them immediately on his return. Little Trixie was then about a year old, and surprised everyone by holding out her baby arms to the officer after a short scrutiny. From that time they were good friends, and as she grew older her liking for the officer appeared to increase. So confidential did they become that Trixie, at the age of three, informed him that she would marry him when she was old enough, which sent the young officer into a fit of laughter.

Trixie looked a little hurt, so Lieutenant Hatley smoothed his face and said gravely: "Very well, little woman! I'll marry you. Make haste and grow up!"

The child's fondness for the bronzed officer became quite noticeable, and the remark made by her was told as a good joke, but the little girl repeated the statement several times at short intervals during the next six months. Then Lieutenant Hatley's regiment was ordered to Afghanistan, for a time the child made inquiries for her friend, but gradually the old association seemed to fade away, and the incident was forgotten by Mr. and Mrs. Davenport.

The years went by. Lieutenant Hatley became Captain and Major, and returned with his regiment to the old country. He had not heard much of the Davenports during his stay in the East, and he was unable to trace them at first, but he at length met Mr. and Mrs. Davenport by accident on a Rhine steamer during a tour on the Continent.

The meeting was a pleasant one for both sides, and, when cordial greeting had been exchanged, the Major asked:

"And what about my little friend, Trixie? She is getting to be quite a woman now, and has forgotten me, I expect?"

"She is studying at a German High School for Girls, and she will go to a Parisian school to finish," replied her mother with a touch of pride. "She is turned fifteen now, you know, Major. But you are wrong to suppose that she has forgotten you. She asked after you when we saw her the other day, and was glad to learn that you had attained the rank of Major."

"Oh, she hasn't forgotten you, Dick!" chimed in Mr. Davenport. "Are you home for long?"

"I am having a short holiday," responded the soldier, "but I shall be off again soon, as I expect to receive an administrative appointment in Egypt. I am sorry not to have the opportunity of seeing my faithful friend, Trixie," he added with a smile, "but that is a pleasure that must be reserved for a future occasion."

They spent a day or two together, seeing some of the sights of the Rhine district, and then the Major returned to England. A week later he was off to Egypt, to remain there for four years.

Those four years made a great change in Trixie. She was nineteen, and a charming specimen of budding womanhood. She had been presented and was "out," and her father and mother were anticipating with that pleasant fear peculiar to such circumstances, that their lovely daughter would be demanded of them by some eligible member of the highest society.

However, Trixie passed through six weeks of the season without meeting anyone who could capture her maiden heart; she refused two offers, each of which would have given delight to Mr. and Mrs. Davenport. In one case she would have had a title.

"They do not appeal to you, my dear?" asked her mother, when she learnt of the second refusal. "Well, we do not wish to lose you, and you must not accept anyone if you doubt the prospect of happiness with him. There is time enough."

"I shall not leave father and you, dear mamma!" declared Trixie softly. "I shall not marry at all, I believe."

"Ah!" exclaimed her father, who had entered in time to overhear the last remark. "Wait till Mr. Right comes, and then we shall see! I say, what do you think?" he continued, addressing both ladies. "I've had a letter from Hatley, he is giving up his appointment and is coming back to take up his residence at Hatley Manor. The people there will be glad to have the place occupied; it's so much better for them. It is a great pity that so many of our country seats are unoccupied. But the strange part of it is—our new home is only five miles away from Hatley. So we shall see the Major pretty often, I suppose."

Trixie's cheeks were a trifle more rosy as she listened to the concluding words. Suddenly her father turned to her.

"You will see your old friend again, Trixie. How long is it since you saw him? Nearly sixteen years! He asked after you when we met him on the Rhine, you remember? He will require an introduction to you now, for he won't know you. I wonder if you would recognise him?"

"I saw his portrait, father, when we were at the Ryles. I think I should recognise him by that," answered Trixie with an awkward laugh.

"Ryle saw him in Cairo three months ago," pursued Mr. Davenport, "and he tells me that the Major's hair has grown quite iron grey. Let me see! He must be forty-five or forty-six. Well, I'll write and tell him where our place is and that we shall all be glad to see him!"

Digitized by Google

So Major Hatley came home, the Manor having been set in order for him and servants engaged. His first visit was to the Davenports, where he saw his former small friend and companion in the form of a beautiful young woman, tall, graceful, charming. He was a man of the world, but it took him a second or two to recover himself sufficiently to make a remark.

That was the first of many visits; being old friends, as well as neighbours, it was but natural that they should visit frequently.

Trixie went out for drives and walks with the Major as with one whom her parents could trust to take care of their daughter without arousing criticism, and so the time spent in the country passed agreeably enough.

"You ought to marry, Dick," said Mr. Davenport one day, while discussing a cigar. "That's a fine old place of yours, and it wants a mistress to complete. I consider that you are not keeping up the reputation of the Manor, and are depriving some woman of a good husband by remaining single. Why don't you look about for one?"

Major Hatley was silent for a while. When he spoke his voice had just a trace of sadness in its tone.

"I daresay you are right," he said, "but the difficulty would be to find a woman who would take me and whom I liked."

"Well, well," laughed Mr. Davenport, "there is a wide field for selection, and you have time enough to look about!"

The subject was then changed, Mr. Davenport congratulating himself on having given Dick something to think about.

The Davenports and the Major went to London for the winter, but the Davenports returned to the country before the Major went back to the Manor. It was during this extra sojourn in London that an incident occurred which had the effect of changing the course of two lives. The Major met old Colonel Wallis, who had been his superior officer at one time in India, and the latter asked a favour.

"It's like this, old fellow," said the Colonel familiarly. "My boy, Arthur, is quite in love with Miss Beatrice Davenport. He's a good lad, and he will have a fair amount of money when his uncle dies, his great-uncle I ought to say. You know all about that affair, Hatley, it ought to come to me, but I rather offended the old boy, and he's going to give it to Arthur. It's all the same. Well, Arthur wouldn't be a bad match for Miss Davenport. But he wants a good opportunity, he couldn't get a real fair chance among all the fellows who crowded about her. That is why I come to you."

The Major did not quite see the drift of the conversation, but his old comrade's words were making him think.

"So," went on the other, "I thought I would ask you if you would invite him to stay with you for a fortnight. I know that the Manor is not far from the Davenport's country house, and that you are always seeing them; that would throw Arthur into her society, and he would have the field almost to himself. At the same time, the fact of his being with you would act as a recommendation with Miss Davenport."

"I don't think I have much influence over Miss Davenport," protested Major Hatley.

"Oh, haven't you!" exclaimed the Colonel. "Why Arthur says that she thinks an awful lot of you. Those were his very words. She is always mentioning you in some connection or other, and you could influence her more than her own father. 'The Major' she calls you, and it's always something about the Major, so Arthur says."

Colonel Wallis waited for Hatley to extend the invitation, and this, arousing himself from the reverie into which he was again falling, the Major did.

"Let him come to me and stay as long as he likes!" he cried heartily. "I am ready to do a good turn to your son or to you for the sake of old times, Wallis. I cannot guarantee the result, of course."

"Of course!" echoed Wallis. "But you can get a good word in for him, no doubt. I'll send on to the lad, but he won't be able to go for at least a fortnight. When do you return, Hatley?"

"At once!"

"I thought you were not going till the end of the week. Well, Arthur will write to you."

As Major Hatley went home he mused on this request.

"It will be best, after all, to see her settled. He's a good lad, I know, so I hope he will make her happy. I wonder what made me say I was going back immediately? Still, it will be as well as stopping here. I can put a word in for young Wallis before he comes. Ah, me! He hasn't grey hair and moustache!"

The Davenports were surprised and pleased to see him back earlier than intended. Trixie welcomed him warmly, and the Major thought of his promise. How should he introduce the subject of young Wallis? He wondered if he could begin the conversation by reminding her of her childish remark—"I'll marry you when I'm growed up!" and then lead on to Arthur. He and Trixie and her parents had joked about that remark several times during the first weeks of their renewed acquaintance at the country seat, but lately that joke had been studiously avoided.

He declined to shelve the matter till the following day. On the next day he met her half-way through a wood that lay between the Davenport's home and Hatley Manor. She was looking more charming than ever; her cheeks flushed, her eyes bright and sparkling, her dainty form showing to advantage in a dainty dress, a comfortable-looking jacket and a becoming hat.

"I have wondered of late," he said, going boldly to the subject as they walked side by side, "why you have not accepted some young fellow for a husband. I am sure that you had a good selection."

"I don't want 'some young fellow for a husband,' Major," she replied, quoting his own words.

He looked at her curiously; there seemed to be some ambiguity as to her meaning. Why had she quoted the words uttered by him?

"It would be better than some old man—some man with grey hair—would it not?"

"I—I really," she began, hesitatingly. Then, observing that his eyes were fixed on hers, she blushed prettily. "Major," she said simply, "I suppose it would be regarded as very unwomanly, but I am going to do it. I told you as a child that I would marry you when I was big enough, and I am still of that opinion!" She held out her hand. "Do you think I am big enough yet?"

Major Hatley asked himself if he could believe the evidence of his ears and eyes. He realised what he had felt but had tried to hide from himself, namely, that he loved this girl as passionately as man could love. Yet, was it fair to her?

"I am grey-haired, Trixie," he said gravely, but taking her hand as if he feared that she would agree with him and draw away, "and——"

"I like it!" responded Trixie. "I have not changed my mind since I was a little girl. If you think I am now 'growed up,' then I am ready."

The Major felt rather ashamed of his promise to Arthur Wallis not having been kept, but he wrote frankly to Colonel Wallis, and his explanation was accepted just as frankly.

Thus it came about that Trixie became "Mrs. Major," and the union has been blessed with the greatest happiness.

Geo. Day.

Digitized by Google

A JAPANESE IDYLL.

A Sad Love Tale of a Geisha Girl.

THE early morning sun was bathing the peaks of Okinawa with the roseate tints of its blushing dawn, as the white hulled yacht Irene steamed into the little bay of Hisomai, cutting the azure wavelets with many a foaming splash as she passed between the headlands, which shelter the entrance of this natural harbour.

Cecil Mavesleigh stood on the bridge of his yacht conning the rapidly-approaching shore through his glasses, when turning to the man who stood beside him, said carelessly: "So we are before Temple, after all, Conyers!"

Conyers smiled.

"Barely surprising, is it? The Irene steams five knots faster than the Yaiskic; besides, old man, you know that Temple can hardly ever tear himself away from Hong Kong under a month."

The angry churning of waters astern lessened, to finally die away as the throbbing screws came to a standstill, and the Irene, its brass fittings refracting the beams of the early sun, hove to, a quarter of a mile from the shore.

It was late in the afternoon before Cecil Mavesleigh and his chum Geoffrey Conyers landed on the white shingle beach, against which the tiny wavelets broke in mimic fury, and proceeded to walk through the little township of Aosima. The quaint houses peeping from among high trees, and their quainter inhabitants, both pleased and charmed Cecil Mavesleigh as he strolled along, to finally halt at a tea-house on the banks of the tiny river Vensi, which debouches into the bay of Hisomai.

Sheltering themselves from the sun's still powerful rays beneath the tea-house's spacious verandah, they proceeded to inform the obsequious Chinese proprietor that a cup of tea would prove refreshing. The Celestial beamed approvingly, and waddled off to execute the order with as much celerity as his corpulence admitted.

In due course the tea was brought, not by the Chinese proprietor, but by a Geisha of such exquisite beauty that Mavesleigh dropped the cigar he was smoking in amazement. Even the blasé Conyers surveyed the dainty little Japanese with approving eyes as she placed the fragile cups on the table beside them. Mavesleigh stroked his moustache thoughtfully, and then said, smiling, in perfect Japanese:

"I had no idea that Japan contained so pretty a Geisha!"

The little tea girl glanced covertly from beneath her long lashes at the handsome face turned to hers; then a blush stole over her cheeks.

"There are many such as I," she said modestly. "Many far prettier! Tea-house proprietors always choose those who are not ugly of feature to wait on their patrons, and to amuse them. . . . They come more often, if the Geishas are pretty," she added naively.

Mavesleigh smiled amusedly.

"Deuced good idea!" he remarked under his breath. Then added aloud: "How do you amuse your patrons?"

"I dance and sing. All who come here say that none can dance and sing so well in Okiawa or any of the Loo Choo islands as O Kiki San." There was a soft ring of pride in her voice as she made this statement, then looking straight into his clear blue eyes, she added shyly: "Perhaps you would like to be amused?"

"Emphatically!" he replied promptly, delighted with her naiveté.

"Shall I dance?"

"Yes, please—unless it is too hot," answered Mavesleigh interestedly, sipping his tea.

She was gone like a flash, returning a few minutes later with five other Geishas carrying instruments and a large mat, on which, as soon as it was spread out, O Kiki San took up a position, whilst her companions commenced to play a low, weird melody. A few bars rang out on the still, perfumed air, then O Kiki San, with a noiseless, easy grace, began her dance. Silently, with wonderful rapidity, and ease of action, the Geisha danced before the admiring Mavesleigh. Swaying lithely to and fro she alternately approached and receded from the visitors, the rapidly-dying sun illuminating the beautiful face of the dancer as she flitted from the shade of the overspreading trees into the evening glow

Faster and faster grew the measure of the dance till Mavesleigh grew dazzled, and O Kiki San appeared but a revolving figure of multi-coloured silks glinting in the fading sunlight. Spell-bound he watched her, then as the dance ceased, said softly:

"Thanks, O Kiki San!"

The little Geisha smiled as she approached the table to remove the cups.

"Will you sing to me?" he said gently.

"Not to-day," he answered. "I am tired. Another day I will, if it pleases the English lord."

"I am not an English lord," he laughed.

"Are not all Englishmen lords . . . even if only in their own estimation?"

He smiled as he gave her the three sen due, then said, rising: "You are as smart as you are pretty!"

"Were I ugly," she smiled merrily, "I should not be a Geisha here."

"And you will break many a heart before you grow much older," he continued sagely.

A gay smile flitted nervously about the corners of her mouth.

"Good-bye," she said politely, and as she watched Mavesleigh's tall figure disappear amid the trees of the garden she experienced for the first time an odd feeling of regret, and a strange longing to see him again.

Mavesleigh was strangely silent all the way to his yacht, a fact which disgusted Conyers much.

"I believe that you are in love with the Geisha," he remarked sharply to his chum, when they were on board.

"What if I am?" replied Mavesleigh irritably.

"I believe you are engaged to my cousin, Nina Howard," replied Conyers icily. "That's why. Have you forgotten that circumstance?"

"I am not likely to be allowed to do that, either by you—or her," answered Mavesleigh angrily. "However, Conyers, since you seem to evince so keen a concern in my affairs you may be pleased to know that I am not in love with 'that Geisha'!"

"Silly ass!" growled Conyers annoyedly, as his chum slammed the door of his cabin to. "How dare he fool about with Geishas when he's engaged to Nina?"

From within Mavesleigh's cabin the opening bars of a melody twanged on a banjo were drifted to his ears. It was the air to which O Kiki San had danced an hour previously.

"Well, I'll be jiggered!" muttered Conyers savagely angrily chewing the end of his cigar.

The following afternoon the Honourable Cecil went ashore alone and wended his way to the garden of Ti Sung, ostensibly for tea, in reality to see O Kiki San.

"Where have you been?" was all the greeting vouchsafed by Conyers on his return.

"Ashore," replied Mavesleigh briefly.

"You've been hanging round the confounded Geisha!"

Mavesleigh grinned unfeelingly.

"What ho if I have?" he asked genially. "Are you my keeper? Shut up, old man, and let a fellow enjoy his wretched life! Have a lime-juice and give up trying to make a storm in a tea-cup."

Digitized by Google

Mavesleigh's geniality jarring, Conyers refused the lime-juice and betook himself to whisky.

For a whole fortnight the Honourable Cecil went ashore alone, till one evening, beneath the spreading trees, the deep shadows of which the soft glow of the paper lanterns but dimly dissipated, O Kiki San redeemed her promise and sang to him.

It was a strange, wild, love song, a passionate burst of melody sung by a soprano of rare sweetness and purity. By turns wistful, commanding, endearing and tender, it swelled ever and anon with the latent fire of jealousy to lapse again into the loving and intreating. Strange and unaccustomed to his trained Western notions, the song nevertheless enraptured him, till when the last cooing notes died away in enthralling sweetness, Mavesleigh exclaimed:

"A wild song, little Kiki! Yet it is very sweet."

"It is my favourite," she answered softly, raising her dark eyes to his.

"It is the kind of song to sing to your lover!"

"Having none," she replied gently, "I only sing it as a matter of business. I have only loved once, and I love the same man still. But he does not love me. He is as far beyond my reach as yonder star." She sighed and then added—"I would give thirty years of my life to wed him whom I love."

A fierce wave of jealousy passed over Mavesleigh.

"Who is he—this man?"

"Do you think a Japanese maiden tells the world whom she loves?" the little Geisha queried proudly. "No! I have told none that I love, save you! You are different from the others who come to this tea garden, otherwise I should not have told even you. There was another reason which prompted me to tell you."

"Which was?"

"Because I—like you!" The admission was made blushingly.

"I wish that you could love instead of merely liking me," he exclaimed moodily.

"Would you care for me—a simple tea girl—to do so?" she asked softly, seating herself at his feet and glancing shyly up at him.

"I would give the world to be that—man you love!" he answered passionately. "Kiki! My darling, I know that I am a beastly cad to tell you that I love you after what you have told me—!"

"Why? I never said that he loved me."

"Then, darling, are you so blind that you cannot see that—I worship you?"

"Ceceel!" There was a depth of love in her voice as she rose and placed her hands behind her back. "Would you be pleased to know—that you are—that man?"

"Kiki!" He started to his feet amazed, clasping her slim form in his arms as he passionately kissed her lips. The little Geisha remained passive in his embrace, her heart beating wildly, contented in the consummation of her wish.

"Kiki, my little girl," he said, stroking her hair with a loving touch. "Is it really true that you love me?"

"True?" The dark, soulful eyes were raised to his, a wealth of love lighting their liquid depths. She nestled closer into the incircling arms, pillowing her head on his breast. "Ceceel, are you so blind, then, that you cannot see it? And you, dearest, you love truly? Not merely transitorily, but really?"

"What is your opinion, Kiki, on that score?"

Silence answered his question, broken only by the soft sighing of the night breeze through the overhanging trees.

"Well, darling?"

"I would speak as I wish it to be, Ceceel, therefore I am no judge! But I am happy in the thought that you love me—oh, so—so happy!"

She sighed contentedly, her soft breath caressing his cheek, and then said gently: "Oh, Ceceel, my darling, should your love grow cold, it would chill my heart to death!"

"Why should my love grow cold?" The question was softly posed.

"They say that man's love is like the restless wave, ever changing," she murmured.

He was about to indignantly deny this aspersion on the sex when the Chinese proprietor's voice was heard calling for O Kiki San.

"Good-bye, my darling!" he whispered. "The time will soon come when no one will have the right to call you from my side."

"Oh, that you may never change!" she answered, kissing him almost fiercely. The next instant she was gone and Mavesleigh strolled down towards the beach.

The dinghy was waiting for him, grounded on the beach. Silently he sat in the stern sheets, and taking the yoke lines in his hands, noticed for the first time the riding light of another vessel some two cables' length away from the Irene on her port quarter.

"What boat is that, Haversby?" he asked the sailor pulling stroke.

"The Yaiskie, sir—Come in two hours ago."

A muttered imprecation burst from between Mavesleigh's lips as the dinghy breasted the wavelets with a long, swinging stroke towards his yacht.

Conyers was in the smoking-room when he entered it, calmly smoking a cheeroot.

"What, ho!" he exclaimed. "Well, Mavesleigh, the Yaiskie has come, with your fiancée on board."

"The dickens!"

Conyers laughed gratingly. "My dear boy, you're not civil to my cousin, 'pon my word, you're not," he remarked easily. "As you are at the locker, man, mix me a whisky. I suppose you've been fooling about that artful little minx, O Kiki San?"

Mavesleigh turned round on his chum, his face livid.

"Look here, Conyers," he cried hoarsely. "You are presuming too much on our chumminess. By Heaven, you are! I love O Kiki San, and by George, you'll have to be civil when you refer to her, or there'll be a rumpus! I've given you due warning, now mind!"

Conyers' face clouded.

"Did I understand you to say that you loved her—that miserable girl?"

"Yes!" shouted Mavesleigh furiously, bringing his fist down with a terrific crash on the smoke-room table. "You did! Now what have you to say?"

"Much," replied Conyers coldly. "You are engaged to my cousin, Nina Howard."

"Well?" retorted Mavesleigh passionately. "That engagement is off!"

"Like the cold goose at Christmas, eh?" snarled Conyers. "You pitiful fool! You rank idiot! Might I inquire how you are going to silence Rimmelheim and Jacobs if you are not going to marry Nina? Is this Kiki an heiress, too?"

Mavesleigh paled, then strode up and down the cabin.

"I also notice that you are utterly indifferent as regards breaking hearts!" sneered Conyers.

"I should not break Nina's heart! She wishes to marry me, because my brother is on his death-bed, and if she marries me on or after his decease she will wear a countess' coronet.

Digitized by Google

Such brow garnishments possess peculiar attractions to America and Americans."

Conyers shrugged his shoulders placidly.

"In exchange you have the dollars," he replied coldly. "However, you wrong her in making that assertion. In my opinion, Maversleigh, you, to speak plainly, have acted like a cad both to her and the Geisha girl."

Conyers expected an outburst of fury, a torrent of invectives, but he was disappointed.

"You are right, Conyers," Maversleigh muttered hoarsely. "I have!" He opened the smoke-room door and strode out alone on to the murky deck.

"I must marry Nina," he mused savagely. "I must, or else die in poverty, and fail to keep my word with those infernal Jews, curse them! I should be a rich man to-day if it wasn't for Rimmelheim and Jacobs! I have been a cad to make love to Kiki, poor little girl! Conyers was right there, and it's deuced hard to admit it! Yes, there's no help for it! I must marry Nina, and enjoy all the fruits of a loveless marriage."

For an hour he paced up and down, then leaning over the taffrail gazed sadly across the little township of Aosima, dimly outlined in the silvery sheen of the rising moon.

"Oh, Kiki, my darling!" he murmured despairingly, "Must I leave you? You, who are my only love!"

The following evening the Honourable Cecil Maversleigh once more visited the tea-garden, and once again his eyes revelled in the beauty of the little Japanese, as Kiki, with a flush of pleasure mantling her cheeks, came to him, placing with nimble fingers a sprig of mimosa in his buttonhole.

"I thought that you were never coming, Ceceel," she said caressingly, as they sauntered down a secluded alley.

"Am I so late, then?" he queried awkwardly.

"Oh, so late! At least, it seems so to me," she replied, smiling up at him. "When one loves, even a minute's wait seems an eternity."

He felt his cheeks flame red with shame.

"Did you think I should leave Okinawa without saying good-bye to you, my darling?"

The hand resting on his arm trembled convulsively. He started shamefacedly like a criminal detected in his crime.

"You are leaving Okinawa?" she exclaimed dully.

"To-morrow," he replied, bracing himself together for the ordeal. "And I shall never return!"

"Never return!" she echoed wildly. "Ceceel, what is to become of me?"

"You will remain here in the tea-garden, I suppose."

He turned his head away, swallowed a lump in his throat and added, "And be the sweet little Geisha to—to others—as—ah, God!—as you have been to me!"

"But, Ceceel—Ceceel, my darling! I love you so!" she cried wildly. "You cannot have the heart to leave me here!—I love you so!"

"And I—Do I not love you madly, Kiki?" he exclaimed fervently. "Oh, Kiki!—my darling!—my love!—I must wed another far less beautiful than you. I am ruined and must recoup my losses. I must marry this woman, for I pledged her my word, long before I saw your sweet face—but you have to all eternity my heart! And I must part from you, Kiki, and leave you who are my life, my all!"

"Ceceel! Ceceel!" she cried feverishly, raising her tear-blurred eyes to his, while her soft, shapely arms stole gently round his neck. "She cannot love you as I do! You love me better than you do her! Forsake this lady, darling, and forsaking her, love me alone! I cannot spare your love to another."

"You do not understand our Western customs, my little Kiki," he cried tremulously. "You do not realise the light in which I stand! Yes, my darling, you are right when you say you love me better than she does. She only desires my future coronet. Had I not that, she would not want to marry me!"

"Give it to her, then," she said naively, smiling through her tears. "Then nothing will stand between us."

He smiled, despite his misery, at her innocence.

"It cannot be," he cried despairingly, kissing her passionately. "I must go from you, my love, never to return! I have sold myself and must stand by my bargain now."

"Ceceel, you cannot be so cruel!"

"Kiki, Kiki! Cannot you see how miserable I am? Don't make this parting harder than I can bear!" he cried hoarsely.

"Not that!" she cried passionately, sinking on her knees at his feet. "Ah, Ceceel, not that! Not parting! I will be your servant, your slave—only take me with you."

She kissed his hand passionately, then continued with her voice trembling with passion. "I will be so good, my love! So quiet! I will never worry you with my love! I will stand by and see you kiss and love another without a murmur! I will be dumb as long as I can see you from afar! Ceceel, my darling! Do not shake your head—take me with you. I love you so!"

"Oh, Kiki, my own, it cannot—cannot be! I shall have to love and cherish that dollar woman I am to marry. If you were nigh"—he turned away his head—"that could never be.

"Oh, Ceceel—Ceceel, don't—ah, don't leave me here to——"

He raised her from the ground, stopped her pitiful pleadings with a passionate kiss on her quivering lips, and then fled from the valley to the beach.

"To the yacht," he commanded, seating himself in the dinghy. "Now then, men, pull!"

The morning dawned clear and bright on the bay of Hisomai, when Aosima awoke into activity. The tiny wavelets broke on the shingle beach with a caressing hiss among the stones, lapping against the body of a Geisha which the sea had cast up.

Far away on the horizon westwards, two streaks of smoke against the azure heavens marked the positions of the Irene and the Yaiskie. From mouth to mouth the news flew through Aosima, that a body was on the beach, and soon the chattering townsfolk recognised the dead as O Kiki San.

In her hand she clasped with a terrible grip the gold locket which, on being opened, revealed a portrait of Maversleigh. Such was the finish of a Geisha's dream!

A year elapsed before a yacht once more steamed into the placid harbour. Half an hour after it had anchored, a yachtsman landed, wearing a deep band of crape round his cap, and a faded sprig of mimosa in his buttonhole.

He gave his name as the Earl of Kinfusis, and Aosima knew ere an hour was out, that he was travelling to forget the loss of his wife.

Meanwhile the Earl had gone to the tea-garden of Kung Li, and had inquired for O Kiki San.

The Chinaman smiled simply.

"Piecee girlee die, allee samee dlown herself," replied the Celestial placidly. "You oncee piecee fond of O Kiki San, eh? Velly nicee girlee, sell plenty tea."

Cecil Maversleigh staggered like a drunken man, then sinking into a chair, gasped hoarsely.

"Too late! Ah, Heaven, too late! I have indeed parted from my darling for ever!"

And a tear, which he had the manliness not to be ashamed of, stole down his cheek.

Tristam K. Monck.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.
CASELLIS	A man from Jamaica who knows Mrs. Norton's past history.

Mrs. Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia: Her companion.

THE STORY STARTS HERE.

HAVING arrived in England from a Bruges convent to be companion to my cousin, Frances Norton, I soon discovered that my cousin was taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money were lost and won. The climax came one night when Mary Vernon staked her diamond earrings (a gift from Lord Kinross), and one of the onlookers found them to be paste. The diamonds, it appears, were stolen by Mrs. Norton.

A few weeks later, my cousin, with Fluffy's help, stole a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew, an American millionaire, at the Café Regal.

We next moved into a house in Pont Street, and it is while here that Sir John Strickland, a poor baronet, proposed to Frankie, and was refused.

Later on Lord Kinross called at Pont Street for a private interview, and during this interview Percival Hope entered the room unannounced, and made the startling statement that Mary Vernon had discovered the thief who stole her diamonds. Shortly afterwards Frankie left the room; but I stayed, and, unknown to Kinross and Percival Hope, overheard Hope (who turns out to be Kinross' cousin) tell Kinross that in a fortnight's time he would prove that Frankie is an adventuress living upon the proceeds of the robbery of her friends. I told Frankie what I had overheard.

On the evening of the next day Lady Gaveston informed Frankie that she didn't approve of her behaviour towards Sir John Strickland, and that unless she decided at once either to marry or refuse him, she would return to Scotland. My cousin was given a fortnight's grace in which to make up her mind.

We went to the Derby, where Mrs. Curtis Blount, instigated by jealousy, enticed me to bet heavily, by which I lost £800. Frankie also lost heavily, and to pay our debts, she prevailed upon a young fellow, by promising marriage, to sign his uncle's name to a bill for £5,000.

That same night, at the Duchess of Warminster's ball, my cousin came face to face with a man from Jamaica who knew all about her past life. Percival Hope brought him in. It was a critical moment, but once again Frankie scored. She persuaded me, much against my will, to engage Hope's attention by making love to him, while she herself purchased the Jamaica man's silence. He agreed to be silent for the sum of £1,000 to be paid before noon on the following day. I had to go to Fluffy's chambers to get the money. It was past midnight, and while negotiating with Fluffy, Percival Hope burst into the room. Fluffy saved the situation by telling him that I had come to get money to pay my debts, whereupon Hope immediately advanced me £1,000.

The next day marked the end of the fortnight, during which Hope was to obtain proofs of Frankie's guilt. He and Kinross arrived with Casellis at Pont Street, and Casellis was asked to say what he knows of Frankie's dark past, but, instead of disclosing any unpleasant facts, he swore that she was a perfectly innocent woman.

Several other witnesses were called, but Frankie scored over each one in turn. Thus baffled; Hope left, and Kinross formally asked Frankie to be his wife. They were still in conversation when Sir John Strickland arrived.

Digitized by Google

Sir John Gets His Answer.

Sir John came slowly up the hall. He struck me as looking very ill. There was a stoop in his shoulders, usually erect; his head hung, he seemed crushed. Usually the most courteous of men, he did not return my greeting—hardly seemed to hear it.

"Your cousin's not at home, they tell me," he said at last. "I'll wait for her return, if you don't mind."

As he spoke he grasped the handle of the drawing-room door, and, before I could prevent him, entered.

As I have said, the drawing-room was the first of three reception rooms. They led one into the other, curtained archways taking the place of doors. Frankie and Lord Kinross had retired into the third and last of the series. Sir John stationed himself in the first. His proximity to the other two was closer than I cared for, at any moment they might appear. And then——

"Won't you come into the morning-room, Sir John?" I asked in a faint voice. "It's quieter there, and you look tired."

"I am tired—too tired to move. I want to rest, but——" he passed his hand wearily across his forehead. "I've so many things to think of. Will your cousin be back soon?"

I shook my head, I could not trust myself to speak.

"She is well? Nothing wrong, is there?"

"Nothing," I returned. "Don't you think it would be wiser for you to go home now and call again this evening? It's wretched to wait for a person, and—and Frankie may keep you waiting a long time."

"It doesn't signify, so that I see her at last." His manner was so strange that it alarmed me.

"What is the matter?" I asked, trembling. "Have you had bad news in the City?"

"Yes, very bad."

"Is it—is it the Carnegie Gold Mine?"

"Yes, the company's bankrupt, the shareholders ruined, the directors disgraced." He roused himself from his apathy, and spoke quickly, sharply, so that I dreaded he might be overheard.

"It was a fraud from beginning to end," he went on, working himself up. "The mine was worn out, as the company promoters knew quite well. The whole thing was worked to cheat the public. They read the prospectus, and, gulled by its glowing account of the 'Carnegie,' bought the shares. The money they paid, save for a few thousands, went into the pockets of the promoters, who were also directors of the company. Directors!" he sneered. "Cowards, cheats! When I went down to the office this morning not one of them was there! On the Continent, gone yachting, anywhere rather than at their post. For three hours I stood a mark for the shareholders' rage and abuse. God knows, I'm sorry for them! I've stripped myself of every penny to mitigate their loss, but my few thousands seem as nothing."

"But the other directors, won't they help to pay back the shareholders?"

"Not with a penny. They even sold what few shares they held a week ago when the market was up. They are not legally responsible, and therefore can wash their hands of the matter."

"Then why should you give up your money? What have you gained from your connection with the Carnegie?"

"Dishonour—nothing else. Yes," as I strove to contradict him, "I say dishonour. I knew nothing of mines, nothing of companies, nothing of the concern that, like a fool, I pledged myself to direct. I gave my name as guarantee of the good faith of what has proved a fraud, a cheat, a lie." His voice rose with passion, then broke into a low, hoarse whisper. "A lie," he gasped, "and I put my name to it."

He leant forward, hiding his face in his hands.

I watched him, fear and pity at my heart. His pride shattered, his will weakened, he sat a broken and a ruined man. And she, the woman who had done this thing, remembering what he had been and was now, could bear to see him, would smile and talk—the ripple of her laughter came through the curtains. I caught my breath. If she should come now, she and her lover, and Sir John should see them!

Desperate with fear, I fell on my knees beside him, and urged him, incoherent in my terror, to go home—at once, this minute.

He glanced up quickly, something of the old look came into his face at the sight of my distress.

"I've upset you," he said kindly. "It was very selfish of me. But you mustn't worry, I'm not ill. I shall get through all right. Come, don't look like that. Poor little girl, you're frightened." And he put me gently in a chair.

"It was a big blow at first," he went on quietly. "But it will grow easier to bear. I reproach myself terribly, but"—he paused—"I wanted money very badly." He was talking as much to himself as to me, arguing the case aloud. "You see," he smiled sadly, almost apologetically, "she can't bear the thought of poverty. She is so fond of nice things and pretty frocks and jewels. Who can wonder? Nobody could expect a woman like that to go without, and——" he broke off short, and turned towards me. "Don't you know at all when your cousin will be back? I want to tell her what has happened. You know how things are between us? Yes, I thought so. You can understand, then, how much I want to see her, to hear her say that, after all, it doesn't matter very much if I am poor, it will only mean a little longer waiting. We shall have to wait, Cynthia, but she won't mind it. It will be a long time. I shall have to start from the bottom of the ladder, and—and I'm not a young man. But she'll wait. I'm not afraid of that. But—I wish she'd come. I'm tired now, worried, depressed; but it will all vanish when she comes. All will be right when I see her."

It seemed to me he glanced towards the curtained archway. I fancied he was going through.

"No, no," I gasped, strangling a scream, "not there!" I rushed and stood in front of him.

His face changed, surprise deepening into suspicion.

"What is it?" he asked sternly. "What are you hiding?"

By this time I was past all self-control. I could only wring my hands and incoherently beseech.

Sir John put me aside, marched towards the archway, and drawing back the hangings, passed through. He paused a moment, and stood as if expectant—listening.

Across the stillness came the sound of voices. I recognised the tender mocking thrill that Frankie always practised on her lovers. Sir John seemed to recognise it too. He started, and crossed quickly to the threshold of the inner room, where Frankie and Lord Kinross sat.

The curtains were half drawn. A graceful figure in her slim white frock, Frankie leant timidly—her eyes downcast—against her lover. Through the open window the sun fell on her golden hair, her fair face and tender eyes. She drooped towards Kinross like a tall, white lily.

The figure at my side stiffened, silent and grim, with a face of stone; not a muscle relaxed, not a sigh escaped him. But when the other far less tender lover caught her in his arms, with a swift movement drew her face to his, eagerly kissed her eyes, mouth, and hair—when, I say, he saw that other do these things, the great heart of the man beside me failed.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

(Continued.

With a low, hurt cry he staggered forward a few paces, only to fall at last senseless, helpless at my cousin's feet.

I don't remember just what followed. I turned faint, and hid my face. When I looked up again Sir John was lying on the sofa with a strange look on his face, a rigidity about his figure.

"A paralytic seizure," said the doctor, and shook his head over the chances of recovery. We wired for Mrs. Ponsonby, Sir John's sister, and pending her arrival Lady Gaveston, efficient and severe, controlled the situation, taking the patient under her charge.

All that night I sat upon the stairs waiting in forlorn hope for better news.

Toby—steadied by the shock he had proved himself most useful—shared my vigil a few stairs higher up. Kinross, at Frankie's wish, had not remained. He was very sympathetic, and had asked no awkward questions, but seemed a touch reserved.

Towards the morning I must have dozed. I awoke to find the door wide open. I cautiously peeped in. Lady Gaveston still erect, was sleeping stiffly in her chair; at Sir John's side knelt a woman, her face hidden in her hands, weeping bitterly. It was my cousin Frankie.

"John, if you could speak to me! If you would say something. I can't bear it. I can't," she clenched her hands, gripping the rug that covered him. "Never a word, a look from him, that was not kind. Always tenderness and love. What shall I do?" she rocked herself to and fro. "What shall I do? If I'd known, if I'd guessed it would be like this. John!" she turned to him, laying her head beside his on the pillow, stroking his hair, begging him wildly, passionately to answer.

Calm and still, with a far-off look in the quiet eyes, he lay unheeding; even the woman he had loved so dearly could not rouse him, nor could her voice recall. In vain her tears, her cries, her lamentations. Too late! Too late!

Lady Gaveston, suddenly roused, turned in her chair.

"It's over late for greeting, woman," she said sternly. "This is no time for tears. Get you up," she laid her hand on Frankie's arm.

"He will get better?" pleaded Frankie. "Tell me he will get better."

Milady shook her head.

"It's not I that can tell you even a thing—you've much to answer for, Frances."

My cousin made no effort to defend herself, but went quietly out. I caught a glimpse of her face as she passed me in the hall. Tear-stained and haggard, it was like some other woman's face—not my cousin's. Could it be she had loved him after all?

SIR JOHN STRICKLAND

I pondered on the matter till I grew cold, and felt inclined to make coffee. Toby had vaunted his powers in this direction at intervals all night. I turned to wake him. To my astonishment, he was not there!

Two days later Mrs. Ponsonby arrived, and moved Sir John away. There was no change in him, nor, said the doctor, was it likely that there ever would be.

For a while Frankie seemed depressed and looked ill. Gradually, however, she recovered her spirits. Her engagement by this time was made public. She received hosts of congratulations, everyone paid her compliments, her friends and enemies alike—more or less sugared as the case might be. Among the first to call were Chesterton and Toby Ffolliott.

I had not seen Toby since he so suddenly and mysteriously disappeared in the middle of the night. I judged it was not a favourable time to ask for explanations. He looked ill and wretched, his health of late was no better than his temper.

Lord Chesterton was very nice to me. He made no actual reference to the mystery of the notes, but made me understand that whoever else might be to blame, he did not think I was. How different from Percival Hope! He had neither written nor been near me.

Chesterton went after an hour or so; Toby, however, showed no signs of leaving, but stuck firm as a limpet on his chair. I read the signs of a storm in his face, and dreaded an unpleasant scene. With great determination and bad taste he waited till the last guest had left, outstaying Kinross himself.

He wasted no time in preliminaries, but came to the point at once.

"Is it true that you are engaged to Kinross, Frankie?"

My cousin, raidant in a wonderful tea-gown of rose chiffon over silk, smiled and nodded.

"Yes," she said, "quite."

"You're going to marry him?"

"It is usual in such cases, I believe!"

Toby got up and came towards her.

"I say you shan't," he said doggedly. "You promised to marry me."

Frankie laughed softly.

"What do you propose to marry on?" she asked.

The boy winced. "I thought——" he stopped blankly. "I've prospects you know," he plucked up spirit as he went on, "and I shall get a larger salary each year."

"I don't propose to marry on 'prospects,' and the chance of an increase of salary," said my cousin firmly. "The case lies thus—I am poor—yes," as the boy looked incredulous, "quite poor. I've been extravagant, infringed on my capital, until there's little left. Another three months will see me at the end of my tether. I shall sink into oblivion unless—" she paused. "I must marry money," she said firmly.

"But you promised me," he argued wildly.

"Don't be a fool, Toby. How can I marry a man with neither money nor brains? I used to think you were clever. When I made you that promise I thought you were ambitious, that you had initiative, go. I find I was mistaken. You've changed, Toby, changed for the worse."

"And who's responsible for that?" he almost shouted.

Frankie shrugged her shoulders.

"I should say it was brandy," she answered insolently.

The boy winced and coloured to his temples.

"You're wrong," he said slowly. "It's you. I mean it, I'm going to tell you just how I mean it, and—you're going to listen." He walked straight up to her, his young face white and drawn.

"I wasn't a bad sort of chap before," he said. "There was nothing much to be ashamed of in my life. Now it's quite different. Day and night the horror of what I've done grips me. Do you think I can ever forget it? Ever forget I forged another man's name? Oh, I know you don't think very much of it. Forgery is quite a small thing in your eyes. But in mine—it's—it's fiendish!"

"It's manly to reproach me," said Frankie.

"It's human. I did it because—I loved you, because I thought that you loved me. Now I know that you don't care a farthing about anybody but yourself. You'd cheerfully send a man to death if his dying would pay your bills. Not a man, not a woman whose weakness you don't trade on. Not a friend, a lover, that you don't betray. Do you think I don't know? What of Mary Vernon, whose sweetheart you stole? What of Sir John——"

Digitized by Google

"If he were here you would not dare to speak to me like this."

"Whose fault is it that he is not? I don't wonder you flinch, even you must needs feel some remorse. I saw you stand in tears beside him. Heard you confess what you had done. What is there to prevent my telling Kinross what I heard? Why should I not tell him what you are?"

She didn't seem afraid, but smiled at him with a curious expression.

Her smile seemed to madden Toby.

"You—you devil!" he said under his breath. "Why shouldn't I ruin you?"

He gripped her tightly by the arms, but with a quick movement she freed herself and clasped her hands about his neck. "Why?" she asked with a little laugh. "Why? Because you love me. Come," she drew his head level with her own, looking into his eyes. "Kiss me," she said.

A short, tense pause, then, with a gasp, half sob, half sigh, he kissed and clasped her tightly.

"Don't turn me off, Frankie," he said hoarsely. "I don't mind what you do, but I can't live without you." He kissed her hands, holding her tight; he begged her forgiveness, praying that she would see him sometimes. Yes, she might be engaged to Kinross, he wouldn't interfere. She might do anything if she would see him, and be kind.

He had no thought of honour towards his friend. His infatuation left no room for better things.

It wasn't a nice spectacle to witness. I left the room and went upstairs.

Frankie followed shortly and asked me to get ready for a drive.

"I'm going to see Mary Vernon," she said, "and I want you to come too." She made no reference to Toby, and I felt relieved at her silence. Some things are better not spoken of.

Mary Vernon was at home, and received us with her usual friendliness. Frankie turned me on to Mrs. Vernon, a little woman with a big flow of small talk, and seated herself by Mary, some short distance off.

Frankie had come to tell her friend that she was engaged to Kinross. I knew it, I felt it, and admired the courage that could face that friend's reproaches.

Mary flushed during Frankie's introductory speech, turning her eyes away.

"Answer me this," she said at last. Her voice was low, but I caught the words, Mrs. Vernon's fatuous remarks seemed to throw them up.

"Do you love Hartland? Sincerely, deeply?"

Frankie nodded.

"He cares for you, I know. He always admired you. Were you quite straight with me in the old days, Frankie? Didn't you endeavour just a little to weaken his allegiance towards me and draw him towards yourself?"

"No, Mary, never." At times her voice sank, I only caught a part of what ensued. "Showed admiration—checked him—honour to you," was all I heard.

Mary gazed quietly at her friend.

"I didn't think he was so weak," she said, "but——" she paused. "Make him happy, Frankie—and I'll forgive you—both."

My cousin was very silent as we drove home.

Lady Gaveston was waiting in the drawing-room, evidently armed for a fray.

"I gather you're marrying Lord Kinross," she remarked with a sniff—she had known it for some days.

"Yes."

"When is the wedding to take place?"

"I think in the Autumn," said Frankie deprecatingly.

"I shall not be here," said Lady Gaveston with a snap.

"You're going to leave me?"

"At the conclusion of the season, as we first arranged. I'll carry out my contract—no more."

"But Lady Gaveston——"

Milady stopped her with a gesture. "Keep your persuasions, Frances—you'll want them later. I am proof against cajolery; I stay till the beginning of August, then—" she paused, "our paths divide."

She retired with the honours of war. Frankie sank listlessly into a chair.

"I wish it were over," she said at last. "My marriage, I mean. It's such a long time coming, and—and—it's cost so much already. Even now something may happen to stop it."

"What is there to fear?"

She sighed. "Not very much, it's true. Hope won't try any more conclusions with me. Sir John"—she paused a break in her voice. "He would never wish to hurt me," she said softly.

"And Toby?"

"Oh, I've settled him. He's not likely to give any further trouble. He won't come here again just yet, I've asked him not to."

But in that she was mistaken. That evening Toby came.

Frankie and Lord Kinross had gone to the theatre. I was sitting in the drawing-room alone when he walked in.

"Where's Frankie?" he said quickly.

"Out. She's gone to the theatre, and won't be back till quite late—what is it, Toby, anything wrong?"

"I'm in trouble—awful trouble." He looked ghastly.

"Frankie's deceived me," he went on. "Not an unusual thing," and he sneered. But this time"—he paused. "She lied about the bill," he said, "lied horribly. She told me it would not fall due for three months, and by that time she would have the money."

"Well, isn't it so?"

"No, I met Nathan, the money-lender, in the Strand this afternoon. He stopped me and asked quite casually if my uncle were in England.

"'It's a matter of business,' he said. 'Sir Edward backed a bill for your friend, Mrs. Norton, at six weeks. I daresay you know about it? It falls due in three days' time. The lady's sure not to have the money, so we shall have to drop upon Sir Edward.'

"He looked at me in a strange, scrutinising way, Cynthia. I'm sure he suspects the signature is not genuine. I asked him to communicate with me before he wrote to my uncle, as Mrs. Norton was my friend, and he promised that he would. Meantime, there's only three days in which to get the money."

"Frankie hasn't a penny," I gasped, "and Fluffy is away."

"It must be got somehow," he said grimly. "I'll try my best but I've small hopes. I'll see you again to-morrow. Remember, Cynthia, if the money is not paid the bill will be presented to my uncle. He will repudiate the signature, and——. But I'll not live to be disgraced. I've courage yet to put a bullet through me. I mean it. If we can't get the money I shall shoot myself—you'll tell her."

He left abruptly, but all the night his white face and hunted-looking eyes haunted me.

"I've courage yet to put a bullet through me."

The words rang in my ears. It must not be, it should not be! But there were only three days left. Three days of grace!

(The first events of those terrible three days will be recorded next Tuesday.)

Digitized by Google

A SISTER'S SACRIFICE.

Telling of the Love of a Crippled Girl.

"WHEN is it to be, Minnie?"

Rob Durand looked lovingly into the eyes of the girl who stood before him, and the expressive orbs drooped under the ardent gaze. Rob's heart beat with exquisite joy as he noticed this, but he attributed the movement to the wrong cause.

"I do not know, Rob," faltered Minnie Penton.

Her heart was contracted with fear; she had dreaded this moment—yes, dreaded the moment when Rob Durand, the man whom she loved with all her soul, should ask her to name the happy day! She called it the "happy day," and yet dreaded to be asked to name it! Her train of thought was interrupted by Rob.

"Then I must fix it, if you will not," he declared, placing his palms against her soft cheeks and raising her head until he could look again into those sweet eyes. The frightened expression which he detected in them perplexed him.

"Oh, Rob," she burst forth at length, "it cannot be yet! Not for a long time perhaps. I could not leave Jennie!"

"But who said——" He was about to ask why she thought that marrying him meant leaving Jennie, but she interrupted him hastily.

"I could not leave her; she would die if deprived of my care. I have tended her since mother died, and have devoted myself to making her happy, poor crippled Jennie! I could not allow one more drop of pain to be added to a cup of suffering that is now almost full to overflowing. No, Rob, it cannot be!"

"You are running on wildly, Minnie dear," he expostulated with loving kindness. "I do not propose to separate you and your invalid sister; whatever could have caused such a notion to enter your pretty head? She will live with us, and she shall not know that any change has taken place, so far as care of her is concerned. She will be as happy as it is possible to make such an invalid. I will see to that!"

She knew that he would do all he said; she had never thought otherwise, and she was ashamed of having tried to mislead him. Yet how could she tell him the truth? She must put him off in another way. Oh, why had Rob and she fallen in love?

"It cannot be, Rob dear. While my sister lives it is impossible for me to marry you. I know that you would do everything to make her happy, but she would not be happy if she knew that I loved another better than I love her. She has had my undivided love and attention so long that it would be a cruel blow to her, a blow that my love will not permit me to inflict. We must wait—wait while she lives!"

"But that is absurd, Minnie!" cried Rob impatiently. "Why, we might have to wait a lifetime! I am willing to wait a year if you like, but not indefinitely. Come, within the space of twelve months, you can gradually accustom her to the idea. Even twelve months seems a lifetime!"

He laughed gaily, bent and kissed her, feeling convinced that he had overcome all her scruples. His temper began to get slightly the better of him, ardent lover as he was, when she shook her head.

"It cannot be, Rob! I know that we may have to wait years, but we must wait. While Jennie lives, I cannot marry. I will not keep you bound; you are free, if you desire it. Let us be friends——"

"Friends!" he echoed scornfully. "I love you, and cannot be a mere friend. If you love me," he continued bitterly, "as you have told me, then you will marry me. I cannot wait.'

"I do love you, Rob," she said simply, crowding back the tears, "but I cannot marry you while Jennie lives. Don't be hard. Do I not suffer as well?"

"If you love me, you could not ask me to wait indefinitely," he replied savagely. "So that is the love you have to give me, and it is for this that I have hovered near you, unhappy during every moment that I could not be with you! Friends! No, it cannot be; you must be my wife or a stranger."

"No, no, Rob!" The words were wrung from her. "Do not go away! Stay with us, for the sake of the days we have passed together and can yet have together! Stay near me, and let us be good friends!"

"No! I should like to remain near you, for happiness will be an impossibility for me while out of sight of your dear face; but if you have no greater love for me than that, it is best that I should go!"

He turned on his heel with his usual impetuosity and strode away. She tried to call him back, but she could not utter a sound. With a moan of anguish she sank to the ground and sobbed convulsively.

Why had such a cruel fate been forced upon her? Rob had gone away, angry with unsatisfied love, forgetting that she, too, was suffering. No, not forgetting, but unaware of it. She excused him even in her sorrow. He did not know the truth; how could she tell him? How could she let him know that she could not marry him while Jennie lived because the marriage would be a death blow to her sister?

Poor Jennie had conceived a consuming passion for handsome Rob Durand, ever since the day when he had lifted her from the awkward position into which she had fallen while Minnie had gone in search of flowers for the invalid. Rob Durand had been struck with the beauty of the cripple, and he was just as much moved by the loveliness and charm of the elder sister when she returned two or three minutes later and warmly thanked him. After that, Rob Durand had called under the pretext of inquiring after the health of the invalid, but in reality to obtain the chance of a talk with Minnie. So they had drifted into love, Rob and Minnie, and the latter had suddenly awakened to the knowledge that her deformed sister had fallen in love with Rob Durand.

Minnie's grief exhausted itself, leaving a dull pain at her heart. She went to her own room to efface the marks of tears and then made her way to the chamber where the deformed girl was lying in bed.

"Has Rob been to-day, Minnie?" she asked querulously. "My Rob! I call him mine, because I love him, although I fear that he cannot love me. You don't think me foolish, I know, Minnie. It is so sweet to think of him as mine! Has he been this evening? I did not hear his voice."

Bright red spots on her cheeks indicated the intensity of her feelings. Minnie smoothed the lovely hair from the forehead of the invalid and smiled indulgently.

"Yes, he came and stayed for a little while, dear. Are you comfortable?"

It was strange to see such beautiful features in a cripple. A fall during childhood had marred the making of a beautiful woman, and she was more like a lovely child in appearance than a woman of full age, as she lay thus in bed.

"I wish I had been up to-day!" sighed the invalid. "I should have liked to see him. My Rob! I know that he can never be really mine, but it is pleasant to say so to myself and to you, Minnie. What did he say?"

Digitized by Google

"Oh, that he was sorry that you were not up, and so on."

The cripple was quieted until the morrow, but Minnie was uneasy on Jennie's account. Suppose Rob Durand kept his word and went away? What would Jennie say?

The next day came and began to wane, but Rob Durand did not appear. Minnie, fulfilling some necessary errands, learnt that he had left by the 2.45 train for Paris, where his sister was living, and her heart sank. He was gone! He had thought her cruel, but oh! how cruel he was to her!

"Why has not Rob been to-day?" asked Jennie fretfully.

"He has been kept away unavoidably, I suppose, dear," replied Minnie, trying to maintain her composure.

"That is the first time he has stayed away since he helped me. I don't understand it."

The next day passed, and still no Rob. Jennie was excited and irritable.

"Where is he, Minnie? Why is there no sign from him?" She glanced sharply at her sister, and Minnie's countenance betrayed her. "You know why he is not here and you have not told me!" she added vehemently.

Minnie saw that it was useless to keep up the deception; she must soon learn that Rob had left England.

"I have heard that he has gone to Paris, dear," she explained. She dared not trust herself to say more.

"Why has he gone? Minnie, I insist on knowing. Why. Ah!"—as Minnie burst into tears—"I understand. You have taken him from me! You have stolen his love from me! This is your devotion to me! You pretend to care for me, and you take advantage of your health and strength, your upright figure, to take my lover from me!"

"Jennie, don't, don't!" cried Minnie appealingly. She feared the result of this paroxysm for her sister as well as for herself.

Jennie's cheeks were burning now. She raised herself in the bed and pointed a finger with withering rage and contempt at Minnie ere she fell back in a swoon.

There was no mistaking the fact that Jennie's violent outburst had done irreparable mischief to her frail body. She changed visibly and would speak to Minnie only when occasion demanded. Minnie, in the greatest alarm, summoned a well-known physician, who confirmed her suspicions that Jennie's days were numbered. She saw the sister, the poor creature who had been deprived of the pleasure of living and condemned to constant suffering, fading from this world. Could anything save her? Only one thing offered the merest chance, and she resolved to do it. She hurriedly scribbled a letter to Rob Durand at his sister's address and posted it.

But a week went by and he came not. Jennie's attitude had changed somewhat; the softening influence that comes when the end is near was working silently. Minnie would sit by her for hours at a time, without a word from Jennie, but now and then there was a look in the eyes of the deformed Jennie that indicated a change of sentiment.

One afternoon, more than a week after the posting of the letter, Minnie was keeping her vigil by Jennie's bedside when the latter opened her eyes suddenly and cried:

"Rob is here!"

Minnie gazed at her in deep anguish; the end was surely near, and her sister had actually mistaken her for Rob! She arose to bend over the bed, but started as the door opened and Rob Durand stepped into the room.

"He has come to me!" cried Jennie, holding out a weak, emaciated arm and hand. Rob took it and glanced at Minnie.

"I understand it all now," he said softly, taking her by the hand that was disengaged.

"Yes, yes!" said Jennie weakly. "I do not mind; it is well. You are mine while I live and——"

Her eyes closed. Minnie took her sister's other hand, and thus they stood till she passed away from her life of pain.

"I did not get your letter for five days," said Rob, "for I had gone to St. Petersburg, and it was sent on. I returned at once. Can you forgive me?"

G. E. Lingen.

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

September 2. — Mixed influences over the next year may be expected by those whose birthdays occur to-day. Unexpected changes and sickness. Have a care with servants.

Girls will find love affairs very interesting, but little confidence should be given.

The day is evil for most matters; guard against chills and mishap.

A child born to-day will be ingenious, and fortunate in the employ of others.

September 3.—An active and fairly prosperous year may be expected by to-day's children. Good for young people, clerks and teachers. Landlords and farmers benefit.

Rather quiet for love affairs.

The day is good to deal in property, sign papers, and engage servants.

A child born here will be very clever, have an active brain, and sharp wit. Will do well in business.

September 4.—Good for health, business, and finances. Some trouble over home affairs and children.

Young girls will have anxiety over lovers, but if born from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. they will become engaged, or marry.

The day is good for buying and selling, especially near noon.

A child born this day will be fortunate in most matters, and should be in a business of its own.

September 5.—The positions for those who celebrate birthdays to-day are more fortunate for girls. Aged people will find it a dull time and need care with the health.

Girls receive attentions, and, if engaged, they marry.

The day is good for changes; buying wearing apparel, and for pleasure. Beware of colds and mishap on the water.

A child born to-day will be fond of change and pleasure. Will lack self-confidence and should keep in employ.

September 6.—The year will bring many annoyances and not much good fortune in business. Guard against loss and accident.

Love affairs make little progress, and girls should beware of quarrels.

A bad day for letter-writing, signing agreements, speculating, and visiting friends.

A child born here will be improvident, sharp-tempered, and headstrong.

September 7.—A fortunate year for business; farmers, builders, and aged people are favoured. Ask favours and buy property.

Girls born near 1 a.m. and 8 p.m. receive attentions from elderly men.

A child born here will be fortunate in business; the mind will be practical, painstaking, and ingenious.

September 8.—An active year, but sickness or trouble in domestic circle. Beware of quarrelling and mishap.

Young girls will find love affairs go wrong, chiefly through third parties.

The day is good to deal with military men, visit doctors and push business. Evil for pleasure and marriage.

A child born here will be quick, headstrong and fond of pleasure. Should be in employ of others.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google

THE LOVER'S LEAP.

Telling of a Mistake and its Sequel.

CHAPTER I.
The Introduction.

MAIDEN aunts are a peculiar dispensation. As a rule they have money, hang out hopes to a nephew or niece, wear glasses and fronts, and are rigid and requiring. They lean to theology, denounce the theatre, and view the mildest Havana as a spark from the hottest regions of profundity. Such, at all events, is my experience of the race. I had two of them. One departed, and my expected legacy merged in the second, thus binding me over to a tighter and direr state of bondage.

My aunt Euphrosyne Gorges possessed something besides her high-sounding name to raise her to the ranks of the aristocracy. She was nearly six feet high, had white tapering hands, was a twenty-fourth cousin of Lord Tatterham, and owned a lofty house in Merrion Square, Dublin.

It was here that I was admitted to play my part as slave, sycophant, and strategist, and I contrived to enact it as skilfully as I could, having only a Castle-Rackrent sort of habitation to fall back upon in the far west, if I fell out with my present prospects.

I am afraid, after all, I was a bad hypocrite. My cousin Bob Bright had ten times my gifts of diplomacy. For me, I was apt to be remorseful if I humbugged too unblushingly; and this combination of scrupulousness and subtilty was a distasteful admixture, tending to an uncomfortable state of the internal regions. Far better to have been thorough-going, like my cousin Bob. The elements for success are a cool, clever brain, unflinching courage, and untold audacity.

It may be thought that this rule can scarcely extend to the fairer sex, with whom softness and sweetness are so enticingly associated; but here affectation steps in adroitly on the scene. They can show tenderness, by all means; never feel it. A woman of this genius passes far in the race her delicate, shrinking sister, who blushes away her chances in life, and seldom rises to the occasion when a line has to be cast or a prize landed.

I may as well admit at once that I had not succeeded very well up to this point in one line of tactics; I made no way with the ladies. Now my aunt Euphrosyne cherished a firm theory that young men should marry and "settle" early. I was wise enough to indorse all her views when laid down to me tract-wise; but here acquiescence ended; I could not put them into practice.

One morning in the dog days my aunt had held forth to me rather warmly on some subject from behind the tea-urn, and I felt almost suffocating. I escaped as soon as possible into the garden at the back of the house. It was but a narrow strip of territory, and few flowers of the more delicate species flourished within its imprisonment. Nevertheless my aunt had made the most of it. A trellis-work entwined with roses and jasmine surmounted the walls, there was a grass plat in the centre, and a border at either side of a gravel walk well stocked with sweet peas and hardy annuals. Her crowning piece, however, was a large, waving plant which stood near an arbour in the far corner. She called it "The Pampas, Palustris, Parnassus Grass." The name I thought long, and the plant likewise. Its tall stalks, with their light puffy heads, seemed always in the way; and I didn't like it somehow. At the same time I was wholly guiltless of any premeditation as to the catastrophe which was at hand.

At this hour my aunt Euphrosyne was generally absorbed in some matutinal consultations with the cook, and I thought myself safe. I drew surreptitiously from my pocket a small embrowned case. My nerves wanted soothing and the insects smothering. Let the cost be what it would, I must have a cigar. Scarcely, however, was a light vesta ignited when a step was on the gravel walk, and with an expletive, into which I fear the word "blazes" intruded, I flung the match hurriedly away.

"George!" said my aunt, approaching, "I've some news for you."

She held an open letter in her hand, and I turned to her attentively.

"You have heard me speak of Miss Lufleigh?" she pursued —"Letitia Eliza Lufleigh—she is a sweet, serious girl, and has just come into a fortune, willed to her by her godmother—twelve thousand pounds. George, she's the wife for you! I will give you an introduction, and you can make her acquaintance at once. I have shown some kindness to Dr. Lufleigh's family before now, and I expect they will receive you as a son——"

"And heir?" I interposed.

"Don't be flippant, sir. This is a serious matter. Matrimony is an important step in life. Miss Letitia is young, handsome, and clever. In a word, she has wit, wealth, and worth. Can you ask anything more? Tell me that, sir, I beg of you." And my aunt, warm with her oration, bent enthusiastically towards her pet Pampas.

"Isn't it grand?" she murmured, and stroked it affectionately. "It's getting golden, gorgeous, quite red towards the centre," and she peered closer into its depths. "But, gracious! what's that?" and with a bound she was back to me. "Good heavens, it's on fire!"

"Sunstroke! fireflies! spontaneous combustion!" I cried incoherently.

"George, you've done it!" said my aunt, in that awful tone which seemed to thrill everything like an earthquake. "How could you? How dare you?"

"I—I didn't—I didn't mean it," I finished up, for she had seen the fib on my face. "I was lighting a match to scatter the midges. I suppose it fell somehow; the place is as dry as tinder, and——"

"Oh you wretch! And you stand there, and my Pampy in flames! The seat will catch in a moment, the house, the whole square!"

The picture was so terrible that I sprang madly to the pump, and calling all hands to aid we had presently drenched arbour, walls, walks, shrubs, and, lucklessly, my aunt herself, with a primeval deluge of water. Everything being either burnt or soaked, I fled to the house. My aunt's cap was done for, a new dress, and any remnant of reason the first shock had spared.

Digitized by Google

It is scarcely necessary to explain that after this escapade, I fell meekly into all Miss Euphrosyne's views respecting the matrimonial investment, and the very next day was dispatched ardently on my mission.

Dr. Lufleigh was a country doctor residing in a southern part of Kilkenny. He was the owner of two daughters, who both had the reputation of beauties. It was the elder who had become now the lucky legatee of the bequest from a deceased godmother.

"Mind," exclaimed my aunt as I left, "mind, George, that it's Letitia—not Lucy. Be clear and clever. Don't forget!"

Turning my head towards my aunt's excited face, I sang out, in a tone as eager and emphatic as her own, "Lucy, did you say? Yes, aunt, all right; never fear."

The cab was off before I could catch her distracted ejaculation; but I saw her hands uplifted despairingly, and plumed myself on the fright I had put her into. She was not, however, to be outdone by me in this way, or baffled in having the last word. As we stopped presently at the station on the line a telegram was put into my hands. It contained the single sentence, in a clear, clerkly caligraphy that made me redden instinctively—

"Letitia, you stupid, not Lucy, for your life."

An omnibus was at the station which was my final destination, the town itself being some little distance off. Just as we were starting a delay came. There was a rush at the doorstep, the conductor gave way, and a pile of wet garments tumbled in amongst us. There was no possible room for another occupant; but before any of us had recovered from the showerbath which the dripping garment had dispensed, a lady had taken her place—or rather my place—and I sprang into an awkward position, between sitting and standing, to escape receiving her in my arms. A thick-set gentleman in the corner, against whom I was thrown, was round on me in a second. He was in a muffler, and saw nothing beyond his immediate vicinage.

"What are you about, sir?" he exclaimed. "What do you mean by this violence? You had better go outside, or I will call the conductor."

"I beg your pardon. This lady——" I began.

"No lady is encroaching," he broke in sharply. "It is you, sir, who are aggressive. It is you who have no seat."

It was scarcely unnatural that my prejudice should be pretty strong by this time against the cause of the commotion. I decided at once on her appearance. She was large, bony, and stern-featured, and with that disagreeable, self-asserting air which marks the spinster of a certain age, who, with no other prop to cling to, is tenacious of her "woman's rights."

A glance to one side revealed, however, an unexpected vision. The lady was blushingly young, undeniably pretty, and unmistakably shy. It was no doubt in a bashful rush that she had deposited herself anywhere to escape the awkwardness of claiming or soliciting a seat. She had evidently not forgotten my implied reproach for this procedure.

The instant the omnibus stopped she started up, drew her dress and wrappings as far as possible out of my way, and, rejecting my proffered assistance, sprang from the vehicle, disappearing rapidly down a side street.

It had been arranged that I was to put up, in the first instance, at the village inn, with the ostensible object of looking out for some fishing in the neighbourhood, and call casually with my ticket of introduction on the doctor's family. I had a rod and tackle with me, but it was a line of another kind that was to claim the most careful manipulation at my hands; so at all events had decreed my aunt Euphrosyne.

Alighting now at the only hotel the place boasted of, I ordered something in the way of refreshment; and in the interim of awaiting its appearance I set myself to an inspection of a photograph of Letitia Lufleigh with which my aunt had armed me. Viewed critically, I could not but acknowledge that the features were good; but they had a corrective in a point which I decidedly objected to; the complexion was sombre. A dark-visaged wife! I had no fancy for the possession.

My meditations having run in this vein, I made inquiries as to the locality of Dr. Lufleigh's abode, set forth, and speedily found myself ringing at his door.

I had decided beforehand that this gentleman was short, round, and rubicund; and when I saw a tall, thin man, with a squeezed-looking face and a sallow, sad complexion, I half felt that I had made some mistake.

"Dr. Lufleigh?" I murmured.

A reply in the affirmative brought aunt Euphrosyne's letter from the inner recesses of my pocket, and my companion, adjusting a pair of spectacles, read it slowly. The signature finally acted as a talisman on him. The muscles of his lean features relaxed, and he extended his hand.

"The nephew of Miss Gorges is truly welcome to my humble hearth," he said, in a tone as full as could constitutionally be managed,

Here was I, struggling ignominiously on the ground, and, worse than all, planing the stately Letitia to the same posture of humiliation.

Digitized by Google

"Pray come into the drawing-room, and let me introduce you to the young ladies."

The instant I entered this apartment I started. The first face I saw was that of my bashful neighbour in the omnibus. She seemed to be in a chronic state of blushes, for her cheeks suffused all over now as the doctor announced her as "my daughter Lucy."

Lucy; but where was Letitia? The question was asked aloud almost as my thought framed it.

"What has become of Letitia?" demanded the doctor. "I thought she was here with you."

"So she was a moment since. I will call her, papa"; and Miss Lucy, glad to escape from my scrutiny, glided to the door.

I foreboded what the elder would be like. I had the dark colouring of her father before me; and the unerring truth of photography flashed, instantaneous as its own impressions, on my mind. I was so nervous till Letitia entered that the doctor seemed each instant about to feel my pulse, and I thought there would infallibly be a move to the surgery.

At last she appeared. Something in her aspect sent a quiver through me. She was handsome, no doubt, and I could trace a far-off likeness to the photograph. But the features looked larger and heavier in reality; and though the dull tinge I had so timorously apprehended was softened more into paleness than sallowness, there was enough, even in this milder hue, to rouse a feeling of aversion.

What between the stiffness of the one sister and the shyness of the other, my projected system of dispatch fell rather to the ground on the present occasion.

I did not take leave, however, without having received an invitation to a small party for the following evening; and, afloat on a more lively scene, possibly my own courage might rise, and the charms of the old and the coy young ladies expand in proportion.

CHAPTER II.
The Entanglement.

The hour for the entertainment having arrived, I put in a punctual appearance, and was ushered at once into a room gay with flowers and gaslight. Possibly I looked nervous again, for the doctor's hand was extended with a pulse-feeling gesture as he came forward to receive me. It changed, however, into something of a reassuring shake as he noted my brilliant shirt studs with the Gorges' arms inwrought in jewels. My eye rested quickly upon Letitia. She was in pale pink with white ruches, Lucy in a washed-out muslin; so there could be no hesitancy as to the object of devotion. I was at the side of the elder sister in a moment; I hovered about her like a shadow; she couldn't lay down her bouquet for one second but I had seized upon it, and was presenting it to her with a gracious grimace.

Miss Lufleigh was not without her womanly instincts, and she relaxed insensibly in the presence of such definite attentions. A deepening tinge came gradually into her cheeks, and this was enough to fire me at once.

"Charming colour pink is!" I exclaimed ecstatically, and ventured a nearer approach to the folds of her dress.

"Do you think so?" said Letitia calmly. "I suppose it becomes pale people."

"Pale! The most lovely tint of blush; just the hue I admire; anything deeper is so glaring and gaudy. I would not change it for worlds."

This rhapsody was without any definite subject, as may be seen, but Miss Lufleigh must have understood whereto it tended.

She rose suddenly and half averted her head.

"Do you dance?" she asked, looking towards an adjacent room where the preparations for this entertainment were commencing.

"Yes, certainly, gladly, delightedly, when I can secure a —a——"

"A partner in pink?" said Letitia, with a laugh.

The sound grated on me. What did she mean by the query? Did it bode mockery or encouragement? However that might be, I was not to be deterred now; and accepting the words as a promise I claimed her hand for the opening waltz. I was soon spinning about with her in its bewildering mazes.

"Enchanting! entrancing! ravishing! Let us pause for one second!" I exclaimed suddenly.

Certainly Miss Lufleigh had great physical powers, whatever else she might possess. We had been whirling and whirling as if we were to go on for ever, till I drew up at last with a gasp. My partner scanned me contemptuously.

"You don't care for waltzing?" she inquired, with her calm, dull face as cool as a cucumber.

"Oh yes, of all things; it is my passion!" And more mindful of the jeopardised "twelve thousand" than any considerations of exactitude, I seized her in the same breath round the waist, and before I knew where I was, or certainly where she was, I had dashed her violently against an unoffending couple, had knocked them over, ourselves after them, and had trampled her pink silk in a crushed mass beneath my feet..

I couldn't get up. Something horrible came over me. It was a sense of suffocating shame; and whenever I attempted a movement an awful rending sound—heartrending is the truer term—warned me that I was hopelessly entangled in the lower flounce of her dress.

What was I to do? The other gentleman and young lady were on their feet again in a moment, and here was I struggling ignominiously on the ground, and, worse than all, pinning the stately Letitia to the same posture of humiliation.

